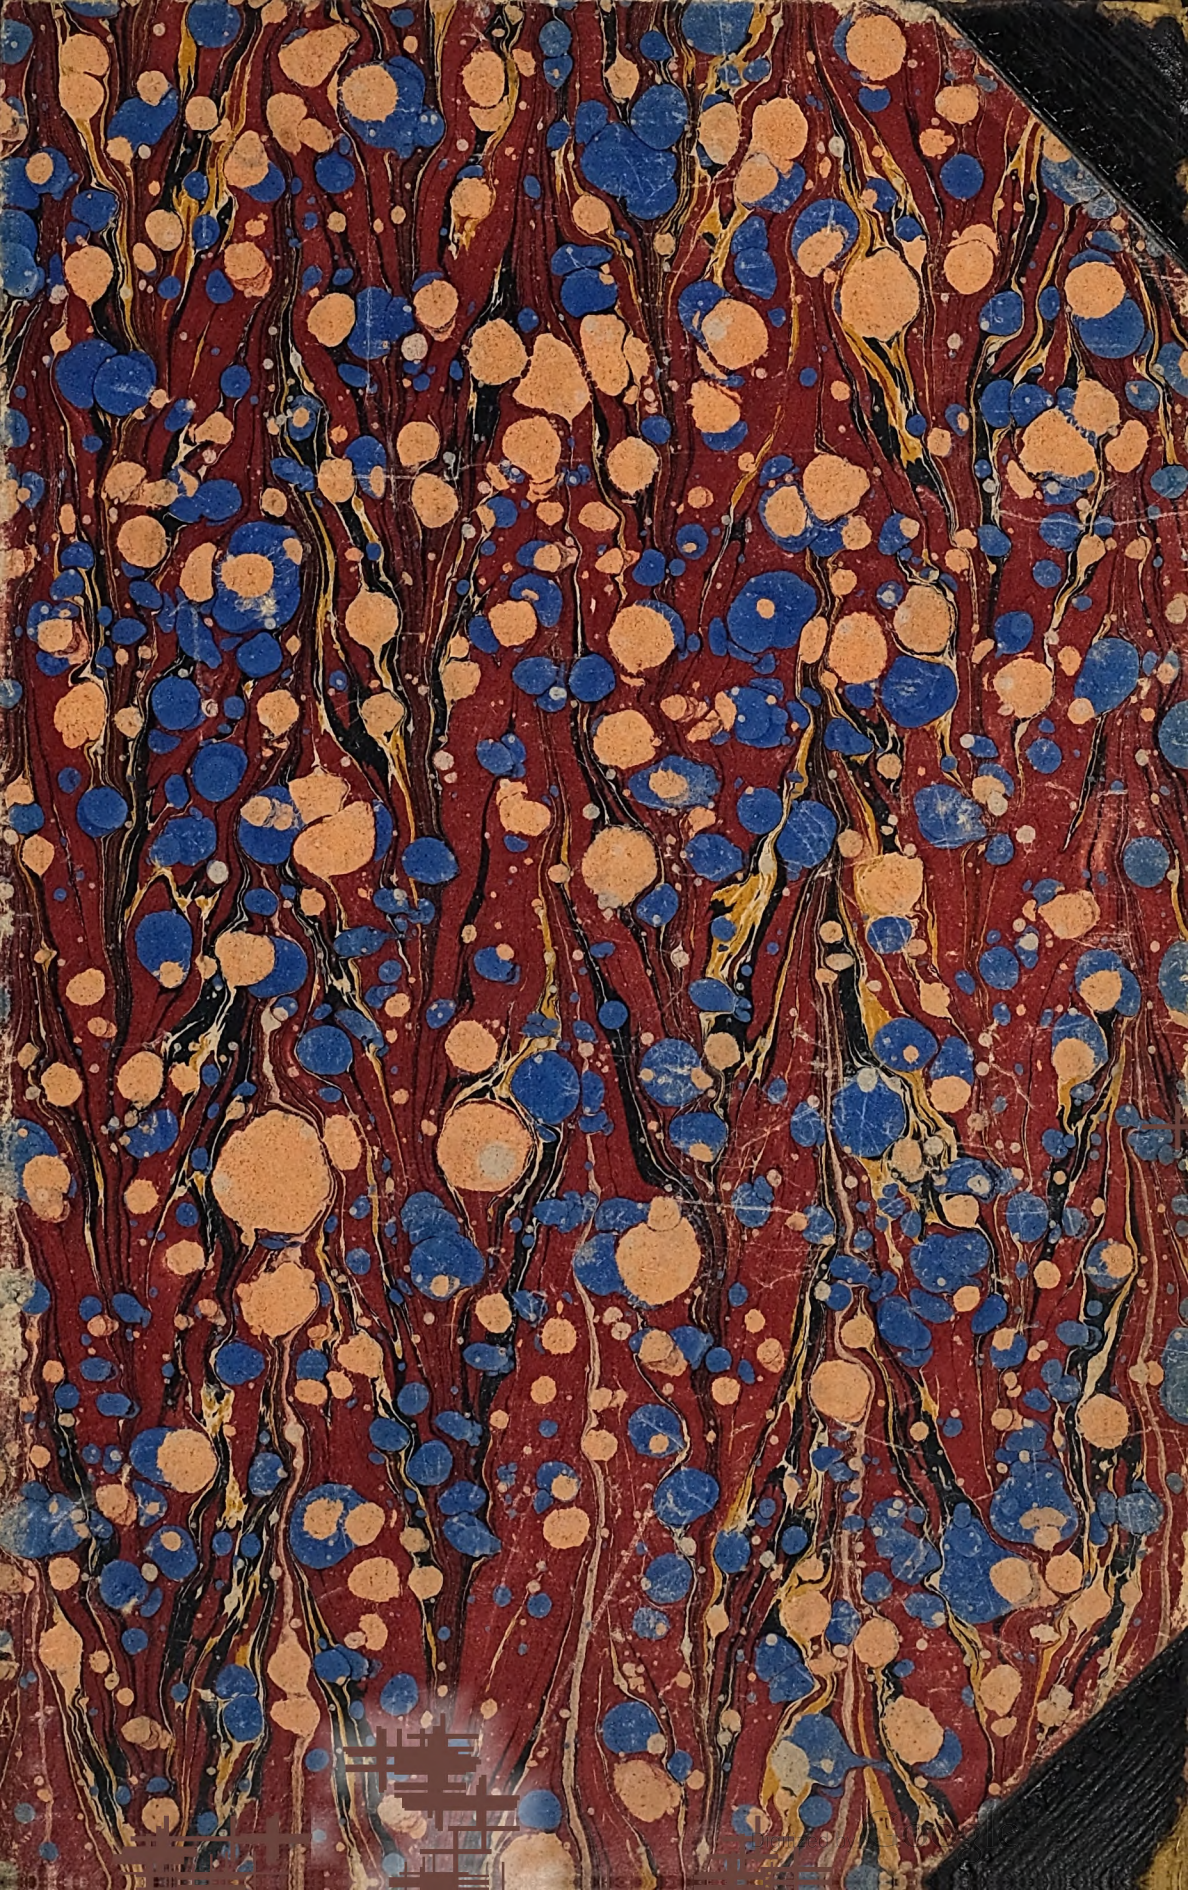
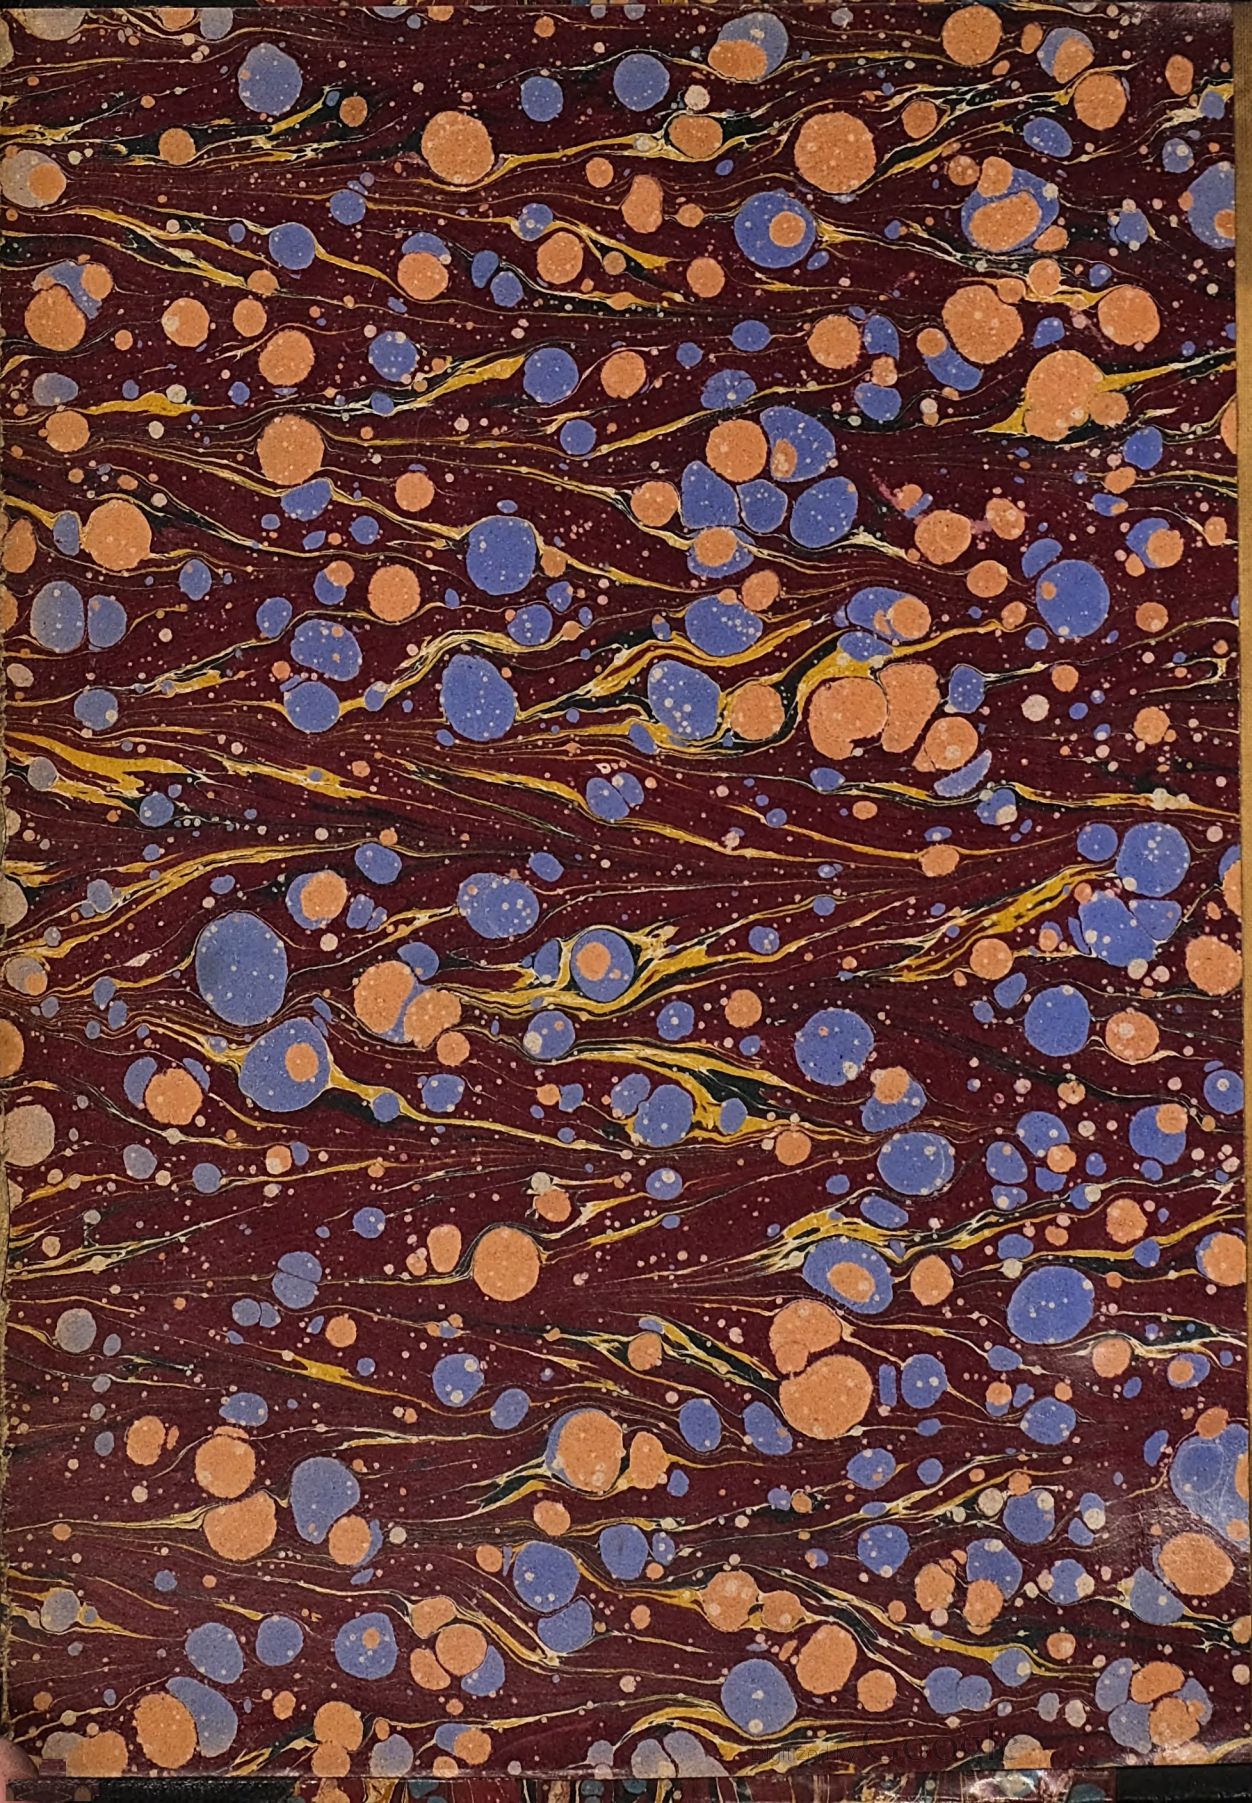
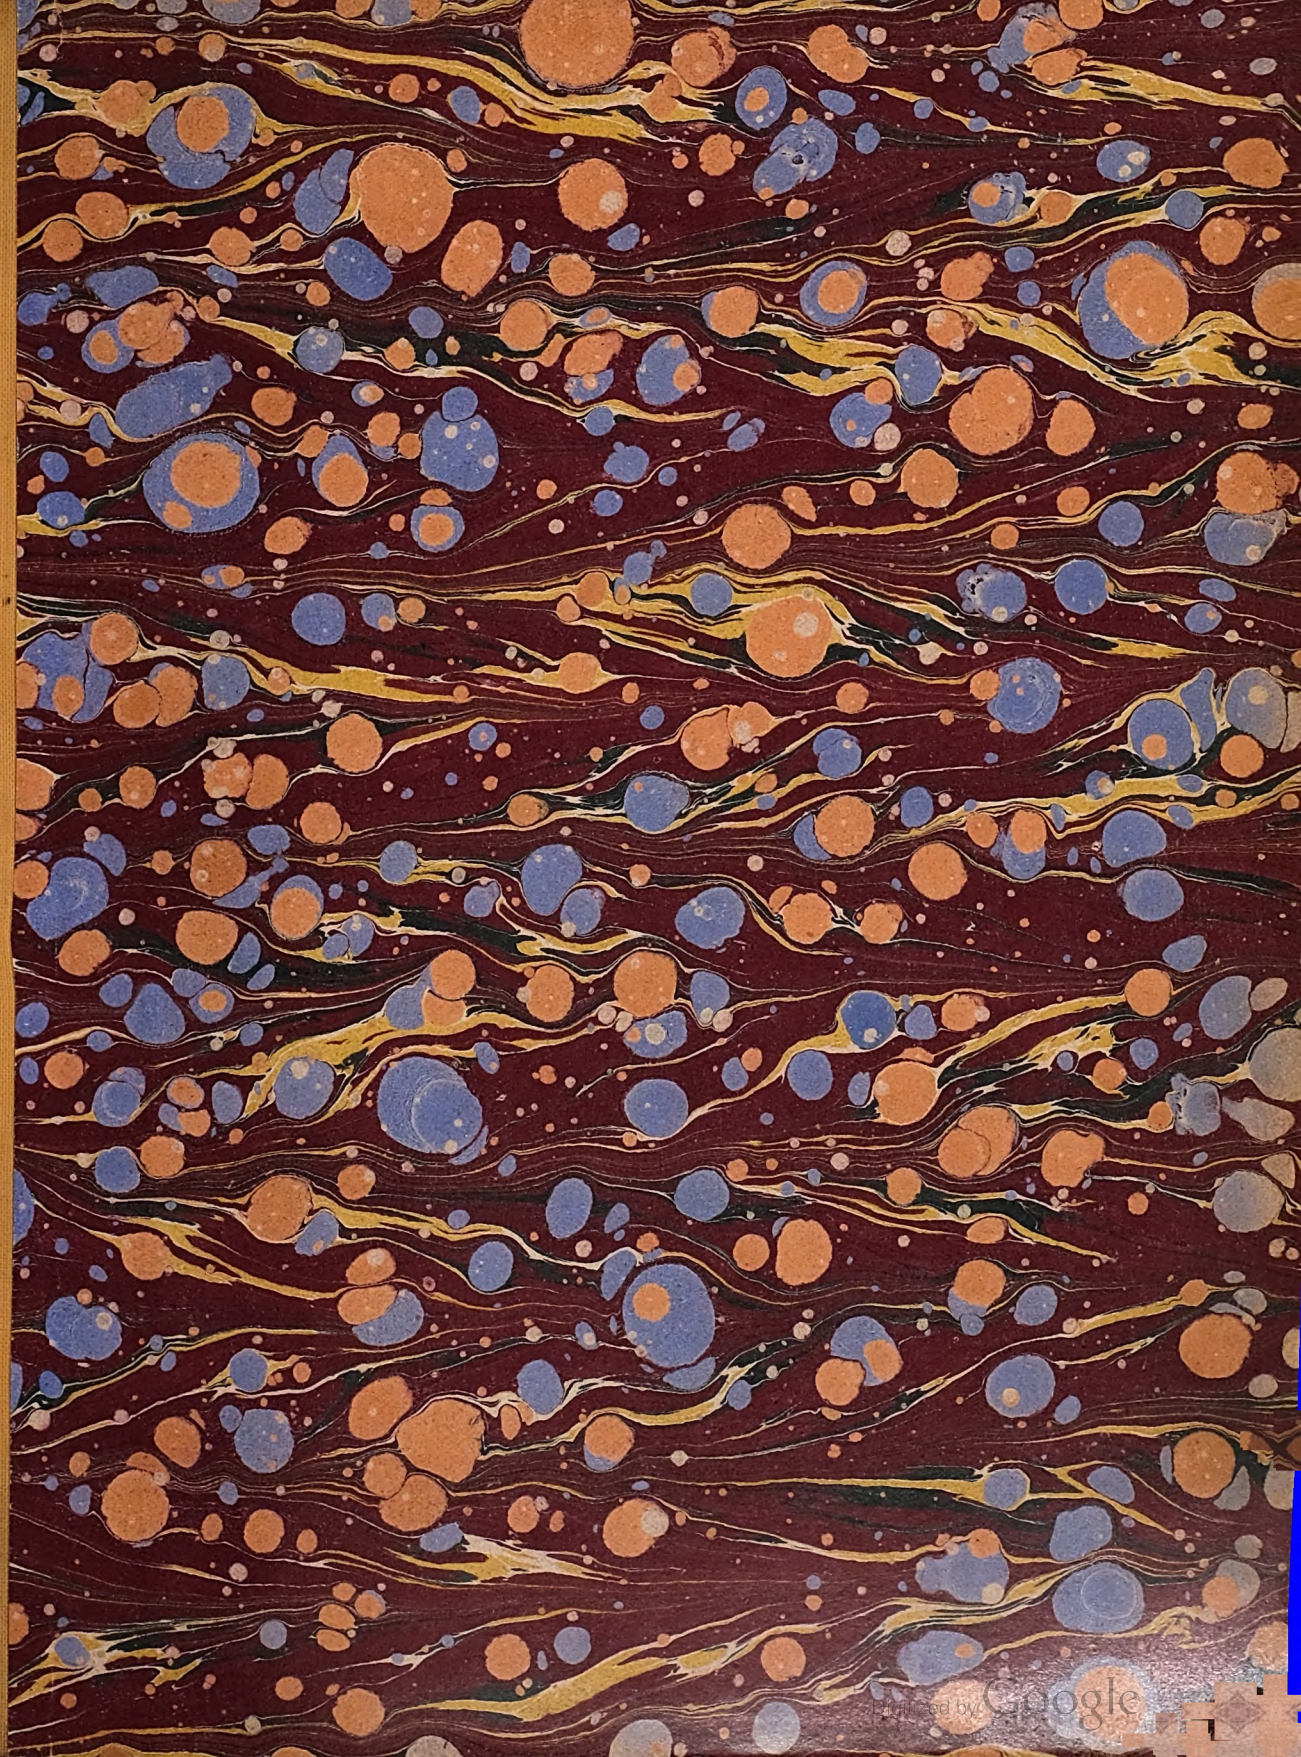
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com







Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

MacTaggart's First-Foot
See inside.

TARTAN COVER No. 7.—
ERSKINE.

No. 731.] Week ending January 3, 1903. [One Penny.

Digitized by Google

FREE PRESENTS.

FREE.

You can earn a 3 years warranted Watch, Life-sized Doll, Powerful Air Rifle, Beautiful Solid Gold filled Dress Rings, Long Guard, Bracelet, and Jewellery of all kinds from our list of presents. You can have any of these FREE after selling Nine Articles of Exquisite Jewellery, at 6d. each (sold by shops at 1/6.). We send the goods on approval on receipt of your post-card. When sold you remit us the 6/-, and you get a Beautiful Present, absolutely free. Send no money, we trust you. You take no risk, as they sell at once, and we receive back unsold goods. Colonials must send 1/- for extra postage.

FREE.

(Room 59) HYDE PARK WATCH CO.,
14 Ranelagh Road, Paddington, London, W.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

DAILY . . . EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY
For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

Don't be put off with a dangerous substitute. Insist upon Kaputine the safe remedy. Recommended by many eminent medical men.

Cures in ten minutes. Kaputine is not a single dangerous crude drug put up to evade the Government stamp duty, but is the safe remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-.
Samples 1d. each.
KAPUTINE LTD.,
HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

GIVEN AWAY
WITH THIS WEEK'S
Home Notes
(No. 468),
PAPER PATTERN OF THESE KNICKERS.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price ONE PENNY.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 731.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 3rd, 1903.

A Woman Hater.

And How he was Converted.

"Colonel Clarence is a woman hater, Barbara; your enthusiasm over his coming is quite misplaced."

Uncle Denis spoke with a sneer. He usually did. I think he is the most aggravating person I know, excepting aunt Fanny. They both take a delight — a positive delight—in making sarcastic speeches; and in being generally disagreeable. They have what my dear London arabs call "a down" on me.

Uncle Denis is my guardian, unfortunately, and I came to live with him and his sister, aunt Fanny, when my dear dad died.

Dad and I had spent most of our time travelling about together, and we were just two of the very happiest people in the world. Aunt Fanny says I was shockingly spoilt and indulged—and uncle Denis sniffs assent.

Perhaps dad did spoil me. We spoilt each other, I believe! At any rate my uncle and aunt did their best to neutralise the effect of my past happiness. They were at great pains to snub me on every available occasion, and to assure me repeatedly that it was unlucky I should have turned out such a plain, uninteresting girl.

This sort of treatment palls upon one after a time, and Dipleigh Court (my uncle's place), was not in any case a very lively abode.

Naturally, therefore, I was pleased to hear that Colonel Clarence, the Colonel whose name was in everyone's mouth, who had led the famous charge of Raslapan, was actually to be one of a house party at Dipleigh in the following week.

Naturally, too, having been accustomed to express pleasure when I felt it, I showed my delight. Hence the snub bestowed on me by uncle Denis: "Colonel Clarence is a woman hater, Barbara, your enthusiasm is quite misplaced."

"I can't quite see that, uncle Denis," I said, uncle Denis does aggravate me so, he has such a little shrivelled-up face, and such ferret's eyes. "I don't see why I shouldn't be enthusiastic about a woman hater, if he has done something worthy of enthusiasm. What have his views about women got to do with his soldiering?"

Uncle Denis snorted unpleasantly, and smiled the sarcastic smile which fills me with an unholy longing to kick him.

"I merely wished to warn you that Colonel Clarence is not likely to return your enthusiastic interest. He is a most pronounced woman hater."

All rights reserved.]

"Then he has probably treated a woman badly, or been treated badly by a woman," I retorted; and I actually smiled up into uncle Denis' sour visage. I tried never to show when he annoyed me; it did so please him to upset and vex people, and he merely sniffed at me again.

"Woman hater, indeed?" I said to myself as I sat before the glass doing my hair on the evening the Colonel was expected. "Now, my dear, that means one of two things." I nodded at myself in the glass, "either the poor man has been run after by women till he hates the very sight of them, or one woman has broken his heart and he is afraid to trust it to another."

My dear old dad had taught me a good deal of shrewd worldly wisdom; although he had at the same time a most simple, loving soul.

"I expect"—I went on soliloquising aloud, "that this poor woman hater would be rather surprised and disappointed if he were not made much of; we shall see."

Then I laughed at my own reflection. "You plain, uninteresting girl," I said, curtseying to myself in the long pier glass which aunt Fanny declared was an incitement to vanity, "we shall see."

My gown was white and soft and fell in heavy folds. Dad always liked me in white. He said it went well with the copper of my hair, and my grey eyes. That evening I wore no colour at all; and the flowers in my belt were white roses.

There was only one person in the drawing-room when I went down, a tall man with a bronzed face, a heavy moustache and the very keenest blue eyes I ever saw.

"Behold the woman hater," I said to myself, and aloud, my hospitable instincts getting the upper hand, "I think you must be Colonel Clarence? I am Mr. Denis Tenby's niece."

He shook hands with me; but I could see a look of annoyance shoot into his eyes, and a most funny expression of bored resignation crossed his face. I knew perfectly well that he was thinking:

"Another woman to bother me and gush."

And before he could begin a polite nothing, I said:

"I know you will excuse me, but I have a note I must write before dinner," and I sailed off to the writing table, feeling, rather than seeing, the astonishment in his eyes.

From where I sat, I could just see his brown bullet head over the top of the chair into which he had subsided, and I noticed that he shuffled his feet impatiently once or twice, and I smiled as I wrote that unnecessary note. Before I had finished it, aunt Fanny came gushing in. She looked from the great man to me, a storm gathering in her face.

Digitized by Google

"Barbara," she said, in her 'well, I am surprised' voice, "did you not know Colonel Clarence?"

I came forward, wrinkling my brows.

"Know it, was Colonel Clarence," I said; "oh, yes, I guessed that you must be he, did I not?" I beamed upon the big person on the hearthrug, "but I had a very important note to write, and I knew Colonel Clarence would forgive me."

Then uncle Denis entered the room, his face wreathed in smiles, most unusual to it, and whilst he talked to the guest, aunt Fanny whispered acidly to me:

"I don't know what he will think of your behaviour, Barbara. To allow a man of his eminence to sit and amuse himself whilst you write notes—a chit of a girl too!"

Aunt Fanny always became incoherent in her tempers; she gave me no opportunity to reply, but turned back to the Colonel. We were alone that evening, and uncle Denis kept our guest in close conversation throughout dinner; whilst aunt Fanny listened with rapt attention.

I also listened, but I continued to look as if my thoughts were far away; I did it because I caught those blue eyes looking at me across the table with a puzzled expression, especially when the conversation turned upon the recent war.

When uncle Denis began to mention the word Raslapan, I saw out of the corner of my eyes what an intensely bored look crossed Colonel Clarence's face, but uncle Denis has the perception of a rhinoceros and went on gaily, asking a series of questions about that famous charge.

I pretended harder than ever not to hear, especially when I knew that the bored look on the face opposite was changing to one of increased surprise as he watched my impassive visage.

"You know every detail of Raslapan," my uncle suddenly said viciously, turning to me. I gave a great jump.

"I?" I said, "Oh, I beg your pardon, uncle Denis, I am so sorry. What was it you were saying?"

"You have Raslapan at your fingers' ends," he repeated, "you always go wild over the heroic." The sneer in his voice was rather unbearable, nevertheless I laughed lightly.

"Oh, I don't know about that," I said, "wars and rumours of wars have become almost monotonous lately, haven't they?" I flashed a look across the table; the blue eyes met mine, their look was still puzzled.

"Just like a girl," uncle Denis muttered, "never know their own mind two minutes together?"

All the same I knew my mind perfectly well!

After dinner aunt Fanny talked to me for fully half an hour upon the superiority of the young women of her youth. If they all turned into aunt Fannys I have no wish to emulate them.

Colonel Clarence was buttonholed by uncle Denis for the whole evening, and I stole away early. I knew that the soldier's eyes were often upon me, but I did not meet them again.

"It is most excellent for him not to imagine that every woman must adore him," I said to myself, and again spoke to my own image in the glass, "the woman hater must learn a lesson."

Next day the house filled up, one unmarried girl was of the party, my cousin, Annie Deane.

"Oh, Bab," she said eagerly, as I went upstairs with her, "you've got him here, haven't you?"

"Him?—who?" I asked.

"Why Colonel Clarence; the Colonel Clarence?"

"Oh, yes—he's here," I made my voice quite indifferent, and began to hum a tune.

"My dear Bab"—Annie looked at me with eyes grown round and awed, "you speak of him as if he were nobody, it makes me positively shiver with joy to think of seeing him close."

"My dear Annie," I said mockingly, "he is only a man, much like other men, except that he poses as a woman hater."

"Perhaps some hateful creature jilted him," she said warmly.

"Perhaps," I answered coolly, "I really don't know." Annie is a perfect goose. She took the line at once of hanging on Colonel Clarence's words as though they were pearls and diamonds, and of deferring to his opinion as if he were a Solomon.

"No wonder the poor thing is a woman hater," I said to myself twenty times a day, when I saw that not only Annie, but the rest of the ladies of the party, laid themselves, metaphorically, under his feet.

"The man simply despises women for being such fools. So do I." I felt really vicious; perhaps I have a spice of uncle Denis' temper somewhere in me. I did not join the throng of worshippers when they sat round with rapt countenances, asking questions about the campaign. I usually discovered something most important to do elsewhere, and the more persistently Colonel Clarence's blue eyes watched me, the more did I appear not to notice them.

One evening I slipped out on to the terrace after dinner. The garden was fragrant with the scent of roses; a silver moon hung in the deep sky; a nightingale sang in the copse.

A step on the gravel made me turn.

"What a delightfully peaceful place!" Colonel Clarence's deep voice struck on my ear.

"Yes," I said, "I came out to find some fresh air, and fresh ideas." I added mischievously, looking up at him. The war had been talked all dinner time.

"You don't take much interest in the war?" he asked.

"W-e-ll—one can have too much even of a good thing, can't one?" I said. "You see, I read all about it in the papers at the time."

I was rather proud of that speech, because no item of the war failed to interest me, really!

"I quite agree with you," he spoke eagerly. "I'm dead sick of being asked questions about it all; and ladies want to know so much."

"Do we?" I asked.

"I didn't include you amongst them," he exclaimed hastily.

"Thanks," I said; and I made him a low mocking courtesy; "it is true aunt Fanny says I'm more a tomboy than a woman," I added, reflectively.

Then I looked at him. His eyes shone in the moonlight; his teeth gleamed white as he smiled.

"You—don't care much about men, do you?" he said doubtfully.

"Not particularly," I answered nonchalantly, "but why?"

"Well, I thought; it seemed, I mean," the hero of Raslapan stumbled hopelessly.

"Yes?" I said, "you thought?"

"Well, you never seem to care to join in the conversation when—when I am talking——"

"Don't I?" I knitted my brows as though in deep thought; "I think I rather like to talk myself, you know. If you have monopolised the conversation at all, I expect I didn't care to play second fiddle. Was that it?"

I smiled at him sweetly; he looked utterly nonplussed.

"Oh!" he said feebly; "it wasn't exactly intentional then? I mean you didn't purposely avoid me."

I laughed.

"Why should I avoid you?" I said; "why you more than anybody else? All men are more or less alike, aren't they; just as women are?"

Digitized by Google

I looked at him again.

Then I looked away, because there was a light in his eyes which made my heart beat.

"Are women all alike?" he said; "I don't find them so. I—I usually dislike women, but——"

"Do you?" I broke in lightly; "how funny; but why? You don't mean to say you're a woman hater? Oh! I'll go in at once!" I half turned from him, but he stopped me.

"If you only knew," he began, and there was a pleading note in his voice that I could not resist.

"I don't want to be a conceited jackass, but—my life has been a burden to me lately, because——"

"Because women are fools," I said shortly. "I've no patience with them. Why, I believe you might be quite nice if they hadn't spoilt you. It is a pity."

And before he could recover from his speechless astonishment I had fled into the house.

I did not see him again that night. Next morning when I went into the garden as usual before breakfast, he was the first person I met. He was in the rose garden, looking absently at a bush of white roses. When he saw me he smiled.

"You wore white roses the first day I saw you," he said.

"Did I?" I answered quietly, but my heart beat much faster than I liked, and I did not care about meeting the glance of those keen eyes.

"Come and sit here and tell me what you meant last night," he said, pointing to a seat. Now to this day I know not why I obeyed him; I suppose his habit of commanding gives him a masterful air. Anyhow, I sat down.

"What I meant last night?" I asked, trying to speak lightly; "why, what did I say? We talked about so many things."

"You said I was spoilt because women were fools."

"Did I? How rude of me!" I made patterns on the gravel then with my foot for I felt that his eyes were on me, and I was getting more and more nervous.

"In what way am I spoilt?" he persisted.

"Well, you know," I said, plucking up courage, "you do seem to think that everybody is just made to listen to you and worship you. You may call yourself a woman hater—but——"

"But what?"

"But I don't believe you are." I glanced at him nervously; his eyes twinkled, a smile glimmered round his mouth.

"You are fairly outspoken," he said.

"Yes. I always was. You see, I am not in the least afraid of you, and I think it's a great pity you should go about posing as a woman hater, which simply makes silly women admire you, and sensible ones despise you. Now why not treat us all naturally? I——"

I was well launched on my subject, when suddenly I felt my hand taken and grasped firmly in his big brown one.

"Are you one of the silly, or sensible women?" he said. "No—look at me and tell me truly"—for I was most busy at that moment looking at a rose-bud into which a bee was dipping. I had to look round, he was so masterful. He only grasped my hand tighter.

"I—I—don't think I have considered the matter," I said, with flagrant disregard of truth.

"You don't know whether you despise me or not?" Something pleading crept into the masterfulness of his voice; he bent a little nearer to me.

"I—I—don't despise you," I said—my voice shook, which annoyed me; "but of course I wouldn't grovel round you as though you were a little god. I don't think you are!"

I looked at him defiantly.

"What is your opinion of me?" His voice shook now.

"I don't exactly see what my opinion of you matters, one way or the other." My coolness returned as his vanished; "I think you are just a very human sort of man," I ended mischievously; "and I can't imagine what uncle Denis would think if he heard me giving my opinion!"

"Pshaw! Who cares about uncle Denis?"

"Well, you see, he says I am a chit of a girl who has no right to opinions; a plain, uninteresting chit of a girl." I spoke slowly and thoughtfully, making patterns with my foot. My hand was still a prisoner.

His grasp on it tightened.

"A plain — uninteresting—chit of a girl—You?"

"Yes—I——"

"I wish I could duck uncle Denis in the nearest and dirtiest duck-pond," he growled. Then suddenly his voice changed and softened. I never imagined his deep voice could grow so gentle.

"Shall I tell you something?" he said.

I nodded.

"I can't get away from the memory of you as I first saw you; all in white, with your crown of bronze hair. I—may be a conceited ape, and spoilt, and everything you say, but—I love you dear——"

The simple ending made my heart leap. I was silent because I could not speak.

"Could you put up with a fellow like me?" he said anxiously.

Now I badly wanted to put my arms round his neck, and tell him then and there that I loved the very ground he walked on, but it would never have done, would it? It would have simply made him put me on the level of all his other silly worshippers. Besides which, it is very bad for a man to know too much of one's feelings. So I only said:

"I believe I could put up with you, only—you won't want me to fall down and worship, will you? I shan't ever think you an angel——"

Then he took me in his arms and kissed me.

All the same I think he is very nearly perfect, and I am most truly sorry for all the wives who have not got husbands like mine!

L. G. Moberly.

"I HAVE noticed that it is the bad boy who seems to get on best in school." "Yes; the teachers promote them to get rid of them."

"HERE, my little boy," said a benevolent old gentleman to a weeping boy, "I wouldn't cry that way if I were you." "How did you cry when you were a little boy?" asked the weeper, during a temporary cessation of tears.

THEY were two little children, and they were painting pictures in their school books. One youngster finished a cow in blue, and then remembered never to have seen a blue cow. "Never mind," said the other; "we will say the cow is cold."

WIFE (to her husband, who is a great criminal lawyer, and who has found fault with the dinner): "There you go again, always finding fault with my cooking. You never see any redeeming qualities in me, and yet you have an excuse for every murderer that comes along."

"SAY, pa," queried Willie the other morning, while preparing his geography lesson, "how many motions has the earth?" "I don't know, Willie," replied the fond parent, as he bound a towel soaked in ice water about his throbbing brow, "but they're numerous, very numerous."

"PAPA," said the young mother, "I've decided on a name for the baby. We will call her Imogen." Papa was lost in thought for a few minutes. He did not like the name, but if he opposed it his wife would have her own way. "That's nice," said he, presently. "My first sweetheart was named Imogen, and she will take it as a compliment." "We will call her Mary, after my mother," was the stern reply.

Digitized by Google

HER FAIRY STORY;

Or, HELPING HIS RIVAL.

How bewitching the girl looked, with her cheeks aglow where the frosty air had touched them, and her usually bright, expressive eyes rendered still more sparkling and vivacious by the delight of the afternoon ride! She had taken off her warm jacket and her hat and gloves, and had returned to the cosy drawing-room to chat with her companion, a man of six-and-twenty.

He gazed at her as she lay ensconced in the cushions of a particularly comfortable arm-chair; she was staring dreamily into the fire, having sunk into a reverie. If anyone could have looked into his eyes, they would have observed an expression indicative of love and longing.

"Bessie," he said suddenly, causing her to start slightly at the abrupt break in the silence, "when are you going to marry me?"

"I wonder how many more times you will ask that question, Frank?" she inquired with a smile. "You have been asking it off and on ever since I was a little girl and you were only just a little bigger boy! You asked me every time you saw me with a new frock; of that I am quite certain!"

"And now I ask it without even that provocation!" retorted Frank. "You have never given me an answer. In the earlier days I did not attach so much importance to not having a reply, but we are older now, Bessie, and the matter is more serious."

Bessie laughed. The laugh began merrily, but it assumed a different note before it concluded, although Frank did not notice the change. This question and answer had, as she said, been a commonplace for years; they had grown up to regard it unconsciously as something in the nature of a jest that is half in earnest, and she was treating it so now, but with a purpose. Frank was only half in earnest still; he was in that peculiar frame of mind when one accepts a refusal, or procrastination, contentedly because one feels sure that the thing will come about in time.

"Well," he yawned, for the warmth of the fire had a somnolent effect. "I shall ask you again soon, because"—and here he became more wideawake, more serious—"because I want you, Bessie!"

"Frank," she said quietly, "there is only one obstacle to our union."

"And that is some petty affair not worth considering, of course!" he rejoined promptly. "We have been so much together, that——"

"It is that I do not, cannot, love you enough to become your wife, Frank! You are a dear old boy, and—and you will understand it."

"We are getting on a bit!" he declared with a laugh. "I have received something more than the usual reply, so I hope soon to get the wedding-day fixed!"

She looked away from him and gazed into the fire once more. Her face was troubled, but he could not see it in the gloom of the gathering darkness.

"Frank," she said softly, after a pause, "I used to tell you fairy tales when we were boy and girl. Perhaps I am out of practice now, but suppose I try? I have a fairy tale which I should like to relate."

"I don't see what that has to do with the subject in hand, Bessie, but I suppose I mustn't press you any further to-day. We shall get further next time. Yes, go on with the fairy story, but you won't mind if I fall asleep, will you?"

She slipped from her chair and seated herself on a hassock near him, so that he could have placed his hand quite easily on her head and caressed the glossy hair.

"Once upon a time," she began, in true fairy-tale style, "there were a father and a daughter who went to Scotland to stay for a few weeks in a mansion of the Western Highlands. They rented the place for the time, transacting the business of hiring through the owner's solicitor."

"That isn't very exciting," remarked Frank, "and I won't guarantee not to go to sleep!"

"Yes, you will!" replied the girl in a tone of quiet confidence. "Well, the stay was a very pleasant one, but the girl wished to see the country and the two made journeys to places quite a long distance from the mansion and sometimes had to put up at a hotel for a night in consequence.

"I wanted to see—I mean, the daughter wanted to see—some of the crofters on their pasturage holdings; some of the poorest, if possible; and to that end she persuaded her father to undertake one of those long journeys. When they reached the particular locality mentioned by a friend as a favourable spot, we set about visiting some of the people in their dwellings."

"Rather cheeky of you!"

"It was while visiting the occupants of these dwellings, by whom we were very hospitably received, that a strange incident occurred. We were met at the door of a wooden structure, with a thatched roof, by a man who was not a crofter, although he was dressed in the garb of one and his beard and hair were unkempt and untrimmed. He was a tall, strongly built man under thirty, and he showed the training of a gentleman as soon as his attitude of defiance yielded to one of affability, which it did after a few words."

Bessie stopped and Frank sat up a little. "What of the man?"

"He showed us into his best room and did his best to make us comfortable. The girl was surprised to find on the shelf many books that betrayed the scholar; and in his conversation he unconsciously gave indications of having travelled and of being a well-bred, highly intellectual, chivalrous man—a gentleman, in short.

"My father left us conversing about music, of which he was undoubtedly very fond, and on other subjects, and the fifteen minutes during which his absence lasted, appeared to go like the same number of seconds. I longed to ask this crofter why he came to be there, but some indefinable influence restrained me, and I suppose it was so with my—I mean, with the girl's father!" concluded Bessie hastily, recognising that she had been speaking in the first person.

"We left the crofter's dwelling," she went on, again relapsing into the personal, "but not before father took a snapshot at this 'interior,' as he called it, and when the picture was developed I was surprised—and pleased—to see that it included the crofter and myself as we sat talking. I will show it to you in a minute! We went back to our temporary home, and three days later the crofter appeared and asked that he might see me, in order to give me some Spring flowers and to leave some music which he thought might please me! I asked the servant to show him in; they were our own servants, travelling with us. He entered, and I was pleased to find that he had trimmed his beard, and had his hair cut. I think that he was wearing a slightly better suit of clothes, but I didn't notice that especially; I only noticed that he was even more like a gentleman in bearing than before.

"I am afraid that I was rather forgetful of conventionality, for I asked him if he would like to hear the old pieces played, and I played them. One of them was a dreamy song, a love song. Then he went and I have not seen him since."

Digitized by Google

"You said that you would show me the picture!" said Frank in a strained voice. He was widewake now.

"Oh, never mind that! It is only a fairy story, you know, and I do not understand why I have told it, except—But let us forget it."

"I should like to see the picture!" said Frank in a strangely subdued, but persistent tone.

She brought it to him, lighting the gas that he might see it the better. It was not a perfect picture by any means, but it was sufficiently distinct for him to see the two faces clearly. He started as he recognised the features of the man and his hand trembled as he muttered under his breath:

"Alec Malcolm!"

"Don't smile at father's amateurish effort and say things to yourself about it!" said Bessie, with a poor attempt at jocularity. She was wondering what effect the fairy story and the snap-shot would have upon him.

"Thank you," he said, handing it back to her and speaking nonchalantly. "You promised me a game of chess, and I should like to undertake something serious after the frivolity of fables and fairy tales!"

Bessie's father had announced his intention of spending some time on the Continent, and within a week after the scene in the drawing-room they were off. Frank Staynes made rapid preparations, and on the following day he was off to Scotland. He had no difficulty in finding the locality mentioned by Bessie, and at noon on a cold Spring day he knocked at the door of the crofter dwelling. He had found it by giving a description of his man, for he rightly guessed that Malcolm had assumed another name.

"Frank Staynes!" gasped the astounded Malcolm, on beholding his former college friend. "How—how did you find me out?"

"That's another story, Alec!" replied Staynes lightly. "I've come to spend a week or two with you for the sake of quietude. I want to read up—something—and my nerves are not so steady as they ought to be, so I want more solitude. See? Oh, I'm prepared to rough it, and I can pay for my keep and the rent, old fellow. Don't shut your door against an old college acquaintance."

"Well, if you put it like that," said Malcolm, "I'll not say nay to you. Come in, and be welcome to what there is, but I'm puzzled to understand how you found me! I thought I had slipped from all the old friends and acquaintances."

"Let us have something to eat," said Frank, "and we can go into the thing. I see you have your frugal repast ready and as there doesn't appear to be enough for two, I am glad that I brought a sandwich or so with me."

"I'll have enough for two at the next meal," smiled Malcolm. "I didn't expect company, you see!"

The "frugal repast" was soon ended, and Frank Staynes carried his trunk into another room which served as a bedroom. There was no second bed, but Staynes soon arranged that with a rug, and stated that a hammock was coming. He had ordered one at the place where he had bought his rough clothing, which he intended to wear.

"I'm going to be a crofter for a time," he declared, "and I'm sure it will do me good!"

He had so far dodged the question asked by Malcolm, as to how he had found out his former schoolfellow. He proceeded deliberately with his plan, and, for the better accomplishment of his object he avoided asking why Malcolm had chosen the life he was leading.

"I'll find out all about it soon; first let me learn the truth on the other matter!" mused Staynes. "Does Malcolm love——"

A slight exclamation from Malcolm interrupted his musings. He, Frank, had tumbled several things out of his trunk for the purpose of placing them handy on the shelves or the table; a cabinet photo of Bessie Danvers had fallen out, and this had caught the eye of Alec Malcolm. Staynes pretended not to notice the exclamation, but proceeded to sort his things. He picked up the photo and put it in a small writing case which he had brought with him. In a few minutes he had done all that was necessary, and he was ready to accompany his host to the open, where he had to tend the sheep.

Alec Malcolm seemed much preoccupied at times, while at others he would talk freely. It was in one of those expansive moods that he disclosed his reason for living apart from his fellows.

"It is strange, perhaps, but I am doing it for three or four years in order to raise money," he said. "My father was owner of an estate without a rent-roll, for all the money obtained from the cottages on it is swallowed up in repairs, and so forth. When he died, and I came into the property, I found that there was nothing to live on. My father had kept up a goodly show by living on his capital, and all that was left when his debts were paid was the estate, which I cannot sell, and a large number of mining shares that seem to be worthless, although my father never lost faith in their possibilities. He believed the mines would prosper one day and the shares bring in large dividends and be worth a lot of money.

"It was a blow to me when I learnt the truth, and I pondered on ways and means. I found out that I could easily let the house, for shooting, and so on, and make about £700 a year net out of it. I might have done that and lived quietly abroad, or gone to Australia and set up in business, but sentiment overpowered me. I love the old country, I love Scotland. So I descended to this, and am earning a small living, while I am putting the rent away in the bank. In five years I shall have a fair sum, and then I hope to be able to do something—I can't tell what yet. I like the life, but I fear that I was beginning to degenerate when, nearly a year ago, I was pulled up by—well, by Fate, I suppose!"

He became quiet after that, and Frank Staynes left him alone.

At night Frank turned in first. Malcolm said he was not sleepy and intended to read. An hour passed, and then Staynes saw his host walk stealthily into the room and approach the writing-case.

"It's mean, but I must see that face again!" he muttered. He was unconscious that, in his excitement, he was talking audibly enough for anyone to hear. Moreover, Staynes was asleep! "How came he with her portrait? It haunts me!"

Staynes, peering at him, saw him open the case, take out the photo and stare at it in the dim light of a lantern which lighted his face as well as the picture. If Staynes had entertained any doubt that Alec Malcolm loved Bessie Danvers, that glance at the former's face dispelled it.

It seemed to be several minutes before Malcolm took his gaze from the photo, and then it was to throw a swift glance at the hammock. He saw nothing, but, through a slit in the material, Staynes saw him kiss the photo and replace it in the writing-case.

Several days passed, but no allusion was made to the woman whom both men loved. Staynes did not remain awake long after turning in at night, and Malcolm was always the last to retire; but Staynes knew that the photo had been looked at, because its position in the case, arranged by himself, was always a little different in the morning.

Frank noticed a cup that was kept scrupulously clean, but never used. It remained on the top shelf of a cupboard—not that in which Malcolm kept his crockery and food, but one in which he kept some of his best books.

Digitized by Google

"This seems to be a souvenir," he remarked casually. "I should like to have my tea in that!"

He took it down and made ready to place it on the table. Malcolm laid a restraining hand on his arm.

"Not that, Frank! That is sacred to me! Don't laugh! I can't bear it, and I shall punch you if you do!"

The concluding words were uttered fiercely. Frank laughed and replaced the cup with a jesting apology; he had adopted the light tone with the object of soothing Malcolm, but it was wrongly interpreted, and he nearly received the promised punch.

One morning, Staynes went into the bedroom hurriedly, and thus unintentionally precipitated the crisis. Malcolm was standing near the writing-case with the photo in his hand. He was caught in the act, and he coloured to the roots of his hair.

"Hallo!" cried Staynes cheerily, but with a cheeriness that was wholly assumed. "What have you got there?"

For a second the other did not reply; then he spoke with suppressed passion.

"Frank, what is she to you? You have her photo, and such a thing is not permissible unless a man has asked the woman to be his wife! Tell me, do you love her?"

"Miss Danvers is my third or fourth cousin, or first cousin four times removed, or something of that kind," answered Frank, "and she and I are the best of friends—quite brother and sister, in fact. We've known each other since we were children, but she doesn't love me, and wouldn't have the slightest idea of marrying me even if I were a Duke! I'm positive of that!"

So he was, but he had not answered Malcolm's question. His reply was sufficient for his host, however, who placed the photo reverently on the case, and seized Frank's hands in his iron grip.

"Frank," he said brokenly, "forgive me for my caddish act in going to your desk, but I love her! She was here a year ago, and she has brightened my life, although it has been somewhat embittered by the thought that I could never possess her. Then I saw it among your things, that photo, and I have been nearly mad since. If there were only a chance for me!"

"I do not see why there should not be," declared Frank stoutly, despite the pain at his own heart. "Why not come back with me and see her?"

"Have I anything to offer her?" asked Malcolm sorrowfully.

"You have nearly three thousand saved, and a splendid home. She has enough money in her own right."

"I could not accept——"

"And spoil your own happiness and hers?" cried Frank angrily.

"Hers?" repeated Malcolm, catching at the word. "Do you mean——?"

"Come with me and ascertain for yourself, Alec. I cannot answer for a woman's feelings!"

A letter forwarded from home told Frank that Bessie had returned from the Continent, and he and his host left the crofter holding for London. Malcolm took the cup with him, and they broke the journey at Malcolm's estate, where the cup was placed in safety. "She drank from it," was all the explanation vouchsafed by him.

"Do you think she would like this?" asked Malcolm, while looking over the grounds. "She seemed happy enough while she was staying here."

"It was here?" inquired Staynes in astonishment. "I never thought of asking her where she stayed. So you really visited her in your own home?"

"Yes," assented Alec Malcolm with a smile. "I took care that none of the tenants should see me, and all the old servants are gone!"

They went to the metropolis and called at the residence of Mr. Danvers. Staynes sent up his card to Bessie, who came running into the reception room.

"I'm so glad to see—Mr. Alexander!" she gasped, as she caught sight of the other. "I did not know that you were coming with Frank; he only sent up his own card."

"I trust that you are really glad to see Mr. Alexander, Bessie, as you said just now!" said Frank, with a quiet smile. "I am sure he is glad to see you, and I may tell you that his real name is Alexander Malcolm, and I hope you will congratulate him on a circumstance that will enable him to give up the life of a crofter and reside again in his proper home, the place where you lived last year. I see by the papers that certain mines are looking up, and the shares promise to be worth a great deal, but I fancy that my old college friend has not read the good news yet!"

As they glanced at one another, Frank Staynes slipped away to a little study which was always regarded as his room when he was staying with the Danvers. How long he sat there he knew not, but he was aroused by feeling a pair of arms incircle his neck, and the touch of lips on his cheek.

"You're as good as a brother to me, Frank! However can I repay you?" said a well-known voice. "It is all your doing! It is so good of you, and—I am so happy!"

F. Brewster.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE

is offered to all readers of Short Stories who care to become readers of Pearson's Weekly, and to fulfil the conditions of the competition which starts there shortly.

In order that you may not be too late to take advantage of this liberal offer, you should at once get a copy of Pearson's Weekly and read all about this huge scheme.

Result of the "Albert Gate Anagram" Competition.

THE Gramophones in the above competition have been awarded as follows:

J. Hargreaves, 8 Houghton Street, Bury.
C. Martin, 1 Park Avenue North, Priory Road, Hornsey, N.
E. Friend, 65 Eastern Road, Romford.
Marshall Gray, care of 63 Withnell Road, South Shore, Blackpool.
Mrs. H. Spice, 59 Southover Street, Brighton.
W. Hindle, 35 Olney Street, Walton, Liverpool.
W. Stevenson, 18 Granville Terrace, Carlisle.
G. Carter, 5 Boston Villas, Oswald Road, Southall.
W. Gunning, London Road, Newbury, Berks.
G. Neill, 4 Elms Road, North Dulwich.

The five special Gramophones which we offered to Scottish readers have been won by the following:

J. A. Downie, care of Hume, 231 Great Junction Street, Leith.
J. Marshall, 25 Paterson Street, Motherwell.
A. White, 3 New Bridge Street, Partick, Glasgow.
Miss Anne Dewar, 7 Henry Street, Edinburgh.
J. Nicol, 10 St. Mirren Street, Paisley.

Digitized by Google

Love Problem No. 3.

WAS IT LOVE?

Can a Man be in Love with Two Women at the Same Time?

DICK FRASER had always been a great trouble to himself. He was so uncomfortably liberal in his views.

He possessed the fatal gift of being able to see both sides of a question with equal clearness, and the consequence was that he never could make up his mind as to which was the right side.

Dick's political persuasions were characterised by such breadth of view that neither he nor his friends had ever been able to determine whether he was a Liberal or a Conservative or even a Liberal-Conservative, and he had never been heard to express a definite pro or con in any discussion concerning religion, sociology, or any other problem of the day.

Dick himself was the first to admit that it was irritating and uninteresting to have no fervid convictions of any kind, but he was too conscientious to save himself trouble—as men have been known to do—by feigning opinions he did not possess.

"There's so much to be said on both sides," he would declare uneasily, and the unfortunate thing was that with Dick this was no mere phrase of a lazy man who has no wish to argue. Dick, if called upon to do so, could advance forcible arguments in plenty to prove his contention.

Then, one day, Dick made the acquaintance of Nora Maclean, and soon afterwards he discovered, to his own intense astonishment, that there was at least one question to which he was prepared to give a definite answer.

His attitude towards matrimony had hitherto been a consistent part of his general non-committal policy.

Had he been called upon to make deliberate choice between a wife and single blessedness he would have been placed in no small dilemma, since he agreed with his married friends that there was much to be said in favour of bachelorhood, but was equally ready to admit the charms of married life as described by the bachelors of his acquaintance.

It is conceivable that, had he been required to plunge either into bachelorhood or matrimony from some neutral plane, Dick would have been entirely at a loss. The respective advantages and disadvantages of either state would have been sure to confront him with equal force, and he would not have known which to select.

The fact that he had been born a bachelor simplified matters. It seemed to lessen his responsibility, as it were. So long as he continued in his original state, he could hardly be said to have made any choice at all.

And so it happened that Dick Fraser had attained the ripe old age of twenty-seven without committing himself to matrimony.

As an eligible and good-looking male, he had met several women who had tried to please him. They had succeeded, up to a certain point, but not one of them had been able to alter his outlook upon life.

That was before the advent of Nora Maclean, of course.

Nora changed all that. She was a charming girl, made to be loved, and she captured Dick's heart without an effort.

Before Dick had known Nora a week he admitted joyfully to himself that he was head over ears in love, and that matrimony was the only desirable state of man.

For the first time in his life Dick felt no hesitation in expressing an opinion, and he realised this fact with something very like triumph.

Undoubtedly Dick would have proposed to Nora, and probably he would have been accepted, but for an unfortunate accident.

The accident was the existence of Nora's cousin Kate.

Exactly two weeks after he had first met Nora, Dick was introduced to Kate. From that moment his doom was sealed.

Kate was not half so pretty as her cousin, yet Dick felt her fascination the moment he set eyes upon the girl.

He thrilled at the touch of her hand, he listened, enthralled, to the sound of her voice. Her dark, wistful eyes cast a strange spell upon him.

"This is the woman I love," he told himself rapturously, and for one brief moment Nora's image faded from his mind.

For one brief moment only. Then—well—then Nora happened to enter the room, and Dick became a prey to such a conflict of emotions as most men, it is to be hoped, are mercifully spared.

With a sudden shock Dick realised that while adoring Kate, he had not ceased to worship Nora.

Just as Kate's touch had thrilled him, so Nora's thrilled.

Kate's gentle, winsome face bewitched him, so did Nora's glowing cheeks and dancing eyes.

Kate's voice was low and tender, Nora's as clear and silvery as a high-toned bell. The sound of both was music in Dick's ears.

Kate held him captive by her sweet seriousness, Nora by her enchanting gaiety.

When Dick recovered from the first shock of these novel sensations he told himself confidently, and with a laugh at his own expense, that such an impossible state of affairs could not possibly last.

At present, he argued, he probably loved with a superficial passion engendered by purely external charms, in which case it was conceivable that two, or even three, or any number of women could inspire the same emotions.

As yet, he told himself, he had not studied the true inwardness of Kate and Norah. He was unacquainted with their real selves, their characters, their mental and moral attributes.

Time would reveal all these, and then surely he would know whether to read his fate in Kate's soft brown eyes or Nora's laughing blue ones!

But as time went on Dick only grew more and more distracted in his mind, for Kate and Nora, on closer acquaintance, appeared as equally lovable as before.

They were as dissimilar in their natures as in their appearance. Both natures, alas, appealed to Dick. Even the discovery that Nora had a temper did not affect his impartiality.

The situation would have been ridiculous had Dick not been so desperately in earnest.

How happy could I be with either sang someone in a frivolous mood.
Were t'other dear charmer away.

Dick echoed the sentiment in all good faith.

At the end of six months of mingled bliss and agony Dick, in a sudden burst of confidence, was moved to make full confession of his dilemma to his chum and other self, Charlie Bourchier.

Charlie, with great simpleness and directness, advised Dick not to be a fool. Then, perceiving that this advice made little impression, he proceeded to prove, to his own complete satisfaction, that Dick was not in love at all.

Digitized by Google

"Love, my dear fellow," he remarked placidly, "is an all-absorbing passion for one woman. The very definition of love makes your case impossible."

"But how do you know that this narrow definition of love is right?" demanded Dick. "My own experience shows me that it is not."

Charlie tried another tack.

"Perhaps you're really in love with only one of them all the time without knowing it," he said. "Tell me, doesn't either of them ever engross your thoughts in preference to the other?"

"Of course, when one only is near me, I can give no thought to the other."

"But when neither happens to be there, what then?"

"Then I think of both, all the time."

"Supposing both were in danger of their lives at the same moment, which one would you try to save?" persisted Charlie.

Dick gave a groan.

"It's no good, old man," he said wearily. "I've tried all that. I've asked myself all the questions you're going to ask dozens of times. About saving their lives, for instance—I couldn't answer that. I only know that both their lives are equally precious to me. I've analysed my own sensations till I thought I should go mad, and always with the same result. I'm abnormal, I suppose, and there's an end of it."

"It's the outcome of your general broadmindedness, Dick. You never could make up your mind to reject one side of a question in favour of the other. But I scarcely thought you would carry your principles into your love-making."

"I can't help it, I wish to Heaven I could!"

"Well, you can't marry them both, you know," said Charlie mildly. "By the way," he added, "do you happen to know whether your affection is reciprocated?"

"How do I know till I ask them? And how can I ask them both?"

"Well, one generally has an inkling on the subject. Now, supposing one of them liked you and the other didn't, wouldn't that solve the difficulty? It has been known to do so in similar cases."

"Never in a case like mine!" cried Dick. "I know what you are thinking of. There are plenty of men who are mildly attracted by any number of women and who go and marry the most convenient one. But my case is different. You forget that. I adore where they only admire. It would be impossible for me to marry one, for I know that I should continue to worship the other."

"Of course," remarked Charlie thoughtfully, "there's always the possibility of neither of them caring for you."

"Ye—es," replied Dick.

Charlie detected the obvious insincerity.

"I always thought you were a man of honour," he said.

"What do you mean?" asked Dick uneasily.

"Unless I am very much mistaken you are making love to two trusting women."

"That's not true. Nothing could be more—more—er—circumspect that my behaviour."

"Nonsense. You may flatter yourself you're circumspect. By your own showing you're in love and, to a certain extent, you're bound to give yourself away to the objects of your affection. Of course, each of them is sure to imagine she is the only one. If she cares for you, you are raising hopes which you may never be able to fulfil. As a man of honour and a gentleman there is only one course open to you."

"And what is that?"

"You must go away. You must not attempt to see either of these girls again until you have definitely decided which of them you want to make your wife."

And Dick who, to tell the truth, felt guiltier than he cared to confess, lost no time in taking his friend's advice.

"My belief is," said Charlie to himself, "Dick's not a bit different from other men. It's all imagination. He's not in love at all. When a man's really in love there's only one woman in the world for him. When Dick meets the woman he'll find out his mistake. Time will show."

But time, strangely enough, has done nothing of the kind. Though Nora and Kate Maclean were led to the altar years ago, Dick Fraser is a bachelor still. In his heart of hearts he is convinced that there will always be two women in the world for him.

Grete Hahn.

MOONLIGHT - - - - REFLECTIONS.

"MAY I have the pleasure of a dance?"

The girl addressed turned sharply away from the group of black-coated youths amongst whom she had been endeavouring to divide her favours impartially.

"Mr. Maxwell," she exclaimed, the colour leaving her cheeks.

The man smiled.

"You have not forgotten me then?" he said, taking her much defaced programme. "Which may I have, there are not many left to choose from."

"The tenth, thirteenth and fifteenth are still unappropriated, you may have any of them."

"Or all would be better still. It is a long time since I have seen you, and many things must have happened since. Be generous, and for the sake of old times let me have all three."

"It is against my principles, but still—as you say—it is a long time since we met, so—if you really wish it, you may have them."

"Thank you," he said, and scribbled his initials against the dances.

* * *

The strains of a dreamy waltz were filling the big ball-room when Guy Maxwell came to claim his partner. It was the beginning of the winter season in southern California, and the Hotel del Coronadao was filled to overflowing with guests escaping from the cold eastern winter. The dance was merely the ordinary Saturday evening one, but the huge ball-room, with its brilliant lights and floral decorations had the appearance of some large function.

Handsome women in gorgeous New York and Paris gowns, strolled through the beautiful rooms. Belles from Washington and Baltimore vied with Californian girls from the sleepy little town across the bay, while outside the deep thunderous boom of the Pacific, whose waves rolled up almost to the panelled walls of the ball-room, mingled with the wail of the violins.

Neither Maxwell nor his partner spoke, and before the music ceased he stopped rather abruptly, and saying, "Shall we go outside?" led her through the door on to the glass verandah which runs the whole length of the hotel on the side fronting the sea. They strolled to the end and then stopped. He threw up one of the large windows, and they stood side by side, and in silence which neither seemed to care to be the first to break, gazed at the wonderful scene before them.

And in truth it was a scene to have made the most thoughtless pause and think. The waves rolled up and broke a few feet below them. A full moon shed its brilliant, pure, cold light on the broad expanse of the mighty ocean; to the right the dark outline of Point Loma showed up faintly in and to the left as far as the eye could see a continuous line of white breakers formed a semi-circle to the cliffs of Mexico.

Digitized by Google

The thoughts of both the watchers were busy with the past. Two years before Sybil Delaunay, then in the zenith of her youth, and tasting the first draughts of success in the art of sculpture, to which she determined to devote her life, refused to marry the man who stood beside her, and sent him away, vowing that no man should ever find part in her life, nor interfere between her and the work she loved. Disappointed and heartsick Maxwell had thrown up his profession in which he was already being spoken of as a rising surgeon, and disappeared from Miss Delaunay's world. From that day to this she had never heard anything of him until he appeared to-night, at this hotel in the Far West, to which she had come for the winter with a party of friends. She had learnt much of herself since the time when he had left her, and had begun to realise that art alone cannot fill the heart of a woman, nor that a successful career was all that she required to make her happy.

To the man who watched her she seemed in the moonlight almost unearthly in her beauty. Not the faintest breeze stirred the ripples of her golden hair. Every sequin on her black gown caught the reflection of the moon, until her slight form seemed to be sheathed in silver.

A sudden shudder on his part broke the spell that held them, and she turned suddenly towards him.

"It is strange that we should meet like this," he said, striving to keep the passionate longing out of his voice. "When we last danced together—do you remember?"

"I remember everything," she answered softly. "It is two years ago now, isn't it?"

"Two years," he repeated, "and to me it seems a lifetime." Then in a different tone. "Are you staying here long?"

"All the winter, I think. They say I must not stay in New York, that I need sunshine."

"You are not ill?" he said sharply.

She smiled. "No, not ill, but I might be if I stayed longer in a cold climate."

"And your work, will you keep that up here? You will not give that up, of course?" he asked, a trace of bitterness creeping into the question.

"For the present, yes, but I hope to go back again to it. It is all I have to live for now, I am quite alone since my father died, and you know I never cared for society."

"I think it was all you ever lived for," he said roughly; "the ruin of a man's life meant nothing to you while you could devote yourself to your art."

She shrank a little from him and her face grew still whiter in the moonlight.

"I suppose you have a right to say that—I do not know—perhaps I was selfish in those days—but I was very young and success when it first comes is sweet to everyone—and how was I to know that you cared any more for me than for any other friend, I did not realise where you were drifting, and so I suppose, you grew to hope for what I had never thought of—then."

"How was I to know that you were so different from all the rest of your sex," he said bitterly, "the rest of the world knew if you did not, and women are not generally so blind in those matters. What does a man usually mean when he follows a woman like a lapdog? You let me wait on you, send you flowers, escort you everywhere—allowed me to go on in a fool's paradise, and then, when you had grown into my life and wound yourself round my heart until life without you seemed impossible, till your face haunted me day and night and my work was dedicated to you and you only, you told me in your calm, sweet way that you did not care for me except as as friend, that you intended to devote your life to art, and that no man would ever take its place. God! what are you women made of," he continued, passion getting the mastery of him at last, "you have no more feeling than one of the statues you thought so much of, no more idea of the purgatory you send a man to than those same blocks of marble to which you devoted yourself!"

Sybil Delaunay shivered a little and her figure lost its haughty alertness.

"I — I hoped you had forgotten," she said tremulously.

He laughed bitterly.

"Did you come out here, then?" she asked, trying to keep her voice steady. "I heard you had left New York, but no one seemed to know where you had gone."

"Yes, I left New York, gave up my profession, and came here, as far away as I could get, my one desire being to escape from anything and everything that reminded me of you."

"You live here then?"

"Near here—in the mountains—I have a ranch."

Again a dead silence. He gazed fixedly at the scene before him not trusting himself to look at her face. She did not know that his hands were clenched till the nails cut into the flesh to keep himself from seizing her in his arms and holding her for ever. He did not see that her eyes were full of tears, or notice the trembling of her slight figure.

"You are happy now—you have forgotten," she almost whispered.

"I thought so until to-night. But when I saw you I knew that it was hopeless, that all the flight, the striving to keep back the memories and put you out of my life were in vain. You are and always will be, the one woman in the world for me. I am a fool to tell you I suppose, but what does it matter. I was a fool all through, a blind fool and I have no one but myself to blame. Don't let it worry you, I have managed to go on, I have not shot myself, nor taken to drink nor any of the hundred and one things that a man can do to try to help him to forget."

"Don't you think," she said, a new tone in her voice, and speaking very slowly and softly, "that—if you had waited a little—had not been in such a hurry to get away—it might have been better—women do not always know their own minds, you know."

Her voice was so low that he had to bend down to hear, and then he saw her face, and a light flashed into his own.

He put his hands on her shoulders and turning her round, forced her to meet his eyes.

"Do you mean it—Sybil—oh, my darling, don't mislead me again, don't say it out of pity—or——"

For answer she leant forward and kissed him on the forehead.

Still he held her away from him and continued in the same eager, passionate voice.

"You know what you are doing—you will come to me, live as a rancher's wife in the mountains, give up society, and your work that was so much to you?"

He waited breathlessly for her answer.

She raised her head and through her tears she whispered

"For better or for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health until——"

She got no further for his arms were round her and her face was hidden on his shoulder.

The band still played, and the dancers whirled as they had done half an hour ago. Miss Delaunay's discarded partners searched anxiously for her, and finally and very wisely gave up the search and consoled themselves with less evasive attractions, the moon still shone brightly as ever, and the waves rolled up and broke with their steady monotonous sound, but for the two people standing at the window the world had changed.

Beatrice M. Studdy.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister, who visits Cairo.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. A celebrated French artist in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman and friend of Lady Peggy's.

At Midnight in the Studio.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ'S studio was an annexe of a large old house dating from the picturesque period of Paris, when gallants in velvet doublet and silk hose were beruffled and befrilled as any lady of fashion. The studio was of quite modern date; it had been the workshop of a famous sculptor. Alphonse had enlarged and decorated it almost out of recognition.

The studio opened into a large gymnasium, fitted with all the newest athletic appliances and lit by electric light.

From the gymnasium a door led into the garden, otherwise there was no entrance save through the studio.

It was in this gymnasium that I presumed the Duke and Hervé were about to fight. Belinda gave me a somewhat incoherent account of what had happened. I gathered, however, that Paul de Sonnaz's valet had told my maid, Felicité, that the artist had had words with the Duke that morning, and was going to fight that same night.

Felicité had, of course, imparted the information to Belinda, who in turn inflicted it on me. If Eastacres was going to fight the man, he might, I thought, have managed to keep the affair quiet. It was most disturbing to be called out at twelve o'clock at night to prevent two men flying at each other's throats.

When we arrived at the Rue Royale we found the house in darkness. Repeated rings at the bell and knocks at the door elicited no response. It being evident that there was no admittance that way, we went round the corner, down a side street, to a little door in the wall which opened on a covered passage leading to the studio. This door was reserved for the use of artists' models and Hervé's intimates.

A loud and clanging bell rang as I turned the handle. At the sound, the door of the studio at the end of the passage was cautiously drawn back. We hastened down the passage, and found ourselves confronted by Jean Lefroi—Hervé's valet—at the end.

I gave him no time to question or deliberate, but, with a gesture of command, swept past him, Belinda following close behind.

"Where is your master?" I asked imperatively.

"He is engaged, madam, much, much engaged."

The man's eyes glanced across the room as he spoke. I took the hint, and walked rapidly to the door that led into the gymnasium.

"Open," I called sharply, rapping at the panels, "open at once."

The walls were thick, otherwise I might have heard the substance of the parley that ensued. As it was I only caught a word or two in Hervé's voice.

"I can see no one—make excuse."

The door swiftly opened, was as rapidly shut, and the key turned once more in the lock. Paul de Sonnaz stood before me, a look of surprise on his face. He quickly recovered himself, and with a low bow observed:

"Hervé will be desolated not to see you, Lady Peggy. He——"

"Enough, enough," I interrupted hastily. "Tell me, have they fought, or is it yet to come?"

His face grew anxious, almost perturbed.

"It is useless to try to deceive me, Paul," I cried. "I know as well as you that Hervé and Eastacres fight a duel to-night."

"Then, my dear lady, permit me to ask why you are here?"

For answer I moved aside and pointed to Belinda!

White as death, her eyes full of fear, her mouth set in curves of suspense, her apppearance was an ample reply.

"If I had not come, Belinda would have done so alone," I observed, "and of two evils I chose the lesser. Now, perhaps, you will answer my question. Is Hervé going to fight the Duke?"

Paul made me a sign in the affirmative. Then with a smile bowed over Belinda's hand.

"My dear Lady Peggy," he said softly, "Hervé and the Duke are at this present moment on the best of terms."

"Then it is not true there is to be a duel to-night?" Belinda's blue eyes searched him through and through.

Paul shrugged his shoulders. "Surely not, mademoiselle; consider, is this the time for duels? It is an hour when all just people seek repose. Shall I not take you to your carriage?"

Belinda flushed, threw up her head and turned indignantly on Paul.

"You play with me," she said. "I am not a child to be deceived by foolish excuses, meaningless words. You told me you were my friend."

"To the death, mademoiselle," replied Paul gently.

"And yet, when I ask you a simple question, the answer to which means much to me, you quibble, jest, grimace—oh, I have no faith in you."

Digitized by Google

Paul sighed, and looked romantic, but remained inflexible.

"If you only knew how anxious, how cruelly anxious I am," she said, with a suspicious tremor in her voice. "M. Hervé has been so good, so kind to me, that the thought of the danger he is in, or"—she paused—"will be in, is terrible. Ah! monsieur, please tell me what is happening in that other room"—she pointed eloquently to the gymnasium.

Then, clasping her hands about his arm, she gazed up at him with great, appealing eyes.

De Sonnaz was not proof against her pleading.

He flushed and cast a look at me, and then without any more ado shamelessly succumbed.

"I will tell you everything," he said, "if you will promise me to be discreet."

Belinda nodded.

"I'm not quite a fool," she remarked; "I'm not likely to make a scene, or any nonsense of that kind."

"Very good, I shall rely upon your word. There was a disagreement this morning between Alphonse and the Duke in the Bois."

"About me?" interposed Belinda. "I was sure of it."

De Sonnaz shrugged his shoulders.

"I am not at liberty to disclose the matter upon which they disagreed," he said drily. "Alphonse considered himself insulted, and sent a challenge to the Duke, who has accepted it. They fight to-night, the weapons, pistols, the place"—he motioned to the gymnasium—"the hour, within five minutes."

"But M. Hervé cannot shoot a bit," said Belinda; "he told me so when I challenged him to pistol practice at the Baronne's only last week. It will be murder, murder!" she repeated. "Eastacres can snuff out a candle with a pistol shot at thirty paces." She flashed a look of indignation towards the room. "Where is this noble English gentleman?"

"The Duke has not yet arrived," said Paul, "he and his second, Colonel Langton, will be here within the next few minutes." He looked at his watch. It was close on one o'clock.

"I shall go to him," said Belinda. "I will tell him what I and every other decent person will say and think of the man who fights a duel with an opponent who can no more shoot than—than Lady Peggy," she cried scornfully.

"Belinda," I interrupted, "you will do nothing of the kind."

"Do you think I can stay here and let a man be murdered in cold blood?" she said, crimson with passion.

"I must remind you of your promise, mademoiselle. You gave me your word to act with discretion. What you propose to do would bring everlasting disgrace upon Hervé. He challenged the Duke, who only acted as a man of honour in accepting the challenge. If you succeed in preventing the duel Alphonse will be covered with ridicule, and he will be accused of sheltering himself behind a woman. Your interference would merely delay matters. We should wait till to-morrow, that is all, and choose a quiet spot in the Bois."

"What can I do?" asked the girl despairingly.

"Return to my aunt's," he said gravely, "and——" he paused, "offer prayers for a brave man's life."

"Are you the Duke's second?" she asked.

"No, mademoiselle, the Duke is my guest; etiquette would forbid it. I am to be present as the friend of both, and now," he took her hand gently in his, "now you will return?"

She hesitated, and then, with an air of resolution, shook her head.

"No," she said firmly, "I shall remain here, not to create a disturbance or to make a scene, but to see fair play. I am resolved, monsieur; here I remain until the end."

At that moment came a knocking at the door of the gymnasium.

"It is the Duke," cried Paul. "I must go," then, stooping towards me, whispered, "You must get her away somehow."

"Is Alphonse likely to be hurt?" I asked.

Paul nodded, and passed into the gymnasium, locking the door behind him.

I looked towards Belinda, who had sunk back into a chair and wondered how I should persuade her to hear reason. I may explain that a close study of Belinda's character had convinced me of the impossibility of leading her in the way she did not wish to go. The only thing to do was to get her there without her knowledge! It was a mad and preposterous thing to have come to the studio on such an errand, and nothing but the certainty that if not with me, she would have started off without me, had induced me to accompany Belinda.

It now remained to take her back to the Hotel D'Arteuil.

"Now, my dear," I said with decision, "we will go to our carriage."

To my surprise she did not make the least demur, but rose and followed me quietly through the door, down the covered passage to the entrance in the wall, and out into the street.

The carriage was waiting for us round the corner of the Rue Royale. Belinda seized my arm and impetuously urged me towards it. Just as we passed the front of the house, I felt her fingers tighten on my arm, and before I had time to remonstrate or resist she had whirled me through the open gates.

"I'm going round to the back," she said, "to see if we can't get into the gymnasium from the garden. It's no use telling me not to, Lady Peggy; I'm sorry to go against what you say, but nothing will keep me back."

"You foolish girl," I cried angrily. "Don't you see what you are doing? You are proclaiming your infatuation for Hervé from the house-tops. It will create a positive scandal."

She dropped my arm and faced me in the darkness.

"You said that once before," she answered quietly. "That time I believed you and did as you asked me; this time I shall judge for myself—I shall go on."

"Do you want the whole world to know you are in love with Hervé?" I sneered. "You transfer your affections very quickly; a little while ago it was David Carr you adored, now——"

"It is still David and always will be," she said passionately. "I have no love for M. Hervé of that sort, but I have a great friendship, affection, if you like, and will not go back on him. David would be the first person to blame me if I did. In my class we don't forsake our friends when they are in danger and difficulty."

She spoke with a force and dignity which I could not contest. Her will was set, I could not turn her purpose, and all I could hope to do would be to guide it.

Together we crept round to the back of the gymnasium and softly tried the door that opened on the garden.

It was fast locked!

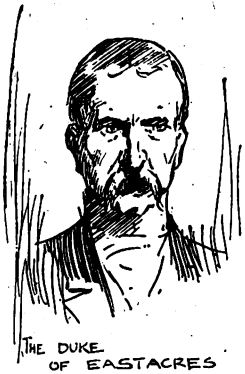
"This way," said Belinda quickly. "We can see what is going on through the window!"

Borne up by her desperate energy, I took my station by her outside the window, some three feet from the ground, and cautiously peered through the glass. The window was slightly open, we could see and hear what was taking place.

In the brilliant, searching light of the electric lamps the room was clear as daylight, but our faces and figures were not discernible, so dark was the night, so heavy the shadows in the garden.

There were six men present, Hervé and the Duke, their seconds, M. de Blouet, a noted duellist, and Colonel Langton, Paul de Sonnaz, and a dark, keen-faced man whom I took to be a doctor.

Breathless we saw the seconds load the pistols, measure the distance between the combatants, saw them thrust the swords into the oak floor to mark each man's position, the physician busy himself with his affairs, then, with fast-beating hearts we saw De Sonnaz advance.



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Digitized by Google

"Is there no hope of a compromise, messieurs?" he said, glancing from Hervé to the Duke.

"None," answered the two men simultaneously, and Paul retired.

"As the challenged in the duel, I claim the right to insist on three rounds," said Eastacres, "provided"—he gave a sneering laugh—"we are both here to fight them out."

De Blouet, Hervé's second, demurred, but the painter hastily interrupted.

"I agree," he said. "Three rounds, or thirty, if you will. Come, let us begin."

The pistols were then presented. Hervé took his carelessly, with a shrug of the shoulders; the Duke took his with the right hand and dropped it softly into his left, dropped it as carefully yet familiarly as only a man can who has known the intimate use of it for years.

Paul de Sonnaz stepped forward.

"Take your places, messieurs," he said gravely; the seconds fell back and the Duke of Eastacres and Alphonse Hervé faced each other. Then—

"I shall have the honour of counting ten," said Paul, "during which time you are required to fire or not at all."

Eastacres, who stood five paces at the back of his sword, remained quite still, his pistol in his left hand.

"One—two—three!"

Hervé sprang forward, aimed carelessly and wildly, his shot flew over the Duke's head and crashed into the oaken panelling. Simultaneously Eastacres, dropping the pistol into his right hand, sent a shot through his adversary's shoulder.

Hervé staggered, De Blouet caught him in his arms, and the physician hastily attended to him. Down the white shirt front crept a thin crimson stream, a stream of blood.

"You are hurt, my friend," said Paul de Sonnaz.

"But little!" The painter straightened himself, and glanced proudly at the Duke.

"If monsieur is recovered," said Eastacres, "we will proceed to the second round."

At this there was a protest from De Blouet, a protest in which De Sonnaz joined.

"If M. Hervé will make an apology to me for his insolence to me this morning, and will undertake to cease annoying a certain lady with his unwelcome attentions, I am prepared to forego the last two rounds," the Duke said.

Hervé laughed scornfully.

"To apologise to you," he said, "would be an infamy to which death is a trifle. Proceed—we will fight to the end!"

Once again the pistols were loaded, once again the seconds fell back, the combatants faced each other.

Belinda, who up to now had kept perfectly quiet, showed signs of agitation.

"Do you think," she said, seizing me in a firm grip, "do you think the Duke means to kill Hervé?"

"Not for an instant," I replied; "he will disable him."

"I will let them fight this round," she said between her teeth, "in the hope that Alphonse may hurt him, after——" She paused, Eastacres was speaking.

"Monsieur, I warn you," he said calmly, "that in the next round I shall smash your left hand. In the third"—he paused—"your right. Consider, is not your reputation as a painter worth an apology and a promise?"

It is impossible to describe the insolence, the contempt of the speech. He spoke to Hervé as a man speaks to his slave or to his dog. De Blouet went scarlet, Langton, the Duke's own second, interposed.

"You are here to fight, not to talk, Eastacres," he said, sternly; "go on with the business—if you are resolved," and he gave a gesture of repugnance.

Again the shots rang out upon the night. Hervé's left hand hung limp and useless at his side; from the Duke's arm trickled a streak of blood.

"Thank Heaven for it," cried Belinda.

"A mere scratch," remarked the Duke, handing his handkerchief to Langton.

"Well, M. Hervé," he asked sneering, "will you apologise now?"

"Never!" was the answer—"never!"

Then the Duke raised his pistol significantly.

"Say farewell to your art, monsieur. At present you cannot hold a palette, in a second you will never again finger a brush." He leant forward, his face awful with hate, his cold eyes gleaming like points of steel.

Hervé, white to the lips with pain and loss of blood, rallied at the insult.

"If I lose my hands," he answered, "I shall still have my tongue, my brain, my energy, my force of will, and all and every one of these shall be employed against you, coward, liar, scoundrel!" He flung out the words like blows, then reeling, leant against De Blouet.

"Make haste," he murmured, pointing to the pistols—"make haste, reload—I faint—I die—almost."

For a moment De Blouet hesitated to allow the last round to be fought; it was like countenancing a crime. The Duke would keep his word, Hervé would lose his hand—he would be infinitely poorer by the loss. Never to paint again, never to fix in glowing colours on a cold, grey canvas, the glory of the sunset, the blue of God's Heaven, the flower-like beauty of a woman's face.

"The pistol," gasped Hervé; once again his second, pale as death, loaded and handed it to him.

"One!" said De Sonnaz, in a low hoarse voice. The Duke and Hervé remained motionless.

"Two!" each raised their pistol.

"Three!" The Duke covered Hervé's right hand, the hand that, famous throughout the world, might the next moment for ever lose its cunning.

"Four!" On the instant Belinda stooping caught up a stone from off the garden path, and sent it whizzing through the window. The crash of the falling glass caused all the men to start. Even as Eastacres pressed the trigger, the pistol dropped to the floor—exploding as it fell.

Belinda followed quickly on her missile, and flinging up the window, she vaulted lightly over the sill into the room.

It was a dramatic scene. The huge room blazing with light, against which the black coats of the men looked even darker. The smoking pistols, the blood-stained floor, the look of apprehension and alarm upon the faces of all present as Belinda, drawn to her full height, her blue eyes flaming, her cheeks flushed, stood like a goddess of vengeance before them!

"Coward!" she said, pointing to the Duke. "Coward! If I were but a man I'd shoot you to the heart for shame of the manhood you've disgraced! Do you suppose I don't know why he challenged you?" she asked, her young voice ringing with scorn. "You spoke of me with insult, and he—took up my cause."

Then wheeling swiftly round, she pointed to Hervé, supported by De Sonnaz and the doctor.

"If he dies," she said, "I will not rest till you are punished."

"Your concern for M. Hervé is astonishing," said the Duke. "I trust he will prove grateful for your solicitude."

Belinda paid no heed to this remark, but, crossing to Hervé, bent over him, clasping his hand—the hand that she had saved. As she knelt there, the tears started to her eyes, but there was never a tremor in her voice, when next she spoke.

"Messieurs," she said proudly, "perhaps you think that I should not be here? It seems strange to you that a girl like me should interfere in a scene like this. I will tell you why I came."

Her French was of the grammar-book, prim and precise, but her voice was sweet and thrilling, and touched the heart of every Frenchman present.

"I came, messieurs, because"—she paused—"M. Hervé is my friend," she said, "and the friend of the man I love!"

Digitized by Google

I gasped, the men stared, Hervé smiled.

Belinda had done this mad, most audacious thing from friendship—not love!

"Happy is the man with such a friend," said De Sonnaz gravely. There was a little murmur of applause.

The doctor, unlike the rest of the men, thinking more of his patient than Belinda, noticed a change in Hervé's face.

In an instant the room was cleared, Paul and De Blouet alone remaining. The rest of us were shut in the studio. Langton, feeling the awkwardness of the situation, bowed to me, gave a frigid salutation to Eastacres, and, with a profound obeisance to Belinda, departed. Hoping the Duke would follow his example, I advanced to bid him "good-night."

"I am not going just at present," he said quickly. "I have first to speak to Miss North. Listen!"—he came close to Belinda, and before she realised what he was about to do, clasped her two wrists in his strong, cruel-looking hands. "No," as she tried to shake herself free, "I don't mean to release you, till you've heard what I have to say. You can't get away by yourself, if you call for help you'll frighten your friend," he sneered evilly, "and Lady Peggy has too much sense to interfere. I am your master now as I shall be always. I mean to marry you, I shall marry you. The longer the delay the more you will suffer. You shall belong to me, and to no other man. You shall have no friends, no lovers, no admirers—I will fight them one by one. After this I shall not wound but kill. Henceforth if you so much as smile on any man but me you sign his death-warrant. You hear me?"

"Yes, and regard you as little as the wind; I shall never marry you; I would rather die."

"Even so, you will be my wife." His fingers tightened on her wrists, his face set in a sneering smile, bent over her. He was hurting her cruelly, horribly, as I could see.

"Eastacres, stop," I cried, and laid my hand upon his arm. He paid no heed to me, but gripped her soft, slim wrists until her face grew livid with the pain. I tried to tear his hands away. I even beat them with my own, I might as well have dashed myself against a wall.

At last, with a sneering laugh, he let her go. She staggered and would have fallen, had I not caught her in my arms.

"Whenever you look at those little soft white hands, you will remember what I say," he added; "you will be my wife. You cannot help yourself, and no man will dare to help you. Who would risk crossing me after to-night?" and he glanced towards the room where Hervé lay—grievously hurt.

Even as he was speaking the studio door opened and a man walked quickly into the room.

"I dare!" he said, and calmly faced the Duke. "I—Stanley Forbes!" and the Duke fell back.

(Another powerful instalment will appear next week. I shall be very glad to have the candid opinions of readers regarding this series. Such opinions are of great value in deciding whether the matter I am giving you is appreciated or not.—Ed 'S.S.")

£50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

A reader of SHORT STORIES won a prize of £10 in 1894 and with the help of this money emigrated to America, making a fortune out of the cycle boom of 1897 and 1898. He recently wrote a letter, under the nom-de-plume of "Dayton," to the Editor of SHORT STORIES, enclosing dollar bills to the value of £50, and asking that this money may be offered as prizes in five sums of £10 each.

The Editor has given the matter very careful consideration, and has arrived at the conclusion that, as his anonymous correspondent was in great want when he won his prize, the most satisfactory manner of distributing his gift of £50 would be to offer it to those who can give me the best reason for receiving it.

You may be wanting to emigrate to one of our Colonies. You may want £10 to buy something you have needed for a long time. You may want to clear off some small debts that have been worrying you. Or you may want to trade with the £10 and, like "Dayton," turn it into a fortune.

Whatever your reason for wanting it may be, write it down in the space below, and send it to "The Competition Editor of SHORT STORIES," Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Dayton 2."

Readers may send as many reasons as they like, provided each is written on a separate coupon. Another coupon will appear next week. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors may enter only on this understanding.

CUT OFF THE COUPON HERE.

My reason for wanting £10 is.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

Name.....Address.....

Digitized by Google

The Chronicles o' Glencrackit.

BY G. VINCENT-HOLYTOWN.

No. 1.—MacTaggart's "First-Fit."

Amongst the quaint customs peculiar to Scotland, the genial practice of first-footing one's neighbours on the birth of the New Year is too well-known to need much explanation.

Suffice it to say that the fortunes of each household during the ensuing twelve months depend absolutely upon the manner of person who first crosses the threshold (from the outside) after the midnight hour has tolled the departure of the old year.

With the family fortunes hanging upon the fateful visitor, the nature of that visitor's coming is a matter of anxiety for all concerned. In many cases the fortune-bringer is carefully arranged for beforehand, for there are certain things a good first-foot must—and must not—be.

The first-foot must, above all things, be a man. No more disastrous start could be made for the year than the first crossing of the threshold by a woman. The first-foot should also be tall and dark, strong rather than handsome, and of military bearing, with well-shod feet turned out at the proper angle, for hen-toed men are an abomination. He must not squint, nor come empty-handed, for the prosperity of the house depends upon his bringing a gift, no matter how trivial, for his hosts.

* * * * *

The Old Year had barely an hour to live, and Sandy MacTaggart was seated chatting with his wife and daughter by the side of a cheerful fire, waiting to see the New Year in.

Suddenly he remembered that he had not arranged for an acceptable first-foot, and with a horror-stricken expression, he jumped from his chair.

"Weel, I declare," he exclaimed, "if I hadna clean forgotten tae tryst a guid first-fit till this very meenit. I maun awa' tae Glencrackit and bespeak Jimmie Niven or some ither proper man at once."

Nancy MacTaggart and her mother exchanged glances full of meaning, and then Mrs. MacTaggart spoke:

"Sit ye doon, guid man, and let come wha likes; it's far luckier tae ha'e your first-fit veesit ye kin' o' spontaneous——"

"Wumman," replied MacTaggart sternly, "would ye leave sic an important item o' oor destiny tae a mere chance, tae the whim o' a wanderin' neighbour, tae the caprice o' a casual tramp——"

"Saunders MacTaggart," interposed his wife reproachfully. "I wonder at ye, an Elder o' the Kirk, letting your superstetion get the better o' your judgment."

"Jean MacRae," retorted Sandy (who, when on his dignity with his wife, invariably called her by her maiden name), "Jean MacRae, o' all men breathin', I am the least superstetious, but on questions o' cause and effect I can be logical, which nae wumman could ever be. What I'm determined tae arrange, in spite o' ye, is that nae hen-taed, squint-e'ed, decrepit, empty-handed albino shatters my peace o' mind for the comin' year. And yet ye would ha'e me sit doon and let the wind blaw in what it likes. Ay, it's weel for ye all that Saunders MacTaggart can be loyal tae his convictions and his duty."

With this oracular utterance, MacTaggart strode to the door.

His pretty daughter, Nancy, hesitated a moment, and then flew to his side, with the words:

"Father, you needn't worry yourself about it. It's too bad to let you go down to the village this bitter night when I feel sure—that is, mother and I think—in fact, we are certain—oh, mother, why don't you tell him?"

She broke off in flushed confusion and MacTaggart looked from his daughter to his wife in blank amazement.

"What's the lass ravin' aboot?" he queried in bewilderment.

Mrs. MacTaggart set her lips hard, for a pitched battle of words was at hand, and she knew it. She had already fought a preliminary engagement with Nancy, had succumbed, and was now loyally ranged on her daughter's side. She was prepared, indeed, to bear the brunt of the fighting.

"She's no ravin'," she said sharply, "she's tellin' ye that there's sure tae be a proper first-fit without you botherin' yoursel' aboot him."

"Hoo dae ye ken?" inquired MacTaggart, in tones of cold suspicion.

"Because we've arranged for him," was his wife's decisive reply.

Saunders MacTaggart perceived at this juncture the imminence of some sort of an attack by the allied forces of his wife and daughter, and like a wise general he immediately seized all available strategic points.

"I thocht ye said it was far luckier tae ha'e your first-fit vee-sit ye' kin' o' spontaneous. Are ye sure ye kent the meaning o' the word when ye used it?"

Saunders MacTaggart had addressed these words to his wife with studied and withering deliberation, but he was promptly countered by his daughter.

"Yes, father, she meant what she said. Our first-foot is coming of his own suggestion. Indeed, he asked our permission to come. One volunteer is worth ten pressed men, so we arranged it beforehand."

The argument was unanswerable, and therefore unsatisfactory to Mr. MacTaggart.

"Hoo am I tae ken if he's a fit and proper man?" he demanded, with a searching look at his daughter.

Realising that there was a sweetheart in the case, he switched on another current of meaning through his next words. "Ye're far o'er young tae be thinkin' o' lads yet, my lassie, and I maun hold your mother responsible for allowing any sic developments tae transpire without my knowledge and consent."

He turned to note the effect of his peroration on Mrs. MacTaggart. No particular effect being visible and no reply forthcoming, he added grandly:

"Dae ye hear those words, Jean MacRae?"

"I do, Saunders MacTaggart, they're simply magneeficent. Are ye sure ye kent the meaning o' them when ye used them?"

"Oh, mother dear, don't quarrel, please," intervened Nancy, viewing with some anxiety her mother's tendency to forget, in the heat of a general engagement, the real issue at stake. "Tell father who is coming, he has a right to know."

Matters might have made much better progress if Nancy had made the dreaded revelation herself. Saunders MacTaggart was easily led by his daughter, and indeed by his wife too, only his wife liked to drive, and Saunders MacTaggart would not be driven.

As it was he braced himself up for resistance under any circumstances.

Digitized by Google

In response to Nancy's request, Mrs. MacTaggart snapped out the bald announcement :

"Young Angus Colquhoun."

Saunders MacTaggart raised his hands in speechless horror. His dramatic silence (whether real or affected) had considerable effect on his wife, for she continued hurriedly, and almost apologetically :

"He's after oor Nance, and he's a decent enough chap. Ye needna think that because auld Angus Colquhoun and yoursel' canna agree, the young generation are goin' tae perpetuate your private quarrels."

Here Saunders MacTaggart found his voice, and used it with no uncertain sound.

"Jean MacRae," he thundered, "daur ye stand there and disgrace the prood name I consented tae share wi' ye twenty-five years syne? Dae ye even suggest the possibeelity o'. an alliance between a MacTaggart o' Tullywhoop and a Colquhoun o' Aberquiech? For four hunder' years there's been an undying feud between the MacTaggarts and the Colquhouns, and far be it frae me and auld Angus Colquhoun tae profane oor ancestral enmity wi' the alliance ye seem tae contemplate wi' sic callous complacency. Avaunt, ye female apostates, begone," he bellowed, as his wife and daughter clung to an arm each, and endeavoured to calm the choler of his words, "nae female blandishments ha'e power tae destroy within me the speerit o' my forefathers."

Here he paused for words and his wife got a chance.

"Saunders MacTaggart, ye just rave o'er naething."

"What, Jean MacRae, dae ye call half-an-acre o' arable land naething? Does the law coont it naething? Have we no' already contested seeven law suits tae decide whether it shall come intae the richtful possession o' the MacTaggarts, or remain in the wrongous clutches o' the Colquhouns?"

"But, father," implored Nancy, "Angus—that is, young Mr. Colquhoun—says five minutes' friendly talk could settle the whole thing out of hand. He has told his father that, too, and half persuaded him already. You should let him speak to you about it."

"Never!" interrupted Mr. MacTaggart inflexibly, "I'm prood tae state, on behalf o' my hereditary foe, auld Angus Colquhoun, and mysel', that we havena spoken a ceevil word to one another since we could speak ava', and I'm no' goin' tae begin wi' the son."

"But you won't actually refuse to speak to him when he comes to first-foot you and wish you a happy new year, will you, father?"

The girl's eyes were tearful now, and MacTaggart weakened perceptibly.

"I w'u'dna actually refuse tae speak tae him, seeing he's coming wi' the express permission o' your mother and yoursel', but as it happens I'm no' goin' tae sit up and see the new year in, so ye maun just dispense the hospitality o' the hoose yoursel's, when he comes."

The faces of both mother and daughter clouded. They had won their victory, but it bade fair to be a barren one. The enemy was destroying all that was worth capturing before surrendering.

Mrs. MacTaggart made one more effort to retain her lord's presence to receive young Colquhoun.

"W'u'd ye no like tae see your first-fit? He's a good-lookin' lad, an' ye've never met him yet."

"No," replied MacTaggart tartly. "First-fittin's a heathenish custom at the best, and I leave ye tae perform your idolatrous rites yoursel's," and so saying he stalked majestically out of the room.

The moment he had gone, Nancy flung herself upon her mother's neck and wept—and was consoled.

* * * * *

It was simply out of the question that MacTaggart could so lightly abandon the cherished custom of watching for his first-foot, and, as a matter of fact, he had no intention of missing the event at all. His retreat was a merely strategic one. He certainly went to his room, opened the door, slammed it hard, and locked it with ostentatious noise, but he performed all these operations from the outside.

Then he slipped off his boots and carefully hid them. After that he dexterously swung himself into the loft, which exists in most one-storied houses of the Tullywhoop Farm type.

A square opening about three feet wide was let into the ceiling just inside the front door directly over the entrance-lobby.

Over the edge of this trap he could get a splendid view of his first-foot, and the proceedings generally, and he lay there like a cat watching for a mouse. After he had lain awhile in ambush he glanced at his watch by the light of the hall-lamp, and noted that it only wanted a couple of minutes to midnight.

From his perch he could already hear the shuffling of footsteps outside, and from that sound he gathered that his first-foot was there ready for action.

Then the hour of twelve struck on the hall-clock, and immediately the sound ceased, a loud knock at the door raised his excitement to fever-pitch.

Mrs. MacTaggart appeared from the parlour, followed by Nancy, both with smiling faces, ready to welcome their visitor.

The door opened and the ladies uttered a startled exclamation as a gigantic man, carrying with evident exertions an enormous box, staggered across the threshold shouting, "A happy new year to one and all of you!"

Obviously the first-foot was not the man they had expected, but he was warmly welcomed nevertheless.

With staring eyes MacTaggart gazed blinkingly at the newcomer, who was all that could be desired as a first-foot, six feet five in his boots, black-haired, straight-limbed, jovial, hale and hearty. It was his minister, the Rev. Marmion MacIvor, by whom, of all persons, he desired to be respected.

"Where's the good man?" domanded the reverend first-foot as he deposited his burden on the floor, and shook hands with Mrs. MacTaggart and Nancy.

"He's rather indisposed to-night, sir," replied Mrs. MacTaggart meekly.

"Rouse him up, good wife, rouse him up to feast his eyes on the biggest first-foot gift he ever got. Rouse him up, it will do him good!"

As he spoke he tore off the lid of the box, and there stood revealed to the astonished gaze of at least three pairs of eyes, a quantity of some substance that looked like newly-dug earth.

MacTaggart's curiosity caused him to over-reach himself, his hand slipped, and down he crashed into the box.

The women shrieked and the minister started at the unexpected visitation, and MacTaggart picked himself up with rueful gravity.

"Oh, you're there, are you, Saunders?" said the minister. "Allow me to present you with your first-foot gift, being the biggest sample I could carry of half an acre of arable land that has been in dispute for some little time. The land is now made over in its entirety to yourself by Angus Colquhoun, senior, of Aberquiech, who is here, with his son, to attest my words, with the deeds. Step forward, there, Colquhoun, shake hands with MacTaggart, and bury your enmity for ever in this earth!"

Of course, with such a splendid first-foot as the Reverend Marmion MacIvor, whose good offices had been secured by young Angus Colquhoun, with the approval of his father, the ensuing year was a specially propitious one for all concerned. The alliance by marriage of the MacTaggarts of Tullywhoop with the Colquhouns of Aberquiech is now an accomplished fact, accomplished in person by the reverend first-foot.

The following Tartans have already appeared on the covers of "Short Stories":

No. 1.—MENZIES	Issue dated August 2nd, 1902.
No. 2.—MACPHERSON ...	,, ,, August 16th, 1902.
No. 3.—MACLEOD	,, ,, September 13th, 1902.
No. 4.—ROB ROY	,, ,, October 4th, 1902.
No. 5.—MACMILLAN ...	,, ,, October 25th, 1902.
No. 6.—MACDONALD of SLEAT	,, ,, November 29th, 1902.

Back numbers can always be had on application to these offices.

Digitized by Google

A Literary Theft.

AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

In the small sitting-room of a modest little cottage situated in one of the least pretentious thoroughfares of Highgate, a middle-aged woman was sitting before the fire, and glancing ever and anon through the pretty curtained window which looked out upon the street. Presently the object of her thoughts appeared, walking briskly over the clean, wind-swept pavement, and soon after entered the room and divested herself of her hat and coat.

It was a frosty morning in November, and the girl's face glowed with healthy exhilaration after her walk, while her blue eyes sparkled with unusual animation. As she entered the room, however, her eyes fell on the little table which stood near her mother's chair, and the whole expression of her face changed to bitter disappointment and anxiety. The mother looked up quickly, and a look of tender sympathy shone in her eyes as she read her daughter's distress. Going up to the table, the girl picked up two foolscap envelopes, directed to herself, which had come by post during her absence. With indifferent fingers—for she well knew what they contained—she broke the seals and drew from each a folded manuscript.

A slip of paper lay in each manuscript, with the usual form of rejection: "The Editor presents his compliments and regrets his inability——" and so on. With a sigh she laid the papers down upon the table and looked anxiously into her mother's face.

"You do not look so well this afternoon, mother," she said. "Has this troubled you as well?" And she pointed to the rejected manuscripts.

"Your disappointments are mine, dear," said the mother, "and, like you, I had so hoped that one at least would have met with success."

The girl sighed.

"A year or two ago," she said, "my stories quickly found a good market, but latterly successes have been few. I must have lost the knack of writing, I think, for even I am conscious of the difference between my present work and what I used to turn out."

"It is not that you have lost the knack, dear, for your genius is as unquestionable to-day as ever it was," replied the mother, looking at her daughter with evident pride. "No," she continued, "you have lost nothing. But the past year has brought with it many anxieties, many dark forebodings of the future, many pressing needs which cannot be supplied, and all these things have weighed upon you and robbed your stories of their brightness and colour, until their vitality has almost disappeared. Do not think me cruel for saying this, dear Jessie, for I am only impelled to do so by the knowledge that to thus wound you would be infinitely better than to see you lose all faith in the abilities which, notwithstanding these bitter disappointments, you still possess, and thereby sink into lethargy and despair."

The girl looked gratefully into her mother's face.

"I think you are right, dear mother," she said, "and it is nice to know that someone believes in me in spite of all these recent failures." And she laid her head lovingly on her mother's shoulder. "But it is not my failure alone which troubles me, but what it entails. I called in to see the doctor while I was out, and asked him to tell me the truth about you. He says there is no immediate danger, but that, unless precautionary measures are at once adopted, he cannot answer for the consequences. Your recent affection of the throat, together with the weak state of your general health, make it imperative that you should enjoy a change of air. He recommends Ventnor, and declares I must send you there at once for six weeks at least. If this is done, he says, you will speedily recover your former health."

The girl paused and looked into the fire. "And I promised," she added in a low voice, "that you should go."

For some moments there was silence in the little room, broken only by the ticking of a gilt clock on the mantelpiece. Then the mother took the girl's head, with its cluster of brown curls, between her white hands, and kissed the troubled face with loving tenderness.

"My child," she said soothingly, "do not worry about it. I believe a way will be opened, although I cannot see how or what it will be, and some day we shall look back at these troubles of to-day and wonder why our faith in the future was so feeble as to make them oppress us so heavily. Now I will go and lie down till tea is ready, and in the evening we will talk over your two stories. Perhaps I may be able to suggest some way of improving them, and, if not, at any rate my sympathy may stimulate your greater ability to the accomplishment of the same end." And once more kissing her daughter's cheek, she left the room.

Left to herself, and feeling unfit for work, the girl took down an old number of the American Monthly Magazine and idly turned over the pages. It was five years old, and had been sent her by a cousin residing in New York because of an article which it contained written by a friend of hers.

Upon its arrival, Jessie Verrall had read the article in question, but, though she had preserved the magazine ever since, she had not even glanced at the rest of the contents. She looked at the titles of the short stories which it contained, until she came to one entitled "An Act of Dishonour." Carelessly she began to read, and, with the full flowing sentences, a living interest in the characters of the story grew up within her and absorbed her whole attention. More and more potent became the fascination of its influence as the girl read on—each incident standing out in bold relief, each word of its intensely impressive dialogue stamped with the hall-mark of truth, and each touch of pathos drawing the tears to her eyes. Spellbound she read on to the end, and then let the magazine fall in her lap.

"Oh, if I could but write like that!" she said with a sigh. "The editor does not live who could reject such a story. I wonder who wrote it!" She turned back to the title. It was signed "Pentaur." "'Pentaur,'" she said to herself. "It sounds like a man. I suppose he is an American, for the story has never appeared in any London magazine."

She stopped, and a strange expression came into her blue eyes. A thought seemed to have come to her—a thought that startled her and sent the warm blood to her face. She put the book on the table, and, rising, began to pace the room in nervous excitement. A frightened look came into her eyes as she walked to and fro, and her breath came short and quick.

Digitized by Google

Presently she stopped, and, glancing round as if fearful of being observed, looked again at the date of the magazine.

"Five years," she whispered. "Who would know? If it were for myself I would not think of it, but for her—for her—She must go to Ventnor at any cost! But it is horrible! And yet there is no other way. Oh, what shall I do?"

Her eye fell on the title which stood out in black type at the head of the story, and she shrank back with a low cry. "An Act of Dishonour!" she gasped. "Oh, I dare not—I dare not!" She started, and, going towards the door, listened intently. Up the stairs of the little cottage, she heard her mother coughing—a hard, racking cough that frightened the girl. She turned about and looked once more at the open pages of the magazine. "Oh, my God!" she moaned, putting her hands before her crimson face, "it is my shame—or—her life! No one will ever know and I only will bear the burden of my guilt. I must—yes, I must!"

With flaming cheeks and nervous fingers she carried the magazine over to her typewriter, which stood on a little table in one corner of the room, and her fingers were soon flying over the keys, while the same story, with the same title, grew out of the white sheets which she slipped into the machine. At the end of an hour and a half the task was completed, and, still with trembling fingers, she collated and fastened together the sheets of the story, signed the title-page with her own name, directed an envelope to a second-rate journal, and, putting on her hat, went out to post it. Once only did she pause, when she stood in the narrow passage with the letter held tightly in her hand. But again the sound of that racking cough from the room upstairs decided her.

"For her sake," she whispered, and closed the door behind her.

When she returned, she again took up the magazine, and, after a moment's reflection, carefully cut out the pages containing the story and thrust them, one by one, into the glowing fire. Then, replacing the magazine upon the shelf from which it had been taken, she sank into a chair and tried to think more calmly.

"'An Act of Dishonour,'" she murmured again, as if the title had for her a terrible and irresistible fascination. "I wonder," she continued after a brief pause, "what would be done to me if by any chance the truth were discovered. I know it would be termed 'infringement of copyright' in legal phraseology, but most people would give it an uglier name. But it cannot—it is almost impossible to be discovered. I must not think of it. It is for my mother's sake—for my mother's life—I do it, and she is all I have in the world!"

After tea, Mrs. Verrall joined her daughter in the sitting-room, and again proposed that they should together reread and discuss the two rejected stories which still lay upon the table. But the proposition met with no response from the silent girl. For the first time in all her life, she found herself afraid to meet her mother's eyes.

"My head aches," she said, with a little forced smile. "I think I will go to bed early."

Mrs. Verrall went to her daughter and kissed her, but the girl shivered at the caress and turned away her head.

"You are not yourself to-night, dear," said the mother gently. "Several things have happened to-day, and you are unstrung. But you will be all right again in the morning, and more enthusiastic about your work." She took up a book as she spoke, and settled herself in an easy-chair.

For some moments Jessie sat gazing into the glowing fire-light, until, afraid even of her own reflections, she too took up a book and attempted to read. But the story, though a good one, failed to engross her. Time after time she found herself wandering from the narrative to that other story, "An Act of Dishonour," and its shameful sequel. She was conscious, too, that her mother glanced up, from time to time, at her troubled face, and she grew nervous under the scrutiny.

At last she rose with a sigh, and, kissing her mother's cheek, bade her good-night and retired to her own room. But all through that night the consciousness of what she had done kept her from sleep, and though again and again she whispered to herself "For her sake—for her sake!" the words brought small comfort to the troubled girl. She was only five-and-twenty, and this was her first deviation from the path of rectitude. What untold torments do we not suffer when conscience lashes us for the first secret sin of our youth! But the morning came at last, and with it, sleep for the weary girl, and when she again awoke, it was broad day, and she rose refreshed and comforted in body, if not in mind.

Thus the days went by. Eagerly and sometimes apprehensively, she watched the post. Morning after morning she took the few letters which the post had brought her and tore them open with trembling fingers. And at last the one she hoped for, and yet dreaded, came, and a cheque fluttered on the floor. The letter which accompanied it was full of high commendation for the excellent story she had submitted, his appreciation of which the editor desired to practically acknowledge, by doubling the usual sum paid for short stories and by warmly inviting her to submit others.

The girl sat very still when she had read the letter, and a confusion of emotions passed through her

She glanced round as if fearful of being seen. "The story is five years old," she whispered; "nobody would know."

Digitized by Google

mind. How sweet would have been these commendations had they been honestly earned! Now, they only served to increase her shame. The coveted cheque had come, and for even a larger amount than she had dared to hope, and her mother could now go away where life and health would be restored. But the cheque meant the publication of the stolen story, and this awoke anew the dread of the shameful humiliation which would be hers when the discovery came.

While the acceptance of the story still hovered in uncertainty, she had almost persuaded herself that discovery was impossible. But now that she realised it would soon be scattered broadcast over the whole country, the dread of detection took fresh hold upon her and sent a chill of fear through her veins. With an effort, however, she stifled the many voices that seemed to clamour within her, and, picking up the cheque, she went to her mother's room.

"Mother," she said, trying to control her voice, "I wrote a story a week or so ago which I kept from you. It is a good deal better than any of my recent work, and it has been accepted. Here is the cheque for it, with which you will be able to start for Ventnor as soon as you like." There was a deep flush on her face as she spoke, but the fond mother attributed this to the excitement of the occasion and the joy which she knew her daughter must feel in giving her this good news.

"God bless you, my child!" she said, with tears in her eyes as she threw her arms about her daughter's neck and kissed her tenderly. "I said it would come. And this is the very best way in which it could come, because it is through you, dear."

The tears were in the girl's eyes also as she put out her arms and clung passionately to her mother—tears that would not be denied, but gushed out unhindered, while great sobs shook the slender frame. But with the tears came relief to the overwrought brain, and she grew more composed as the day advanced, helping her mother to pack and in other ways prepare for the journey which was before her.

The next day Mrs. Verrall took an affectionate leave of her daughter, and was soon travelling down to Ventnor. She had stayed there before, and therefore knew just where to go to obtain the rest and quiet of which she stood so much in need. So Jessie returned alone to the solitary little cottage in Highgate, and tried to find distraction in the production of new stories and in the improvement of the old. So the days went by, and, to her surprise, she felt her old power returning. Nor was the cause of this far to seek, for each day that sped by after the appearance of the story she had appropriated lessened the danger of detection, while the constant letters from Ventnor told of her mother's returning health and the delights of the long holiday she was enjoying.

Five weeks had slipped by since Mrs. Verrall's departure, and Jessie had almost lost the terrible dread which had haunted her, keeping only the shame and dishonour, which she felt could never fade from her memory, when a letter was delivered to her. Tearing it open, she read the following:

Office of "The Censor," 95 & 97, Desborough Street,
Strand, W.C.

MADAM,—I have been greatly interested by the story which appeared some weeks ago in the "Metropolitan Magazine," entitled "An Act of Dishonour." As you are doubtless aware, our terms are considerably above those of the above-named magazine, and if you would favour us by submitting an occasional short story for publication in "The Censor," I shall be happy to personally and carefully consider them. Perhaps you might find time to call at this office, when we might discuss a few preliminaries. Yours faithfully,

MAX ORMOND (Editor).

When she had read the letter, the girl glanced across at the little table upon which stood her typewriting machine. At one side lay a pile of manuscripts, the upper one of which contained a story she had finished only the previous day. She knew it to be the best thing she had written for many months, and, after a moment's reflection, she decided to take it herself to the office of The Censor. Accordingly about eleven o'clock she put on her hat and proceeded in that direction, with the manuscript clasped tightly in her hand. She was admitted at once to the editor's room, and Max Ormond—the well known author-editor of The Censor—bowed to her as she entered.

"Miss Verrall, I believe?" he said as he motioned her to a chair. "I am glad you have come, for I have been quite curious to see you since I saw 'An Act of Dishonour' in The Metropolitan."

The girl flushed.

"It is very good of you," she said in a low tone, "and I could do nothing else but readily respond to the invitation conveyed in your letter."

"Invitation? Ah, yes, I remember. Have you done anything else in the same style as 'An Act of Dishonour'? If so, I should like to see it."

"I finished a story yesterday," replied the girl, "and I think it is one of the best I have as yet turned out. If you would care to look it over——" And she put the folded manuscript on the table in front of the editor.

"Thank you," he said. "If you are not in a hurry, I shall be glad to do so." He turned and whispered a few words to his secretary, who immediately left the room. Then, once more turning to the girl, he said, "Perhaps you might amuse yourself with a magazine while I read your manuscript. Here is one in which you may find something to interest you."

The girl took the magazine he handed her, and, seeing that Max Ormond began at once to read her story, she turned over the pages and glanced at the titles. Something about them seemed familiar, but at first she could not tell what. Then a dreadful suspicion flashed upon her, and she hurriedly turned over the pages until she came to what she dreaded. For there, as in her own copy, she read the title "An Act of Dishonour—By Pentaur." It was another copy of the same old number of the American Monthly Magazine. A groan escaped her lips, and, letting the book fall to the floor, she sat there, trembling and bewildered, not even daring to move. Max Ormond appeared not to notice her agitation, but went on persistently reading the manuscript before him, and it was not until he had reached the last word that he lifted his head and looked at the terrified girl.

For some moments neither spoke a word. With searching, penetrating eyes, Max Ormond regarded the girl before him as though he would read her inmost soul. Then he spoke, firmly but gently, in words that left no doubt in the girl's mind that he knew all the terrible truth.

"Tell me," he said, "for I must know—why did you do it?"

The girl covered her face with her hands and was silent.

"I must know," the editor went on. "And I have a right to ask the question, for—I am 'Pentaur.'"

"I did it," she said, dropping her hands and looking at him through the tears which dimmed her blue eyes—"I did it because I knew that the money I should thus obtain would save the life of the only living creature in all the world who is dear to me—my mother! I used to write well at one time, and reaped success after success. But trouble and anxiety have robbed my work of its charm and its power, and failure and disappointment have met me at every turn."

"But what is this you say about your mother?" asked the editor.

"My mother has been ill," replied the girl, "and her doctor told me that she would die if she did not have immediate rest and change of air. If she went away at once, her life would be saved, but if not, there was no hope. It was that which drove me to it, for my mother's life is dearer to me than my own honour."

Again there was silence in the room.

Digitized by Google

"There is one other question I must ask," said Max Ormond presently. "It is one I have no personal right to put to you, but the answer must necessarily influence my view of the matter. Tell me—honestly and without prevarication—is this the only story you have appropriated, or are there any others which you have similarly treated?"

"This is the only one," said the girl in a voice that shook with emotion. "And God knows how great is the mountain of guilt which that one has heaped upon me."

"You swear it?"

"Yes."

Max Ormond breathed a sigh of relief.

"I cannot but believe," he said, "that you speak the truth. This thing that you have done would be a sufficient excuse for a contrary opinion. But to me your words carry conviction, and I believe you. It is fortunate that the copyright of the story in question is still in my hands, so that I am the only person to whom you are responsible for its misappropriation. And I, well, I should be less than a gentleman if I did not view your act in the light of its motive, and free you from all further anxiety in the matter." He took a sheet of paper from the rack before him as he spoke, and hurriedly wrote a few words upon it, signing his name at the foot.

"This paper," he said, as he handed it to her, "transfers to you the copyright of 'An Act of Dishonour,' and I have dated it prior to the publication of the story in the Metropolitan Magazine. You need, therefore, have no further misgivings on that score. I would extract from you a promise that you would never again act in this way, no matter what were the circumstances or the motives which actuated you, but I think this is unnecessary—first because it is all too evident that your punishment has been heavier than you ever anticipated; and secondly, because, while you can conceive such stories as the one you have brought me this morning you will have no need to appropriate other people's. I shall accept this story, and will send you a cheque as soon as it is published. Please let me see any others you may write, and, if they are like this one, you need have no fear of finding a good market for them."

Tears of gratitude were in the girl's eyes as she listened. For the first time during the five long weeks of shame and self-abasement which had passed, a gleam of sunny happiness returned to her life. She could scarcely speak the thanks which welled to her lips and trembled for utterance. But Max Ormond stopped her with a kindly smile. She had risen, and he, too, now followed her example. He held out his hand, and she put hers timidly within it.

"There is one thing more," he said quietly. "Will you regard me as a friend who will always feel an interest in your welfare?"

"Can I regard you as anything else?" returned the girl, "when you have treated me so magnanimously and punished me, not with severity, or even with common justice, but with kindness?"

Max Ormond smiled.

"There are many diversities of regard," he said, "and friendship is surely not the highest."

The girl's eyes fell.

"It is not far from it," she said shyly.

Max Ormond regarded her attentively for a moment, while a strange light played about his handsome face.

"Well," he said at last, "we are friends then. I shall come to see you sometimes when your mother returns. Do you know, I am quite anxious to see this mother upon whom you lavish so rare an affection. But I won't detain you any longer to-day. Good-bye. I shall see you again before long."

And with a warm pressure of the hand, he bowed her courteously out of the room.

A year later, a paragraph appeared in the marriage announcements of the Times, which ran as follows:

On December 1st, 19——, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, Jessie Beatrice Verrall, daughter of the late Rev. E. Bathurst Verrall, Rector of St. Cuthbert's, Hampstead, to Max Pentaur Ormond, Esq., son of Sir Gurney Ormond, M.P.

Walter J. Mowbray.

With penetrating eyes Max Ormond regarded the girl before him as though he would read her inmost soul.

Digitized by Google

FOR LOVE or MONEY.

The Story of a Case, and of the Circumstances which Altered It.

"AUSTEN!"

"Dick!"

"Man!—is it your ghost?"

"No—I don't think so; though I'm a little in doubt as to your substantial reality, Dick!"

"Seriously, Austen!—where, in the name of Fortune, have you sprung from? It's eight years and more since you and I forogathered, and—well—there's something about you, Earle, that to me, is—is new and strange."

"I might say the same Dick, of you, but I'm afraid that it wouldn't seem kind."

"Oh!—you couldn't hurt my feelings, old chap! I'm past all that."

"Well, it's no use denying it, Dick!—things are changed for the better with me. If I were to tell you what I am worth to-day, you would hardly believe me. When you and I lived together in the Pimlico lodging, years ago, change for a sovereign was like an angel's visit. Now!—but come out of this crowd; we'll get to Holborn, and find a quiet place for a snack and a chat."

"But, Austen, old fellow! I—I'm not exactly fit to pair with you in a swell restaurant. Besides, I have to look after business."

Austen Earle looked his new-found friend in the eyes with kindly cunning.

"Dick!" he said, "you can't deceive me! Do you think I forget who it was that pawned his watch to raise the money to make up my passage? Do you think I forget that a certain Richard Mowbray sat up a whole night to finish a story; worried his editor the next morning till he got the money for it, and with sly treachery slipped every penny of that money into the pocket of his friend who was about to sail for El Dorado?"

"I only thought, Austen, that my companionship would perhaps compromise you."

"Anything more in that strain, Dick, and I shall begin to think that there is something in the theory of doubles, after all; and, that it is not you but your counterfeit, whom I have run up against to-day."

The two men, eight years before, were chums, in the best sense of the word. Friends at college, they had continued their friendship in close companionship till ill-fortune in the case of Austen Earle, made it necessary that he should leave England, and begin life again in a new country.

A clerk to a member of the Stock Exchange, he was one day accused—and, as it transpired two years later, falsely accused—of betraying Stock Exchange secrets to a firm of outside brokers. Clever as a financier, beyond the ordinary, his prompt and ignominious dismissal from his position, meant for him utter ruin. His friend, Richard Mowbray, a hard-working writer of fiction for the weeklies, it was who, by devoted effort, raised the money necessary to start the other on his new career.

Bitter belief in his guilt, shut both the hearts and the purses of the unfortunate young fellow's family and friends, so that but for Dick Mowbray's faithfulness and sympathy, he would have inevitably drifted into the ranks of the shipwrecked.

As for Dick himself; one of those gentle-souled Bohemians, who in the midst of a selfish world, are the true apostles of unselfishness; he lived his life through those eight years, not unhappily. Beyond one letter from New York, that announced his safe arrival, he heard no more from Austen Earle, till, as time went on, he came to believe that his old-time friend had dropped out of the race.

He still continued to live in the street off the Vauxhall Bridge Road, the only difference being, that on his friend's departure, he moved up into the attic.

Long connection with the big publishing firm for which he almost exclusively worked, made him familiar with nearly everybody at the office; and it was with a young girl, Phyllis Howell by name, typine and shorthand writer to the managing editor himself, that Dick Mowbray, some three years before Austen Earle's sudden reappearance on the scene, fell in love.

It so happened that Phyllis lived also in the Belgravian paradise, which, when Dick had discovered, he utilised to his own advantage. If it was a fine evening, and Phyllis walked home through the park, Dick found that he, too, had the pedestrian fit upon him, and the pair strolled Pimlico-wards in company. Was it wet or stormy, Dick's umbrella, as far as Charing Cross underground station, sheltered two instead of one, the same service being again rendered at Victoria, and gratefully acknowledged.

They were both fairly lonely young people, Dick's family letting him, as an irresponsible and somewhat disreputable Bohemian scribbler, severely alone, while Phyllis, as an unappreciated unit in an unsympathetic household, was shut up, within herself, so far as human companionship was concerned.

For some reason, which he could not exactly explain to himself, Dick Mowbray did not confide the fact of his engagement to Phyllis to Austen Earle.

Over a well-spread dinner-table at the Holborn Restaurant, Austen Earle told how that he had been six months in London, where he had set up in business as a large speculator in the purchase and sale of new companies.

He had been exceptionally fortunate in his ventures in America, having returned to England with a fortune running into six figures, which, he told Dick, he anticipated doubling in less than twelve months.

"And, now, old chap!" he said as they sat in the smoking room, "this eternal grind of yours must cease! No more burning of the midnight oil! No more days of failure and disappointment! What I have, is yours to share!—for you shared with me when it meant sacrifice and even worse."

"It is very good of you, my dear fellow!" said Dick, "and I know you mean it out of the generosity of your heart, but——"

"I will not hear a 'but'!"

"I was but going to say, that, though I haven't a pound too much, I have no claim upon your purse such as you would have me believe I have."

"Well, think it over. Perhaps you will find that there is something my money can do which will add to your comfort and happiness. Think it over, Dick, come and see me to-morrow in Old Broad Street, Palmerston Buildings. I must leave you now, for in an hour I am to sign a contract, which will give me the purchase option of the biggest commerical undertaking in the three Kingdoms."

Dick Mowbray stood a moment, looking after the hansom that bore eastwards the busy man of money, and then turned his steps in the direction of the office, where a five pound note awaited him for work done.

* * * * * * *

"Am I late, Dick?" said a voice in his ear, as he stood waiting in the entry of the big building.

It was ten minutes past six and he was fidgeting in so unmistakable a manner that Phyllis could not help noticing it.

Digitized by Google

"Just a little bit, darling! But which is it to be, walk or train?"

"Whichever you like, Dick."

"Then we'll walk, for it will give me time to tell you of a most extraordinary experience of mine to-day.'"

"Anything good, dear, ?" she said, smiling up at him, for she had such unbounded faith in her lover's genius and ultimate success as a novelist of coming world-wide reputation, that she felt she would never be surprised at anything in the way of good fortune which might befall him.

"Well, in a way, yes; though the good really concerns someone else—an old friend of mine—you've heard me speak of him—Earle—Austen Earle?"

"Oh, yes, I know—he went abroad seven or eight years ago, didn't he?"

"Yes—and now he's come back with an enormous fortune, which he is using as a means to make, as he has just told me, the biggest pile of any one man in the City of London to-day."

"Oh, Dick!—why it's like a fairy-tale, isn't it?"

"But that isn't all, dear! Austen Earle, for old time's sake, and because he has an idea that he owes me a good turn, as he calls it, wants to share some of his money with me."

"Dick!—what a splendid fellow he must be!"

"Yes—he is a splendid fellow, but——"

"What did you say to him, Dick? Tell me, Dick!—tell me!"

"Well, I said scarcely anything; I was so full of that story I am doing this week—the one, you know, I told you of, that I am afraid my old friend's generous offer didn't quite appeal to me, in the way he perhaps looked for it to do."

"Dick," said Phyllis, after a moment's pause. "Are you going to slave, as you do now, all the rest of your life?"

"Hullo, Phyllis!" he answered her gaily. "What has come over you—I hope you are not getting mercenary! I shall always have to work hard, I expect; but for your sake, dear, I look forward to being more prosperous—some day."

"It does seem such a long time in coming—prosperity—doesn't it, Dick? Why you and I shall be too old to enjoy it when it comes, if it doesn't come soon. Fancy this Mr. Earle having all this money; and you obliged to write night and day almost, for so very, very little."

"Would it please you, dear then, if I let my friend throw me a charity dole?"

There was just a suspicion of irony in the question itself, and in the tone in which it was spoken.

"You should not put it in that way, Dick! Mr. Earle, I expect, has no such thought with regard to his generous intentions."

"I suppose not—or rather, perhaps not. But I am to see him about this time to-morrow, and will bring him to see you, if you will let me. I do not wish Earle to know that we are engaged."

"Why, Dick?"

"Oh, I don't know—it's a fad of mine, I suppose. I am jealous of almost every man, even of my old friend."

By this time they had arrived at Phyllis' door, where Dick left her, again promising to introduce Austen Earle to her at six o'clock on the following evening.

* * * * *

Phyllis awaited with impatience her introduction to the man of money.

It must not be imagined that she was inclined to waver over so little in her allegiance to Dick. She loved him too well and truly for that.

When she saw Austen Earle, a tall, dark, keen-eyed man of the same age as Dick, she was not unnaturally anxious to please.

The man of money thought he had never seen so dainty a specimen of fair womanhood before, and mentally made notes concerning her.

The three strolled through the park to the Howell's door, where, before Dick and his friend left her, Phyllis extended to the latter an invitation to accompany Dick on his next visit to her parents' house.

Phyllis' dreams that night were golden in every way, and it must be confessed that all through the next day strange thoughts arose in her mind, concerning the power of money. Austen Earle figured more in her imaginings than poor Dick, who, bringing her that evening an armful of chrysanthemums, noticed something wanting in her manner towards him.

The meaning of it all came upon him with full force when he heard that, without waiting for his company, Austen Earle had called one evening in Gillingham Street, and had created a very favourable impression upon the family generally.

Then, one day, the bolt fell.

For several days now, Dick had kept away from the six o'clock tryst. He was ill-at-ease, irritable, and afraid to trust himself with Phyllis.

He had called in the usual way one morning, on business, when the porter handed him a note addressed to him in Phyllis' handwriting.

It was a pitiful little letter.

"Dick," she wrote, "I am very unhappy—I want to see you, oh! so much. I have something to tell you, too, which you must hear. If I do not see you at six to-night, I shall break my heart. You have been very cruel, Dick.—

"PHYLLIS."

As he left the building a hansom drove up, from it descending Austen Earle.

"The very man I wanted to see!" he said, and then, when they had passed up the street a little way, turned short round upon Dick. "You and I, between us, have managed to do the worst day's work we have ever done. But the fault was more yours than mine. Why didn't you trust me, Dick? Why didn't you tell me that that dear little girl was going to be your wife? I'll tell you why I ask you. Last evening I went to her father and told him that I loved his daughter, when he at once replied that you had her promise; had had it for three years and more. Was it fair to me—to her—to yourself even, to keep me in the dark? I thought something was wrong when you did not turn up lately."

Dick didn't know what to say. He saw that his friend was hurt more sorely than he cared to confess, and he felt, almost for the first time in his life, ashamed of himself.

"That's about all I wanted to say, Dick. I'm going to Paris to-night, and afterwards I don't know what I shall do. You shall hear from me, and if you'll take a fool's advice, you'll comfort that poor little woman before you're many hours older, for, unless I'm very much mistaken, she is fairly wrung over this wretched business. Good-bye, old chap! I'll write you from Paris!"

* * * * *

It is satisfactory to know that between Phyllis and Dick there is no question now as to the respective merits of love and money.

With Phyllis there never had been any real hankering after the "golden calf." With her, it was but a young girl's natural bewilderment in the presence of a man who, like a magician, could, if he would, bring the world to his feet. Once the novelty of this feeling worn off, and there remained, as pure and as true as ever, the love, which Dick knows now, could never have given place to a mere desire for money, and all that money could buy.

A few days before the wedding, Dick received a letter from Austen Earle, dated from New York, where, he said, he had after all, decided to work and live.

Accompanying the letter, was a small box, containing some remarkably fine diamonds which the writer requested Dick to have made up into any form of ornament Phyllis liked, charging the setting of the same to his, Austen Earle's account.

"I wish," he said in conclusion, "both you and your wife the happiness that comes from perfect mutual love; just asking from you an occasional kind thought for him who would like always to be looked upon by you as your friend—"AUSTEN EARLE."

Ralph Enderby..

Digitized by Google

A KERRY LOVE IDYLL.

The Old, Old Story Ending as it Should.

She was a flaxen-haired, Irish maid of eighteen. He, an Englishman of eight-and-twenty.

Opposite in nature, tastes and education, the two nevertheless fraternised, as is so often the case with people whose views but rarely coincide.

Hard, sceptical, and a cynic on matters both human and divine, Arthur Haddon had arrived at Athlee to go over the ground which he had chosen for the scene of his next novel.

In the village of Athlee none knew what had induced him to come to that little out-of-the-way hamlet on the banks of the Feale. No one knew whence he came, his natural taciturnity and reserve repelling all pertinent questions of this description. Thus he remained, till one day in the course of a ramble in search of information his eyes lighted on Nora O'Roole.

From a smile and a nod a sort of friendship sprung up, a friendship which had deepened into a far deeper feeling ere a month had passed over their heads.

Days and weeks flew by unheeded. Then a letter arrived from his publishers who inquired when they might expect the first instalment of his new novel. The trade, they stated, had been given to understand that the book would be issued to the public early in October. They concluded their epistle, by stating, that it was the beginning of July and that so far not a page of manuscript had come to hand.

"I wonder if they think I am not aware of that most obvious fact," he mused aloud, as crushing the missive in his hand, he smiled grimly. "The beggars are right, however. There's no help for it. I must return to London and scribble for dear life and break the chain which binds me to this place."

He informed Nora of his resolution that evening, as the two were floating down the river in a boat, which he had hired for the summer.

"Going?" she echoed softly, turning her head to gaze apparently at the fields, bathed in the warm glow of a summer sunset.

"Going? When do you leave Athlee, Arthur?"

"To-morrow," replied Haddon, and paused abruptly, expecting a reply.

He was doomed to disappointment. His only answer being the splash of his oars as they clove the placid waters of the stream and a soft, silvery ripple as the stem of the boat cut its way through the tranquil surface of the river.

"Nora."

"Yes, Arthur."

"I don't suppose that it will make much difference to you whether I stay or go, will it?" His voice was pathetically inquiring.

"I would rather that you stayed."

"Why?"

He had rested the oars across his knees and leant forward, a hungry, yearning look in his eyes as he bent them on the girl reclining amid a bevy of cushions at the stern of the boat.

"I shall miss our rambles. Are you tired of Athlee, that you have taken so sudden a resolution to leave it? But sure, you must be wanting to get back to London," she said, then added slowly, "and a good-looking fellow like yourself is sure to have someone, waiting for him to come back."

There was the faintest trace of bitterness in the concluding words of her sentence.

"No," he said slowly. "I am not tired of Athlee, for I love the place. Neither have I a girl waiting for me to return to London. I must, however, leave here. I have stayed too long as it is, and my publishers——"

"Your publishers?" she echoed, inquiringly, steering clear of a floating snag. "What are they?"

"They are beings who print your books and sell them. You see, I am an author, Nora, so I am pretty dependent on them. It seems strange to me to hear you say that someone is waiting for me in England," he said wistfully. "If you only knew how I lived, you would realise how bitter is the irony of your words. My dear Nora, there is no one in England who cares for me enough to do that."

"Are you sure of that, Arthur?"

"Am I sure?" he laughed bitterly. "I know it only too well. Has a taciturn, sceptical man, friends? But rarely, Nora! My cynicism and suspicion have estranged me from my family. Have robbed me of my friends and deprived me of love. For years I have lived for myself alone, and see what I am now. True, I am rich and well known. But what is the use of either wealth or fame to a man if he be friendless and unbeloved! Nora, were I to die to-morrow, there is not a soul who would care unless it were my publishers. I am a source of revenue to them," he added sardonically.

"Do you not view life from too dismal a standpoint?" she queried lightly, steering the boat to the bank and jumping on to it.

"Perhaps," he replied sadly, grasping the hand which she extended to him and stepping out of the boat. "It has been owing to that failing that I am what I am. Now there is nothing left for me but to remain the cynic to the end of the chapter."

"I shouldn't if I were you," she said sagely. "Why not turn over the proverbial new leaf and view things from their rosiest side? Faith, I am thinking that it would be more pleasant."

"It is easy for you to speak thus," he said, a shade of bitterness in his voice. "What shadow has ever crossed your sunlit path? Nora, this has been the happiest time of my life. For three months I have lived in a sort of Eden. I have—that is—oh, I almost wish I had never come here, Nora."

"I don't. Why?"

"Because of the change which is about to take place in my life. Before I came to Athlee, Nora, I was quite content with my flat, my books, and my pipe. No one cared to visit me, and I, for my part, wanted none to look me up. Now, however, all this is changed. How can I return to them and be content when the memory of our happy days spent on the Feale and the vision of Athlee village come between myself and my work. I fear the recollection, Nora, that is why I wish that I had never come."

A sigh which was half strangled at birth escaped his lips.

Digitized by Google

"You surely do not mean to say that you prefer Athlee to London!" she said, her voice trembling oddly. "How strange!"

"It is, however, true," Haddon replied, bending down to tie the boat's painter to a neighbouring post. "Athlee to me is the loveliest spot in Christendom."

"Why?"

"Because, Nora, it contains the one thing I have ever loved in all this wide world of ours!" he replied, with a tensity which thrilled his hearer.

"A girl, of course," she remarked tentatively.

"As you say—a girl," he answered, unmindful of the pallor which was slowly creeping over Nora's face.

"Why don't you propose to her then?" she asked gently. "She might love——"

"Ah, might," he interrupted, wistfully. "That is where the shoe pinches. She might not care to marry me, and if this were the case, her refusal would extinguish for ever the one bright spark which has illumined my dreary life. No, Nora, I know that you will think that I am mad, but I prefer to live on in uncertainty. To think what might have been had——"

"It isn't fair to the girl if she loves you," said Nora, tremblingly. "You have no right to ruin her life, even if you have to do so to yours."

"But how do I know that such would be the case? How—"

"Faith, you can't know without finding out. Why, her heart might be—be—breaking—at this—mo——" Nora's voice grew huskier till it finally died away in a whisper, as she raised her eyes bright with tears to his.

A strange light illumined them, a very wealth of love and pleading looking up at him from their violet depths.

"Nora, Nora, do you realise what you are saying?" he cried hoarsely, as pressing her slim form to his he rained kisses on her resistless lips. "You are telling me that you love—oh, darling, is it true? I can't leave Ireland without its loveliest daughter as my wife! I love you, darling! Love you as no man has ever loved woman before. You told me to ask the girl I loved to be my wife, I am waiting for her answer—I am waiting for yours, Nora, love."

And as he pressed her slim form to him and felt her trembling with happy sobs, he knew his answer before she spoke it.

Tristam K. Monck.

MRS. CALLER: "What is the name of your new servant?" Mrs. Wifey: "We call her Bliss." Mrs. Caller: "Why?" Mrs. Wifey: "Because ignorance is bliss."

DEMONSTRATOR (in clinics): "You will notice that the subject's right leg is longer than his left, which causes him to limp. Now, what would you do in such a case?" Bright Student: "I'd limp, too."

"YES," said the chairman sadly, "our temperance meeting last night would have been more successful if the lecturer hadn't been so absent-minded." "What did he do?" "He tried to blow the foam from a glass of water."

"YER lordship, I didn't steal this man's cornet; indeed I didn't," pleaded the prisoner. "I bought if from him. You know me better than that. I live in the same street as you." "Oh, you do, eh?" said the judge. "Well, five years. Call the next."

TELESCOPE PROPRIETOR: "Step up, ladies and gents, and view the planet Mars. One penny, mum." Old Lady: "Oh, law! Hain't it round and smooth?" Telescope Proprietor: "Will the bald-headed gent please step away from the front of the instrument."

GENTLEMAN: "You ask me for a small gift, and do not even take off your hat from your head. Is that the way to act?" Beggar: "Excuse me, most honourable sir, I dare not, for yonder stands a policeman. If he should see me take off my hat it will occur to him at once that I am a beggar, and he will arrest me. At present, as we are now, he merely supposes we are old acquaintances having a friendly chat!"

YOUR EDITOR CHATS.

A GOOD deal of correspondence has reached me as the result of the publication of the instalment of "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA," containing reference to the efforts of Honoria to become married to El Hamed, the Egyptian. Many readers look upon this incident as ridiculous, and say that no lady of title such as Lady Honoria would think of falling in love with an Egyptian, no matter how high his position may be. In making such statements, of course these readers have only convinced me of how little the average person knows about life in High Society, and it is with a view to spreading knowledge on the subject that I am publishing such series of articles as "THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA" and "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA."

That such an affair as that between Honoria and El Hamid is not only possible but probable, is pretty obvious when one reads the following news item which appeared in a recent number of the Daily Express:

EMIR'S ENGLISH WIFE.

"RIVAL IN THE HAREM CAUSES HER IMPRISONMENT.

"Constantinople.

"The English and American residents at Constantinople were much surprised in May when it was announced that Miss Isabel Dunn, an English lady, had married an Arab, who was a descendant of the prophet Mohammed and who aspires to be the next Emir of Mecca. The marriage has turned out to be a most unhappy one, as everybody expected.

"Miss Dunn was introduced into the house of the Arab as a governess for his two sons, and after some months in that position she became a convert to Mohammedanism, and was secretly married to her employer.

"For some time the marriage was kept secret from the other wives, but it was soon discovered, and the other ladies of the harem did everything they possibly could to annoy the new bride. The favourite wife discovered that, according to Mohammedan law, it was impossible for anyone to become the Emir of Mecca who married anyone who had ever been a Christian. She communicated this news to her friends, and in consequence the Emir fled into the country, and has not been heard of since.

"Meanwhile she caused Miss Dunn to be imprisoned in a small kiosk in a little garden near Scutari. Here she remains for the present time, a prisoner and friendless. She is visited once a day by a servant, who brings her food and attends to her other wants, but otherwise she is cut off from all communication with the rest of the world. As she is now a Turkish subject, and also a Mohammedan, she cannot claim any protection from England."

This reads more like fiction than fact, does it not? Yet every word of it is true. Those who are sceptical as to the facts contained in the "BELINDA" series will perhaps now feel convinced that what we say is perfectly correct, viz., that all the statements made are exactly as they happened, the only alteration being that of the names of the chief characters concerned.

A very simple way of obtaining £10 is to turn to page 13. There you will find an announcement to the effect that this sum will be given to the person who sends in what the Editor considers to be the best reason for having it. I don't know of any simpler way of distributing money. If you cannot think of a reason why you should receive £10, then, of course, you don't deserve it. If there is a reason why you should receive £10, then send it along to the COMPETITION Editor, and if he considers it the best of those received you will be the richer by a £10 Note.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Domestic Taste.

FIRST CLUBMAN: "Is Jackson a man of domestic tastes?" Second Clubman: "Very; I understand he flirts with his servants."

What She Had in the Bank.

HE: "Before proposing, Miss Lulu, I wish to know if you have anything in the bank?" She: "Yes, Mr. Poorman, I have a lover there. He is the cashier, and we are to be married next week."

Mary Didn't Know.

MISTRESS: "How is it, Mary, that whenever I enter the kitchen I always find a man there?" Mary: "I don't know, ma'am, indeed, unless it be them there soft shoes ye wears, that don't make no noise!"

An Unfair Advantage.

JESS: "I thought that you hated Jack, and yet you have accepted him." Bess: "I did hate him; but he proposed under an umbrella, and said if I refused he would let the rain drip on my new hat."

Father's Condition.

BANKS: "What did her father say when you told him that you wanted to marry his daughter?" Rivers: "Well, he didn't absolutely refuse, but he imposed a very serious condition." Banks: "What was it?" Rivers: "He said he would see me hanged first."

There Was no Mirror Handy.

MRS. MYLES: "I told Mrs. Styles I had heaped coals of fire on her head, and she looked worried." Mrs. Fyles: "What made her look worried, do you suppose?" Mrs. Myles: "She didn't know whether they were on straight or not."

The Very Reason.

MRS. O'BRIEN: "Good-mornin'; Mrs. M'Cabe. An' phwat makes yez look so sad?" Mrs. M'Cabe: "Shure, Dennis was sint to gaol for six months." Mrs. O'Brien: "Well, shure, don't worry; six months will soon pass." Mrs. M'Cabe: "Shure, that's phwat worries me."

Hands Off!

ONE afternoon, when a perfect gale of wind was raging, a gentleman, in feeble health, was struggling to reach his home, aided by his wife. Just as they reached the corner of a street a huge tin chimney-pot was torn from the roof of a house by the power of the wind, and dashed to the ground just in front of the feeble gentleman and his wife. "Good gracious!" cried the gentleman, "that was a narrow escape for us." "If it had struck us it would have killed us," she replied. The two stopped for a moment to examine the chimney-pot, more dangerous in a high wind than a bomb-shell; but just as they were scrutinising it a window near by was opened, a female head was thurst out, and in a shrill tone she shouted: "You needn't think you're going to carry that 'off cause it b'longs to my house!"

How it Happened.

GREENE: "How did Jones come to marry that red-haired girl?" White: "Poor Jones didn't notice it; he is colour blind."

Just as Well to Know.

PAPA: "So you asked my daughter to marry you. Can you support a family?" Suitor: "How many of you are there?"

Easily Accounted For.

"Do I squint, Charlie?" asked the rich girl. "A little, Maudie," he said tenderly; "but who wouldn't with your eyes? If mine were as beautiful as yours, I'd be trying to look into them myself."

Why Women Dislike Prominent Bachelors.

WINKERS: "Why is it that women always dislike a prominent man who is an old bachelor?" Blinkers: "Because they can't say he would never have amounted to anything if it had not been for his wife."

There Are More Ways.

TOMMY: "Yes, cats can see in the dark, and so can Ethel, 'cause when Mr. Wright walked into the parlour, when she was sittin' all alone in the dark, I heard her say to him: 'Why, Arthur, you didn't get shaved to-day!'"

Not What He Wanted to Know.

STERN PARENT: "Quite so, sir, quite so! You tell me that you have proposed to my daughter, but—er—you say nothing about your position." Nervous Suitor: "My position, sir? Oh—er—the—the—usual one, I believe—on my knees, you know."

A Necessary Alteration.

HUSBAND (impatiently): "What is the reason my wife doesn't come down? I thought she was almost ready to go to the ball an hour ago." Maid: "She will be ready in a minute, sir. She has been changing her colour to match her new hair."

Perfectly Safe.

PRETTY DAUGHTER: "Ma, may I go boating?" Fond Mother: "Indeed you shan't. The idea! Who invited you?" Daughter: "Mr. Bliffers." Fond Mother: "Oh, yes, you may go with Mr. Bliffers. He has a cork leg, and if the boat upsets just you hang on to that."

Its Own Punishment.

MR. PARAKAY: "These two seats you gave me are in different rows, one behind the other." Ticket-seller: "One seat is for a lady, is it not?" Mr. Parakay: "Yes." Ticket seller: "Well, that is all right, then. You are expected to sit behind the lady, and if you bring one with a big hat it's your own fault. That's the way we sell 'em now."

Now Reginald Doesn't Call.

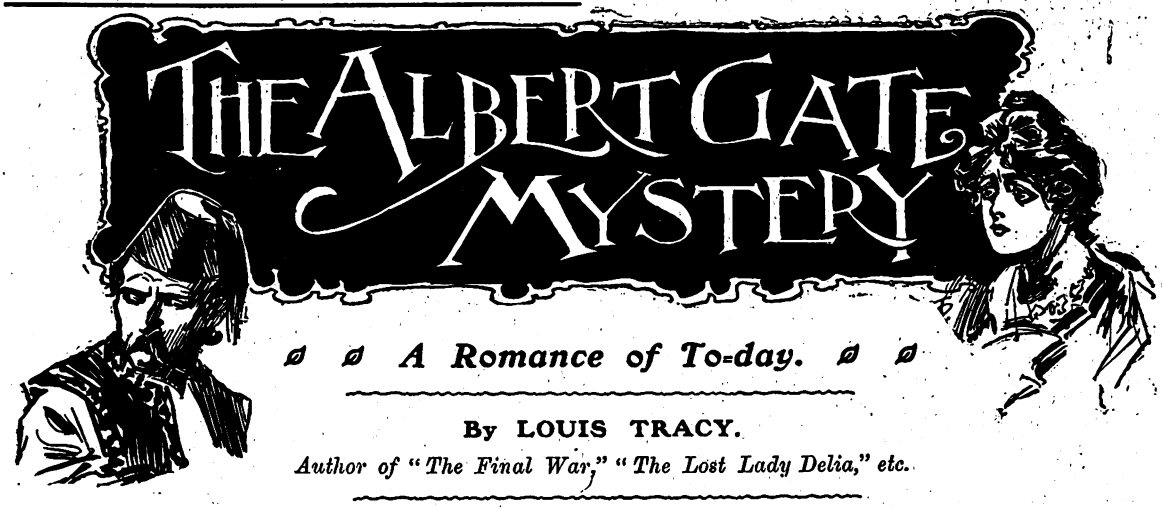
SHE: "Yes, Reginald, I confess you have awakened in my heart tender throbbings of a first and only love." He: "Dovey! Darling onliest only!" Her young brother (peeping from behind the curtain): "Hullo! Caught yer! Look here, if yer don't give me a tanner I'll split." She: "Tommy, you little beast, go away, and if you hold your tongue I'll give you a sixpence—to-morrow." Relentless Fiend: "No fear, no more tick! You promised me a bob if I didn't tell ma about Sammy Spooner kissing you, and you never brassed up yet."

A Young Philosopher.

MRS. MURRAY was reading a story to her son Justin, aged five years. Mrs. Murray: "Now, Justin, if your father were to die, would you work to help mamma?" Justin: "Why, mamma, what for? Haven't we got a nice house to live in?" Mrs. Murray: "Yes, Justin, but we can't eat the house, you know." Justin: "Well, mamma, haven't we got a whole lot of good things in the pantry?" Mrs. Murray: "Certainly, pet, but we would soon eat them up, and then what would we do?" Justin: "Well, mamma, isn't there enough to last until you could get another husband?"

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.



A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Mr. Brett's Quest.

A NUMBER of priceless diamonds having been most mysteriously stolen from an Albert Gate Mansion, and four of the custodians of the jewels murdered, Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, in conjunction with the police, is called upon to help clear up the mystery.

The diamonds, it appears, were sent over by the Sultan of Turkey in charge of a number of Turkish officials, and, being of political importance, the mission was placed by the British Government in the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, of the Foreign Office. Upon the night of the robbery and murder, Mr. Talbot disappears.

The Earl of Fairholme, being engaged to be married to Talbot's sister, intrusts Brett with the finding of Talbot.

Brett's first clue is the statement of Mr. Winter, a Scotland Yard detective, that Mr. Talbot and a lady have been seen in Paris, Talbot having signed his name in a hotel register. Brett goes to Paris to see if the signature is genuine.

On board the boat going across he finds a Scotland Yard man, probably sent to arrest Talbot, as being a party to the crime.

CLINGING to the hand-rails and executing some crude but effective balancing feats, he reached the dining saloon, which was woefully denuded of occupants, for the English Channel that night had sternly set its face against the indiscriminate use of cold ham.

Near the bar, however, solemnly digesting a liqueur, stood a man to whom the choppy sea evidently gave no concern. He had the square shoulders, neat-fitting clothes, and closely clipped appearance at the back of the neck which mark the British officer; but he also stood square on his feet, and swayed with unconscious ease whether the vessel pitched, or rolled or executed the combined movement.

"Now, I wonder," said Brett, "if that is Captain Gaultier. He must be. Gaultier, from his name, should be a Jersey man, hence his facility in foreign languages and his employment as a Foreign Office messenger. It's worth trying. I will make the experiment."

He reached the bar and ordered a whisky and soda. Turning affably to the stranger, he remarked:

"Nasty night, isn't it? I hope we shan't be much behind time."

The stranger glanced at him with sharp and inquisitive eyes, but the glance evidently reassured him, for he replied, quite pleasantly:

"Oh, no. A matter of a few minutes perhaps. Then they usually manage to make up any delay after we leave Calais."

"That's good," said Brett, "because I want to be in Paris at the earliest possible moment."

The other man smiled.

"We are due there at 5.38," he said. "Rather an early hour for business, isn't it?"

"Well, yes," assented the barrister, "under ordinary circumstances, but as my only business in Paris is to examine a hotel register and then get something to eat before I return, I do not wish to waste time unnecessarily on the road."

The other man nodded affably, but gave no sign of further interest.

"So," communed Brett, "if it be Gaultier he has not heard the latest developments. I must try a frontal attack."

"Does your name happen to be Gaultier?" he went on.

The stranger arrested his liqueur glass in the final tilt.

"It does," he said, "but I do not think I have the pleasure of knowing you."

"No," said Brett, "you haven't."

"Well?" said the other man.

"The fact is," said Brett, "that I heard you had been in London. I guessed from your appearance that you might be a King's messenger, and it was just possible that the Captain Gaultier in whom I was interested might start back to the Continent to-night, so I just put two and two together, don't you see, with the result that it made four, a thing that doesn't always happen in deduction if not in mathematics."

Now, Foreign Office messengers are not chosen for their simplicity or general want of intelligence. Captain Gaultier eyed his questioner with some degree of stern suspicion as he said from behind his cigar:

"May I ask who you are?"

"Certainly," said Brett, producing his card.

After a quick glance at the pasteboard, Gaultier continued:

"I suppose, Mr. Brett, you have some motive in addressing me? What is it?"

"I am interested in the fate of a man named Talbot," was the straightforward reply, "and as you told the Under-Secretary that you had seen Talbot crossing to Paris in company with a lady last Tuesday, I hoped that perhaps you would not mind discussing the matter with me."

Captain Gaultier was evidently puzzled. Private conversations with Under-Secretaries of State are not, as a rule, public property, and his momentary intention to decline further conversation with this good-looking and fascinating stranger was checked by the remembrance of that fact.

"Really, Mr. Brett," he said, "although I do not question the accuracy of your statement, you will readily understand that I can hardly discuss the matter with you under the circumstances."

Digitized by Google

"Naturally. You would not be holding a responsible position in His Majesty's service if you were at all likely to do any such thing. But I propose, in the first instance, to reassure you as to my bona-fides, and I may point out, in the second place, that as I have met you by a fortunate chance, you can hardly deem it a breach of confidence to discuss with me the mere accidental appearance on a cross-Channel steamer of a man known not only to both of us but to Society at large."

Gaultier clearly hesitated, but he did not refuse to accept the Under-Secretary's letter, which Brett handed to him, with the words:

"You know the handwriting, no doubt."

"That speaks for itself." The King's messenger smiled when he returned the note. "It is an odd coincidence," he added. "And still more curious that you should spot me so readily. However, Mr. Brett, we have now cleared the air. What can I do for you?"

"Simply this," said the barrister, "do you mind telling me how you came to recognise Mr. Talbot?"

"Well, for one thing," was the thoughtful reply, "I knew his overcoat. I often met Mr. Talbot in the Foreign Office, and one day he drove me to his club wearing a very handsome coat lined with astrachan. It struck me as a peculiarly comfortable and well-fitting one, and although there are plenty of men about town who may possess astrachan coats, it is a reasonable assumption that this was the identical garment when it happened to be worn by the man himself."

"Then you are quite certain it was Talbot?" went on the barrister.

"Quite certain."

"Would you swear it was he, even though his life depended upon your accuracy?"

"Well, no, perhaps not that, but I would certainly swear that I believed it was Mr. Talbot."

"Ah, that is a material difference. The only way in which you could be positively certain was to enter into conversation with him, was it not?"

"Yes, that is so."

"I do not want you to think, Captain Gaultier, that I am cross-examining you. Let me tell you at once that I believe the man you saw was masquerading in Talbot's clothes, and made up to represent him. Was there anything about his appearance that might lend credence to such a view?"

The other reflected a little while before answering.

"There was only one thing," he said, "and that was the fact that he did not seem to notice me. Now, he is a sharp sort of chap, and as it was broad daylight and a fine day he must have seen me, as he knows me well. Again, from all that I have heard of him, I do not think that he would either pass an acquaintance without speaking to him, or take trips on the Continent with ladies of the music-hall persuasion."

"You have supplied two very powerful reasons why the individual you saw should not be Jack Talbot. Yet, as you say, it was broad daylight, and you had a good look at him."

"No, no," interrupted the other. "I had a good look at his coat—and the lady. Whoever the man was he appeared to be wrapped up in both of them, and he certainly did not court observation. I naturally thought that the feminine attachment accounted for this, and, for the same reason, I did not even seek to scrutinise him too closely. To put the thing in a nutshell, I saw a man whom I believed to be Jack Talbot—and who certainly resembled him in face and figure—attired in Talbot's clothes, and wearing a coat which I had noted so particularly as to be able to describe it to my tailor when ordering a similar one. Add to that the appearance of an attractive lady, young and unknown, and you have my soul laid bare to you in the matter."

GIFT OF £50
From One Reader to the Rest.
See page 13.

"Thank you," said Brett, "I am much obliged."

He would have quitted the saloon, but Captain Gaultier laughed, as he said:

"Hold on a bit: it is my turn now. Suppose I try to pump you."

The Fellow-Passenger.

A GIANT wave took hold of the vessel and shook her violently, and Brett, though an average amateur sailor, felt that the saloon was no place for him.

"Between you and the ship, Captain Gaultier," he said, "the success of the operation would be certain. I have secured a quiet corner of the deck, so if you wish for a further talk we must adjourn there."

The transit was effected without incident, much to Brett's relief. After a minute or two he felt that a cigar was possible. He turned to his companion with a quiet observation:

"The vessel has failed. You can start now."

"Well," said Gaultier, "tell me what is the mystery attaching to Talbot's movements. I only heard the vaguest of rumours in the Department, but something very terrible appears to have happened, and, indeed, I heartily wished I had kept my mouth shut concerning my supposed meeting with him last Tuesday, as the affair was no business of mine. Moreover, you have now somewhat shaken my belief in his identity, although I can hardly tell you why that should be so." Brett glanced round to make sure that no one would overhear him, but the fierce wind that whistled round the charthouse and bridge, the seas that smote the ship's quarter with a thunderous noise, the all pervading sense of riotous fury in the elements, rendered the precaution almost unnecessary. Despite the weather, however, there was no one near enough to act the part of eavesdropper, and Brett, exercising his power of rapid decision which frequently impressed observers as a gift of divination, determined that to let such a man as the King's Messenger into the secret could not possibly be harmful to the interests of his client, whilst his aid might be very beneficial.

In the fewest possible words, therefore, he poured the tale into the other's wondering ear.

When he had finished, Gaultier remained silent a few minutes.

Already the clear radiance of the magnificent light at Calais was sending intermittent flashes of brightness over the deck, and the long shoulder of Cape Gris Nez was thrusting the force of the gale back into mid-channel.

"I think," said Gaultier, speaking slowly and thoughtfully, "that your view is the right one, Mr. Brett. There is much more in this business than meets the eye, and any man who believes that Jack Talbot would mix himself up in it must be a most determined ass. Of course such people do exist, but they shouldn't be in the police force. You are going on to Paris, you said?"

"Yes."

"Then we might travel together. All that you have said is quite new to me. Curiously enough I have just returned from Constantinople and I may be able to help you."

Brett silently thanked his stars for the gratuitous circumstance that threw him into the company of Captain Gaultier. He recognised that the King's Messenger, with the precaution that might be expected from one whose daily life depended entirely upon the exercise of that faculty, desired to mentally review the strange facts made known to him before he committed himself further. With ready tact the barrister changed the conversation to matters of the moment until they reached the pier at Calais, when both men, not encumbered with much luggage, were amongst the first flight of passengers to reach the station buffet.

On their way they captured a railway official and told him to reserve a coupé lit compartment. In the midst of their hasty meal the Frenchman arrived, voluble, apologetic. The train was crowded. Never had there been such a rush to the South. By the exercise of most profound care he had secured them two seats in a compartment, but the third had already taken itself. He was sorry for it, but he had done his best.

Digitized by Google

When they entered their carriage they found the third occupant in possession. He was French, aggressively so. Phil May might have used him for a model. The poor man had been wretchedly ill from the moment he left Dover until the vessel was tied to her berth in the harbour at Calais. He paid not the least attention to the newcomers, being apparently absorbed in contemplation of his own misery. The two Englishmen, though experienced travellers, were sufficiently insular to resent the presence of the stranger, whom Brett resolved to put to the language test forthwith.

"It is very cold in here," he said, "Shall I turn on the hot air?"

The Frenchman seemed to understand that he had been spoken to. He looked up with a shivering smile and explained that he had only booked one seat. The remainder of the compartment was at their disposal. He was evidently guiltless of acquaintance with the English tongue, but Brett did not like his appearance.

Though well-dressed and well-spoken he was a nondescript individual, and the flash of his dark eyes was not reassuring. Yet the man was so ill that Brett forthwith dismissed him from his thoughts, though he took care to occupy the centre seat himself, thus placing Captain Gaultier on the other side of the carriage. After a visit from the ticket examiner, the Frenchman disposed himself for a nap and the train soon started.

Captain Gaultier, by this time, had made up his mind as to the information he felt he could give his new acquaintance.

"It is very odd," he said, "that those diamonds should disappear just at the moment when there is every sign unrest in Turkey. You know, of course, the manner of th last Sultan's death?"

Brett nodded.

"And you have heard, no doubt, something of the pr cautions taken by the present Sultan to safeguard his life?"

"Yes," said Brett.

"Well, these have been redoubled of late, and the ma never goes out that he is not in the most abject state of fea He is a pitiful sight, I assure you. I saw him less than fortnight ago, driving to the Mosque on Friday, and hi coachman evidently had orders to go at a gallop through th streets, whilst not only was the entire road protected b soldiers, but every house had been previously examined b police agents. There is something in the wind of more tha usual importance in the neighbourhood of Yildiz Kiosk jus now, I am certain. I suppose you did not chance to see an mention of the fact that Hussein ul Mulk, the Sultan's nephew has recently fled from Turkey, and is now under the pro tection of the French Government?"

"Yes, I noticed that."

"You don't seem to miss much," was Gaultier's shar remark, pausing in his narrative to light a cigar.

"One of my few virtues is that I read the newspapers,' said Brett.

The train was slowing down as it neared the town statio in Calais, and Gaultier's voice could be momentarily hear above its diminishing rattle.

"Well," he said, "I happen to know Hussein ul Mulk and if we could find out where he lives in Paris I would intro duce you to him."

Brett looked at the slumbering Frenchman out of the corne of his eye. The man appeared to be dozing peacefully enough but the alert barrister had an impression that his limbs wer not sufficiently relaxed under the influence of slumber. Indeed

(Continued on next page.)

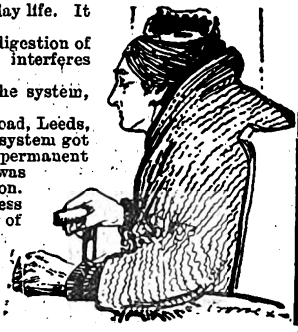
AFTER EFFECTS of Influenza!

An attack of Influenza leaves the human system too weak to stand the strains of ordinary every-day life. It disorganises the digestive organs, and as a natural result, it leaves the liver in an unhealthy condition.

The ordinary duty of the liver is to separate the bile from the blood. Bile is necessary to assist the digestion of food, and it also helps the bowels to act regularly. The liver is easily disorganised if anything whatever interferes with its action.

It is quite plain, then, that an attack of Influenza brings about a generally debilitated condition of the system, and a tonic is required which will tone up the organs of digestion and the liver to their normal condition.

To accomplish this, follow the EXAMPLE set by Mrs. C. Strafford, 18 Crawford Street, Meanwood Road, Leeds, who has arrived at the mature age of 63 years. Having suffered from two severe attacks of Influenza her system got completely run down, but after taking a course of Bile Beans for Biliousness she found a speedy and permanent cure. Interviewed by a Leeds journalist, Mrs. Strafford said: "My illness dates four years back, when I was much distressed by a family bereavement. My appetite began to fail me, and I suffered from Indigestion. I was attacked by influenza, which left me in a weak condition. Pains in the chest and a sense of fulness tortured me, and I had to be careful what I ate. About last Christmas I had another very severe attack of Influenza, which left me in a still weaker state. I could not sleep at nights, and when I got up on a morning I was troubled with a splitting headache. In fact I was completely run down. I tried every means I could think of to get cured, but without success. I obtained medicine from three different doctors, but it did not benefit me. About this time I heard of Bile Beans, and as a last resource I determined to try them. I began to take the Beans, and soon found they were doing me good. As I continued with them I grew stronger, and the pains in my chest disappeared. After completing the course of Bile Beans, Indigestion and the morning headaches are things of the past, and I am glad to say that I am completely cured, which is due to Bile Beans alone.



Bile Beans for Biliousness cure Headache, Influenza, Constipation, Liver Troubles, Rheumatism, Colds, Liver Chills, Indigestion, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Mfg. Co., Red Cross St., London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box. Sample Box Free on receipt of penny stamp (to cover return postage) if this paper is mentioned. Address: The Bile Bean Mfg. Co., Greek St., Leeds.

HALF-A-GUINEA'S WORTH FOR 6d.

THE "BILOSCOPE"

and Outfit (an advertising novelty) for producing life-like pictures. Post free on receipt of 7 stamps. Address: The Bile Bean Mfg. Co., Box 686, Greek Street, Leeds.

Digitized by Google

he felt sure that the Frenchman was wide awake and endeavouring to catch the drift of their conversation.

"I will be most pleased to meet your friend, Captain Gaultier," he said, "and lest it should slip your memory I will give you a reminder."

He opened his card-case and wrote on the back of a card: "Grand Hotel. Breakfast 11.30. No more at present."

The quick-witted King's Messenger read and understood.

"It seems to me," he went on, "that my friend is the very man for your purpose, and though he is not in favour at Court just now he has plenty of friends in the various departments, and he could give you letters which would be certain to secure you some excellent orders. I suppose you are going to the East as the result of the rumoured intention of the Turkish Government to reconstitute the navy."

Brett made a haphazard guess at Gaultier's meaning.

"Yes," he said, "we ought to place a good many thousand tons with them."

Gaultier leant forward to strike a match and glanced at their companion. For some indescribable reason he shared Brett's views concerning this gentleman, and immediately started a conversation of general significance. They soon discovered that they had several mutual friends, and in this way they passed the dreary journey to Paris pleasantly enough.

At the Gare du Nord, their knowledge of French methods enabled them to get quickly clear of the Octroi, as neither of them had any baggage which rendered their presence necessary at the Custom-house. The Frenchman, who seemed to be thoroughly revived by the air of his beloved Paris, hurried out simultaneously with themselves. He had no difficulty in hearing Brett's directions to a cabman, but Gaultier had entered a vehicle at some distance.

Brett was the first away from the station. He fancied he saw his French travelling companion hastily whisper something to a lounger near the exit, so he suddenly pulled up his voiture, gave the driver a two-franc piece and told him to go to the Grand Hotel and there await his arrival. The cab had halted for the moment in the Rue de Lafayette, at the corner of the Place Valenciennes, and the cabman, recognising that his fare was an Englishman and consequently mad, drove off immediately in obedience to orders.

Though nearly six o'clock in the morning, it was quite dark, but as Brett walked rapidly back towards the station he had no difficulty in picking out Gaultier, who drove past him in an open vehicle. Some little distance behind came another, and herein the barrister thought he recognised the man to whom his French companion in the train had spoken. By this time many other cabs were dashing out of the station-yard, so Brett took the chance that he might be hopelessly wrong.

He hailed a third vehicle and told the driver to follow the other two, which were now some distance down the Rue de Lafayette. Not until the three cabs had crossed the Place de l'Opera and passed the Madeleine could Brett be certain that the occupant of the second was following his friend Gaultier. Then he chuckled to himself, for this was surely a rare stroke of luck.

Quickly reviewing the possibilities of the affair, he came to the conclusion that the Frenchman in the train really understood little, if any, English, but that he had caught the name of the fugitive from the Sultan's wrath and had forthwith betrayed an interest in their conversation which was, to say the least, remarkable. At the exit from the Gare du Nord the stranger had readily enough ascertained Brett's destination, but he clearly regarded it as important that Gaultier—the man who claimed Hussein ul Mulk as a friend—should be tracked, and had given the necessary instructions to the confederate who awaited his arrival

Special Story for Scottish Readers.
See page 14.

Although Gaultier had not said so, Brett guessed that his destination was the British Embassy in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré. The route followed by the cabman led straight to that well-known locality. The Frenchman in the second cab evidently thought likewise, for, at the corner of the Rue Boissy he pulled up, and Brett was just in time to give his driver instructions to go ahead and thus avoid attracting undue notice to himself.

Gaultier turned into the Embassy, and Brett himself halted a little further on. Dismissing his driver with a liberal fare, he walked rapidly back, and was just in time to see the Frenchman enter into conversation with the night porter on duty. The latter personage, however, was clearly a trustworthy official, for he loudly told the other to be off and attend to his own affairs.

Then followed for Brett a most exciting and perplexing chase through many streets, and it was only by the exercise of his keenest powers of observation that he finally located his man at a definite number in the Rue Barbette, a tiny thoroughfare in the Temple district.

By this time dawn was rapidly advancing over Paris, and the streets were beginning to fill with early workers. He inquired from a passer-by the most likely locality in which he could find a cab, and the man civilly conducted him to the Rue de Rivoli. Thence he was not long in reaching the Grand Hotel, where he found the astonished driver of his first vehicle still safeguarding his bag and arguing fiercely with a porter that he had unquestionably obeyed the Englishman's instructions.

Tired though he was, Brett did not fail to scrutinise the list of arrivals at the hotel on the preceding Tuesday. He instantly found the entry he sought. The arrival of "Mr. and Mrs. John Talbot, London," was chronicled in the register with uncompromising boldness. Hastily comparing the writing in Talbot's letter with that in the visitors' book, Brett was at first staggered by their similarity but he quickly recognised the well-known signs which indicate that a man who himself writes a bold and confident hand has been copying a signature of another with the object of reproducing it freely and with reasonable accuracy. There are always perceptible differences in the varying pressure of the pen and the distribution of the ink.

Allowance had evidently not been made for the fact that Englishmen almost invariably write their names very badly in Continental hotel registers owing to their inability to use foreign pens. The man who had not only forged Mr. Talbot's name, but had also supplied him with a wife, laboured under no such disadvantage. Indeed, Talbot himself would probably not have written his own name so legibly.

"That is all right," said Brett wearily, traversing a corridor to gain his room. "Now I wonder if there is any connection between Hussein ul Mulk and the Rue Barbette."

The House in the Rue Barbette.

BRETT was called at ten o'clock. After reinvigorating himself with a bath and a hearty breakfast, he was ready to meet Captain Gaultier, who arrived promptly at 11.30.

In the spacious foyer of the Grand Hotel it was impossible to say who might be looking at them.

"Come to my room," said Brett. "There we will be able to talk without interruption."

Once comfortably seated, Brett resumed the conversation where he had broken it off in the train overnight.

"You said you knew Hussein ul Mulk," he commenced.

"Yes," replied the King's Messenger, "and what is more I have discovered his residence since we parted. It seems that one of the attachés at the Embassy met him recently and

(Continued on page 31.)

Digitized by Google

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W, you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL; or, if desired, can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you ho (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; th most efficacious substitute for cod liver o invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/ 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefto Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mr CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALÆOLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account. — Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10 is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"A hair on the Head is worth two in the brush."

WHY THIS FALSE SHAME?

False shame is a robber. It takes from us our pleasures, joys, and rightful inheritances, and gives us nothing in return. Is a woman ashamed of desiring beauty, or a man of acquiring strength? According to the publishers of Professor Boyd Laynard's great work, SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE, there are hundreds of thousands of such cases. In a recent interview with the publishers the following statement was made: "It is perfectly astounding the thousands of letters we are receiving from the public requesting us to send Professor Laynard's work privately packed! Of course we have always made a custom of doing so; but why people should be ashamed of receiving such a book is beyond our comprehension and very uncomplimentary to the Professor, who is the greatest living authority upon personal hygiene. But for all this, the sale of his work in the English language is rapidly approaching one million copies. Hindustani, Arabic, and Malayalam are among the latest translations."

The first part of this remarkable book, which contains 127 chapters, consists of a practical guide to the attainment of good looks without the aid of art. Professor Boyd Laynard will have nothing to do with powder, paint, face-washes, and the like; but gives plain instructions for the scientific cultivation of beauty. The rest of the book deals with health and long life. These chapters are of the highest value.

Its publishers, Messrs. Hammond, Hammond and Co., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., have just produced a new and complete popular edition. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the publishers, be forwarded, carriage paid, to all readers of SHORT STORIES at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING & SIXPENCE.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with the following are but a few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers.

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation — Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions — Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine, their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Exercise and its relation to health — Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

ORDER FORM 7392577.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO., 19, 21, & 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

thought it advisable to keep in touch with the Young Turkish party, of which Hussein ul Mulk is the shining light. So he asked him where he lived, and as the result I have jotted down the address in my notebook." Gaultier searched through his memoranda, and speedily found what he wanted.

"Wait a minute," interrupted Brett. "Does it happen to be No. 11, Rue Barbette?"

The barrister had more than once surprised his companion during the night, but this time Gaultier seemed to be more annoyed than startled.

"If you know all these things so glibly," he said stiffly, "I don't see why you should bother me to get you the information. I certainly gathered from your remarks that the only acquaintance you had with Hussein ul Mulk was obtained from the newspapers, and that individual himself has the best of reasons for not publishing his address broadcast."

Brett smiled.

"You mean," he said, "that Hussein ul Mulk does live at No. 11, Rue Barbette."

"Why, of course he does," was the irritable answer.

"That is very odd," said the barrister. "It was a mere guess on my part, I assure you."

His assurance evidently did not weigh much with Captain Gaultier, who replaced his note-book in his pocket, and obviously cast about in his mind for a convenient excuse to take his departure.

Brett knew exactly what was troubling him.

"I am quite in earnest," he said, "in telling you that I simply hazarded a guess at the address. To prove that this is so I must place you in possession of certain incidents that transpired after we parted at the Gare du Nord."

Rapidly but succinctly he told the amazed King's Messenger of the chase in the cab across Paris, and how he, Brett, had followed the Frenchman who was tracking Gaultier's movements so closely.

"You will understand," he concluded, "that, in view of my preconceived theory, it was not a very far-fetched assumption to connect Hussein ul Mulk with the house in the Rue Barbette into which your spy vanished."

"Well," gasped his astonished hearer, "I must say, Mr. Brett, that I owe you an apology. I really thought at first you were fooling me, whereas now I learn that you simply kept your eyes open much wider than other people perhaps. Nevertheless, you have given me a genuine explanation of circumstances that were otherwise puzzling. For, do you know, I heard about that chap calling at the Embassy last night. The incident was unusual, to say the least, but I paid little attention to it, and certainly failed altogether to connect it with your visit to Paris. Even yet I do not see what reason anyone can have for shadowing my movements."

"I think it is mere chance," said Brett, "I imagine that our fellow-passenger in the train caught the name of Hussein ul Mulk in our conversation, and this decided him to shadow your movements, by means of the confederate who awaited his arrival at the station. As it happened, they simply hit upon the wrong person. It might have paid them much better to follow me. The outcome of the blunder is that I am in a fair way towards ascertaining all I want to know about them, whereas, up to the present, they do not even suspect my existence as an active agent in the affair."

"Well, now," said Gaultier, "since you have so satisfactorily cleared my mind of suspicion, in what way can I help you regarding Hussein ul Mulk?"

"Could you introduce me to him?"

"In what capacity?"

Brett reflected for a moment before replying.

"It would best suit my purpose if I met him as a political sympathiser."

Gaultier evidently did not like the idea. Foreign Office messengers do not care to be associated with politics in any shape or form.

"Is there no other way?" he asked dubiously.

"Plenty," said Brett. "I might pose as a friend of yours interested in Turkish carpets, or coffee, or cigarettes, but for the purpose of my inquiry it would be well to jump preliminaries at once and make this chance acquaintance under the guise of a wire-puller."

"All right," said Gaultier, "I can't see that it matters much to me, and the letter you have in your possession from the Under-Secretary is sufficient warrant for me to give you any assistance that lies in my power."

He glanced at his watch. "It is just about time for dejeuner," he continued. "What do you say if we drive to the Rue Barbette at once?"

The barrister assented, and they were soon crossing Paris with the superb disregard for other people's feelings that characterises the local cab-driver.

"By the way," inquired Gaultier, "have you learnt anything else since your arrival?"

"Only this—it was not our friend Talbot who came here on Tuesday with a lady."

"You are sure?"

"Positive. I have compared the handwriting in the hotel register with that of a letter undoubtedly written by Mr. Talbot, and the two do not agree. The appearance of the entry of 'Mr. and Mrs. Talbot, London,' in the visitors' book of the Grand Hotel, was a mere trick intended to amuse the police for a few hours until the conspirators had perfected their scheme for final and complete disappearance."

"It was a bold move," said the King's Messenger.

"Very. Quite in keeping with the rest of the details in the history of an uncommon crime."

At last the fiacre stopped in front of the house in Rue Barbette which Brett had already scrutinised during the early hours of the morning.

"Here we are," said Gaultier, with a laugh. "If we find Hussein ul Mulk at home I don't know what the dickens we are going to say to him. Remember that I depend upon you to carry out a difficult situation, because my Turkish friend will become suspicious the minute he finds me dabbling in intrigue. He knows quite well that such matters are quite outside of my usual business."

"I think I shall be able to interest him," said Brett, calmly; and without further preliminary Gaultier ascertained from the concierge that the Turkish gentleman was within.

The two men ascended to the second storey.

Gaultier rapped loudly upon the first door he encountered, and the summons appeared to scatter some of the inhabitants, judging by the rapid opening and closing of doors that preceded the appearance of an elderly and solemn-looking Turk, who cautiously unbolted the outer door and demanded their business.

Gaultier sent in his card, and the servitor locked the door in the faces of the two men while he went to ascertain his master's orders.

"They evidently do not mean to take many risks," he said, in a low voice.

"You are right," said Brett, "though they appear to take the greatest one of all without giving it a thought."

"And what is that?"

"This exhibition of nervousness and precaution before visitors are admitted. Why, the best way to excite suspicion is to behave just as they are doing."

But now the door was reopened, and the elderly Turk ushered them into a spacious room on the right of the entrance-hall, where they were received by a young man—a tall, dignified Mohammedan, who rose hastily from a chair, having apparently abandoned the perusal of a newspaper.

(To be continued.)

Ask your Bookseller for . . .

HOW TO CHOOSE A HUSBAND

By ROSALIE NEISH.

A Book every Man and Woman should Read.

Charmingly Illustrated. Six Shillings.

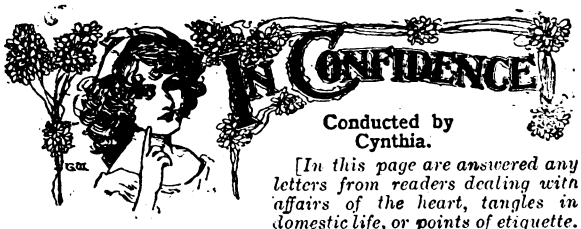
Digitized by Google



Conducted by Cynthia.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Non-Love Letters.

"F. R." met a girl a few months ago, and corresponded with her. She answered his letters in a very friendly strain. He now hears that she is engaged to another man. Should he continue writing to her?

* * * * *

I should certainly reply to her last letter definitely, giving a hint, if possible, that it is for her to decide whether or not she wishes to write to you any more or hear again from you. Of course if she replies and her letter invites another from you, you will write. But you should not take the initiative in continuing the correspondence as she is engaged to another man. There would, however, be no harm in a purely-friendly correspondence, such as many engaged girls exchange with male friends, with the knowledge and consent of their fiancés.

Loving a Married Man.

"Can a girl fall in love with a married man?" inquires "X." Unfortunately, "X.," there are no human limits to those whom one may love. Love knows no boundary lines. Consequently only too many married lives are wrecked through attachments entered into with others than husband or wife. But there is a point at which principle prevents such love attachments from ever assuming a dangerous stage. No right-minded man or woman would allow their feelings to develop towards a person who is another's property.

The Punishment of Coldness.

"F. B." is a girl of eighteen, and admits to me that she is very pretty. Until a year ago, she had been receiving attentions from a young man who had treated her very well indeed, and was much in love with her. She, however, only coldly returned his affections, and offended him. He left her, and she has not seen him since. Now she is anxious to resume the friendship, but she has heard that the man is going out with another girl. Should she apologise to him by writing, or not at all?

* * * *

The best thing would be to ask him to call on you, and then say how sorry you are that the quarrel took place, apologising if you think you were in the wrong. And then if he takes the apology as it is meant, beware against being too cold in future. There are many men who are very sensitive to coldness, and much discouraged by it. It often alienates their affections entirely. Do not exhibit it again.

Forming an Acquaintance.

"ANXIOUS ONE" has fallen in love with a young lady he sees at a church where he worships once a fortnight in company with his cousin. It is away from his own home. How should he try to form her acquaintance? He has her name and address.

Perhaps the clergyman knows her family, and also your cousin. If you move in the same social circle, it might be possible for you to meet in connection with some parochial affair, such as a bazaar, concert, or meeting. It may take some time to accomplish your desire, but as you belong to the same congregation, I should think there must sooner or later be some opportunity for your knowing each other, which would not exist if you attended different churches.

A Seaside Love.

"CAUTIOUS" has the usual doubts which follow on chance seaside acquaintanceships. He met a girl a year younger than himself—sixteen—and exchanged "sweet" letters and photos. Now he thinks he will get into trouble if he continues the affair, as he finds he "will not want the girl," to quote his own expression. He asks me if I think it wrong for him to continue writing love letters to her, seeing he is not really in love with the girl. They will meet at the same seaside town next year.

* * * *

I should say it would be very nice for "CAUTIOUS" to keep up a "sweet" tone in his correspondence. As he is only seventeen, I scarcely see that there can be any particular danger in doing so. One does not expect girls and boys at his age to exchange formal letters. When next year comes and they meet again, will be quite time for them to consider whether there is any lasting affection between them. If there is, well I am sure nothing could be nicer. But if "CAUTIOUS" really does not care for the girl, he should avoid any deception in the matter of correspondence. It is possible, he should remember, to write a sweet letter and yet not to commit himself to any false statement.

Sending Presents.

"LEONARD" is engaged to a girl, but she never sends him a present, though he constantly sends her things. Do I think he should continue to send them when nothing ever comes in return, even on his birthday?

* * * *

It is rather unusual for a girl engaged to a man to neglect his birthday. But perhaps the girl cannot afford to give you as good a present as she would wish, and thinks it better not to send a trifling object. Anyhow, one does not give presents merely in the expectation of receiving them. There is, I imagine, a pleasure in giving to those you love which is independent of any self-interest. If you are still fond of the girl, I suppose you will continue to give her presents. It would be nicer if she occasionally returned them, but after all, I suppose she would do so if it lay in her power.

Sowing Suspicion.

"M. M." has fallen in love with a young man, but her friends warn her from making his acquaintance. They will not, however, give the reason. The young man has announced that he is much attracted by "M. M." Should she try to know him under the circumstances?

* * * *

Probably your friends have some reason for warning you against the young man. It is unkind of them not to tell you the reason they wish you not to know him, so that you could make up your own mind on the point. If they continue to refuse to tell you, the best thing is to refuse to believe anything. If you are brought together, you should easily be able to judge for yourself whether he is or is not a desirable friend for you. The warning may have been based solely on Rumour, and she is, as we all know, a lying jade. The man may be really quite a good fellow, and yet the victim of some petty scandal.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

Digitized by Google

"IT'S CHRONIC!"

What a curious saying, or rather exclamation, has now caught the popular fancy—"It's chronic!" And what a flavour of keen sarcastic humour there is about it, too. Mention the torn-up condition of the roads in every direction "It's chronic!" Speak of the flatness of trade—of the iniquity of combines—of the lock-outs and strikes—of slumps and falling markets—of the matinée hat. "It's chronic!" When a thing has become chronic, it represents a fixed evil.

FOR INSTANCE, an occasional bilious attack, or indigestion, or a run-down state of the nervous system, may not be very remarkable; but as these ailments, by slow degrees, take on a more or less permanent character, why then, "It's chronic!" And none but sufferers from such diseases can realise the dire meaning of those words. If it were only not chronic—if the particular cause of trouble was transitory—so that its victims could hope for peace; but no, they sorrowfully think, "It's chronic!" Nevertheless, in the great majority of cases the evil need not be chronic. It can be quite cured; and in many other cases it never need become chronic at all. It can be nipped in the bud. An old and faithful remedy is always at hand. Already you have a feeling that you ought to have remembered

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Just so. That approved vegetable medicine is, without doubt, a specific for most of those diseases which have their origin in a disordered state of the stomach, liver, or kidneys. They regulate the digestive secretions, stimulate the action of the liver, and are one of the most powerful aids in eliminating uric acid from the system. As a general and family medicine they are beyond praise, and when BEECHAM'S PILLS are judiciously taken or administered, according to the directions which accompany each box, few of the troublesome ailments which make life a misery to thousands need become, or continue to be, CHRONIC.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 732.] Week ending January 10th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"THE RING SHALL BE ON HER FINGER, BUT SHE SHALL NEVER MARRY."

(SEE OUR THRILLING STORY, "FORTUNE'S WHEEL.")

Digitized by Google

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS, Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

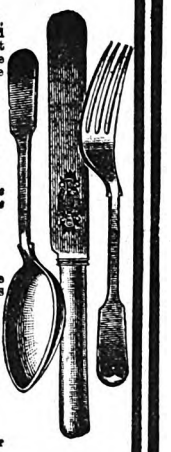
THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL 25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No. Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ZOX for Neuralgia at Night.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Short Stories

No. 732.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 10th, 1903.

Fortune's Wheel.

See the Coloured Illustration on Cover.

"Let the gipsy tell your fortune my pretty lady! Silver—a little bit of silver—to cross the hand, and I will tell you the future—the beautiful, shining future I see before you!"

The queer old gipsy face peered up into Constance Leslie's, the shaking old voice rose into a kind of whining cry.

"Shall I, Felix?" The woman turned eagerly to the man by her side. "Shall I just let her tell my fortune, to see what she says? Now that I know what Fate has arranged for me it will be amusing just to hear what this old thing says," she added, in a whisper, whilst the sharp black eyes of the gipsy woman watched the two young people, half curiously, half indifferently.

Felix Maitland smiled indulgently down into the lovely laughing face of his betrothed, and, drawing from his pocket a silver piece, tossed it to the old woman with the words—

"Tell the lady's fortune, mother, and be sure it is a good one!"

A chuckle broke from the old woman's lips as she took the coin, and then bent over the hand Constance held out to her.

"I see a bright pathway," she said, her voice dropping into a strange, monotonous drone, "it shines to the end, and one walks it with you. All is fair—all is good, joy goes before, joy follows, unless——"

Her voice ended abruptly, and Constance glanced at her in surprise.

"Unless—what?" she asked.

"Unless you choose the wrong turning," came the reply, abrupt, short, almost harsh, and the piercing black eyes of the old gipsy looked long and searchingly into the woman's blue ones.

A little tremor passed over Constance's form.

"Unless you choose the wrong turning," the gipsy repeated slowly and emphatically, with again that long, long glance, which, for some inexplicable reason sent a long shiver through Constance's frame. "Farewell, lady, farewell; sir, beware the wrong turning!" and, saying the words thus for the third time, the old woman turned away and vanished from their sight amongst the trees that bordered the lane.

For a few seconds after she left them the man and woman remained silent, then Constance said lightly—

"After all, dear, what does it amount to? Simply that if one makes mistakes in one's life, one must suffer for them. I don't know why the old thing's words gave me that odd, creepy feeling which came over me for a minute."

All rights reserved.]

Her lover laughed tenderly, putting his arm round the girl and drawing her towards him lovingly.

"Silly child!" he said softly, as his lips touched her forehead. "Fancy minding what an old beggar woman tells you! She had to say something, and she has a string of phrases which she turns on promiscuously. She is much like one of those automatic fortune-tellers after all!"

"Is she?" Constance glanced back across her lover's shoulder's in the direction taken by the old woman, and once more she shivered. Then she shrank closer into Felix's embrace, saying gently—

"Of course she is—just what you say. Don't let's talk about her any more. After all—Felix, surely you and I can defy Fate and fortune-tellers—when we are together."

"Certainly we can!" he answered gaily, "And in three weeks hence we shall be together for always, sweetheart, have you realised that? Do you remember that our wedding day is in three weeks from to-morrow?"

"Yes," she said, but there was a mechanical ring in her voice, and throughout the rest of their walk she was curiously distrait and absent. Some change seemed to have passed over the very afternoon itself. The sun, that had shone brilliantly when the two started for their walk, had sunk behind a great mass of grey cloud; a chilly wind crept up from the south-west, and set the leaves in motion, a strange shivering motion that foreboded a storm, and the birds were ominously silent.

"I wish we had not met that old woman," Constance said to Felix when, half an hour later, they entered the house where she was staying as his father's guest, "she—she was like a bird of ill-omen!"

"Oh, nonsense, dear!" Felix spoke lightly. "The coming storm is having the same effect upon you as upon the birds! You are upset, overwrought by the electricity in the air. After tea I will tell your fortune. I am a perfect marvel over fortunes in tea-leaves!" And thus talking and laughing pleasantly, the two joined old Mr. Maitland in the little study in which he always sat, having relapsed, after his wife's death, into bachelor habits and ways.

And whilst the trio sat together in the small, cosy room, an old gipsy woman was slowly threading her way through a tangle of undergrowth back to the gipsy camp, muttering as she went—

"Why did I say that? Why did I say that which I never meant to say? I had meant to read her a fair fortune—a fair fortune throughout, but the words came to me, and I must needs speak them—I must needs say that which it was willed I should say. 'Unless you choose the wrong turning,' I said to her—aye, and she will choose it, she will choose it. The gipsy's magic never fails—it never fails!"

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

"Your betrothed is a very beautiful woman, my son. Pray Heaven she be as good as she is beautiful!"

"She is, dad, she is!" The voice of the younger man was full of eager enthusiasm. "I can never be thankful enough for the good luck which threw me in her way!"

"How did you first meet her? Tell me about it again. The whole thing has come to me so suddenly, as such a surprise, tell me the story again, my boy."

Old Mr. Maitland leant back in his armchair in the study. Felix stood with his back to the mantelpiece, his handsome face illumined with love and happiness, a dreamy light in his eyes, as he looked back over the past few weeks to the day when he had first met Constance Leslie, the beautiful woman who, in three weeks, would be his wife.

He and she had arrived on the previous day at Monkswell, his father's little country cottage, and the old man had immediately fallen a captive to her charms. Now that he and his son were alone together for a few moments after the tea at which Constance had gracefully presided for them, the above questions had fallen from the lips of the elder Mr. Maitland.

"I met her," Felix said, after a moment's pause, a little smile hovering about his lips, "at the house of a mutual friend. She had only just returned from America, where she had been singing. You know she is a singer, father?"

Mr. Maitland nodded.

"I caught sight of her directly I entered Mrs. Danby's drawing-room that night. I saw her dear face, and—I loved it—from the first I loved it. She sat in the circle of light thrown by a big lamp. In its brilliance her hair gleamed golden like a halo, the colour came and went on her cheeks whilst she talked, a smile played on her lips, and, when her eyes met mine their radiance made me catch my breath in wonder. Sometimes I think Helen of Troy must have been something like my darling, and I do not wonder all the world went mad over her!"

"Helen of Troy was, perhaps, not an altogether ideal wife," the older man said drily.

"No-o—possibly not," Felix laughed happily, "but Constance will be! She is so sweet, dad, her every thought and wish seem to agree with mine. I loved her the first moment I saw her beautiful face, and—and—well, I am mad about her!" he ended abruptly, with an embarrassed smile.

"And her family? They have made you welcome?" Mr. Maitland's shrewd eyes glanced up into his son's happy face.

"She has no family, poor darling, she's an orphan and alone in the world. She has told me over and over again that she never knew what love meant until she met me."

Felix's father still eyed him gravely, but the old man said nothing, perhaps because he felt that his son was scarcely the person to whom to point out that so beautiful a woman as Constance Leslie could hardly have lived an absolutely loveless existence.

"My dear boy," he said very gently, rising and laying a hand on his son's shoulder, "God grant you all happiness! If your future wife is as good as she is beautiful, your life should indeed be blessed above the common lot of man."

"She is good!" The younger man's tones were very fervent. "She has a nature clear as crystal. I believe I know her every thought; her truth, her purity are alike flawless, and, dad, you know that a man of my character must be sure of truth, of sincerity in the woman he loves. It is more to me than her great beauty."

Father and son smiled at one another. Both singularly upright men, they shared an almost equal love of truth, with a detestation of insincerity that amounted to mania, and old Mr. Maitland said to himself as he went upstairs:

"God grant all may be well! I wish my boy had found a wife from amongst our old friends and acquaintances. This woman has beauty enough to turn the sanest man's head. If she is as true as she is beautiful, my son's happiness is assured. If not, she will break his heart."

Felix, left alone in the study, sat down beside the table on which the tea tray rested, and idly picked up the cup from which Constance had been drinking, looking into the mass of tea-leaves with that happy smile still on his face.

"My darling!" he whispered. "I must find her fortune here, as I promised. I must look for the shining pathway the gipsy told her would be hers. I——"

As he spoke his eyes had been riveted on the cup, which he turned slowly in his hand, and all at once his voice ceased, the smile faded from his lips, a strange, fixed expression came into his eyes.

"Heavens!" he murmured, "I must be mad, what does it mean?"

He passed his hand over his eyes, shuddering violently, as though the sight he saw transfixed him with horror, then, as if compelled to do so, he fixed his gaze once more upon the contents of the cup, while his lips moved mechanically, and words dropped from them as the words drop from one who is dreaming, or unconscious in delirium.

"Evil behind and evil before," he said slowly. "I see a black past—I see a black future—unless—unless," he frowned wearily, "unless she chooses the right turning. There was a man before—a man who—who——" He broke off suddenly, and once more brushed his hand across his eyes. "I see him kiss her"—the long shudder shook him again—"I see love in his eyes—and in hers—and her face—is—like the face of a beautiful devil!" There was a long pause, and he turned the cup in his fingers still almost mechanically. "There is evil to come," he began again after a moment. "The ring shall be on her finger—yes—on Constance's finger, but she shall not marry the man who stands with her at the altar. The register shall not be signed—because another—another——"

"Ah!—stop—stop!" The door had opened quietly. Constance herself stood upon the threshold, her face white as ashes, her eyes looking at Felix with blank, awful dismay; "what—is—it—you—say?" she gasped out, stumbling to his side; "that—that—cannot be—my—fortune—I—there was—never another. I——" and before Felix could spring from his chair, or put out a hand to help her, she had dropped down like a stone, and lay unconscious at his feet.

Too terrified at first by the ghastliness of her face to realise what she had said, Felix occupied himself in restoring her to consciousness, and only after he had seated her in the arm chair, and she had somewhat recovered her customary calm, did a wave of intolerable doubt sweep over his soul.

It was impossible to him to leave that doubt unsolved. Leaning over her, speaking in his tenderest accents, he said to her:

"Sweetheart, why were you so troubled, so upset by the words you heard me say? I promised to read your fortune—but—we know it is all nonsense! Why did it trouble you so terribly?" He spoke with apparent lightness, but his eyes scanned her face earnestly. That wave of doubt would not be at once stilled.

Constance laid a hand on his and smiled up into his face—a smile that might well have turned a stronger brain than her lover's.

"Naturally a tea leaf fortune is absurd," she said, with her soft, delicious laugh. "Surely you did not think that upset me. Oh, Felix, how funny! I think I—I was tired, dear—and—and—it was foolish of me to faint. Forgive me." The clinging touch of her hands—her fascinating smile—the lovelight in her eyes that met his, made Felix, for the moment, ashamed of his doubts, but later in the evening they recurred to his mind.

Digitized by Google

He and Constance were alone upon the terrace, in the moonlight, and after a long silence, during which his eyes had been fixed upon her face, he exclaimed brokenly:

"Do you know how I love you, my sweet? If I thought what I saw in that teacup was true—if—I thought another man had kissed your lips as I saw him do, I——"

"Saw him?" she panted out the words, and Felix saw that her face had grown very white—"saw someone kiss me?"

She grasped his arm, and he felt that her hand shook.

"Yes—I saw him kiss you. I saw your past," Felix spoke rapidly, hoarsely—"it was all evil—evil—and the picture was evil too. I seemed to hear a voice that said:

"'The shining pathway will all turn to blackness if she chooses the wrong turning now!' Constance—Constance"—he caught her hands and wrung them passionately—"tell me the truth—tell me if I read your past aright. Tell me the truth now. I could forgive everything—everything but deceit—tell me the truth."

His tone rang with vehement excitement, his grasp of her hands hurt her, her eyes contracted with pain—and with—was it fear?

"The truth?" she answered, twisting her head from side to side and speaking fast and nervously; "I have nothing to tell you, dear. My past—has been—has been—just what I have always told you—I was a lonely child and girl—I was a lonely woman till you came. I did not know what love meant—until—you taught me."

In the moonlight he could see her eyes wavered under his glance, and the colour came and went on her lovely face; he heard her hurried breathing and felt the trembling of the hands he held. His voice grew suddenly stern.

"Tell me all the truth now," he said, "I love you—I love you with my whole heart and soul—but—by Heaven, if I found you had deceived me I would spurn you utterly and for ever. I can never forgive deceit. Be true with me, dear; tell me why I saw evil—evil—evil—in your past and future. Tell me if another man ever——"

She wrenched her hands from him, her face flamed with indignation, as she drew herself up to her superb height and looked at him with gleaming eyes.

"I swear to you," she said, "that no other man has ever been anything in my life. I swear no other man has kissed my lips. The tea leaves have lied—there is nothing to tell of my past—I swear it."

She looked full into his eyes now, no wavering in her own glance, nothing but the passionate resentment of an innocent woman.

"Ah, believe me—dear," she cried, her voice breaking into tenderness; "believe in me, and love me, or I shall break my heart."

And Felix, maddened by her loveliness, shamed by her indignation into new hatred of his own doubts, caught her in his arms and held her close against his heart. But that night a whitefaced woman looked out into the moonlight, and stretched appealing hands towards the starlit sky, crying wildly.

"Was I wrong? Was I wrong after all? Have I taken—the wrong turning?"

A solemn hush fell over the congregation in the church, as Felix Maitland's voice rang out clear and firm.

"With this ring I thee wed"—as his hand slipped upon Constance's finger the golden circlet that bound her to him.

Never had the beautiful woman looked more beautiful than on the June morning when she and Felix stood side by side in the great London church, vowing to love and cherish one another till death should part them. The sun streamed in upon her golden hair, till it shone like a halo round her exquisite face—the face that had made those who watched her go up the nave in her sweeping white draperies say breathlessly:

"She looks like an angel from Heaven." And now the ceremony was nearly over! The ring was on the bride's finger; she had turned up to Felix a face radiant with happiness and triumph, and he was looking down at her in speechless love and admiration when a sudden stir at the end of the church arrested attention.

A verger hurried up the aisle and murmured a few words to the clergyman, whose face grew perturbed, and who looked at the two figures before him with a bewildered expression.

"An unforeseen event has occurred," he said at last, meeting Felix's astonished gaze, "I—I must ask you to come to the vestry before we can continue the service," and before the eyes of the greatly wondering congregation the bride and bridegroom, preceded by the officiating clergyman, made their way to the vestry. It was observed by all that the bride's face had grown as white as her dress—and that she seemed scarcely able to drag herself across the church even with the help of her bridegroom's arm—it was observed too, that he had also grown white as death—and little wonder! One sentence rang in his ears persistently, "The ring shall be on your finger but you shall not marry. The registers shall never be signed."

The verger had flung the vestry door open—the two entered the small square room—and then a cry of horror broke from the bride's lips; she staggered backwards, holding out her hands before her as though in desperate appeal.

"Ah, Jem!" she cried, "why have you come? How did you find me out?"

The words were addressed to a man who stood in the centre of the vestry, eyeing the bridal party with a cynical smile.

"Well! Who should be at your wedding but your own brother?" he said slowly, "and is this my new brother-in-law?"—he turned and gazed at Felix—"and—what have you done with your first husband?"

"Your first husband?" said Felix, "what does that mean? I must have the truth now."

"You shall have it—you shall have it," she cried, flinging herself on the ground at his feet, "only forgive me, and I will tell you all—all."

And to the ears of her listeners she poured out a wild story of a past in which she had married a man from whom she had long been parted.

"But he is dead—my first husband is dead," she moaned, at the end of her terrible confession.

"I daresay he is dead right enough," her brother struck in cynically, "and Miss Constance has planned a nice marriage for herself with a rich man! Sorry I put a spoke in your wheel, my dear, but I didn't quite see you marrying a good chap under false pretences."

"Is that man your brother?" Felix asked sternly.

"Yes—he is. He hates me—he always spoils my life."

"I always spoil your little games, my dear, and I always shall," the man said harshly, "if this gentleman forgives you—he'll be a fool"—and so saying the man turned on his heel and left the vestry. The other spectators had also stolen away—Felix and Constance were alone.

"Forgive me," she moaned again, looking up into his remorseless face; but he shook his head.

"I could have forgiven all but the deceit," he said, drawing away from her clinging hands, "I can never forgive that. You may wear my ring if you choose—my wife you shall never be. I never wish to see your face again," and drawing himself away from her clasp, he moved out of the vestry and out of her sight for ever.

Vera.

£5 a Week for Life.

This is the huge prize offered by Pearson's Weekly. For further particulars see page 43.

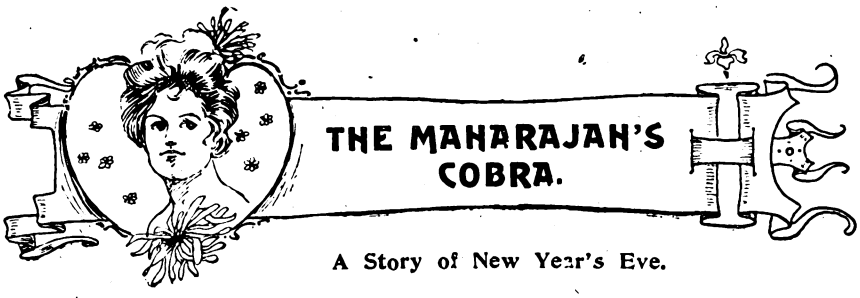
Digitized by Google



THE MAHARAJAH'S COBRA.

A Story of New Year's Eve.

IT was New Year's Eve, and the air was clear, crisp, and frosty. All day long guests had been arriving, with sparkling eyes and shouts of joyous greeting, at the great grey Elizabethan mansion, in the wooded heart of Huntingdonshire, which was the country seat of that most popular of all British officers, Colonel Hawkesbury.

And now that night had stolen over the white, snow-carpeted earth, and the bright stars shone in a purple sky, the blinds were drawn about the great windows glistening with innumerable pendants of crystal ice, and the sound of gay voices and merry laughter resounded through the old and stately house.

For it was Colonel Hawkesbury's homecoming.

For five years he had been on foreign service, and an Indian sun had bronzed his handsome face to an almost Oriental hue. He was scarcely forty, for his popularity—admitted alike by officers and men—had gained him rapid promotion.

And yet, despite these numerous qualifications—his comparative youth, his handsome face and tall, commanding figure, the frank, kindly nature which had won him his popularity, and, above all, his unquestionable military skill and the bravery he had displayed in action—despite all these things, Colonel Hawkesbury was a bachelor.

There were many flippant and irreverent persons, it is true, who, owl-like, temporarily and expressively closed one eye whenever the subject was broached, and gave utterance to mysterious prophecies, which seemed to imply that the gallant officer, like themselves, still had one eye wide open, and that changes might be expected. And there certainly was some reason for these mysterious hints.

"Bob," said one of these prophets to another, as he meditatively chalked the end of his cue in the Colonel's billiard-room, "I suppose you noticed the arrival of the Colonel's last guest to-night?"

"Rather!" responded Bob. "I admire the Colonel's taste—what do you say?"

"You're right there," agreed Captain Tracy enthusiastically. 'For, though her profession is the art of simulating sentiment, I believe she is capable of the real article also, especially," he added with a twinkle, "where the Colonel is concerned."

"Yes," assented the Hon. Robert Winchester, "she's a jolly good actress, but she is as good a woman. I wonder whether this meeting will bring matters to a head?"

Then the two prophets, having finished their game of billiards and cigars at the same time, left the solitude of the billiard-room and joined the rest of the party in the big drawing-room, where a great log was blazing on the wide hearth, and the rosy glow of the softly-shaded electric lamps danced on the animated faces of the assembled guests and their genial host.

The Colonel's only sister was there, with her tall, military-looking husband. They had one child, a pretty, blue-eyed, curly-haired boy of five, who was a great favourite with his uncle, the Colonel. But the boy, together with the other children who had come with the Colonel's guests, was upstairs with the nurses in a big room which the master of Hawkesbury Hall dimly recollected as once being his own nursery.

Whenever the door opened the shrill laughter of the children floated down the wide staircase to the drawing-room beneath, and told that they, too, were making merry in their own particular way.

In the drawing-room the guests were amusing themselves in many ways, though all were bent on adding to the enjoyment of the party generally.

There was one other figure in the great room, almost as conspicuous as the Colonel himself.

Seated in an embrasure by one of the windows was a lady, still in the first beauty of youth, upon whose face the stamp of individuality was clearly traced, even through the wondrous changes of expression which from time to time illumined it.

It was clear, too, that Sybil Carrington, the famous English actress, owed much of her rare beauty to ancestral intermarriage with the subjects of other than British monarchs.

Indeed, her grandfather had chosen his wife among the noblest of Castilian beauties, and in Sybil Carrington the peculiar loveliness of her Castilian ancestress could be clearly traced.

The oval face, the delicate, clear-cut features, the pure olive complexion through which the rich blood mantled so warmly on the slightest provocation, were all evidences of her Spanish descent.

And beside these there were the large, black, liquid eyes through which looked forth a soul, keen, restless, and loving, and the free, proud poise of the small head, crowned with rich, heavy coils of raven hair, which were now shot through with a golden arrow.

Her slender throat was incircled by a heavy necklace of opals, set in dead gold, and her delicately tinted dress set off, by its harmonious contrast, the full measure of her dusky loveliness.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that Colonel Hawkesbury should have fallen a victim to such radiant beauty. Scores of other men had done the same, but Sybil Carrington had smiled but coldly on their amorous attentions, and they had retired discomfited. And now it really seemed as if she were making an exception in favour of the Colonel.

Presently Bob's voice was heard at the other end of the room.

"By the way, Colonel," he said, "is there any truth in the paragraph which appears in to-day's Morning Post, and which has reference to you?"

"I must plead guilty to complete ignorance of to-day's news," replied the Colonel.

"Curiously enough," said Bob, with his finger and thumb in his waistcoat pocket, "I cut it out on my way down this afternoon. It's somewhere here—oh, here it is! May I read it?"

"Thank you!" said the Colonel. "We shall be delighted."

There was complete silence in the big drawing-room as Bob read the small slip of paper which he now held in his hand.

"We are informed that, before Colonel Hawkesbury's recent return to England, the Maharajah of the Province in which his regiment was quartered presented him with the thrice-sacred cobra of the temple. The creature is a magnificent specimen, and, though not yet fully grown, is considerably above the average, both in size and beauty. From an Indian point of view, no greater honour, we believe, could have been conferred on the gallant officer, though what the Colonel will do with his gruesome gift is matter for some speculation."

The Colonel fidgeted uneasily in his chair.

"Gruesome gift indeed," he assented grimly. "The editor, or the reporter, has well expressed the situation. I have no affection for such pets, and could well have dispensed with the 'honour'!"

Sybil Carrington laughed—a silvery, rippling laugh, which even the uncomfortable Colonel found infectious.

"Can't you get rid of it?" she said.

"That is what I have been endeavouring to do ever since this very questionable honour was conferred upon me," retorted the Colonel. "We had not been forty-eight hours at sea when I tried to bribe the crew of the Indus to heave the great, perforated, jewelled casket and its loathsome occupant overboard. But the Maharajah had done the thing properly, and had deputed two villainous-looking fanatics to attend his Majesty the Cobra on the passage, and these worthies watched the reptile night and day. So it had to come to England, where, fortunately, the two attendants bade both me and their charge an affectionate adieu.

Digitized by Google

"But in England my plight was no better than at sea. I dared not shoot the brute, for that, had it become known, would have bred dissatisfaction among the Maharajah's subjects. So here I am, the nervous possessor of the finest cobra in Europe, and there is but one hope left. I shall try to shift the responsibility, with its gruesome cause, on to the shoulders of the Royal Society."

"And have you really got the brute under this roof?" asked Captain Tracy.

The Colonel nodded.

"But let me caution you," he added, "not to breathe a word of this before the servants. If they suspected the presence of such a villainous-looking visitor, they would decamp in a body. I had the casket conveyed to an empty room in the old west wing of the house. I feed the brute myself, and keep the door of the room religiously locked, so that there is little or no danger of the proximity of such a creature becoming known among the domestics. But I regret this paragraph has appeared, for it might lead to unpleasant suspicions. However, it cannot be helped. But let us change the subject, since this is scarcely conducive to unqualified enjoyment. What shall it be?"

"Ghosts," suggested pretty Mrs. Carew, the Colonel's sister.

"Almost as bad as cobras," said the Colonel with a laugh.

"As we seem slow to choose a topic," said Pat Neville, glancing across to the embrasure by the window, "may I suggest that, at Colonel Hawkesbury's request, Miss Carrington might be induced to treat us to an exhibition of her marvellous talent?"

The Colonel looked at the lady with a winning smile on his handsome face.

"The very thing," he said, "if Miss Carrington would consent to grant us so great a favour."

Sybil looked perplexed.

"With pleasure," she said doubtfully, "but how can I impersonate any existing and well-known character without the costume and scenic effects which are so indispensable to a realistic rendering of the part chosen?"

"Can you not discard those time-worn characters for the nonce, and create another on the spur of the moment?" suggested the Colonel.

Sybil laughed.

"Since we are asking questions without answering them," she said with a bewitching smile, "let me ask another. Would not that sound extremely like burlesque?"

"On the contrary," responded the Colonel warmly, "it would, to my mind, contain a deeper ring of realism than the words which we, from our very childhood, have been taught to quote. We should be wholly unprepared for the subject, and could, therefore, almost mistake for reality and truth the simulated earnestness of your words."

Sybil smiled a gracious acceptance of the Colonel's argument.

"I will do my best," she said, rising. "And, if you will allow me, I will leave you for a moment or two in order to make a few trivial but necessary preparations."

There was a murmur of pleasurable anticipation as the Colonel rose, and, courteously opening the door for the lovely actress to pass through, expressed his appreciation as much by one of those rare smiles that won his way into all hearts as by the courtly bow which accompanied it.

Scarce two minutes had passed since the closing of the door when it again opened, and the beautiful actress, with frightened dilated eyes and parted lips, rushed breathlessly into the room and closed the door behind her.

For some moments she uttered no sound, but stood, as if transfixed with fear, gazing into the face of the Colonel. Her very limbs trembled as if with uncontrollable agitation, and she pressed one hand convulsively to her heart as if to still its beating. Every lineament of the dusky face, every movement of the lithe and supple form, bespoke the utmost intensity of horror and alarm.

The eyes of all present were fascinated by the tragic spectacle, which had, almost in a moment, transformed a lovely, smiling, self-possessed woman into a terrified, horror-stricken creature, struggling to articulate the words which froze on her parted lips. In spellbound expectation the onlookers awaited, while a murmur of admiration broke from one or two. Then her words came, broken and disjointed, as she tottered to the wall for support.

"Oh, my God!" she gasped. "The cobra—the cobra! Oh, it has escaped! Come—in Heaven's name, come and destroy it before it is too late! It is on the great staircase, between us and the children! Oh, think of the little ones, who are so near the terrible thing! Even now the door may be opening, and an innocent child stepping out into that hideous death-trap. Come—you must come! Oh, why do you stand there, with your smiling faces, when death is at your very door? Oh, my God, what shall I do! Is there no one to heed me? You, who have the heart of a lion"—and she sprang to the side of the Colonel's chair—"you, who know no fear in the hour of danger—come—come you—and destroy this hideous creature that menaces the life of the little ones as well as that of ourselves!"

She stopped, panting for breath. A deep flush overspread the Colonel's handsome face, for the words she had addressed to him were music in his ears. There was a momentary silence, and then the spell was broken, and a burst of applause resounded through the room. For one moment Sybil stood, stupidly staring at the smiling faces around her, and then, with a wild, inarticulate cry, she bounded back to the door, and, again darting out, closed it swiftly behind her.

"By Jove!" said Bob, as she went out. "That was real, if you like! Do you know, I really thought she meant it until I heard everybody else applauding." And he mopped his brow nervously.

A general laugh followed this confession.

"It certainly was intensely realistic," said the Colonel, still with the flush on his face and a curious light in his eyes. "But I was prepared for it, you see, for it only bears out my argument."

And so they talked on, waiting until Sybil should return.

But outside, another and more terrible scene was being enacted.

As soon as Sybil had closed the door behind her, she glanced, with frightened eyes, up the broad staircase, and the sight which met her gaze was one calculated to inspire the bravest hearts with horror and alarm. For, half way up, coiled about the stout oak banister which skirted the staircase, and glowing in the white light of an electric lamp which hung above it, was the Maharajah's cobra.

The coils of its great body were writhing in horrible undulations, and the huge head, with its coldly glittering eyes, was uplifted to the glowing lamp, against which the cruel forked tongue was flickering to and fro and the white venomous fangs grating with a harsh, rasping sound. Evidently the monster had not noticed the reappearance of Sybil Carrington, being wholly absorbed in its enjoyment of the light and scanty warmth which the great lamp afforded it.

For a moment Sybil stood and gazed in terrified bewilderment at the writhing reptile. Then she looked about her.

Digitized by Google

"Since they will not heed me, and think I only play a part," she whispered, "I needs must do the thing myself! Yet what can I do? Where can I find a weapon?"

A passage led out of the hall at right angles, and, noiselessly traversing this, she came at last to the door of the Colonel's library.

Entering the room she felt along the wall until she touched the switch of the electric light. Instantly three or four lights blazed up around her, and, turning to the secretaire upon which the Colonel's papers were scattered, she tore open drawer after drawer with frenzied fingers, tossing the contents of each upon the floor, in a hurried search for what she knew would, in all probability, be found there.

At last her fingers touched something cold which lay at the bottom of a drawer, and, drawing it forth, disclosed a glittering six-chambered revolver. She had handled such weapons before, and a glance sufficed to show her that all six chambers were loaded. Cautiously she crept from the room, and approached the broad, brilliantly-lighted staircase.

Yes, the snake was still there, but this time it saw her, and a low, menacing hiss greeted her appearance, while the coils of its great body began slowly to unfold themselves from the banister in order to prepare its attack. At this instant the door of the nursery softly opened, and a little merry, blue-eyed boy of five ran laughing to the top of the stairs.

Sybil's heart stood still, and the hand which grasped the butt of the revolver faltered.

"Back!" she said hoarsely. "Go back and shut the door! Don't stay a moment! Quick—quick!"

But the child had caught sight of the uncoiling, glittering reptile on the staircase, and, unconscious of the danger which threatened him, saw only that the creature was beautiful. For a moment he stood gazing in wondering admiration at the great cobra, whose attention was now divided between Sybil and the child.

"Oh, isn't he just lovely!" exclaimed the boy. "I should like to play with him. I'm sure he wouldn't hurt me! Oh, do please go and ask my uncle if I may! Don't ask papa—ask my uncle, the Colonel—he always lets me do as I like. Oh, what's that?"

There was a flash, and a report rang through the hall. A bullet whizzed close to the cobra's head, and buried itself harmlessly in the ceiling beyond.

With a hiss of infuriated anger, the hideous monster dropped with a soft thud upon the broad staircase and began swiftly to descend.

Sybil's breath seemed to choke her as she beheld the failure of her first shot.

Slowly she moved the barrel of the revolver, following the downward course of the writhing brute, until it had almost reached the lowest stair. Then, with a brief prayer for strength, she pressed the trigger, and, with death at her very feet, waited for the smoke to clear.

One glance, and a cry of joy broke from her lips. The monster's head had been pierced by the ball, and the great folds of its hideous body were writhing in the convulsions of death.

The relief was almost more than Sybil could bear, and she staggered against the wall, almost unable to support her trembling form.

At that instant the Colonel, startled by the shots, stood in the doorway of the drawing-room. One glance up the broad staircase revealed to him all that had happened—the form of his little fair-haired nephew on the topmost stair, gazing down with wide eyes of unspeakable surprise; the rapidly stiffening body of the great cobra, not five yards from where he stood; and the trembling figure of Sybil, with the revolver still tightly clenched in her right hand, and clutching the wall for support.

In a moment his strong arm was about her, and, leading her into an adjoining room, he sent his pretty sister to her and returned to the drawing-room.

A few words informed the astonished guests of the all too realistic drama which the lovely actress had enacted—a drama which had well-nigh ended in grimmest tragedy.

One by one they peered out to view the Maharajah's cobra, now stiff and lifeless, and every voice was heard in praise of the beautiful actress who had so bravely and courageously risked her life to save them from the danger they had not believed.

Other ladies among the Colonel's numerous guests now began to leave the drawing-room in search of the lovely heroine, and it was not long before Sybil was sufficiently recovered to rejoin the rest of the party in the great room, where she was received with a burst of enthusiastic applause from all present.

The voice of the Colonel's brother-in-law shook with deep emotion as he thanked her, in a few simple, earnest words, for the noble way in which she had saved their darling's life.

Only the Colonel was silent, sitting for a long time in meditative thought, but the light had deepened in his eyes, and, when the party broke up for the night, his hand detained the retreating figure of the lovely actress and drew her unresistingly into the library, where the lamps were still aglow and the papers strewn upon the floor.

"Sybil," he said tenderly, when he had closed the door, "I will not add to the well-earned commendations you have to-night received from my guests. But there is one thing I must say, though I am sure it will not come wholly as a revelation to you. Will you not consent, by your bright presence, to fill with sunshine the home of a rough old soldier like myself? It is my only hope, my one ambition—the one cherished and predominant desire of my life. Tell me, dearest!" And, taking a step towards her, he held out his strong arms and waited.

There was no affected confusion in the lovely face that was still turned towards him—no downward drooping of the large liquid eyes that looked so frankly into his—but, with that pure and fearless love that sees no shame in sweet confession, she let the outstretched arms close about her in a lover's strong embrace.

"Sybil," he whispered in her ear, "you have made me very happy—happier than I can ever tell you; but, may I not have one word—a word that shall tell me 'tis not only I who love?"

Sybil lifted her head and gazed for a moment into her lover's eyes.

"Maurice," she said in a voice of intensest feeling, "Maurice, I have loved you even as you have loved me, and though you waited I read your purpose and was glad—waiting, too, for the time when your final return to England should give to you the opportunity you sought, and to me the greatest joy that ever gladdened a woman's heart. Does that content you? If not, then stoop your head that I, too, may confess the secret I have kept so long in a lover's lingering kiss."

* * * * *

It only remains for us to say that for some time the mystery attending the cobra's escape from its prison remained unexplained, in spite of the strictest investigation to which the Colonel subjected the occurrence.

As soon as the great creature had grown stiff in death the Colonel found the door of its prison open and the casket forced, but, though the servants were questioned, no light was thrown on the mystery.

But a strange story is current in the far-away province over which the Maharajah rules. For it is whispered among the dark-skinned denizens of that vast and mysterious jungle-land that the great white lord who dwelt among them, and upon whom their mighty Maharajah had conferred so great an honour, had violated the thrice sacred trust reposed in him by attempting the life—the immortal life—of the great Temple cobra.

And they affirm that one of its faithful attendants—Firmali the Righteous—having discovered the sacrilegious plot, had secretly followed the white lord to his great house, and, entering it all unobserved in the darkness of the night, had picked the lock of the door and set the monster free to wreak its own vengeance on the head of the unsuspecting Colonel and his guests.

Walter J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

THE GIRL AND THE IDEALIST.

The Transformation which Love Brings.

THE Girl sat in her chilly bedroom and stared gloomily at the wallpaper. From its cheerlessness and ugliness there seemed no way of escape. Particularly when she was discouraged did its hideousness oppress her—and she was thoroughly discouraged to-day. Discouraged with herself, her work, and the dreary unloveliness of her life.

"How can there be inspiration among such surroundings?" she sighed.

Truly, the room at best was but a blankly comfortable abiding place, although there were touches that told of a brave effort towards improvement. The feminine yearning for warm colours and graceful lines had vented itself in such trifling adornments as a limited income permitted.

But the Girl's passionate love of the beautiful was expressed all too inadequately in these pitiful attempts at decoration—attempts which seemed, after all, mere makeshifts and mockeries—caricatures of the glowing designs her imagination created.

"There is little that is lovely in my world," she said sadly, as her gaze shifted to the view from her window—smoke-begrimed roofs and chimneys showing sullen outlines in the drizzling dampness of the dull Autumn afternoon.

She rose with sudden decision and got out her hat and jacket. "I may as well walk," she said. "It is better out-doors, in spite of the weather. I will at least have fresh air."

As she opened the front door she came face to face with the Idealist, who was about to enter.

She always associated him with that name, regardless of his real cognomen. One of the boarders had used the title in speaking of him, and since then she called him that in her own mind.

"You are going for a walk?" he asked pleasantly.

"Yes," she answered.

"I'll go, too, if you'll let me," he said promptly, turning round to descend the steps with her.

The Girl was somewhat astonished. It was so unlike him. None of the boarders felt at all acquainted with him—he was so quiet, so unobtrusive. No one knew much about him. Mrs. McAvoy, the landlady, surmised that he was a writer "or something" from the litter of papers usually found in his room. He had the skylight room—a cheerless affair—and often sat up late at his desk.

The Girl had really never noticed him particularly before. But just now, as he spoke to her, she observed the winning light in his eyes, the fine lines of his face.

After they had walked several paces it seemed the most natural thing in the world that he should be with her.

"You seem happy," she said to him frankly, "and on such a day! I cannot understand it."

"Why not?" he asked. "Days do not control us."

"They control me," she replied. "And so do my surroundings. You can't mean that you are independent of such things!"

"I have no time to think of them," he answered. "There is so much else. What are more externals, anyway?"

"Oh," she cried, recollecting, "you are an idealist. I forgot. Of course you can say it. But I never could. I do not understand. It does not seem practical, somehow."

"Not practical?" he echoed. "And why?"

"What good is it?" she questioned him in return, "to deceive one's self with dreams when the cold, blunt facts of life are constantly smiting one in the face? Facts are greater than ideals or theories."

"But facts are not greater than you."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that these outer things—surroundings, circumstances, conditions—are in no wise so potent as the reality of your own self—your own individuality—your own soul, if you will. That soul, that consciousness, need not dwell down among these disagreeable conditions. It may by its own decree know a life of exalted happiness."

"Beautiful," said the Girl, "but vague and vast and impossible."

"Impossible? You might say, indeed, that it was impossible for anyone to be happy on a dismal day. Can you not imagine a condition which would make one entirely oblivious of the weather?"

The Girl smiled. "Yes," she said, "I can. If one were in love, for instance."

She said it naturally and without embarrassment. He seemed the sort of man she could talk with in just that way.

"Yes," he responded quickly. "If one were in love. Now, imagine such a state of mind perpetuated—a state of mind which draws its gladness, not from externals, but from some inner realm of radiance. A state of mind dependent, not upon the meagre happiness which a grudging Fate affords, but upon such glory as comes to it through its love of humanity, its study of high things, its contact with great minds, its loyalty to duty and to truth."

"Perhaps I will understand it, too, some day," said the Girl.

"See," said her companion, "there is the promise of it in the sky. The clouds have cleared and the west is ruddy."

"But there are mud puddles at our feet," she laughingly reminded him.

"Look again and see if you can call them mud puddles," he said.

She looked and saw the rose glory of the sky reflected in them. "They are pools of beauty," she confessed.

"There!" he cried. "You are converted already."

Her dingy little room looked strangely bright when she returned to it. She felt buoyant, happy, music-filled.

"And yet these are the same surroundings," she told herself, marvelling. "After all, happiness is from within."

There were other walks and further talks with the Idealist in the days that followed.

"I see the change in you," he said to her triumphantly one day. They had returned from one of these walks and were standing together in the dim hallway.

"I, too, am changed," he went on. "A greater happiness has come to me. When one is in love——"

The Girl raised a startled face to his.

"Dearest, let me say it!" And drawing her to him he kissed her on the lips.

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

CRAWLEY DRUMMOND. Lady Peggy's old friend and adviser.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DUCHESS OF EASTACRES. His mother.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. A celebrated French artist in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman and friend of Lady Peggy.

The Duke and I Go into Partnership.

EASTACRES did not answer immediately. The entrance of Stanley at so critical a moment seemed to deprive him of the power of action. The blow had fallen with such crushing force that it benumbed his faculties. Stanley, tall and erect, faced the Duke, his head thrown back, his eyes flashing, his whole attitude expressive of an indignant contempt only held in check by a strong will.

For the time being neither of the men was conscious of our presence. The nature of each was antagonistic to the other; their temperaments would have clashed under any circumstances, the present state of things brought their antagonism to a white heat.

Belinda, restraining her outcry of joy at Stanley's appearance, glanced from one to the other, the light of battle in her face.

Eastacres brought the silence, the tense silence that preludes a fight, to a sudden termination.

"You will find me an inconvenient person to interfere with, Mr. Forbes. Your friend Hervé knows that, to his cost."

Belinda, with a flush of hot colour in her cheeks, interposed.

"He has been trying to murder M. Hervé," she said, "fighting a duel with a man who can't shoot. Oh, I am glad you are here, Mr. Forbes. He," and she pointed to the Duke, "is insufferable in his insolence. He dares to say he will compel me to marry him against my will. Tell him," she threw up her head, "tell him that rather than marry him I would kill him."

The Duke sneered and laughed insultingly.

"You tire me with your mock heroics, Miss Belinda," and with that he walked towards the door. Forbes stopped him with a gesture.

"Stop," he said sternly, "stop!" as the Duke paused' his hand upon the door. "You have first to hear what I have come some miles to tell you." Then, as Eastacres, with a shrug, declined to listen further, Stanley made what seemed to me a single bound across the room, and, clutching him tightly by the collar, half led, half dragged him back, helpless as a child in his firm grip.

"Listen," said Stanley, in his ringing voice, "listen, and, when you have heard me, make your choice of what I offer. Leave Paris here and now, resigning all notion of marriage with Miss North, and I will let you be in peace. Remain," his fingers tightened on Eastacres' coat, "and I will ruin you, disgrace you, force you from respectable society, publish your infamies and your dishonours, close the doors of every decent house upon you. I have it in my power to utterly discredit you, and you know it! Now," he released the Duke, stepping back a pace, "now, do you go or stay?"

"Stay!" was the answer, flung like a challenge in the other's face. "Your threats are idle. What can you do? Society will laugh at your efforts to prove me as an undesirable acquaintance as"—a vindictive look crept into his cold grey eyes—"it will jeer at your attempts to re-establish Sheila Kenwyn. You are powerless to injure me or help her. Try both if you like and see what your efforts will accomplish. Bah!" he sneered, "you are a wind-bag. What can you do with your boastful talk? Go back to your cousin, Mr. Forbes, you may, perhaps, impress her. Here we are not so easily convinced. Go back to your innocent Irish girl who——"

The sneer remained unspoken. Like a flash, Stanley had fallen on the Duke, gripping his throat with merciless hands, forcing him to silence.

"You dog!" he cried, shaking him to and fro. "You dog, another word against her and I'll kill you as you stand!"

"You shall give me reparation for this," gasped Eastacres, when Stanley at last released him. "You shall fight me or be known throughout the length of Paris as a coward."

"I don't fight with men of your stamp," was the answer. "I cane them. No," as Eastacres sprang forward, raising his hand to strike the other's face, "no, it's no use, you are powerless. I could crush you with a blow. You may take this"—he laid his hand heavily on the Duke's arm—"You may take this as a token of what I shall do with you in the future if you remain in Paris. I will give you one last chance—Go!"

"Never," returned his Grace, "I shall remain, and in defiance of your threats and prophecies I shall achieve my end. He laughs best who laughs last. I shall have cause for merriment at the end, Mr. Forbes," with which the Duke, after a sweeping bow to Belinda and myself, departed, not, I thought, without some of the honours of war.

It was past three o'clock when Belinda and I at last regained the Hotel D'Arteuil. The events of the evening had much tried me. I was beginning to despair of Belinda, despair of marrying my charge. The thought fell on me cold and grey as a mist from the marshes that unless I were very clever, very careful, the twenty thousand pounds would slip through my fingers. I remembered the Duke's words that morning in Cairo, when we drove to the docks at Boulag. He had sworn he would force Belinda into marriage with him; I had tried my best to bring it about and I had failed. It might be that I should be compelled to adopt the Duke's plan after all.

Digitized by Google

Somehow or other, the mystery of the midnight duel in Hervé's studio leaked out, and formed the chief topic of conversation in Parisian society. Belinda's part in the affair was magnified to an almost incredible extent. It was reported that she had received the shot intended for the artist, and had been severely wounded. Only the sight of her, serene and smiling, in the Bois, reassured Society as to her safety. Her popularity was immensely increased, and the number of proposals she received, and, alas, refused, grew more numerous daily.

I spoke to her, imploring, upbraiding, even threatening, but my speeches and reproaches were alike of no avail. The girl really possessed no taste. It is impossible otherwise to account for her determined rejections of the many brilliant offers she received. Some of the handsomest, most distinguished men of France laid their titles and their fortunes at her feet. To them all she turned a deaf ear. The love of David Carr seemed a talisman against which power and fortune, position and prestige fought in vain.

The Marquis de Fontenoy, a young and extremely fascinating man of good family and assured income, was dismissed without a second thought. Baron Rolla, the famous financier, came next on the list. He was middle-aged, of vast fortune and great personal charm. He was more diplomatic than Fontenoy, and laid siege to Belinda by slow, almost imperceptible degrees. Hardy North was terribly discouraged at Belinda's conduct, and wrote expressing his strong disapproval of her treatment of the Duke.

Stanley Forbes, after his dramatic entrance at the studio, passed for the time being out of sight. He was not seen in fashionable Paris, but was reported to be living in a charming villa on the outskirts of the town.

Eastacres also had disappeared. He had left the Hotel D'Arteuil quite suddenly, in response to a summons from the Duchess, and the date of his return to Paris was uncertain.

Meantime, Baron Rolla took advantage of every opportunity to further his suit. He took Belinda and me for long excursions in his motor-car, arranging some charming and novel expedition almost daily, and, rumour said, neglecting his business in consequence. The girl's every inclination and her slightest whim were law. Did she express a wish to help a charity, relieve a society or hospital in urgent need of funds, a cheque from Baron Rolla was immediately forthcoming. He worshipped, almost adored her. And she, a mere girl in her teens, accepted his worship as a matter of course, as a mere incident in her life. It is marvellous how unconscious, how egotistical a young girl can be! Rolla had known the most beautiful and the most accomplished women of his time. Rumour said that not a few had been more than willing to share his future and his fortune. Hitherto, however, the Baron had remained untouched, only to fall a victim to blue-eyed seventeen!

One day, returning from a spin to Versailles, we encountered all people in the world, Mark Striven and Honoria! Belinda gave a cry of recognition.

"Please stop," she said to the Baron, "I want to get out, I simply must speak to Honoria."

Fearful of complications, I followed. Honoria was a fool, and in my experience I have known a fool prove more dangerous than many a wise man.

Honoria was looking better dressed than usual, but there was still the same air of depression, the same suggestion of fear that had characterised her before marriage. She brightened at the sight of Belinda, however, and led her aside, leaving me to hear Mark's fulsome compliments. He talked loudly, but not loudly enough to drown Honoria's voice.

"Belinda," she clutched my protegée in the old appealing fashion, "you aren't going to marry Eastacres?"

"Of course not, I've told you so a hundred times, Honoria!"

"But he says you are, and that"—Honoria broke off and glanced fearfully at her husband, "Belinda, whatever you do, don't come to us. We've taken a house just outside Paris"—she raised her face and spoke with a strange emphasis "a house where all sorts of strange and dreadful things could happen and no one be any whit the wiser. You mustn't come there, Belinda, no matter what they say or what they tell you, don't come."

"Honoria, you're silly," said Belinda mildly. "Of course I shall come and see you in your home, and bring Lady Peggy with me. You're looking very nice, dear." Then, with a quick change of voice, "Is he kind to you?" pointing to Mark.

A look of terror flashed into the poor thing's face. Mark had overheard the question and was waiting for her answer.

"Kind?" she said, with a hysterical attempt at a laugh, "that's not the word, Belinda. He's a devoted, yes, a most devoted husband."

Then with a flush in her sallow cheeks she dropped Belinda's arm and hastened to that most devoted husband. Turning to look after them as they entered the Luxembourg Gardens—almost deserted at that hour—I saw him raise his hand—a a moment later I heard a scream, a woman's scream. On the instant the memory of a dark and passionate face flashed across my mind—the face of El Hamed, the Egyptian, touched with the light of a great love—love for Honoria! And at the thought I sighed.

At the same time I resolved not to encourage Honoria; marriage had merely increased her opportunities and capacities for mischief.

Eastacres had been foolish to marry his sister to Mark Striven. As I told him, he would have done better to keep her single.

I had yet to learn the part he had determined Honoria should play.

That night was the occasion of a ball held at the Hotel du Nord—a subscription ball for the benefit of a popular charity. All the newspapers had puffed it weeks beforehand, and great ladies had vied with each other in the sale of tickets. All classes were represented there—high born women of the old school, grandes dames of the Faubourg St. Germain, wealthy foreigners, a good sprinkling of the financial element, and some representatives of the wealthy middle classes.

Millionaries elbowed each other, and their wives fairly blazed with diamonds.

The ball had arrived at that stage when only real beauties look well, those who, like Belinda, can withstand the glare of the gaslights and the incessant waltzing; the others fade and wither like flowers in the sunlight, and the blue circles under their eyes betray their age with the indiscretion of a birth register.

People were getting blasé, even Belinda for once showed signs of boredom, when an incident took place that raised the jaded spirits of all present.

Fashionable Paris is in touch with all the scandal of Mayfair, and gossip had been very rife in both capitals concerning Stanley Forbes' quarrel with the Duke. It was known that a woman was the cause of the disagreement, and the name of Sheila Kenwyn crept into the discussion. This being the case, you can judge of the sensation that ran through the room on the announcement that Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Forbes had arrived. The sensation was increased a thousandfold when Stanley and his wife appeared. He looked unusually distinguished, and leaning on his arm, pale and fragile, but exquisitely lovely, was—Sheila Kenwyn — or, I should say, Sheila Forbes.

Digitized by Google

It was a most daring and most audacious and most extraordinary thing to do. To marry a girl with a past like Sheila's was a mad or a chivalrous thing, according to one's point of view. To introduce her in public, to throw her, as it were, in the face of Society, was courageous or nonsensical, according to the result. A visible thrill ran through the assembly. Stanley advanced towards the Duchess de Chartres, who, as patroness of the charity, received the guests at the ball given in its aid. It was an awkward moment for her. According to her behaviour during the next few minutes Society would decide on its treatment of the girl. If the Duchess received her the world of fashion would receive her also. If the great lady declined to notice her, we should follow suit, and, casting her from our midst, condemn her to outer darkness.

I was sorry for the girl. She had been cruelly deceived, and had suffered for her folly. There were plenty of women whose faults were far less worthy of excuse than Sheila's, but their faults were in secret. They were not the cause of a scandal. The Duchess de Chartres herself had more than one shady chapter in her life, but with consummate skill she had kept them from the knowledge of all but her intimates. Sheila had displayed no such finesse.

The Duchess—remembering perhaps certain passages with Stanley, and retaining some of her old tenderness for him—advanced with heightened colour to receive them. At the moment when her Grace was about to shake hands with Mrs. Forbes there was a slight stir among the guests assembled round a door at the other end of the apartment. A slight figure pushed a way through the throng, a slight figure with a set face and cold, grey eyes.

Eastacres had chosen this very moment for his return to Paris.

He came forward rapidly, and stood a little to the right of the Duchess, in line with Sheila. At the sight of him she lost her nerve, the hand that the Duchess was about to press dropped limp to her side. She gave a little startled cry, and clung to Stanley's arm.

It was an awkward predicament; women without courage have no business to depart from the straight path of custom and conventionality; at any rate, having once left they should not return to it. Such returns distress themselves and other people.

I was sorry for Stanley. He had played a bold game, a game that would have proved successful but for Sheila's cowardice and Eastacres' malignity.

As it was she all but fainted. There would have been a scene—a scandal, had not Belinda, with that calm self-confidence that marked her out, come to the rescue.

She went quickly to the girl's side, grasped her hand in a firm, I had almost said manly, clasp.

"It is nice of you to have come," she said. "I wanted to see you so badly." Her voice or her touch reassured the girl. She raised her head, stammered a few words of greeting, and Belinda whirled her off to a seat in the conservatory.

For a moment Eastacres' triumph had been turned to defeat, but it was not for long.

Some half an hour later the two girls reappeared. Stanley advanced to meet his wife. Eastacres approached to greet Belinda. With a low bow he murmured a compliment on her appearance. Belinda, staring straight in front of her, paid no more attention to his Grace than if he'd been a statue or a footman.

"My dear," I murmured in an agony, "what are you thinking of? For Heaven's sake, Belinda, answer the Duke! Everybody's looking. Whatever will they say?"

"I don't wish to speak to the Duke of Eastacres," said the terrible girl in her clear voice. "I don't like him, he's not the sort of man I care to know. In future I shan't know him. Paul"—she turned to De Sonnaz—"I think this is our dance." And without the least compunction, she waltzed off the Comte, leaving the Duke white with rage and nearly mad with mortification.

"You shall pay for this," he said to Stanley, as the latter passed, "and within a week." Sheila shuddered, and clung closer to her husband. Stanley smiled scornfully, and passed on.

The next moment the Duke offered me his arm.

"Come," he said briefly, "I want to speak to you." He piloted me skilfully through the crowded rooms until we reached an ante-chamber where we might hope to be left undisturbed. Then with a look in his eyes and a twist about his mouth that caused me some uneasiness, he opened the conversation.

"What are you going to do about Belinda?" he asked abruptly.

"I don't follow you, Duke," I replied.

"Nonsense," he answered rudely. "You know what I mean quite well. But if you prefer plain language you shall have it. How are you going to secure that provision for your old age that Belinda's marriage would give you? Don't play the hypocrite," he added savagely, "I've no patience with that sort of thing just now. I know as well as if you had told me the terms on which you agreed to find a titled husband for the girl. You were ruined in Hammond's Bank, and but for Hardy North's offer you'd have been stranded. Now"—he brought his face level with mine—"the question is: How are you going to secure your terms? You've done your best to cajole and coerce Belinda into taking a husband. You've tried me and half a dozen other men. But she's refused them all. Now I'm going to try in my own fashion and my own way, and I'm going to succeed. By yourself you've failed, and you'll continue to fail, and as a result at the end of a year or two years at most, you'll be penniless."

He smiled quite calmly but most evilly as he spoke, and with the remembrance of that scene in the ball room upon me I could not repress a shudder.

"I repeat, you will be penniless, unless you come into partnership with me. Consider"—he laid his hand upon my arm—"it's your only chance. No other man would be skilful enough, clever enough, brave enough to do what I propose. Listen"—he bent his head and whispered in my ear. As he spoke my heart almost ceased to beat and I turned cold.

"You consent?" he asked when he had finished. "Will you help me?"

For a moment I paused. The nature of his plan, the thing he asked me to help him bring about, made me feel faint and dizzy. If—if he should play me false, if he should break his word——

"Eastacres," I cried, "are you doing this as a mad scheme of revenge against Belinda?"

"On my honour, no, merely as a means to induce, or, if you will, force her to become my wife. You risk nothing, you gain everything by the attempt, why do you hesitate?"

Again I paused. Belinda's face rose before me. Her eyes, large, clear, limpid as a child's. It was like plotting to hurt a child to plan to injure her. And yet she had been very obstinate, very tiresome. It was nonsensical to suppose she would or could be happier married to that miserable engineer than as the Duchess of Eastacres. And, besides, I had to consider myself. The thought of a penniless old age was one I could not bear. Belinda must be made to do what was best for her.

"I consent," I said, and clasped Eastacres' hand.

"Very good," he answered, "between us we shall conquer."

"When is it to be?" I asked, and despite myself the colour left my cheeks and my lips twitched as I spoke.

Digitized by Google

"Within a week, on the day of the races. By-the-bye, don't bet on Forbes' horse, Lady Peggy. I hear he has no chance." Eastacres' eyes glittered as he spoke. I thought of his words not five minutes since to Stanley: "You shall pay for this within the week."

The races were within a week. Stanley had entered a horse and backed it heavily! Remembering these things and bearing in mind Eastacres' words, I felt that Stanley might have cause for apprehension. I did not warn him, however; it was not my business.

During the next week I lived in a state of nervous tension, waiting impatiently for the all-important day, the day when Eastacres was to carry out his scheme. My protégée meantime daily grew more lovely and more courted.

The morning of the races dawned fair and fresh. Belinda was in high spirits, she had donned Stanley's colours—mauve and green—and looked, so Baron Rolla told her, like the spirit of Spring. We went down to the course some few miles out of Paris, on the Baron's motor. Rolla was more infatuated than ever. It was evident to my mind he would propose to Belinda before the day was out. For her own sake I hoped she would accept him. His title was hereditary, not bought, and his wealth and prestige tremendous.

The racecourse was a brilliant sight. There were gathered statesmen, heroes, celebrities, royalties—their rivalries forgotten in their eagerness for sport. Diplomatists who had lately been quarrelling over the knotty points of national frontiers, now only vied for a twenty franc rosebud from a pert and pretty bouquetière; Knights of the Garter and Knights of the Golden Fleece, who had hated each other with the deadliest rancour with the width of the Channel between, became friends over a mutually good book on the race. Brains that were the power depôts of one half of Europe let themselves be fanned into amusement by a fair idiot's coquetry, or lulled into quiescence by the persistent cries of eager bookmakers.

Stanley's horse, Maraschino, was a beautiful, satin-skinned chestnut. As I looked at the glossy bow of his neck, the width of his magnificent ribs, marked his high-bred, delicate-looking head, I felt a contempt for the Duke's capacity to injure Stanley's chances of success. Maraschino was good to win against a much more powerful field than would gather against him. His jockey, a famous rider from the Newmarket stables, was true as steel. Neither horse nor rider could be got at. The Duke for once, I felt convinced, had missed his mark.

But I was yet to learn the full extent of Eastacres' purpose.

At last the signal for the start was given. Maraschino broke away with the force of a pent-up torrent suddenly let loose. He shook himself clear of all the horses and led off in a grand canter in front of his chief rival, a French bay mare.

Half way down the course his jockey turned pale, swayed in his saddle, fell forward, resting his head almost in his arms. The glittering throng spreading over the plains gazed in amazement; they thought the famous English jockey was dead beat, and sneered at his failure.

"He's been doctored," said Stanley between his teeth, and gazed savagely round, seeking with eagle eye to detect the man who had done so foul, so base a thing.

Eastacres smiled serenely and passed his glasses to a woman at his side, an opera singer famous for her diamonds, and her lack of morals. Belinda glanced indignantly at Eastacres. I, remembering what was to happen to her after the race, caught my breath, and waited.

The field swept on with a rush. Maraschino, startled at first to miss the guiding hand upon his rein, recovered his nerve and bending his mettle to the task, put out his strength, and gained once more the advantage over his foes.

On, on, till they came into the straight, and a great cry breaks from the throng.

"Maraschino, Maraschino leads!"

And then, in a gasp of horror, rises as a single cry from a thousand throats:

"The jockey! Look at the jockey. The dead jockey wins!"

(Next week tells of what happened to Belinda after the race.)

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

AND

£1,000 IN CASH CONSOLATION GIFTS.

THE MOST LIBERAL PRIZE EVER OFFERED BY ANY PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

The prize of £5 a Week for Life will be paid to the person (perhaps you) who correctly solves the set of pictures which appear in "PEARSON'S WEEKLY," under the conditions published in that paper.

Each of the pictures represents the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom, and every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:

FIRST CONSOLATION CASH GIFT: £100.

2nd	Cash Gift	£50,
3rd	" "	£50.
4th	" "	£25.
5th	" "	£25.
6th	" "	£25.
7th	" "	£25.
8th to 57th	Cash Gifts	£10 each.
58th to 97th	" "	£5 "

So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a Week for Life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash prizes.

In order to form some idea of the size of the prize of £5 a Week for Life, we would ask you to glance over the following figures. Assuming that you live to the age of 70—which is quite reasonable—you will have received one of the following amounts, according to how old you are when you start receiving the prize:

If you are	60	you will have received	£2,600.
"	50	" "	£5,200.
"	40	" "	£7,800.
"	30	" "	£10,400.
"	20	" "	£13,000.
"	15	" "	£14,300.
"	12	" "	£15,080.

From this table you will be able to calculate exactly the amount of money which will come to you.

The first set of pictures will appear in the issue of Pearson's Weekly published on January 23rd. Order a copy to be reserved for you.

Digitized by Google

FOR GLADYS' SAKE.

A Pretty Little Tale of a Sister's Devotion.

"I WANT to go on the merry-go-round."

"Nonsense, child! come along at once." And the eldest Miss Norman caught her sister's arm and tried to pull her past the piece of waste ground on which a feeble attempt at a fair was encamped.

The Norman girls were the daughters of a retired Colonel, who imagined himself an invalid, and, having lived his own life, had no particular wish that his girls should live theirs. So he had bought a cottage in this remote fishing village, and lived in the utmost seclusion. He was scornfully tolerant of his practical eldest girl, who acted as his housekeeper, and he considered Alice, the youngest, commonly called Baby, a decided nuisance, but he was intensely proud of Gladys, the second girl, and the beauty of the family. For her he intended at some future date, to conquer his indolence, and give the beautiful girl a chance in the great world. The three girls were accustomed to go freely about alone, since their governess had been dismissed a year ago, on the ground that Baby was too stupid to learn anything more, and there was no use wasting money on her.

Baby was nearly seventeen, and it was therefore quite impossible for her elder sisters to sanction her joining in the amusement of the fair.

"I do so want a turn, Nellie," she said. "What harm will it do? I shall go whether you let me or not."

"I've got the purse," significantly responded Nellie, clasping closer the shabby little portemonnaie wherein reposed the slender pocket money of the three sisters.

Baby dived her hand into her pocket, and, discovering a stray penny, she tossed it to the man who was just starting the merry-go-round again, and sprang into a gilded car. The elder sisters were powerless to stop her, and could only exchange dismayed glances, as Baby swept past, her loose hair floating on the summer breeze, her face bright with mirth and mischief.

"Oh, if father were to come by, what would he say?" murmured Gladys, looking round to make sure no fatal chance had brought that upright figure strolling round the bay. Her glance met a pair of laughing dark eyes, fixed in mingled amusement and admiration on her face. A young man had just been rowed ashore from his yacht, and, springing up the bank, had been an amused witness of Baby's little escapade and her sisters' consternation. The merry-go-round was beginning to slow down, preparatory to coming to a stop, and Baby sprang out, slipped, and fell heavily. In a moment, the stranger had raised her, and was reassuring the frightened sisters.

"It's nothing," he said. "She can't be hurt; she fell on the grass. She's only shaken."

"It's my foot," murmured Baby, scarlet with confusion. "Let us get away. Gladys, you must give me your arm home."

"I think you had better have mine," said the stranger, but Baby disengaged herself, and tried to move away. The attempt was a failure, and she was glad to catch at the arm the young man hastily offered.

"You see," he said, with a kindly smile. "Indeed, you had better let me help you home. My name is Rex Thornecliffe. I am here for a few days on my yacht."

"We are Colonel Norman's daughters," Nellie introduced herself and her sisters. "I don't like to trouble you, but I'm afraid we could not get my little sister home without your aid. We live in that cottage on the hill in the distance."

"No trouble at all," he returned. "Did you say Colonel Norman? My father had a very dear friend of that name in his young days."

"That couldn't be father," said Baby, decidedly. "He never could have been anybody's dear friend."

"I have heard father speak of a friend of his called Daylesford Thornecliffe," observed Gladys.

"That's my father. They were old friends, I believe, but lost sight of each other after my father came in for his brother's estate, and left the Army."

"You must come in and make father's acquaintance," said Nellie. "He'll be delighted to see you. We live very quietly because of father's health, but I know he will be pleased to see the son of his old friend."

So when the party reached the cottage, while Nellie hurried Baby away to have her foot attended to, Gladys conducted Rex Thornecliffe into her father's presence. The young man had the good fortune to please the old autocrat, and after spending an hour or so with him, was dismissed with the genial request to look upon "The Cottage" as his home during his stay.

"And what about James Fleming?" asked Baby. She was sitting on the window-seat, devouring with healthy appetite, a slice of bread and butter covered with apricot jam. Gladys stood beside her, gazing with dreamy eyes into the wood behind the house. At Baby's question, she started.

"What do you mean?"

Baby finished her bread without answering, looked lovingly at the jam pot which stood conveniently at hand on the window ledge, and seemed contemplating a fresh attack.

"You'll spoil your dinner, and make yourself sick," went on Gladys. "Leave the jam alone, and tell me what you mean."

Baby pushed the jam pot aside, and threw herself, a heap of white cambric, on the floor.

"Oh, isn't it hot?" she sighed, stretching her arms above her head. "What was I saying? Oh, I know. Yes; Gladys, what about James Fleming?"

"What in the world do you mean, Baby?" demanded Gladys, turning from the window, and fixing flashing eyes on her sister.

Baby closed her eyes languidly.

"That voice of cold anger is so refreshing," she murmured. "You are nicer than Nell when you get angry. You get into a cold fury and speak in an icy voice, but Nell gets red and her very voice sounds hot."

"Baby, have the goodness to explain yourself," commanded Gladys, in a voice still more icy.

"It's difficult in such hot weather," remonstrated Baby, "but I'll try. Isn't it very plain what keeps Rex Thornecliffe here?"

"No, it is not," returned Gladys, each word an icicle.

"You are right; it is not plain," agreed Baby, opening her eyes and looking mischievously at her sister. "How lovely you are, Gladys!"

There was a pause.

"If you mean that Rex remains here because of—of me," began Gladys, after a minute's silence, "you're wrong. He likes Nell just as much, and you more, than me. He's fond of you, Baby."

Baby suddenly turned her head aside, and her sister did not see the change in the soft, childish face.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, yes, he's fond of me," assented Baby presently. "He thinks me a little girl to be petted and teased. And of course, considering my unfortunate introduction to him, that is the most charitable view he can take. But, Gladys, he loves you. Nell sees it; her rector, her beloved Timothy, sees it; father sees it; and you have seen it, too, haven't you?"

She had turned her head again, and was looking eagerly up at her sister.

"Haven't you, Gladys?" repeated Baby, but without answering, Gladys dashed out of the room.

"What about James Fleming now?" called Baby after her, with a burst of elfin laughter, but next moment the mirth vanished from the child's face, and Baby lay still, lost in thought.

James Fleming was the son of the village bookseller. He had had a good education and was superior to his position, so the Norman girls had got into a way of chatting with him when they went into the shop. This had ripened into a kind of friendship with the two younger girls. Nellie's mind was fully occupied with her housekeeping duties and with her future life as the rector's wife, but her sisters had nothing to fill up the empty, aimless days. Both were fond of novel reading, and gladly accepted James Fleming's offer of the loan of new books from his father's shop. The young man arranged to meet the girls in the little wood behind "The Cottage," and exchange the books.

He was gentlemanly, good-looking, amusing, the only young man of their acquaintance, so it was no wonder that Gladys and Baby were glad to relieve the monotony of their lives by spending an hour strolling in the woods with James Fleming. It was soon plain that he was violently in love with Gladys, and Baby sometimes thought it might be imprudent to allow James Fleming to meet them, but she believed implicitly in Gladys, and thought her the wisest as well as the best of created beings. So she said no more about the luckless lover, not even when, some days later, Rex Thornecliffe proposed to Gladys, and was accepted.

It was a lovely August evening, a fortnight later. The three sisters were in the drawing-room, Nellie and Baby reading, Gladys at the piano. Colonel Norman had carried off the two lovers to play cards directly after dinner, and the deserted maidens knew that they should see nothing more of the gentlemen that evening.

It was beginning to grow dusk when a servant brought in a note for Gladys. Baby's book was not interesting, and she idly watched her sister read the note, slip it in her pocket, and rise hurriedly. There were two windows in the room, one a French casement opening on the garden, and through this latter Gladys disappeared with a speed which left Baby breathless, and did not give her time to ask where her sister was going. She was still marvelling when the rector, whose losses at cards had made him desperate enough to rebel against his future father-in-law and break up the card-party, marched into the room, and took a seat beside his betrothed.

"Where are father and Rex?" asked Baby.

"Gone out to smoke a cigar in the wood," replied Mr. Harvey.

An idea flashed on Baby, and in another moment she had darted through the French window and sped to the place in the wood where they had always met the bookseller's son.

There he was, deep in conversation with Gladys.

"It cannot be helped," Gladys was saying, as Baby came up. "You know it must come to an end. We cannot meet you again."

"I know," the lad replied. "It was a liberty to write to you, but—to see you once more—to say 'Good-bye'—I could not help it."

"Gladys, go. Rex is here; and father," broke in Baby. "Go at once."

Gladys gave one startled glance round, and vanished. Baby held out her trembling little hands to Fleming.

"You are not angry?" she said, in a breathless whisper. "We are not ungrateful. It was kind of you to bring us books; it has been very pleasant. But it was foolish of us to meet you. We meant no harm, but it was foolish, and so—it must come to an end. You understand?"

"I understand," answered the boy, taking the two little hands, and looking sadly into the frightened face upraised to his. "I never hoped—anything. But I loved her. I am grateful for her kindness and for yours." He bent his head, and kissed the hands he still held. "My undying love to Miss Gladys," he added, and was gone like a flash.

At the same instant, Baby heard someone breaking through the bushes, and before she had time to escape, Colonel Norman and Rex Thornecliffe were beside her.

"It's Baby. It's my daughter," shouted the Colonel, catching the girl's arm and shaking her violently. "And who was that fellow? Speak out, child. Who was that man? And what were you doing with him at this hour?"

Baby stood motionless and speechless. Her silence enraged her father still more, and her face of ghastly terror convinced him there was something very far wrong indeed. She was hardly conscious. She saw Rex Thornecliffe's shocked and reproachful face, and felt vaguely thankful that Gladys had escaped. Better that she should be thought the sole culprit. The whole story was harmless enough, but it would be so difficult to explain. She knew her father's rigid notions, too, and concluded that Rex shared them. They would think such conduct unladylike, unwomanly. Perhaps Rex, who was looking at her in such a horrified way, might break off his engagement, and that would break Gladys' heart.

"Are you imbecile, girl?" asked her father, with a shake that might have scattered any brains she chanced to possess. "Answer me; who is that man?"

"Be gentle with her," interposed Rex. "Take her home, and she will explain. There is some mistake."

The Colonel pulled his daughter along to the house. Baby made an effort to free her arm and escape upstairs as they entered, but her father held her firmly, and led her into the drawing-room. All looked up in amazement.

"I discovered this girl in a tender interview with a young man," announced Colonel Norman, "and she refuses to tell who he is, or to explain in any way. Nell, do you know anything of this?"

"Nothing," returned Nellie, looking horrified.

"Gladys, you know nothing, I am sure," said the Colonel, in a gentler voice. Gladys was as white as her dress, and made a vain effort to speak. "No, no, of course you don't," her father went on. "It's entirely Baby's wickedness, I can see. Now, Baby, you are very young, and I am willing to believe that you have only been giddy and silly, and did not know how wrongly you have acted. Give me the name of the man you met this evening, and tell me how it came about, and how you made his acquaintance unknown to your sisters."

Baby wrung her hands, in mortal anguish, but she never spoke.

"You will not speak," continued her father, in a tone of quiet determination. "You will not confess. Well, then, I will not keep you in my house. You shall go to a strict boarding-school, where your folly will be checked, and you will not re-enter my house till you are ready with a full confession."

Gladys started up.

"Father," she began, but Baby threw herself on her sister's neck, and clasped her close.

"No, Gladys, no," she said, in a hoarse whisper, "don't speak; let me go to school. If you speak, if you say he came to meet you, I shall die." And Gladys kept silence.

Digitized by Google

"Letters from home, Gladys," said Rex, stopping out on the balcony where his wife sat, looking down on the foreign scenes below with interest quite unabated although they had now been many months abroad. "Only one for you, though." He handed her a letter, and began to read his own, leaning carelessly against the railing, and softly whistling to himself.

Gladys let the letter lie unopened on her lap. She seldom heard from home. Her father never wrote; Nell, now Mrs. Harvey, had little time for correspondence; and the rules of the boarding-school to which poor Baby had been consigned permitted no letter-writing.

"Any news, Rex?" she asked, after a pause.

"Well, my father thinks we have been long enough away. So, if you like, we might turn homewards now."

"Yes, I think we might."

"Any news from home?" asked Rex, in his turn. "Why you haven't opened your letter yet."

"It's from Nell, and there can't be any news," replied Gladys, breaking open the letter as she spoke. "Nell never has anything to write about."

But as she read her face grew very pale, and she uttered an exclamation of dismay. "Baby, poor darling Baby," she gasped.

"Baby? What of her?" exclaimed Rex. "Poor little woman; is she ill?"

"Very ill. The principal of the school wrote to Nellie, as father is abroad, and Nell had her sent to the Rectory. She has broken a blood-vessel, and is in great danger. Oh, Rex, let me go to her."

"Of course, darling," replied her husband. "We'll be off at once. Poor Baby! poor little thing! her father was too hard on her for a piece of childish folly."

Two days later they reached the Rectory.

"How is she?" cried Gladys, as Nellie met them at the door.

"Just alive," was the answer. "Come and get your things off, and have dinner, and then you shall see her. She's asleep just now."

"You don't mean there's no hope," said Rex. "I can't believe it. Such a bright merry little thing as she was, so full of life and strength."

"She hasn't much strength left now, poor darling," answered Nell, sighing heavily.

"If she dies," said Gladys, in a low, unnatural voice, "she's been murdered. She was always used to such freedom, such love, such indulgence, and that horrid school with its restrictions and confinement has killed her."

As if the knowledge that her beloved sister was near had reached the sick girl in some mysterious way even in her sleep, the nurse came at this moment to tell Gladys that Baby was awake and wanted her.

Gladys was awe-struck at the change in her young sister. The dimpled, rosy face was white and drawn, the blue eyes looked twice as large as before, and the light and laughter had died out of them. Baby languidly held out a skeleton little hand, and a momentary smile parted her pale lips.

"I'm glad to see you, Gladys," she said, simply.

Gladys kissed her with quivering lips, but could not speak.

"Sit down beside me. Let me look at you! Gladys! Gladys!"

The fond utterance of her name overcame Gladys. She laid her head on the pillow and sobbed as if her heart would break. Baby touched the fair hair lovingly.

"Don't cry, dear. You must be happy always, my Gladys. Gladys Thorncliffe."

Something in her tone struck Gladys. She raised her head quickly, and looked at her sister.

"Baby, you loved him. You loved Rex." The words escaped her involuntarily, and no sooner had she uttered them than she would have given worlds to recall them, but they did not agitate Baby. The faintest pink flush came in her cheeks, and died away, but the blue eyes looked calmly back at Gladys.

"I don't know," she said quietly. "Yes, I think I did. But I love you, Gladys, and it was for your sake I would not speak last summer. For Gladys' sake; for Gladys' sake."

"And it has killed you. My cowardice has killed you. Oh, why did I not speak out?"

"You mustn't say that," whispered Baby. "I'm glad it is all as it is."

"You were only a child," went on Gladys, "and I was responsible for what wrong-doing there was. It was all harmless enough, but I was frightened, and left you to be the scapegoat. Baby, I will take my share of the blame now. I will tell Rex, and——"

"No, you must not," broke in Baby. "If you love me, you will not. I am quite happy now, but if you tell, I can't die in peace. Promise you won't tell, Gladys, now or at any other time." She raised herself, her cheeks burning with excitement, her eyes wild. "Promise me. Don't you see you are killing me? Promise; promise."

Terrified by her sister's appearance, Gladys gave the required promise, and Baby sank back exhausted. There was a short silence, only broken by the sick girl's hurried breathing.

"Thank you," said Baby, at last. "I'm rather tired now, Gladys, but I'd like to see Rex just for a minute, and then I'll rest."

Gladys fondly kissed her, and went to find Rex, and send him to the sick room with a warning not to stay longer than five minutes. Baby welcomed him with a pretty smile, and a flush on the hollow cheeks.

"You don't look as ill as I expected," began Rex, cheerily, taking the little hand in his, and looking kindly down at her. "You're thin and pale, of course, but that's the confinement of school life. Poor Baby! but you were a naughty little girl to be so obstinate, weren't you, now."

The flush had faded, and her pallor and exhaustion would have alarmed anyone as densely ignorant about illness as Rex.

"It was a childish freak, wasn't it?" he went on, changing his tone. "I mean, your meeting that fellow last summer. You don't know how it has worried me. I know it was nothing but a child's innocent folly, still—it has worried me."

She murmured something of which he could only distinguish two words. "No harm."

"I believe that, little one," he faltered, "but why not have spoken out to your father? Why not explain it to your sisters, or—or—to me, Baby?"

The wide blue eyes looked calmly into his.

"I won't torment you now," he continued. "I am tiring you, and I promised not to stay long. I'll send nurse to you. But when you are well, you'll tell me all about it, won't you?"

She did not answer, but a look of anguish came into her face.

"You're in pain," he said. "I'll send nurse at once. But promise me, dear, that you'll tell me all about that fellow."

She suddenly raised herself in bed.

"Never," she answered solemnly, clasping her hands and looking upwards.

She sank back; the light in the blue eyes went out, and Baby lay dead, her secret untold for ever. But the angels know it.

V. Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

LOVE PROBLEM No. 4.

A Little Thing.

Should an Engaged Couple be Completely in Each Other's Confidence?

IT was only a little thing, but it was big enough to make two people very miserable.

The two people were Tom Halkett and Marjorie Page, and it began in this way:

Tom had come into the room quite unexpectedly and had found Marjorie with an open letter in her lap.

She had not heard him come in, and, just for fun, he had stolen up behind her and had looked over her shoulder, pretending to read her letter.

Now the moment Marjorie discovered Tom's presence, she pounced upon the letter, crumpled it hastily, and threw it into the fire.

"That wasn't nice of you," said Tom.

Marjorie turned very red.

"I didn't want you to see what was in the letter." Marjorie never prevaricated.

"So it would seem," returned Tom.

"Don't be angry," she pleaded.

"I'm not angry in the least," he replied, "only—sorry."

"Tom, I've hurt you!" cried Marjorie penitently. "Forgive me, dear; I didn't mean to."

"There's nothing to forgive," said Tom in a cold voice.

"Tom, I know what you're thinking," Marjorie went on hurriedly. "You think I don't trust you."

"What else am I to think?"

"Dear, you are wrong, quite wrong. That letter——"

"Please don't trouble to explain," interrupted Tom proudly. "I've no wish to force your confidence."

"Tom, dear, do let me speak."

"Your action just now spoke volumes. And, really, Madge, I've no curiosity whatever on the subject of that letter. Suppose we talk of something more interesting?"

"If you're going to look at me like that, Tom, I don't want to talk to you at all. One would think I'd committed a crime!"

Marjorie had her share of spirit.

"I'm sorry my looks annoy you so much," retorted Tom. "Perhaps you would like me to go away."

"Go, by all means!" cried Marjorie angrily, and Tom, hurt and puzzled, waited for no second bidding.

On second thoughts, perhaps it was not such a little thing after all.

It involved a lovers' principle hitherto cherished by both Tom and Marjorie—the principle that without perfect confidence there can be no true love.

Marjorie that day had shown, only too clearly, that there was something she wished to conceal from Tom.

It mattered little to Tom whether that something were great or small. It was the principle, he told himself, that mattered.

"The woman who doesn't trust the man she has promised to marry ought never to have given her promise."

They were Marjorie's own words.

Tom smiled bitterly as he recalled them now.

"By her own showing she doesn't really care for me," he thought, with a sinking heart.

For a whole week Tom brooded in solitude over the wretched little incident. He made no attempt to see Marjorie, and the seven days seemed like seven years.

By the end of the week his mind was made up. Marjorie had given no sign. He was persuaded she no longer loved him, and his duty lay clear before him. He would go to her and offer to release her from a bondage which must be intolerable to her.

Circumstances favoured his resolution. Marjorie was at home—and alone.

She came forward to meet him, eagerly, with outstretched hands and a happy smile on her face.

At the sight of his look she hesitated, then her hands fell to her side.

"I was just sitting down to write to you, Tom," she said timidly.

"Then I can save you the trouble," he returned, "unless you prefer to write what you have to say."

His tone chilled her, and for a moment pride struggled with the tenderer feelings in her heart.

Then, with a sudden impulsive movement, she placed her hands on his shoulder.

"Dick, you dear old boy, I want to explain," she whispered. "I can explain everything now. It's a secret no longer. That letter," she went on so hurriedly in her eagerness to be rid of her troublesome secret that the words almost tumbled over one another, "that letter was from Nellie Hastings—you remember Nellie, don't you—and in it she asked my advice about an awful thing she thought of doing, and she said she trusted to me not to breathe a syllable to anyone, and that I was the only living creature she had dared to tell. After that I couldn't let you see the letter, could I? You see, the secret wasn't mine, and it would have been a breach of confidence, wouldn't it?"

And Marjorie looked appealingly at Tom.

"Yes, darling, of course," he murmured contritely.

"Of course I wrote off at once to Nellie imploring her not to do it; I was bound to try to dissuade her, wasn't I? I couldn't bear the thought of her doing it."

"Doing what, dearest?"

"Why, running off with that dreadful Bob Harding. Didn't I tell you? That's what she's done."

"I'm beginning to understand," said Tom.

"She begged for my advice," Marjorie continued, "and then, when I gave it her, she didn't take the slightest notice, but married Bob all the same. I've just had another letter from her. They've run away together, and now they haven't got a farthing, and her father will never forgive her. Poor Nellie! Isn't it horrible? She says she's perfectly happy in spite of everything. Everybody knows about it now, but I couldn't tell you before because it wasn't my secret, was it?"

"No, sweetheart, you were quite right, and I was a fool. I ought to have remembered that some secrets have to be kept even from the people we love, because they don't belong to us."

"But I was to blame too. When I snatched away that letter—Tom, no wonder you felt hurt—I ought to have explained, but you were so proud and angry, and—and——"

"And then you began to feel proud and angry too," concluded Tom, and they both laughed at the recollection—which was a sure sign that they understood each other perfectly once more.

Grete Hahn.

Digitized by Google

THE LAST EVENING.

A Tragic Little Story of Two Hopeless Loves.

THE light was growing dim in the studio, but still the artist plied his brush with an appearance of absolute absorption and his model sat listlessly in the old oak chair, seemingly forgetful of her surroundings or occupation.

Then a faint tremor seemed to pass through the room, as if some tension had reached breaking point, and then the artist threw down his brush.

"It's no use," he said, "I can't go on."

She waited silently, and he added with abruptness, giving the key at once to his thoughts—

"You really are going to marry Peterson?"

"I really am," she replied, a little mockingly.

He strode to the fireplace, and stood a moment with his back half turned to her. The model did not stir, but there was a strained expression upon her mouth, and she kept her eyes fixed on the floor.

"I wish you would at least swear to me that you do not loathe him," he said, in a low, passionate voice.

"Swearing is inelegant," she replied, with that same tinge of mockery, "and it is ridiculous to discuss the subject any more."

"I want to save you from a loveless marriage," he answered, and his voice was a prayer.

"To plunge me into a penniless one?"

"Nita, you have no right to say that to me."

The girl bit her lip as if some inward strain were becoming too much for her, while the fire-light flickering into a fresh blaze lit up her loveliness; and the artist held his breath with passionate appreciation.

He came over and leant against the old chair, resting one hand on her shoulder.

"Nita, dear," he said tenderly, "you know that I am not trying to save you for myself. I have seen that that is useless. It is only you I am thinking about. You have had admiration always; but you know that no one has ever loved you as I have, or would do more to serve you."

Her lips contracted sharply, but she did not speak.

"You are so beautiful, Nita," he went on, "and there does not seem to be anyone to look after you properly; and now it appears that you have let yourself be persuaded that you will be happy with this man Peterson, just because he can give you everything that money can buy. It's such a pitiful tale. As if a girl like you could ever be happy without love."

"Who said I was doing it for happiness?"

There was an unusual tremor in her voice, for she had lost her composure a moment in the stress of feeling. Then she drew herself up sharply, as if with an effort regaining her self control.

"What is happiness?" she asked in a hard voice. "Something that one in a million finds. Why should I look to be that one? If I find a way to throttle the miserable, grinding cares of poverty, and have a little peace, isn't that something to be thankful for?"

"Not for you, Nita. It might be for some, but not for you."

She sank back in her chair, and forced the mocking light back to her eyes. "Of course if you will persist in making a goddess of me I can't help it, but in reality I am the most commonplace lump of clay imaginable. I even care about daily bread."

The artist watched her silently. He had known her long enough to see through the mask, if he could not make her take it off.

"I don't quite know why you persist in remaining the lump, as you call it, when you have every capability of becoming one of the Potter's noblest vessels."

"Oh, they often break so easily, and then it is such a pity. What happens to the lump does not matter, and it makes life so much simpler."

"And you think that is the best aim—to make life simple? Why not make it grand?"

"I leave that for those better constituted by Fate, or whatever power it is that tries to make something of the prevailing chaos. When you want a balloon to rise you don't tie it to a dead weight that will drag at it perpetually; if you did the balloon would only become a wreck in the end. I prefer to stay on the ground and not risk it."

"No, you don't," he said almost fiercely. "You know you would give anything to break your bonds and soar—soar—ah, to what heights you might reach!"

"Oh, no," lowering the mask again, "it's a great deal too much trouble for one thing, and such a long way to fall if you should slip afterwards. I'm going to remain an earthworm, and burrow down here for a good home, and all the other creature comforts, which is really being wise in my day and generation, if you could but see it." She strolled across the studio, and rested the tips of her fingers against the mantelpiece, and the toe of one small foot on the fender. "Edward John Peterson, Esq. is a most estimable man," she remarked, with veiled sarcasm, "and he is going to take entire charge of his mother-in-law."

"I suppose that is why you are doing it?" he said miserably.

She shrugged her shoulders and lifted her eye-brows carelessly.

"Have I not said he is a most estimable man?"

Walter Rosney did not reply, but leant his white face wearily against the chair's high back, gazing fixedly at the floor.

Nita turned to him, and a wave of tender compassion stole over her face. He looked so white and ill, the impulse to go to him and tend him as a sick child was almost too strong for her. But when he looked up every trace of it was gone, for she had remembered that she had to help him fight his battle, if she could, as well as fighting her own.

"Listen to me, Walter," she said, steadying her voice with a courage and determination that were heroic. "I suppose it often happens to people that they come to cross-roads in life, when they are obliged to take a new way, and turn their backs on what is gone, however much they wish to continue the same. That time has come for us, and we shall have to say 'Good-bye.' It is as hard for me as for you," her voice faltered, but she pressed on bravely, "but we may not stop to think about its hardness. Marriage is out of the question; you are very poor and very delicate, and I have an invalid mother to keep. It is simple enough; only too pitifully simple. I must marry a rich man, and we must say 'Good-bye,' that is all."

Digitized by Google

His face had grown ashen, she could not bear to look at it, conscious that a momentary weakness on her part might undo the little she had already achieved.

"Couldn't you have waited a little longer?" he asked at last; "perhaps something might turn up."

"Or Mr. Peterson might go!"—lightly; and then with a leisurely step she walked across to his canvas and looked critically at her own nearly finished picture, seeking to lessen a strain that was becoming too much for her by changing the subject and remarking, "It is your best."

"Yes," he answered simply, "I have felt as if I were painting it with my heart's blood."

She stood silent a moment with contracted brows, then turned to him with a gleam of passion in her eyes she could not control.

"Don't let him have it," she said, "not even if he offers you a thousand pounds."

A sudden mocking fiend seemed to possess the artist.

"Why not?" he asked. "Think how he would value it—his own beautiful wife!"

She turned very white, but with a great effort mastered herself, though a deep longing seized her to go to him and rest her head against his shoulder as she had done when she was happy a few months ago. She knew he must be suffering terribly to speak to her like that.

"I must be going," was what she said however. "Will you get my cloak?"

He fetched it silently, but as he helped her on with it, he again rested his hand on her shoulder.

"Is the wedding day fixed?" he asked.

"Not quite."

"Then will you come out to dinner just once more? I can get George and Alice to come with us."

She seemed to hesitate.

"Do," he pleaded. "Just once for the old times' sake." And she yielded. When he was alone he went and stood by his canvas and looked at it for a long time. "No, I will not sell you," he said gently. "I would rather starve, for you are all I shall have left soon of my life-dream."

In the murky streets Nita hurried along to the little dingy flat where she and her mother lived. She pulled her collar high about her face, and kept her eyes lowered, for her beauty was too striking to pass unobserved even in a dim light, and she was a girl who shrank from the rude stare of the men in the street. Her mother was waiting for her impatiently.

"Well, is the picture finished?" she asked.

"Practically," and Nita's voice was a little hard.

"Because," continued her mother, "I don't think it is right to Mr. Peterson for you to go and sit for that young man as you do. If I were well enough to come with you it would be different."

"There is nothing to be anxious about," and Nita sat down listlessly to their meagre repast.

"I'm not so sure," her mother replied. "He's only like all other young men, and he's sure to be in love with you, or else fancy he is. I'll be bound he's been talking nonsense to you this afternoon."

Nita bit her lip and looked a little dangerous, but her mother had never learnt tact in dealing with her, and probably never would.

"Has he been making love to you?" she asked, a little coarsely; "because if so I shall tell Mr. Peterson to forbid your going."

"You can tell Mr. Peterson what you like," haughtily; "but if he dares to say a word against any friend of mine there will be a scene, so I warn you. As for forbidding me to go to Walter Rosney's studio, let him try it!"

"Don't go in for heroics," retaliated her mother, in the peevish accent of the confirmed invalid, "even if you are in love with the boy."

Nita's eyes flashed then.

"How dare you!" she cried, "isn't it enough that I am marrying this—this—Peterson, to give you a good home and the things the doctor orders, without your taunting me with what it costs. I insist that you never mention Walter Rosney to me again. You never did him justice. You couldn't—he is out of your sphere altogether."

"That's right! run down your own mother. Oh, I know well enough what you mean; of course I am in the way, and everything is my fault. If it were not for me you would have me believe that you would marry this beggarly artist with one foot in the grave, and go in want all your life. If it were true I should have been thankful that I lived to prevent such folly but I don't believe it—I don't believe a word of it, so there. As if any girl would refuse such a chance for happiness as yours. The man is rich and kind and he dotes on you. In Heaven's name what more do you want?"

Nita's lips curled scornfully but she did not reply; she had long known the folly of attempting to reason with her mother.

"Anyhow, I hope you won't see this Rosney again now the picture is finished," the latter went on, "you have seen too much of him already."

"I went to save you from a loveless marriage," he answered.

Digitized by Google

"I am going out to dinner with him to-morrow evening."

"Nonsense," and Mrs. Crossley spoke angrily, "you could not be so foolish."

"Couldn't I?" in that low, mocking voice of hers, "wait till to-morrow and see."

* * * * *

Alice Turner demurred very much when her brother asked her to arrange the little dinner the following evening, but her husband took the artist's part and she was overruled.

"It is only needless pain for both of you," she said, "and as it is impossible for you to marry, it would be far wiser never to meet again."

"We never shall," Walter answered quietly, "after to-night."

Something in his face made his sister cross over to him and rest her hand affectionately on his shoulder. "They tell me Peterson is a good fellow," she said gently, "he will make a kind husband."

"He will not make her happy," the artist replied a little hoarsely, and left the room.

In the evening he met Nita as appointed and persuaded her to go round to his studio to see the completed picture.

"Is this to be our last meeting?" he asked quietly, as he stood before it in silence.

"Yes," she answered, and did not look up. Then —"Are you going to sell it?" she asked suddenly, and he replied, "I would rather die first."

She smiled a little crooked smile at that, and leaning forward pressed her lips impulsively against the wistful drooping mouth of the girl in the picture.

"Good-bye, Nita," she said softly, "you and I must never meet again either. You may love him always and be with him always, but I must forget." A momentary weakness seized her. "How I envy you," she breathed brokenly. "How I envy you, Nita, his friend."

The artist dropped heavily into a chair and hid his face with a groan.

"Good-bye, Nita," she said softly, kissing the picture, "you and I must never meet again. You may love him always, and be with him always, but I must forget."

There were a few moments' painful silence, then she said resolutely: "It is time we were going," and he could only rise and follow.

They had their little dinner-party at a quiet private hotel where they had been several times before, but London was very full just then, and many curious eyes gazed at the two beautiful women as they passed up the room.

At first they were very quiet, but presently, as if thought were unwelcome to all alike, a wave of gaiety broke over them, and lightness became the order of the hour. No one alluded to the occasion, they only talked on gaily, each vying with the other in brilliancy of conversation. It was like some fateful orgy, in which the partakers heralded with mocking delight, some terrible event of the morrow. A bright spot of colour burnt in the artist's thin cheeks, and his eyes shone unnaturally. "That young man will soon be a patient for some one," said a doctor to his companion, eyeing him professionally.

"Ah! don't say so," she cried. "Can't you see he worships the lovely girl beside him."

"He has no right to marry her if he does," was the seemingly heartless reply, but the doctor's eyes belied his tongue.

Long after the majority of diners had left the four lingered on, and still Walter Rosney talked and laughed, and Nita answered him mood for mood. Had they ever been so merry before? Surely not—and must it end?

No, no—the artist was still holding them all enthralled, pouring out his scant vitality recklessly, as he pitted himself against Time, in a mad effort to make it stand still for that one evening.

At last his sister rose with determination. She was getting a little frightened—there was something so unnatural about it all, and he was beginning to catch his breath as if from a sharp physical pain.

"We will go home for the rest of the evening," she said, "it is too late for a theatre now."

Her husband followed her lead, and called for two hansoms at once, in spite of his wife's unspoken protest.

"It is their last evening," he said as they followed together. "My God! it's making me feel I could cry like a child. How do they do it? It's awful! I'd rather see them looking broken-hearted —it wouldn't seem so horribly unreal."

The lovers reached the house a few minutes first, and stood waiting in the dimly lit library.

"You are glad you came to-night?" the artist asked, catching Nita's hand in both his with a passionate movement.

"Ah! it has been splendid!" he hurried on, without giving her time to speak, "if only it hadn't felt that we were fiddling, like Nero, while Christians burned, or hearts-broke, or something.

"But I have had the best of you, so I am more to be envied than he after all. You will never talk and look like that for him—my queen—my beautiful queen" —his voice broke a little—"and I have seen the lovelight too—my God! he will never see that—Nita, Nita swear he will never see that——"

He was getting over-excited, and seeing it, she sought hastily to calm him, speaking to him in a gentle soothing voice. Then the others joined them, and they all went upstairs to the drawing-room.

"What shall we do?" his sister said. "Shall we have a little music? What shall I sing, Walter?"

She turned to him, and almost immediately uttered a frightened exclamation: "What is it, dear?" she cried; "Aren't you well?"

He tried to smile, but his pallid face only grew distorted with pain, and he swayed a little.

"I—I—it's all over," he finished with a groan, "but thank God, we had to-night"—and as Nita rushed towards him, he fell heavily in her arms.

* * * * *

"Angina pectoris," was the doctor's verdict, "and he must have been suffering from it for some time." Nita wondered if he had known—only it mattered so little now—nothing mattered. All night she had sat by his bedside with his weeping sister, only no tears had come to help her anguish, and when all was over she was still tearless.

Digitized by Google

There had been no touching farewell—no improving death bed scene—these things are rare enough in real life. The night had been passed in a sharp succession of heart spasms, which wrung the hearts of the anxious watchers almost past endurance, by their cruel pain. Once or twice he had seemed to watch Nita with conscious eyes, but almost immediately a spasm had blotted out all recollection of aught but the pain.

But as he grew worse she at last gathered him in her arms, and supported his head on her breast to ease his laboured breathing, and then once the faintest semblance of a smile, and a little sigh of content told her that he understood.

But when the grey morning looked into the darkened chamber, the artist was dead.

Later on a woman came alone and stood beside the silent form for a long time—and even in her pallor she was as beautiful as the sunlight.

"Good-bye," she said softly at last. "Good-bye my One Love. It is better that you should lie peacefully there, than have lived to bear the inevitable suffering. For me!—I am strong—and a woman has a heart better tuned to suffering than a man.

"Yet I feel that I too am dead, and, indeed, I think your Nita truly died last night with you. To-day she is someone else with a burden of years that must be lived through with another—but your Nita is yours for ever. Thank God the last evening of our lives was spent together—it matters so little what comes now."

Gertrude Page.

Robin: "I always kiss my wife when I leave the house in the morning." Dobbin: "I've heard that some men will do almost anything as an excuse to get away from home."

Mr. Hornbill: "Do you know, darling, I could pick you out of a crowd of women just by your style." Mrs. Hornbill: "I don't wonder, and me with this same old dress for the last two years."

He: "What proof have I that you really love me?" She: "Proof! Did I not dance with you at the county ball?" "Yes, but I don't consider that any proof of affection." "You would if you knew how badly you dance."

Mrs. Neurich: "How's my son gettin' along with his lessons?" Private Tutor: "Very nicely, madam, although it is rather difficult for him to catch an idea at times." Mrs. Neurich: "Well, I'll have you to know he don't have to catch 'em. We can afford to buy him all the ideas he needs."

Mrs. Peterby was busy cutting her husband's hair. Their little son Johnny picked up some that was scattered over the floor. "Please, ma, mayn't I have a lock of papa's hair? I want it so badly." "Yes, my child. Just see, George, what an affectionate little fellow he is. That child has more heart than any child of his age I ever saw. He wants to have a lock of your hair as a keepsake." "What do you want it for?" asked Mr. Peterby. "I want to tie it to the tail of my horse; his hair is too thin," replied the affectionate little creature.

£50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

A reader of Short Stories won a prize of £10 in 1894 and with the help of this money emigrated to America making a fortune out of the cycle boom of 1897 and 1898. He recently wrote a letter, under the nom-de-plume of "Dayton," to the Editor of Short Stories, inclosing dollar bills to the value of £50, and asking that this money may be offered as prizes in five sums of £10 each.

The Editor has given the matter very careful consideration, and has arrived at the conclusion that, as his anonymous correspondent was in great want when he won his prize, the most satisfactory manner of distributing his gifts of £50 would be to offer them to those who can give the best reasons for receiving them.

You may be wanting to emigrate to one of our Colonies. You may want £10 to buy something you have needed for a long time. You may want to clear off some small debts that have been worrying you. Or you may want to trade with the £10 and, like "Dayton," turn it into a fortune.

Whatever your reason for wanting it may be, write it down in the space below, and send it to "The Competition Editor of Short Stories," Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Dayton 3," by Tuesday, January 13th.

Readers may send as many reasons as they like, provided each is written on a separate coupon. Another coupon will appear next week. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors may enter only on this understanding.

CUT OFF THE COUPON HERE.

THIRD COUPON.

My reason for wanting £10 is.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

Name..... Address.....

Digitized by Google

A GIRL WHO LOVED AND SAID SO.

Which Brought Both Her and Him Happiness.

THE girl stood in the centre of the room, a scintillating figure in the midst of a blaze of light. Her dress glistened and clung, half-hiding, half-revealing the lines of her graceful figure, and trailed in billowy masses about her feet. Her dark hair with its copper and golden glints fell in a loose wave over her forehead, and was gathered into a seemingly careless knot at the nape of her neck.

In reality, there was nothing careless about that or any other part of Beth's costume. She had dressed with great care that night; in fact, she always did if she expected to see Bob, though her heart cried out bitterly at the uselessness of it.

"Why do I try to please him?" she asked herself again and again. "He will never care for me, never. I have cut myself off from any chance I may have had of making him care by my own act."

For Beth had done a thing which, aside from all ethical considerations, is extremely foolish in any girl who wishes to gain a man's highest regard. She had allowed Bob to kiss her. How it came about she never quite understood herself. Other men who had presumed to attempt to gain a like favour had met with crushing defeat—had inspired in her nothing but the utmost disgust and dislike.

If an unprejudiced observer had witnessed the incident he would doubtless have pronounced it the result of strong mutual physical attraction, stimulated by propitious time and place. One night, after they had been dancing together, they strolled out into the garden, where streaks of moonlight and gloom alternated. When Bob spoke there was a tremor in his voice; Beth's pulses pounded in unruly fashion. The spark to kindle the smouldering fire was not long in coming. As they neared the border of a shadowed spot Beth's wrap slipped from her shoulders.

They both reached to replace it and their hands met as they entered the shadow. The next instant she was clasped in his arms, his lips were upon hers.

When Beth wrenched herself free she started quickly away from him, only to pause when she gained the moonlight's brilliant protection and turn upon him wide, serious eyes.

"I ought to be very angry," she declared unsteadily; "and, of course, you think that I am. But I'm not so, I have no right to let you believe that I am." Beth had a way of being brutally frank with herself, and possessed a fanatical sense of justice.

"It's my fault as much as yours, anyway," she continued. "I should have known better than to come out here with you; signs and tokens should have warned me that it was playing with fire. Perhaps, to a certain extent, they did, but I——"

"Beth, I'm a brute—I'm so sorry. Forgive me," he pleaded.

"The 'brute' gets the whip hand of most of us sometimes, I think," she replied quickly; "but this must not happen again, Bob. We're such awfully good friends, you know"—and her voice faltered as she gulped back the sob which was rising in her throat.

For poor Beth had assumed some of this frankness to hide her hurt. Bob must not know how she had been dreaming dreams, how she wrongly interpreted the "signs and tokens," believing that they indicated his love for her, how his sudden passionate kiss had opened her eyes to her mistake. Bob was only her friend, though he did not regard her dispassionately.

"You're a little brick, Beth," Bob assured her; "the idea of you blaming yourself. It's every bit of it my fault, and it's awfully good of you to give me another chance. You can count me more your friend than ever."

They both honestly meant to maintain the standard, but, the boundary once crossed, it is difficult to return to a platonic basis, so it occasionally happened that they strayed from the beaten track.

Sometimes Beth reproached herself bitterly, and vowed that he should never touch her again. At other times she was defiant with herself.

"Somebody will take him from me entirely some day," she argued, "I might as well take my poor little half a loaf while it's within my reach. I'm not hurting anyone except myself—he'd kiss someone else if he didn't kiss me. I shall never marry, so, after all, my kisses are my own to do with as I please."

This evening when Bob arrived she greeted him with the frank familiarity which generally characterised her manner towards him. He looked very, very handsome, so tall and strong, and straight, and her ache tugged so persistently at her heart-strings that she knew she must stay away from him, so, when they arrived at their destination, she flirted desperately with his chum.

It was a weary task at best, and when, towards the end of the evening, Bob led her away to a quiet room where they were quite alone, she was glad enough to rest upon a friendly cushioned couch, even though she felt instinctively that Bob was in what she mentally termed "one of his sentimental moods."

It came, just as she knew that it would. He put his arm around her and she made no effort to resist him.

"What makes you such a witch, Beth?" he questioned as he drew her towards him. "Now you've gone and got poor old Fred in the toils. I was sure you two——"

"Can't you ever talk of anything but 'Fred'?" Beth broke in impatiently. "Before I met him you were always saying 'how much I should like him,' and 'how nice he was,' and now, because he is passably civil——"

"'Passably civil,'" echoed Bob, "why he simply monopolises you—cuts me out entirely."

"That's your own look-out," Beth answered with an attempt at flippancy. Somehow his talk of Fred had got on her nerves to-night, and, as he kissed her, he felt that she was trembling.

"What's the matter, Beth?" he asked.

"Oh, nothing—nothing at all," she said hastily, trying to draw away from him. He held her close. "Let's go back to the others," she added; then, with a dreary little laugh: "Fred can cut you out some more." Suddenly she turned and flung her arms round Bob's neck.

"Only he can't!" she said fiercely; "no one ever could and you can't see—you don't know—you never will," she confided to the shoulder of his coat.

"Beth, darling——"

"Don't you dare say that to me—you don't mean it and I hate you," she flashed at him hysterically, jumping to her feet. "What a fool I am—what am I talking about—no, no—

Digitized by Google

don't speak to me," and she pressed her fingers over his mouth. Her other hand he had caught again and now she raised his and laid her cheek against it. "I love you, I love you," she wailed; "oh, Bob, I know it's dreadful, but I had to say it just once"—and before he could recover from his astonishment she fled wildly across the room.

"Don't ever speak to me again!" she flung at him from the threshold.

"Beth!" he cried, but she was gone.

In the hall she met Fred.

"I'm so tired," she said, "please take me home."

"But where's Bob?" he questioned wonderingly.

"Oh, never mind Bob," she said miserably. "Please take me—and hurry, do."

Seeing that something was wrong with her he obeyed, marvelling greatly.

Beth sank limply into the corner of the carriage with closed eyes and utterly oblivious of the silent man in the opposite corner. She was quite unstrung, her brain was in a whirl. Why had she lost her self-control in that utterly dreadful way? Why had she that night spoken the words that had fought so often for utterance only to be resolutely choked back? Bob despised her, of course. She would never see him again—but suppose she should meet him. She must not; she would go away—she—— She formed a sudden resolution.

"Fred," she said, in a hard, level voice, "I will marry you if you still want me."

A moment's silence, then a man's hand sought hers.

"That's very nice for Fred," spoke a voice from the gloomy corner, "but what about me, Beth?"

"Bob!" she gasped, "oh, Bob, how could you?"

"How could I do anything else?" he questioned very tenderly. "When I saw that Fred was coming with you I threatened all things terrible if he would not let me take his place."

"I wanted never to see you again," she said gravely.

"As we are going to spend the rest of our lives together you're not likely to get that wish, sweetheart. But anything else——"

"Oh, don't, don't," she cried. She was sobbing in his arms now. "Just because you are sorry for me—that is worse than anything."

"I'm sorry that the man you love, and who loves you, oh, so much, is not a better fellow; sorry that you have hidden your love so successfully under the guise of friendship that I was sure I did not have any show at all. Didn't you know that I loved you, dear?"

"There was a time when I thought you did—before that night. But after that——"

"That night, I meant to tell you—to ask you to be my wife. And when you were in my arms I was too happy to speak—I thought you understood and that just then there was no need for words between us. But when you spoke you pulled down all my beautiful castles for you said 'we were such good friends.' You were so gentle with me, I thought, because you did understand that I cared and wanted to show me that you did not."

"I did not want my 'friend' to guess that I had ever thought he might be——"

"Your sweetheart," Bob said. "Always your sweetheart."

And within the carriage, as it rolled quietly through the streets there was the silence of a perfect understanding.

Winifred Alan.

Result of the "Albert Gate Acrostic" Competition.

The Gramophone prizes in the above competition have been awarded as follows:

R. Murdoch, 24a St. Vincent Crescent, Glasgow; W. J. Block, 5 Halidou Street. Erswick Road, Hackney, N.; G. Stevens, 1 Eton Villas, Queen's Road, Cheltenham; F. W. Child, 16 Spilman Street, Carmarthen; F. W. Hook, Commercial Street, Cinderford, Glos.; W. Hastings, 1 Dufferin Terrace, Deal; C. W. Conolly, 43 Nicholas Street, Chester; E. Wilson, 2 Orchard Villas, London Road, Ashford, Middlesex; J. Sewell, The Lund, Lamplugh, Cockermouth; Miss Rita Louise MacLean, 32 South Street, Greenock.

Your Editor Chats.

I would like to call your attention particularly this week to one little story which you will find on page 48 of this number.

It is called "The Last Evening," and is one of those little gems, which when discovered amongst the hundreds of stories, good, bad, and indifferent, which pour into the editorial office of this little paper week by week, make your Editor go home with a happy smile and a contented mind. I really think it is the most powerful little love story of its kind which I ever had the pleasure of presenting to my readers.

The almost endless toil of reading through score after score of tales is amply recompensed by such a reward of labour.

It is with great gratification that I notice the readiness with which readers are hastening to place their confidence in the powers of Miss Cynthia Hamilton for the solution of their love troubles.

All of you who have been readers for the past few months are acquainted with Miss Hamilton's life story, particularly the latter chapters, and I can assure you that she is extremely pleased at the eagerness with which her services are being accepted, and takes a genuine interest in the love tangles brought under her notice.

Next week's cover, I may mention, is a particularly striking one. It illustrates an extremely powerful story in which a wife finds herself forced to leave her happy home and devoted husband, at a moment's notice, without giving those she loves most and best the slightest explanation of her flight or the faintest clue to her whereabouts. I am sure you will like it.

A PRIZE OF £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering the above prize in a simple competition that starts in his paper, published on Friday, January 23rd. The following extract from his Editorial Notice will be interesting to readers:

"It is difficult for one to realise at once exactly what so magnificent an income really means. Men and women have toiled from youth to old age and have never made an income so big as £5 a week. Hundreds of thousands of men and women are to-day earning little more than a fifth of this sum. Their life is one long struggle, without pleasure, without hope.

"It is impossible for us to give a helping hand to every one of these people. It is impossible for us to place them in a position of independence and happiness for the rest of their lives, and we don't contemplate attempting so enormous a task. But it is happily within our reach to benefit at least one such person, and, with this end in view, we make this offer of £5 a Week for Life to the person who shall justify his claim to it under the conditions of the competition which will be announced shortly."

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Saved by the Cheque Book.

He: "My dear, the bank in which my money is deposited has failed." She: "What a mercy you've got your cheque book at home, love!"

Her One Error in Speech.

Mrs. Chatterbox: "Did you ever make any errors in speech?" Mrs. Wordsworth: "Yes; I made one a few years ago." Mrs. Chatterbox: "What was it?" Mrs. Wordsworth: "I said, 'Yes!'"

How She was Pacified.

Mistress: "Did anyone call while I was out?" New Girl: "Yes, mum; Mrs. Wayup called." "Did she seem disappointed when you said I was not at home?" "Well, she did look a bit queer, but I told her she needn't get in a temper about it, 'cause it was really true this time."

Probably!

Young Wife: "I want to buy a hat for my husband." Hatter: "What size does he wear?" Young Wife: "I declare I forgot to find out! I know the size of the collars he wears, though. It's fifteen. He'd want about size eighteen or twenty for a hat, wouldn't he?"

A Gentle Hint.

Mrs. Hyflye: "George, dear, while you are having money troubles, I ought to tell you that I learnt to-day why your rival Soapem's credit has suddenly become so good." Mr. Hyflye: "Why?" Mrs. Hyflye: "I overheard someone remark that Soapem's finances must be all right because his wife was wearing such elegant new hats and dresses."

John's Fatal Mistake.

She never knew he was only a waiter, for he had basely told her that he was a gentleman of independent means. One hot day they were sitting in Hyde Park. He felt very drowsy; she felt very loving. "John," she whispered, "do you love me?" "Eh? What?" opening his eyes; "love you, of course I do, darling," and again his eyes closed. "How much?" she asked, and he dreamily said: "Roas' beef, shilling, sir; taters, tuppence; cabbage, penny, sir; bread, penny; half-stout, tuppence; one an' six, please, sir."

Mighty Improvin'.

Parson: "Well, Molly, did you like my sermon this morning?" Molly: "Oh, yis, your rivrence, 'twas mighty improvin'." Parson: "And what part of it did you like best, Molly?" Molly: "In troth, plaze your rivrence, I don't remember any part exactly, but altogether it was mighty improvin'." Parson: "Now, Molly, if you don't remember it, how could it be improving?" Molly: "Now, does your rivrence see that linin I have been washin' and dhryin' on that hedge there?" Parson: "Certainly, Molly." Molly: "And isn't the linin all the better for the clanin'?" Parson: "No doubt, Molly." Molly: "But not a dhrop of the soap and wather stays in it. Well, sir, it's the same thing wid me. Not a word of the sarmint stays in me. But I am all the better and claner for it, for all that."

Quite Impossible.

Papa: "Young man, you want to marry my daughter, and yet you will not give me a list of your friends for reference." Dunstan: "Not much. They were all after the same girl."

Heard at the Holborn.

Guest: "What have you got?" Waiter: "I've got liver, calf's brains, pig's feet——" Guest: "I don't want a description of your physical peculiarities. What you have got to eat is what I want to know."

Preferred Variety in Kisses.

Mr. Bronston: "Where are the sweets, my dear?" Mrs. Bronston: "The pastrycook has left. You'll have to be satisfied with kisses for sweets to-day." Mr. Bronston: "All right. Bring in your French maid."

Looking for a Peer.

There is a charming story being told of a proud American mamma in London. She was speaking of her daughter, and said she was a "peerless beauty." "But she won't be long," she added, after a moment's pause, "if I can help it."

Willing to Oblige.

Master: "What! both want a holiday to-morrow? I can't spare you Both at once; Mary, you can have to-morrow, and John the next day." John: "Thank you, sir, but we wanted to get married, and I'm afraid, sir, it can't be done that way, but I'll inquire."

Wasted Violence.

Mrs. Spratt (vigorously shaking her sleeping spouse): "John, John! There's a burglar in the house!" Mr. Spratt (protesting): "Look here, Jane, if, instead of shaking the life out of me, you'd go and shake that burglar, you'd be doing some good."

She Knew Her Husband.

Mother: "Is your letter to your husband ready to post?" Married Daughter: "It's all done excepting the postcript telling him to send me some more money. I'm looking for another sheet of paper." Mother: "Write it across the lines. Married Daughter (promptly): "No, indeed. He'll pretend he couldn't read it."

Extremely Awkward.

Mrs. Wearie: "This is the last time I'll have a girl who can't speak English." Husband: "Why don't you send her off?" Mrs. Wearie: "I've been trying to for six weeks, but I can't make her understand what the word 'discharge' means. She thinks it means a day off, and when I tell her she's discharged, she goes out and has a good time."

That Naughty Little Girl.

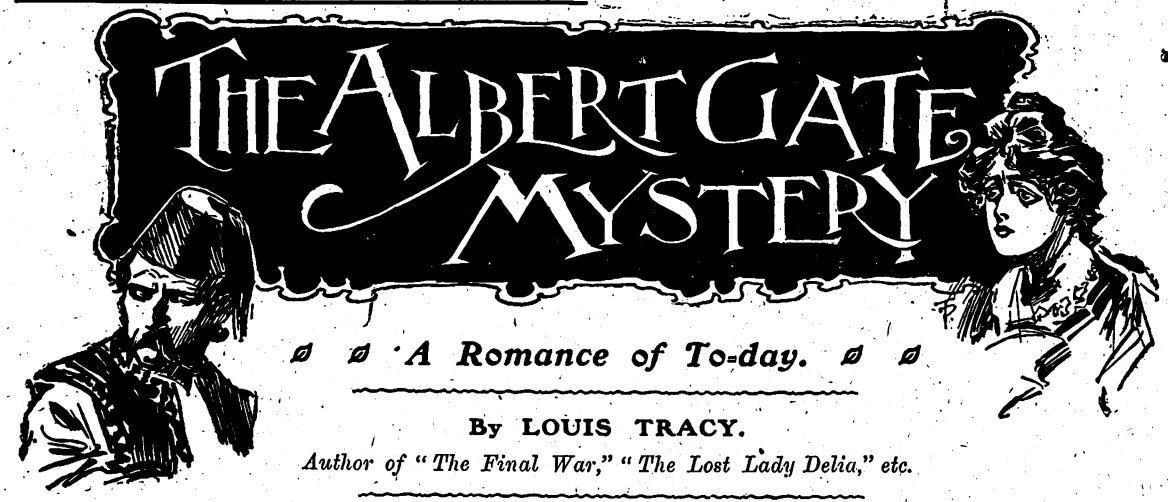
She is homely, she is tricky; And, I am greatly grieved to tell, Her hands are always sticky With a chocolate caramel. Her dolly's battered features Speak of many a frantic hurl. She's the terror of her teachers—That naughty little girl. She dotes upon bananas, And she smears them on my knees; She peppers my havannas; And delights to hear me sneeze. Yet—why I can't discover—Spite of every tangled curl, She's a darling, and I love her, That naughty little girl!

Times Have Altered.

"Yes, indeed," said the old man, thoughtfully, after his wife had delivered a dissertation upon the progress of the sex, "the up-to-date woman is vastly different from the old." "I thought you would realise that in time," she returned, rather sharply. "I have just been reading," he went on, "how girls used to be sold by their parents, and some of them brought fancy prices." "But there is none of that now," exclaimed the up-to-date woman, proudly. "Woman has asserted herself, and——" "No, there's none of that now," interrupted the old man. "That's all passed. A man does not buy a wife in these days." "I should think not." "Certainly not. It's all changed, all changed. Now he has to be paid to take her, and her poor old father has to wreck his bank account to provide the dowry. Yes, I admit that the new woman, Maria——" Then the door was slammed and she was gone.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.



A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Mr. Brett's Quest.

A NUMBER of priceless diamonds having been most mysteriously stolen from an Albert Gate Mansion, and four of the custodians of the jewels murdered, Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, in conjunction with the police, is called upon to help clear up the mystery.

The diamonds, it appears, were sent over by the Sultan of Turkey in charge of a number of Turkish officials, and, being of political importance, the mission was placed by the British Government in the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, of the Foreign Office. Upon the night of the robbery and murder, Mr. Talbot disappears.

The Earl of Fairholme, being engaged to be married to Talbot's sister, intrusts Brett with the finding of Talbot.

Brett's first clue is the statement of Mr. Winter, a Scotland Yard detective, that Mr. Talbot and a lady have been seen in Paris, Talbot having signed his name in a hotel register. Brett goes to Paris to see if the signature is genuine.

On his way he falls in with Captain Gaultier, a King's messenger, from whom he learns that Hussein ul Mulk, the Sultan of Turkey's nephew, who had fled from Turkey, is in Paris. Gaultier promises Brett an introduction. Meanwhile Brett has discovered that the signature in the hotel register is not in Talbot's handwriting.

He suspects Hussein of having caused the diamonds to be stolen, and with a view to eliciting information regarding Talbot's whereabouts, in company of Gaultier, pays a visit to the Turk.

This Week's Instalment.

"AH!" he said, "my dear Gaultier, I am so pleased to see you. I did not know you were in Paris. I have been spending an idle moment over cigars and scandal." He spoke excellent French, and appeared to be quite at his ease, but Brett noticed that Hussein ul Mulk had held the discarded newspaper upside down. He was smoking a cigarette, lighted the instant before their appearance, and notwithstanding his Oriental phlegm he seemed to be labouring under intense excitement.

But Hussein ul Mulk could evidently control his nerves.

"Have you had déjeuner, or have you time to join me in a cigarette?" he went on.

"We will be delighted," said Gaultier, taking the proffered case. "The fact is, I only heard of your presence in Paris by accident, and I mentioned the fact to my friend here, who has interested himself in the Armenian cause in London. He at once expressed a keen desire to make your acquaintance, so I ventured to bring him round and introduce him to you. This is Mr. Reginald Brett, an English barrister, and one who keenly sympathises with the reform movement in Turkey."

"I am delighted to know you, Mr. Brett," said the suave Oriental. "It is naturally a great pleasure to me to make the acquaintance of any influential Englishman who has given sufficient thought to Eastern affairs to understand the way in which my country suffers from a barbarous and unenlightened rule."

He delivered himself of the foregoing with the glibness of a born agitator, yet all the while he was inwardly wondering what could be the true motive of the visit paid him by this distinguished-looking stranger, and Brett was silently resolving to startle Hussein ul Mulk out of his complacency at the earliest possible moment.

"It is an even greater pleasure to me," he said, "to find myself talking to a reformer so distinguished as you. Your name is well known in Europe. Indeed, in some quarters it has come to be feared, which in this world is one of the signs of success."

Hussein ul Mulk was puzzled, but he remained outwardly unperturbed.

"I was not aware," he said, "that my poor services to my country were so appreciated by my English friends."

"Ah," said Brett, with a smile that conveyed much, "the achievements of a man like you cannot long remain hidden. I have good reason to know that at the present moment they are earnestly attracting the attention of the Foreign Office."

Hussein ul Mulk became even more puzzled, and, indeed, exhibited some slight tokens of alarm lest Brett's vehement admiration should reach the ears of others in the adjoining room.

"Really," he said, "you flatter me. Will you not try these cigarettes? They are the best; they are made from tobacco grown specially for the Sultan's household, and it is death to export them. I understand that the cigarette habit has grown very much of recent years in England?"

"Yes," said Brett, "it certainly has developed with amazing rapidity. In trade as in politics this is an age of astounding achievements."

Gaultier knew that there was more behind the apparent exchange of compliments than appeared on the surface. Having fulfilled his pledge, he said hurriedly, "Both of you gentlemen will understand that I cannot very well take part in a political discussion. With your permission, Hussein, I will now leave my friend with you for a half-hour's chat, as I have an appointment at the Café Riche."

Digitized by Google

Although Hussein was profoundly disconcerted by Brett's manner no less than his utterances, he could not well refuse to accord him a further audience, so Gaultier quitted the apartment and the Englishman and Mussulman were left face to face.

A Telegram from Paris.

BRETT felt that he was called upon to play a bold game. Under some circumstances he knew that to throw away the scabbard, and dash with naked sword into the fray, was the right policy.

"I came to see you, Hussein ul Mulk," he said, speaking deliberately, "not only because I have an interest in the progressive policy voiced by the young Turkish party, but on account of matters which are of a personal interest to you, and to friends of mine in England."

The Turk bowed silent recognition of the barrister's motives.

"You are aware," said Brett, "that a large number of valuable diamonds were stolen from the special envoy of His Majesty the Sultan, in London, last Tuesday night, and that the theft was accompanied by the murder of four of the Sultan's subjects and the abduction of a prominent official in the British Foreign Office?"

It is difficult for an olive-skinned man to turn pale, but Hussein ul Mulk did the next most effective thing for one of his race. His face assumed a dirty green shade, and his full red lips whitened.

For some few seconds he strove hard to regain his composure and frame a reply, but Brett, nonchalantly puffing a cloud of smoke into the intervening space, and thus helping his hearer to control his emotions, went on:

"Pray do not trouble to deny full knowledge of the fact. It is far better for men of the world like you and me to discard subterfuge when engaged in grave and difficult negotiations. I do not propose wasting time by describing to you the details of a crime with which you are thoroughly acquainted. Let me say, in a sentence, that my chief, perhaps my only, motive in coming here to-day is to secure the release of my friend, Mr. Talbot, from the place where he is at present confined, and at the same time to obtain from you a statement which will satisfactorily clear Mr. Talbot in the eyes of his superiors of all personal complicity in the Albert Gate incident."

Again there was a breathless silence.

Hussein ul Mulk had regained his nerve. He was now considering how best he could dispose of this Englishman who knew so much. To purchase his silence was too hopeless. He must die as speedily and unostentatiously as possible. So he answered not, but thought hard as to ways and means.

Brett, in imminent danger of his life, disregarded all semblance of danger. He leant back in his chair, closed his eyes in complete enjoyment of Hussein's cigarettes, which were really excellent, and said, in the even, matter-of-fact tones of one who discusses an abstract problem:

"Of course, my dear friend, you are thinking that the best answer you can give me is to strangle me or to shoot me, or to adopt any other part of the drastic policy which finds favour in Constantinople. But let me point out to you that this will be a serious error of judgment. I have not come here without safeguarding my movements. You are aware that Captain Gaultier, a trusted Foreign Office Messenger, brought me here in person. Some members of the British Government, and several important officials of Scotland Yard, know that I am in your house and discussing this matter with you. If any accident were to interfere with my future movements, you would simply precipitate a crisis quite lamentable in its results to yourself, to your association, and to your cause. You will see, therefore, Hussein, that to kill me cannot really be thought of. A man of your penetration and undoubted sagacity must surely admit this at once, and we can then proceed to discuss matters in a friendly and pleasant manner."

At last Hussein found his tongue. "I have never met you before, Mr. Brett," he said, "but you interest me."

Brett smiled and bowed in acknowledgment of the compliment.

"Of course I admit nothing," went on the Mohammedan.

"Of course."

"Least of all do I admit that I contemplated any breach of hospitality towards yourself."

Brett waved his hand in deprecation of such a pernicious thought.

"But you will understand," went on Hussein ul Mulk, "that it is quite impossible for me to even attempt to discuss fully the interesting facts you have brought to my notice without some inquiry on my part, and on yours some proof that the events concerning which you have informed me have really happened. You see one cannot trust a newspaper They get such garbled accounts of occurrences, particularly of State affairs; they are misleading——"

"Excuse me, I am sure you will admit that although I dispensed with details in my brief statement, the facts were undeniable. I can tell you exactly how and why Mehemet Ali and his two secretaries, together with Hussein, his confidential servant, were murdered. But the circumstances were revolting, and need not be unduly discussed between gentlemen. I can tell you how the diamonds were obtained from the Albert Gate mansion, and how they were conveyed to Paris. But as they are probably in your possession, and the main object of your enterprise has thus been accomplished, it seems to me that all these otherwise dramatic effects are needless. I have told you exactly the object of my visit, and I still await an answer."

Hussein ul Mulk laughed a trifle uneasily.

"On my part, monsieur, I might attempt to question the extent of your knowledge, but as you are mistaken in one part of your summing-up of evidence, you may be wrong in others."

"To what do you allude?"

The Mohammedan reflected for a moment, and then answered:

"I can see no harm in telling you that I am not aware of any diamonds in which I am personally interested having arrived in Paris."

"Indeed," said Brett, leaning forward in his chair, and instantly dropping the listless air which had hitherto characterised his utterances. "That is a very curious thing, because the diamonds have been in Paris at least two days, and if they have been withheld from the possession of those who employed certain agents to secure them, there must be a powerful reason to account for the delay. Speaking quite disinterestedly, monsieur, I would advise you to inquire into the matter at once."

His words evidently perturbed the Turk.

"Do you mind," he said, "if I leave you alone a few minutes? I wish to consult with a friend of mine who happens to be staying here."

"Assuredly," said Brett, "but let me beg you to leave your cigarettes behind. They are exquisite."

Hussein ul Mulk had never before encountered such a personality as Reginald Brett. His eyebrows became perfectly oval with surprise and admiration for the man who could thus juggle with a dangerous situation.

"Here is my case," he said, "and when we have concluded this most interesting conversation I hope you will leave me your address, so that I may have the extreme pleasure of sending you a few hundreds."

Digitized by Google

Then he quitted the room. He was absent fully five minutes.

On his return he said:

"In the opinion of my friend, Mr. Brett, it is impossible for us to do anything at the present moment. We must inquire; we must verify; we must consult others. You will see that the negotiations you have undertaken require on your part some display of the extreme delicacy and tact in which you have given us so admirable a lesson. Suppose now we agree to meet here again to-morrow at the same hour. Am I to understand that what has transpired this morning remains, we will not say a secret, but a myth, a mere idle phantasy as between you and me?"

"That is precisely my idea," said Brett. "One hates to mention such a brutal word as 'police' in an affair demanding finesse. Personally I hate the blunderers. They rob life of its charm. They have absolutely no conception of art. Romance with them can end only in penal servitude or on the gallows. Believe me, Hussein, I am very discreet."

In another minute he was standing in the street, and inhaling generous draughts of the keen fresh air of Paris.

"I wonder how much my life was worth during the first five minutes?" said he to himself, and then he made his way to a telegraph office, where he dispatched the following message:—

"To the Earl of Fairholme, Stanhope Gate, London—Have received definite intelligence which confirms my views. Expect our friend will be discovered within forty-eight hours. If possible, join me at Grand Hotel, Paris, to-night, eleven o'clock. BRETT."

What Happened in the Rue Barbette.

PENDING Fairholme's arrival Brett was not idle. He visited a prominent jeweller in the Rue de la Paix, and after making some trivial purchases led the conversation round to the question of diamonds. By skilful inquiry he ascertained a good deal about precious stones, both in their crude and their finished states. The accommodating Frenchman showed him a good many samples of South African, Brazilian, and Indian stones, and explained to him the various tests which were used to determine their value.

Brett had no special object in seeking this information, but when engaged in elucidating any mystery he made it an invariable rule to post himself as accurately as possible concerning all minor details which might by any stretch of circumstances become useful.

When he returned to his hotel he jotted down some notes of this conversation, and whilst engaged in the task a telegram arrived from the Earl of Fairholme announcing that nobleman's departure from London by the afternoon train service viâ Boulogne.

Punctually at the time appointed the Earl reached the hotel. He was all eagerness to learn what had happened since they had last met in London, and why Brett had so suddenly summoned him to Paris.

"I really have not much definite information," said the barrister. "Thus far I am building chiefly upon surmise, but I have undoubtedly come into contact with the persons who organised and planned, if they did not carry out actually, the raid on the Albert Gate mansion."

"Then you have news of Jack?" asked Fairholme.

"Not exactly. All I can do at present is to assure you that the scent is hot, and we may run our quarry to earth some few minutes after eleven o'clock to-morrow morning."

"I am jolly glad that there is a chance of my being useful in this matter," said the Earl gleefully. "If only I am a little bit instrumental in recovering her brother, Edith hasn't got a leg to stand upon in the matter of getting married. That's awkwardly put, isn't it? What I mean is that when Talbot is restored to his family and everything is satisfactorily cleared up, Edith and I can get spliced immediately, can't we?"

"I think that is the most assured fact we have yet encountered," said Brett, pleasantly.

(Continued on next page.)

COLD WEATHER!

HOT BOVRIL!!

Digitized by Google

"But you haven't told me yet the exact manner in which I can be useful."

"No," said the barrister, "I have been revolving in my mind the possibilities of to-morrow morning, and you must play an important part in what, by chance, may turn out to be a melodrama. Now, listen to me carefully. In the neighbourhood of the Porte St. Martin there is a street known as the Rue Barbette. At eleven o'clock to-morrow I go to the house No. 11 in that street, and you will accompany me as far as the door. It will be your duty to stand outside and take note of all persons who enter or leave the house once I have disappeared from view in the interior. You must exercise your powers of observation most minutely, paying heed to the height, build, complexion, and clothing, of any one, male or female, who enters or leaves No. 11 Rue Barbette, after you have taken your stand in the street. It is more than probable that no person will call for scrutiny, unless it be some chance tradesman's assistant visiting the building in pursuance of his ordinary work. However that may be, do you feel capable of attending to this part of the programme?"

"Perfectly," said Fairholme.

"You will maintain watch until 11.30. If at that hour I have not rejoined you, make your way to the nearest policeman, and tell him that you have good reason to believe that a friend of yours has either been murdered or suffered serious personal injury, in a room on the second storey of the house in question. You will then, in company with the policeman, come rapidly to the apartment I have indicated and demand an immediate entrance; if necessary bursting the door open."

"And what then?" gasped the amazed Earl.

"I really don't know," said Brett imperturbably. "It is possible that you may find my mangled remains in one of the inner rooms. The best I can hope for is that I shall be simply a prisoner, but I fully expect to be seriously injured at the very least."

"But look here, Brett; are you doing the right thing in this matter? Why on earth should you run such an awful risk, and take it alone, too? Isn't it possible to obtain some trustworthy detective to keep watch on the street, and let me go into the place with you? Don't you see, old chap, that two of us might make a reasonable show if violence is attempted? One man hasn't much chance."

The barrister cut short his friend's protestations.

"I sent for you, Lord Fairholme," he said, "because I felt that I could trust you to obey my instructions implicitly. This is a matter in which I do not want the police to interfere. My visit to the Rue Barbette to-morrow morning may end quite satisfactorily. If it does, we shall be in possession of important information which should lead to the prompt release of Mr. Talbot. If it fails, there will certainly be some shooting or stabbing, or perhaps an attempt may be made to keep me a prisoner. This latter eventuality renders the presence of the police essential. No matter what has happened to me, they will, with your assistance, be able to take up the inquiry exactly where I leave it off. In this notebook here, which I am placing in a locked drawer"—and he suited his action to the words—"you will find details of all that I have done up to the present moment, together with the lines along which future inquiries should proceed. In particular you will find an elaboration of the theory which I expect to-morrow's visit to confirm. You fully understand me? All this anticipates that after 11.30 to-morrow I shall be personally unable to conduct the investigation further."

"Yes," said the Earl, with rueful emphasis. "I fully understand the proposition, and I tell you what, Brett, I don't like it. There has been enough blood spilt in this beastly business already, and I feel a sort of personal responsibility for you, you know, because I brought you into it."

"Then," said the barrister, with a laugh, "I solemnly acquit you of any such responsibility. I am going into the business with my eyes open. It interests me strangely, and I would not abandon the quest now upon any account."

"But can't you explain matters a little more clearly? Is it necessary that I should be kept in the dark as to the circumstances which have led up to this critical movement to-morrow?"

"Not in the least," said Brett. "It is indeed very important that you should comprehend all that has gone before; I only started at the end, so to speak, so as to fix accurately in your mind your part of the business, which now stands separate and distinctly outlined in your memory. What I am going to tell you simply leads up to the expected denouement."

He then recited to the wondering Earl the whole of the curious events which had happened during the preceding twenty-four hours.

It was late when they got to bed, but they rested well, and, after the manner of their race, fortified themselves with a good breakfast against the trials of the day, whatever these might prove to be.

A few minutes before the appointed hour they quitted a fiacre in the vicinity of the Rue Barbette, and at eleven o'clock Brett passed the concierge, whilst Fairholme took up his stand outside.

The barrister was received with smiling complacence by Hussein ul Mulk. On this occasion he was conducted to another room of the apartment, and he of course promptly noted that this time the windows looked out upon the rear of the building, whereas during his previous visit he could survey the street.

"This looks badly," said Brett to himself, but he betrayed not the slightest unwillingness to fall in with the arrangements made for his reception, and lounged back in a comfortable chair so easily that not even the quick-witted Turk suspected that the barrister's hip pocket contained a very serviceable revolver.

Hussein ul Mulk commenced the conversation. "I have," he said, "a couple of friends here who are interested in the matter you were good enough to mention to me yesterday. With your permission I will introduce them, and he threw open another door with a single Turkish word which Brett imagined was an invitation to enter.

Two men came from an adjoining room. They were Turks—swarthy, evil-looking customers, but well-dressed, and evidently persons of consequence in their own country. The new-comers eyed the barrister curiously, and with no very friendly intent so far as he could judge.

A brief conversation in Turkish resulted in Hussein ul Mulk addressing Brett.

"I must apologise for the fact that my friends here only speak their native tongue. Before we proceed to business I wish to ask you a few questions."

"Certainly," said Brett, "go ahead."

"You mentioned to me yesterday that you had no desire to invoke the aid of the police in prosecuting the inquiry which interests you."

"Quite right," said Brett.

"May I ask if you have adhered to that intention?"

"Absolutely."

"Well, Mr.—Mr."—Hussein ul Mulk consulted a visiting card—"Mr. Reginald Brett, I think, is your name? It would be idle on my part to compliment you on your bravery, but it would be still more futile to attempt to conceal from you the danger of the position in which you now stand."

"Sit," corrected Brett, still smiling.

"Well," said the Turk, "we will not quibble about words. The fact remains, Mr. Brett, that you have heedlessly thrust yourself into an enterprise of such a desperate character that all interlopers can be dealt with only in one way."

Digitized by Google

"You kill them," said Brett airily.

"Yes," said the Turk, "I deeply regret to inform you that you have guessed the object of my remarks with the singular skill you have already betrayed in reaching the existing position. I can only add that I am surprised the same skill did not influence you to avoid forcing upon us the only alternative left."

"Am I to be killed at once?" said Brett, speaking with a slight affectation of boredom.

Even the self-possessed Turk could not conceal his amazement at the manner in which this strange visitor conducted himself. "This is a point we have not yet decided," he said. "We are strangely unwilling to take the life of such a brave man as yourself. If we were assured of your silence, we would even be disposed to permit you to escape this time, with a solemn warning not to cross our path again. But we feel that clemency is out of the question. There is one hope—a slight one, it is true—which may permit us to gag you and tie you securely in this room, where you will be left in peace for at least forty-eight hours, after which time a telegram could be dispatched to any address that you choose to supply us with. But really, owing to unforeseen circumstances, this chance of a reprieve is remote. It all depends upon the arrival, or otherwise, at this house, of a gentleman whom we expect at 11.15."

Brett leant forward in his chair, and took out his watch. The others misunderstood his movement, and each of the three men promptly produced a revolver.

Brett laughed quite heartily as he said: "Really, gentlemen, your nervousness is ludicrous."

He saw that he yet had five minutes' grace before his self-constituted judges would proceed to execute their sentence upon him. As for the Turks, they were manifestly ashamed of having betrayed such trepidation, and they each of them replaced the weapons so readily produced.

"That is a point in my favour," thought Brett. "Next time, if I do wish to reach my revolver, I may be able to get a draw upon them first."

A Revelation.

"DURING the interval," said Hussein ul Mulk suavely, "is there anything you wish to do—any letters to write, or that sort of thing?"

"No," said Brett, "I do not think so; it seems to me that you have thoroughly misunderstood the purpose of this meeting. I came here in order to obtain from you particulars which will lead to the release of Mr. Talbot and redeem his character in the eyes of his superiors. I did not come here to be killed, Hussein ul Mulk. I am not going to be killed. If you touch a hair of my head you will only leave this house for a prison, and subsequently for the gallows. And so, you see, you are talking childishly when you dangle these threats and preliminaries to immediate execution before my eyes. It is not you, but I who have been called upon to dictate the terms on which we will part. It may perhaps interest you to explain this new phase of the situation to your fellow countrymen, and the matter will also serve to kill the few minutes which yet have to elapse before 11.15."

Hussein ul Mulk made no direct reply to this remarkable speech. That it impressed him was quite evident from his manner. Forthwith an animated but subdued conversation took place between the triumvirate.

While it was yet in progress a peculiar knock was heard upon the outside door of the apartment.

"Ah, he comes," said Hussein ul Mulk in French. He left the room in order to meet the new arrival. Then he returned, bringing with him a man very different from those whom Brett had thus far encountered in connection with the crime. This was a dapper little Frenchman, wizened, black-haired, and dressed almost in the extreme of fashion. He at once addressed himself to the barrister.

(Continued on next page.)

A Cabman's Story.

A reporter of our contemporary, the Weekly Budget, has elicited in the course of an interview a very interesting story. The narrator was a London cabman, and he was describing the wonderful manner in which bile beans for biliousness restored his health, which had been broken up by the effects of a cold.

"You will hardly believe it," he said, "but I can assure you that I was often so dizzy and upset that I could not, for the life of me, think of, or utter the name of the street to which I was driving, although, mind you, I knew it perfectly well. But, let me tell you exactly how this state of affairs arose. "About last Christmas I caught cold. I thought I had got over that, but by-and-bye, I 'went off my food,' and got very low and depressed. All the energy seemed to go from me, and my eyesight became very blurred. I had terrible headaches and experienced a general feeling of heaviness. All the food I took seemed to turn sour. I got so bad that I really could not eat, and rapidly began to lose flesh. I went to a doctor for advice, and he said my liver was the cause of the trouble. He gave me some medicine, but this only afforded me temporary relief, and I became worse than I was at first. One day my niece advised me to try bile beans for biliousness. I followed her advice and sent to the chemist's for a box. They did me so much good that I procured another box and determined to give the beans a thorough trial. The result of this course of action has been that they have now completely restored me to health, and I shall ever be grateful to them."

"By-the-bye," continued the cabby, "I shall be very pleased to tell any other sufferers what benefits I received from the beans, and if you like you can have my name and address. It is G. Mansfield, 17a, Williams' Mews, Lowndes Square, S.W. I shall always swear by bile beans in cases of liver disorder, indigestion, and headache." Bile beans are a certain cure for these ailments, also for biliousness, constipation, piles, anæmia, and all female ailments, colds, chills, lumbago, rheumatism, and influenza's after effects. They cost one and three halfpence, or two and nine a box, at all chemists, or from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, E.C. They are sold in sealed boxes only; never loose; and they form an excellent prevenative as well as a curative medicine, for workers, who, like cabmen, are exposed to all weathers.

GIVEN AWAY

WITH THIS WEEK'S

Home Notes

(No. 469),

PAPER PATTERN

OF THIS

SLEEPING SUIT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

"They tell me, my friend," he said, "that you have thrust your nose into this little pie which the friends of his Majesty the Sultan are preparing for him. It is a bad business. You are too soon for the banquet. The result is that your poor little nose may get burnt, as the pie is still being cooked."

The man smiled maliciously at his feeble witticism, and Brett instantly took his measure as a member of the gang of flash thieves which infests Paris. He knew that such a ruffian was both pitiless and cowardly. Whatever the outcome of the situation which faced him he would not stoop to conciliatory methods with this despicable ruffian.

"I suppose," he said, "that the only part of the affair which concerns you is the robbery."

"Well, and what if it is?" said the other.

"I can only say," replied the barrister, "that your political friends will be well advised to keep a close eye upon you, for you would rob them just as soon as the persons against whom they have employed you."

The little thief laughed cynically. "You are right, mon vieux. I would be delighted to have the chance. But this time it is impossible. The stones are too big. They are worth—pouf!—millions of francs, so I must be content to receive my pay, which is good."

"Have you intrusted the Sultan's diamonds to the care of a scamp like this?" said Brett, addressing himself to Hussein, and inwardly resolving that unless the conversation by chance took a turn favourable to himself, he would forthwith open fire upon the gang and endeavour to escape.

"Yes," said the conspirator with a triumphant smile. "You have never seen them, Mr. Brett? Here they are. To many men the sight would be a pleasant one. To you it should be terrible, for the arrival of these diamonds at this moment means that you must die."

So saying he produced from an inner pocket of the frock-coat which he wore a large, plain morocco case. The pressure of a spring caused the lid to fly back, revealing to the eyes of those in the room a collection of stones which were marvellous by reason of the size and magnificence of each of the diamonds on exhibition.

In the centre reposed the Imperial diamond itself, and for an instant Brett thought that whilst the senses of the other men were fascinated by the spectacle, he would have a good opportunity to shoot some of them down without mercy and make a dash for liberty.

But at the same moment there came to him an odd thought. His friend, the jeweller of the Rue de la Paix, had not given him in vain a lesson during the previous afternoon.

The barrister suspected—in fact, he was almost sure—that the gems now flaunting their half-revealed glories in the light of the day—for not one of them had undergone the final process peculiar to the diamond cutter's trade—were not the real stones stolen from Albert Gate, but well-fabricated substitutes.

To his acute brain there came an immediate confirmation of his theory. Evidently the diamonds had not been previously in the Turk's possession. The little Frenchman had just delivered them, and this in itself was a strange circumstance in view of the fact that the genuine stones must have been in Paris at least three days.

Brett concentrated all his dramatic faculties in look, voice, and gesture, when he cried:

"You fools, to be taken in by a device which a child might have suspected. These are not the Sultan's diamonds. These are frauds, cleverly concocted bits of crystal and alum, intended to keep you happy until you got back to Constantinople and discovered how thoroughly you had been deceived."

"You lie!" roared the little Frenchman. "They are genuine."

Brett wanted to punch the diminutive scoundrel heavily in the face, but he restrained himself. Turning with a magnificent assumption of courteousness to Hussein ul Mulk, he said:

"Come, I told you were acting childishly; this proved it. A most outrageous attempt has been made to swindle you, if I may use such a term to persons who confessedly are plotting to rob another. Surely this will convince you that you have nothing to fear from me. I am not here as the agent of the Sultan or the police. It is a simple matter for you to verify my statement. All that is necessary is for one of your party to take any of those alleged diamonds—I would suggest the smallest one so as not to create suspicion—to any jeweller in the district, and he will test it for you immediately, thus proving the truth of my statement. Look here; I will convince you myself."

He took the monster diamond irreverently in his hand before Hussein ul Mulk could prevent him and turned to the window. He pressed the stone against the glass and tried to make it cut, but it failed. He placed it against his cheek. It was warm. A pure diamond would be icy cold. More than this, a small portion of the composition of which the imitation had been hastily concocted, broke off in his fingers.

"You see," he laughed. "Do you require further proof?" Even whilst he spoke the diminutive little Frenchman turned and bolted.

One of the Turks drew a revolver and rushed after him, but Hussein ul Mulk uttered some authoritative words which prevented the man from firing. The Frenchman was evidently an adept in the art of dodging pursuit. In the passage he ducked suddenly, and threw the Turk heavily to the ground. Then without further interference he slipped the latch of the door and slammed it hastily behind him, leaving Brett silently laughing at Hussein ul Mulk and his remaining confederate, whilst the gentleman who had been upset was slowly regaining his disturbed gravity.

"Can it be possible that what you say is true?" said Hussein ul Mulk, in such piteous accents that Brett was moved to further mirth.

"Surely you do not doubt the evidence?" he said; "take any of these stones; they will crumble to pieces on the hearth if struck the slightest blow. See, I will pulverise one with my heel."

And he did so, though the amazed and despairing men whom he addressed would have restrained him, for they still could not bring themselves to believe that what he said was true.

"Come now," said Brett, "rouse yourselves and give me the information I want. I promise that that is the only way in which you may attain your ends. Of course I cannot help you. It may be that as you have bungled matters thus far the authorities will stop you and land you all in prison, but that is no concern of mine. And this moment I simply wish to release my friend and proclaim his innocence. For the rest you must take care of yourselves."

Hussein ul Mulk was the first to recover his scattered senses

"We cannot choose but believe you, Mr. Brett," he said. "We are even indebted to you for making this disastrous discovery at such an early date. We paid our agents so highly that we thought their honesty was assured. We find we are mistaken, and consequently we apologise to you for using threats which were unnecessary. We rely upon your honour not to incriminate us with the police at this moment. All we can tell you is that your friend is not dead, but we do not know his whereabouts."

"Nonsense," cried Brett angrily. "Why, do you seek to mislead me in this fashion?"

"Sir," said the Turk, "I am telling you the truth. We believe that Mr. Talbot has been held a prisoner in London, but we do not know in what locality. My friends here and myself, as you have already surmised, are merely members

(Continued on page 62.)

Digitized by Google

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write.

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1518. 11/6.

Chesterfield Coat and Skirt, direct from the "Alfosco" factories. Splendid value for 11/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. Made in a good, hard-wearing Serge, or in ALLEN FOSTER & Co's celebrated Venetian Cloth. Light and Dark Grey, Navy, Royal, Brown, Green, Black, etc. The Jacket is single-breasted, and measures 28in. long, trimmed tailor stitching, full bell-shaped Skirt, well made and finished. Costume complete, 11/6. Carriage paid 6d. extra.

Design No. 1433. 10/6.

Stylish Costume Skirt. Marvellous value for 10/6. Made in fine Frieze material, or good strong Serge. Colours: Grey, Black, or Brown Mixtures, etc., with strappings and tailor stitching. This Skirt is cut in the full bell shape. Great bargain for 10/6. Carr. 5d. ex. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED FACTORY PRICES.

Design No. 435. 10/6.

Special Value for Half-a-Guinea. Costume made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s world-renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. All colours and sizes kept in stock. The bodice has pouched front, and is stylishly trimmed strappings of Taffeta Silk and small buttons. Well made skirt, bell shape, fasten at side, pocket, and trimmed silk and buttons to match bodice. Price only 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 6/6; carriage 5d. BEST VALUE IN LONDON. Good fit guaranteed. This Costume made in the new "Alfosco" Tweed, all colours, will be 25/-. Patterns sent post free.

10/6

Patterns Post Free.

Write for Our WINTER SKETCH BOOK. Patterns Post Free. Hundreds of illustrations of the latest Novelties for the present season in Costumes and Jackets sent post free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

3/- THE WORLD'S WONDER. 3/-

OUR BEST CHEAPEST WATCH. With a guarantee to keep correct time for 3 years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 3/- and three stamps extra for postage. For accurate time-keeping equal to any Lady's or Gent's watch costing 5 gs. All we ask of you is to show the Watch to your friends, as by so doing you advertise our business. — SWISS WATCH IMPORTERS, 12, Goswell Road, London, E.C.

Mention "Short Stories."

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. (Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s

Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 metal tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list and tunes. ATLAS CO., 184a High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6; MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10/6.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,

Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Digitized by Google

of a political organisation. It was necessary for us to secure possession of the Imperial diamond and its companions. We spared no expense, nor hesitated at any means that would accomplish our purpose. We have been foiled for the moment, I can tell you nothing else, and I now advise you to leave us and forget that such persons exist, for I swear to you by the beard of the Prophet that had events turned out differently you would now be a lifeless corpse in this room, whilst your body would not be discovered for many weeks, as we intended to leave Paris this afternoon as soon as the diamonds came into our possession."

At this moment a thunderous knocking reverberated through the house.

The Turks gazed at each other in affright. None of them moved to open the door. But the knock was not repeated, for the door itself was thrown bodily from its hinges, and the stalwart form of Lord Fairholme, accompanied by two policemen, appeared in the passage.

"Ah," said Brett, jumping forward, "I had forgotten about you, Fairholme. I see you kept your appointment. These gentlemen are not required," he rattled on pleasantly, turning towards the stern-looking policemen; "I am quite alive and uninjured. My friends here and myself had a few earnesti words, but we have settled matters satisfactorily."

The suspicious policemen glanced from the smiling Englishman to the perturbed Turks. At the first sound of danger Hussein ul Mulk had closed the case in which lay the spurious diamonds, so these pretentious-looking gems could not excite the curiosity of the men of law.

The senior officer commenced to demand an explanation from Lord Fairholme of the exciting statements which induced them to accompany him, but Brett stepped into the breach to explain matters.

"It is quite true," he said, "that my friend was anxious on my account. It was even possible that these Turkish gentlemen here and myself might have proceeded to extremities, but now the affair has ended satisfactorily, and if you will allow me——" He put his hand into his pocket and a slight monetary transaction terminated the incident pleasantly for all parties.

Soon Brett and Fairholme found themselves in the street, and again did the barrister draw in deep and invigorating breaths of Paris air.

"Where now?" said Fairholme.

"Tell me," cried Brett eagerly, "did you notice in which direction the little man ran who left No. 11 about ten minutes ago?"

"Better than that," said Fairholme, "I heard where he was going to. He was in such a fiendish funk that he noticed no one nor anything, only flung himself into a passing cab and yelled, 'Take me to the Cabaret Noir, Boulevard Montmartre.'"

"Good," cried Brett, excitedly. "You are a splendid detective. You have saved me hours of search and perhaps days of failure. Come on; let us, too, go to the Cabaret Noir."

The exterior of the Cabaret Noir belied its name.

Originally no doubt, it was one of the vilest dens in a vile locality, but the fairy hand of the brewer had touched the familiar wine shop, and, behold it glistened forth in much mahogany, more brass, and a dazzling collection of mirrors.

Brett was surprised when the driver of their cab pulled up in front of such an ornate establishment. Somehow he expected the Cabaret Noir to be a different place. Not so Fairholme, accustomed only to the glaring exterior of London tied houses.

"Here we are," said his lordship cheerfully. "Let's take them by surprise and run over the whole show before any one can stop us."

"No," said Brett; "this is Paris, and the police here have ways even more mysterious than those of Scotland Yard. We will gain nothing by such drastic procedure. Indeed, had I known the sort of place we were coming to I would have visited it to-night and in disguise. As it is, we have been seen already by anyone interested in our movements, and it would be useless to adopt any pretence, so follow me."

He boldly entered through the main door, and found himself in a light, airy room, filled, in three-fourths of its area, with little marble-topped tables surrounded by diminutive chairs, whilst a bar counter was partitioned off in a corner.

The attendant in charge was a dreary-eyed waiter, who seemed to think that the presence of a couple of sight-seeing Englishmen at such an hour was another testimony to the lunatic propensities of the Anglo-Saxon race. He welcomed them volubly, assuring them that the establishment kept the best Scottish whisky in stock, and guaranteed that roast beef would be ready in ten minutes.

(To be continued.)

HE: "I'd go through fire and water for you, dear." She: "Never mind that. Would you go through the operation of making a fire for me?"

THE small boy had been warned by his nurse as to the awful results of biting his nails. "If you bite your nails," she said "you will swell out like an air balloon and burst." The small boy believed, took heed, and didn't bite his nails any more. The small boy went to a children's party, where he stood and gazed at the hostess for some minutes in silence. Then he spoke: "You bite your nails," he said.

EVERY WOMAN HER OWN DOCTOR.

By an M.D.

A complete book in plain English concerning the Ailments and Accidents to which Women and Children are liable, and their cure.

Crown 8vo.

Price 2/6.

post free 2/9.

THINGS A WOMAN WANTS TO KNOW.

With an Illustrated Section on

The Folding of Serviettes.

Edited by

ISOBEL of Home Notes

Crown 8vo. Cloth.

Price 1/-.

Post Free 1/2.

Order Form. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Please send me a copy of
"Every Woman Her Own Doctor." I inclose 2s. 9d.
"Things a Woman Wants to Know" ,, 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

£400 GIVEN AWAY.

During the past two years we have arranged several great contests for advertising our business in which the cash and other prizes have amounted to over £10,000. These contests were instructive, amusing, and profitable to all concerned. Some of the public when we first advertised these contests believed they were all humbug, but when they found that the cash and other prizes were paid they were sorry they did not compete. Of course, we did not blame them, for almost everybody has been so duped in contests that when they see one, they immediately jump to conclusions. In arranging our contests we have met with immense favour, and can show 10,000 testimonials, which speak for themselves. We assume that if you enter one of our contests, though you may not win a prize, you are satisfied if you know that it has been conducted fairly, that you have had the same opportunity as the winners, and that the money has been actually paid. This we will prove by making known the full names and addresses of winners.

Now, sometimes our contests seem very simple, and perhaps the one below may appear so, but on this point we wish to put you on your guard. Don't say "What a fool that man is. Does he take his readers for children?" No, we do not, but still you are apt to make a mistake and "jump at conclusions." What we want you to do is to solve this rebus correctly; take your time about it, even consult authorities, or consult your friends, and then if you think you are right post your answer. Probably very few will send in the right solution. Remember there is only one correct answer—the original quotation, but the prizes are worth the effort. Find the words and arrange them correctly, and remember that some of the most brilliant men of letters living have on examining this rebus given an incorrect answer.

We shall give £75 in Cash for the correct reading of this rebus which represents a learned saying. We wish you to understand that there is no trick or catch about this puzzle for it is a veritable quotation from a famous author who died in the second decade of the 17th Century, and one that has been often repeated. If you cannot find and arrange the six words in this rebus correctly, but only find five, you will participate in a Second Prize of £50. Now here are £125 being given in two prizes alone, and someone is going to win the money. Is it not worth a trial? There is only one easy condition, which by the way does not involve your selling anything or putting your hand in your pocket for a penny. About this we will write you on receiving your solution.

An envelope containing the correct answer has been sealed and deposited with our bankers, and will not be opened until after the close of the contest. In the event of more than one correct solution, we shall appoint a committee of three from among the contestants to award the cash pro rata. The expenses of the committee will be paid to London, and £1 per day allowed to each while away from home. You may be asked but not compelled to act as one of the committee.

In connection with this contest we are going to give away other Cash prizes, namely Ten Prizes of £10, Twenty of £5, and Seventy-five Prizes of £1, the conditions with regard to which will be duly sent. You have the opportunity to secure any of the above-mentioned cash prizes without cost to yourself, and we shall send you when you answer this, the names of winners in past contests, a list too long for publication here! Every promise in this advertisement will be scrupulously carried out, and all will be treated with even-handed justice. Send your answer at once, with two stamps for postage, copy of one of our publications, testimonials, etc. If you are not satisfied with the contest you can demand and will receive the return of even this 2d., as well as the postage spent in answering this advertisement, for it is well known that we always follow the most straightforward methods. Do not delay, as the day of closing will soon be announced.

Address—NOVELTY PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 81, 8 BREAM'S BUILDINGS, LONDON, E.C.

JOHN NOBLE'S

Catalogues Post Free.

MONEY SAVING SALE

For This Month Only.

Hundreds of Bargains in Costumes, Wonderful Offers in Coats and Mantles, Special Reductions in Blouses, Corsets, Underwear, Dress Fabrics, Blankets, &c.

WRITE for CATALOGUE without delay and get your share of the Bargains and FREE GIFTS.

JOHN NOBLE, Ltd. 46, Brook St. Mills, Manchester

'Let's tell mother.'

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

PIANO PLAYING BY EAR.

ARTHUR'S "HARMONIC INDICATOR"!!

This wonderful invention immediately enables anyone, even if ignorant of music, to play beautifully by ear and VAMP brilliantly on the Piano or organ to Songs, Waltzes, &c., in any key. No figures nor notes to learn! Fits any Piano. Thousands sold! Post paid, 2/-

C. E. ARTHUR, 18 Robert Street, London, N.W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Doffing the Hat.

"F. W. H." writes: "Is it etiquette to doff one's hat to a lady with whom one has danced at a ball? My friend says 'yes'; I am in doubt, but think not."

* * * *

The rule of raising one's hat to a lady with whom one has only a slight acquaintance is: "Wait till the lady shows signs of recognising you, then raise your hat." The initiative in resuming a slight acquaintance rests with the lady. If she does not show a disposition to resume it, then you must take it that you are not advanced enough in her favour. However, if you should meet again, and enter on to a more intimate relationship, there could be no excuse for her in not recognising you in the street or elsewhere.

The Servant's Knock.

"SHOULD a servant always knock on entering a room?" asks "MARY," who is a housemaid. "I am in service in a fairly good family, and my mistress has not told me one way or the other about this."

* * * *

It is not usual in the better families for a servant to knock, that is, of course, in a sitting-room. It is different in the case of entering a bedroom, or, say, a study. I should advise you not to knock on entering except when you have reason to believe people are engaged in private conversation. Of course you will not enter suddenly without knocking when Miss Kitty or Miss Ada is receiving a gentleman friend. That would make you very, very unpopular.

Accepting an Invitation.

"SOPHIE" and her intimate girl friend have been invited to spend a day out with two gentlemen whom they met at a dance. The programme will include a day in the country, with a late dinner afterwards. Should they accept?

* * * *

Well, "SOPHIE," there are certain girls who would not think twice about accepting such an attractive invitation, but they belong to a different class of society from yourself—that is, they are girls of the Bohemian stamp, who don't try to be conventional. With them, it does not very much matter, as they do not care "what people say." But, in your case, where I should say you are living with your parents and have a lot of neighbours who are friends, I don't think you should do this kind of thing. If the men had been really inclined to treat you well, they would have asked your parents' permission, or have invited someone to chaperon you. But don't let me appear prudish. There is nothing at all terrible about their suggestion. It all depends on exactly what sort of girls you are, and how far people are likely to judge your conduct by ordinary standards. Lastly, your parents should know what you are doing, and, if they consent, I don't see that you need trouble yourselves.

The Older Girl.

"BILL," is eighteen, but looks twenty-one. He is fonder of girls older than younger than himself. Now he is enamoured to some extent of a girl of twenty-three, who seems to be mutually attracted by him. He does not know whether she takes him seriously enough to think he should become engaged to her, but thinks that if she knew his real age she might think him too absurdly young and not want his society.

* * * *

Now, a girl cannot be very fond of a man if she would object to him on account of his youth. I imagine she likes you for yourself, and the fact that you are five years younger could not alter that feeling. I should tell her your age, and leave her to act as she likes. She will almost certainly not expect any proposal from you, but I do not see why you and she should not be good friends. After all, she is old enough to know her own mind, and to look after herself, so I should leave the matter in her hands.

A Wrong and a Right.

"A. S. D." (Exeter) asks me the following: "The wife of a business friend of my husband called on me, but did not leave any cards. I did not like the woman at all, as her manner showed that she thought our social positions were not equal. Now, should I return her call, seeing that she made a technical offence in not leaving cards?"

* * * *

An excellent opportunity, "A. S. D.," for you to prove that you are not a social inferior by displaying better knowledge of the usages of society. Call on her and leave your cards—one for yourself, and two of your husband—and be as nice in your manner as she was otherwise. As she is the wife of a business friend of your husband, you may be serving his interests by showing courtesy to her. Certainly do not omit to return her call. That would be a social mistake.

Absent Versus Present.

"CONNIE" was a year ago very much impressed by a young man who has since gone to India for three years. He did not show in any way that he was similarly drawn towards her, but "CONNIE" thinks if they met again something would develop. However, another man has now appeared on the scene and is making definite overtures. "CONNIE" does not like him so much as the man in India. Do I advise her to listen to the second man's protestations, or to wait until the first one returns?

* * * *

You are not sure about the man in India. In fact, things suggest that he is not drawn towards you to any extent. If he were, he would certainly have shown it in some way when here, or by writing to you from abroad. Therefore, you had better not think of him. Decide whether you care for the second man sufficiently to think of him at all. That should be the deciding factor. If so, then allow him to continue his attentions, and see if in time you do not get to reciprocate them. If not, of course, and you still harbour thoughts of the man in India, better straightforwardly tell the man now paying you attentions that you do not feel that you could love him. It would be better to make the truth known before matters have gone too far.

Asking Parents.

"WILDFLOWER" is meeting a young lady of eighteen, but her parents do not know he is fond of her. Should he ask their permission to meet her? Yes, "WILDFLOWER," certainly. If your intentions are serious, and you are very fond of her, and think one day you will be able to offer her a proposal, let her parents know about it.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HYPNOTISM

Its Increasing Use in Daily Life, by English People.

No Longer a Secret Art, But Now In the Hands of Thousands.

A London Publishing House Distributing Free Books on Hypnotism.

Some Strange Secrets of Personal Influence Laid Bare.

The London office of a well-known publishing house is creating a deal of surprised interest here in the subject of hypnotism and allied science by the novel method of giving away books absolutely free. By merely writing to the Psychic Research Publishing Company, Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C., you can, according to their advertisement, receive by return post a most remarkable, fascinating, and instructive illustrated book called "The Power Within." This book and accompanying literature contain some most startling information, setting forth not only how to set about it to learn hypnotism at your own home, but revealing the fact that this mysterious art is now actually being used to advantage by English people in daily life.

According to the publishers, the aim of this startling little free book is to answer such questions as occur to all interested in the mysterious relation between mind and matter.

Such questions as these, for instance:—Can I learn how to hypnotise? Why is the art not more widely known? Just how should I set about it to learn at home, and practise it? Is instantaneous hypnotism possible? What is "personal magnetism," and how is it acquired? What is the mysterious secret of the wonderful success and influence of certain people who seem most ordinary in other ways? Is there really a scientific mode of life or thought which attracts health, success, and happiness? Is it possible to thus radically change one's whole life in a few days, as many claim to have done? Is it true that humanity in general is, in a sense, hypnotised by conventionality and thus blinded to splendid opportunities for success and happiness which lie on every hand? What can I do to arouse myself from this "hypnosis of custom," and rise to the attainments which my natural ability would warrant? What must I do to become a hypnotist? To develop a magnetic, attractive, forceful character? To acquire courage, ambition, cheerfulness? To kill fear and worry? To make myself a source of happiness and inspiration to my friends?

The reader will readily see that a book, especially a free book, dealing with such vitally interesting subjects as these is arousing a lively demand, and the edition provided by the Company is being rapidly exhausted. To obtain this book, which is entitled "The Power Within," it is only necessary to send your plainly written name and address, enclosing a penny stamp for return postage, to the Psychic Research Company (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

As the nature of the contents of this book is of such vital interest and importance to many, it is requested that no one write out of mere curiosity. It is desired to supply the book only to those having a genuine wish to be informed on these subjects.

MR H SAMUEL
DEAR SIR,
SEND ME
FREE GRATIS
YOUR GREAT PRIZE
CATALOGUE
AS ADVERTISED.

A PRIZE
within the reach of every man and woman in the Kingdom.
A POST-CARD WILL BRING
H. SAMUEL'S
BIG FREE BARGAIN BOOK.
Contains nearly 200 Pages, over 3,000 Actual Engravings of Astounding Bargains, all at LOWEST FACTORY PRICES.
Ladies' Gold Watches, 21/-; Gent's Silver Watches, 8/6; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Silver Alberts, 3/9; Alarm Clocks, 1/6; Cutlery, Plate, and all Household Requirements.
DEAL DIRECT AND SAVE HALF!
VALUABLE FREE GIFTS TO ALL BUYERS.
H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY
For HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

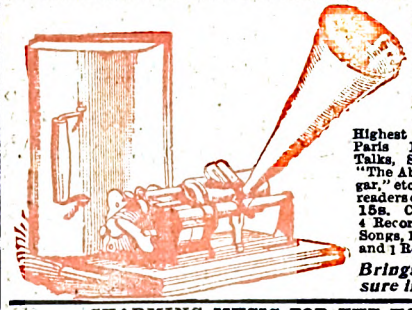
Kaputine—safe, speedy, effective. Cures in ten minutes. But mind it is Kaputine, the safe remedy, and not some dangerous substitute offered for extra profit. Kaputine is endorsed by the medical faculty—safe.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-.
Samples 1d. each.
KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.
A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

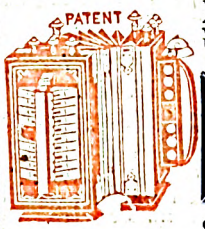
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories
Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6
Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount
Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—
CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.
Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

EVERY WISE WOMAN
Will Insist on Having

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and More Economical than Common Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentation.
The Best Sugar for Household Purpose. Ask your Grocer for Crosfield's Pure Cane Sugar and Syrup. CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

"MENE"

Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Under-clothing Houses and Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. A Free Sample of No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper.

MISS HAYNES, 55 Fann St., London, E.C.

SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

Sole Proprietors: ROBINSON & SONS Ltd., CHESTERFIELD.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

IF

ALL BRITISH HOUSEWIVES purchased "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH in preference to Foreign Metal Polishes, it would enable us to give employment to a larger number of British Workpeople. We Manufacture

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

IN ENGLAND, also make all our own Tins, Cardboard Boxes, &c.

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

Most of these set up acid, and are of a very "Sticky" nature, thus causing more labour in polishing. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the surface of the metal, can be easily removed, and produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

It is also GUARANTEED FREE FROM ACID, POISON OR GRIT.

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD.,
LIVERPOOL.

Short Stories.

No. 733.] Week ending January 17th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

(Illustrating a Powerful Incident from our Complete Story, "The Drama of a Day." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Curés In TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is compos d of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY p eparation of its kind used in British and F reign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

The Editor of the "Family Doctor," the People's Medical Paper, IN ONE OF HIS C MMENTS, SAYS:

"After a careful examination of Kaputine, and learning its component parts, we should certainly recommend it as a Safe and Reliable Remedy for Headache."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-, of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield, for 12 stamps.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' System

On J. G. GRAVES' System you are absolutely certain of what you are buying before you pay for it.

You only send 5/- to start with

THE "EXPRESS"

50/

ENGLISH LEVER, (Regd.) 50/- is then forwarded to you. You examine and test it, and, if satisfied, you complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/-; or, if you prefer to pay the balance in one payment of 45/- within seven days from receipt of goods, a HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT (which you choose yourself) will be sent you. If you are not satisfied return the watch, and your deposit is instantly refunded.

SPECIFICATION.

First-grade English Lever Movement, Capped & Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver (Hall Marked) Cases. Warranted Seven Years.

Guaranteed BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. Good Commission. No Risk.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD

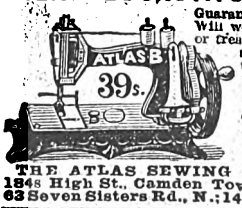
FREE PRESENTS.

You can earn a 3 years warranted Watch, Life-sized Doll, Powerful Air Rifle, Beautiful Solid Gold filled Dress Rings, Long Guard, Bracelet, and Jewellery of all kinds from our lists of presents. You can have any of these FREE after selling Fine Articles of Exquisite Jewellery, at 9d. each (sold by shops at 1/6). We send the goods on approval on receipt of your post-card. When sold you remit us the 6/-, and you get a Beautiful Present, absolutely free. Send no money, we trust you. You take no risk, as they sell at once, and we receive back unsold goods. Colonials must send 1/- for extra postage.

FREE.

(Room 59) HYDE PARK WATCH CO., 14 Ranelagh Road, Paddington, London, W.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 1/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL; or, if desired, can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, Designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

3/- THE WORLD'S WONDER. 3/-

OUR BEST CHEAPEST WATCH. With a guarantee to keep correct time for 3 years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 3/- and three stamps extra for postage. For accurate time-keeping equal to any Lady's or Gent's watch costing 5 gns. All we ask of you is to show the Watch to your friends, as by so doing you advertise our business. — SWISS WATCH IMPORTERS, 12, Goswell Road, London, E.C.

Mention "Short Stories."

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

JUST ONE BARGAIN

out of the many hundreds that NOBLE'S

Money-Saving CATALOGUE

is full of. Wonderful offers in Costumes, Blouses, Corsets, Underwear, Dress Fabrics, House Linens, Blankets, &c., during Noble's Money-Saving Sale.

Catalogue Post Free.

THIS PARTICULAR BARGAIN

(Model 1562) is the coat now so much worn and may be had in Good Black Beaver Cloth or in Grey Frieze Cloth, with the New Round Collar and Gauntlet Cuffs, finished Rows of Stitching. An excellent Tailor-made production. Lengths & Prices:

30	33	36	39 ins.	Carriage
9/11	10/9	11/9	12/9	6d. extra.

Kindly mention Short Stories when writing.

9/11

John Noble LTD., 46 Brook Street Mills, Manchester.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

SHORT STORIES

No. 733.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending January 17th, 1903.

THE DRAMA OF A DAY.

The Tale of a Journalist's Desperate Struggle for Life and Love.

The Story of the Week—See our Coloured Cover.

The Day Opens.

"MANY happy returns, my darling. Did you think I had forgotten?"

The speaker made a swift motion with one closed hand, and a delicate gold chain was flung over a fair head to incircle a slender throat. He had risen from his chair at a dainty breakfast-table and stooped over the woman who sat opposite him. She put up her arms and clasped them about him.

"Gilbert!" she said reproachfully.

Gilbert Hamlyn kissed his pretty wife. He was a tall, dark, reserved looking man, with a sprinkling of grey on his temples and in his moustache. But his eyes dwelt upon the upturned face with a passionate tenderness that beautified them.

"Ella!" he answered, mimicking her banteringly, "there, you are so indulgent to my absent-mindedness that I know you would forgive my even forgetting your birthday. And I really couldn't resist the temptation to make you think I had done so. I bound myself to wait till your second cup of tea, but it was all I could do to hold out. And now, do you like what I have for you? I can't tell you to change it, for it has your name on it."

He opened his hand with mischievous deliberation. In his palm there lay a tiny watch, its gold case rimmed with diamonds and pearls. Hamlyn turned it over—on the back, in brilliants, was the monogram, "E. H."

"How beautiful," cried Ella Hamlyn, taking it, "but, indeed, I did not want anything, Gilbert. You are always giving me jewellery. I have more already than it is wise to keep in a flat. I shall have to deposit some of it with your bank one of these days."

She dropped the watch into her lap and clung to her husband. "Oh, my dear," she said, "you are too, too good to me. Are you sure you can afford it all? I should be happy enough, more than happy, with your love alone."

Gilbert Hamlyn laughed. "Afford it, of course I can," he answered, "it was only yesterday Schillerman gave me a big cheque for royalties. I thought that American book had stopped selling, but it appears not. Truly, darling, America has been a mascot to me, it has given me you, reputation, and quite a gratifying balance in cash."

Ella put an elbow on the table before her, and leant her chin upon it. Her features were those of a resolute, capable, woman, her face seemed as if it had once been much older looking, but had grown, by some magic, younger and happier.

"America!" she murmured; "how I hate the very word. I am an Englishwoman by descent, why could I not have been an Englishwoman by birth? Then I should have escaped—what should I not have escaped? Shame, humiliation, squalor, the shadow of crime."

Her husband drew her to him. "My darling!" he whispered, "did you not promise me that you would try not to remember?"

Ella Hamlyn brushed away a tear. "I can't help it," she said, "I do try, Gilbert, for your sake. Oh, why couldn't I have met you when I was a girl—free, merry, ignorant!—instead of meeting—Robert Lorimer? What right have I to be the wife of such a man as you, I that have been wife to him, wife to 'Kentucky Bob,' 'Bob the Crook,' 'Bob the confidence-man.' I that have been known, and pitied, by the police in half the great towns of the States?"

Hamlyn pinched the pink lobe of a small, well-shaped ear.

"Ella," he said, "you know that I never argue with you in these moods. They are foolish, unreasonable, unfair to yourself. It was not your fault that, as a girl, you made a girl's mistake, and plighted your troth to a plausible scoundrel. Had you been born in England we might never have met, which might not have been your loss, though it would certainly have been mine."

He stroked the soft tendrils of fair hair that clustered naturally about her brow.

"I love you for what you are, dear," he murmured, "a brave, upright, experienced woman, who has come through the fire without even the odour of burning upon her garments."

Gilbert Hamlyn was silent for a moment, then he roused himself, and resumed his rallying tone.

"I was going to come home early to-night," he said, "and take you to the theatre. For once the paper can go to press without me. But, as you have misbehaved yourself, I think I shall change my mind."

Ella lifted her head and tried to smile, though the tears were hanging upon her lashes.

"I am silly," she confessed, "and selfish as well. I ought to be happy if only I can make you happy. And this is not the way to do it. But if you knew how things conspire to remind me! I cannot actually touch the piano, without feeling myself back in that horrid little dime museum, strumming on that awful tin-kettle they called an instrument."

"I wonder however you managed to get a bar of melody out of it," said her husband cheerfully, emptying his tea-cup, "but you did. Though I expect Mascagni would have fainted to hear its top-notes in the Intermezzo. Never mind, you played well enough to make me take the liberty of speaking to you."

"And of waiting to walk home with me," added his wife, "which was a much greater liberty."

All rights reserved.

Digitized by Google

"How vexed you were!" exclaimed Gilbert Hamlyn; "but I plead love at first sight. I read it all in a glance. Crape at your throat, a wedding-ring on your finger, bitterness in your face—a disappointed wife, freed by death and captured by poverty. But what a queer, happy little courtship I had!"

He was gathering up a medley of documents from a writing-table as he spoke.

"Sweet as are the pleasures of reminiscence, my darling," he observed, "I must be off. You would marry a slave of the journalistic lamp."

His wife went for his hat and coat. He put them on, a grave, almost melancholy figure. But he drew her into his embrace with the ardour of a stripling.

"You shall have your theatre, after all," he said, "be happy, dear. I ask no more from you ever, than that you should be very, very happy."

Their lips met lingeringly, mutely, and Gilbert Hamlyn tore himself away. From the lofty window of the flat Ella watched him thread the busy West-end street.

"My dear, dear husband!" she murmured; "so loyal, so tender, so generous." She pressed her finger-tips to her quivering mouth, to hold back the sob that ended the words. "I must be happy," she said, "he wishes it. I will forget."

She sat down at a small concert grand and began to touch the notes; she played well and firmly, with a style more masculine than feminine. She glided into the famous and beautiful, if hackneyed "Intermezzo," she had been playing it in a wretched and half-empty Western "show"—playing it sadly, abstractedly, despairingly, and when she had finished she had looked up to see for the first time the face of Gilbert Hamlyn and to hear his grave "Thank you." It had been the beginning of an acquaintanceship that had meant much to Robert Lorimer's widow.

"If you please, ma'am, a person to see you."

Ella started. A white-capped maid had come into the room. Her mistress rose from the piano.

"A person!" she repeated; "what kind of a person?"

The girl prefaced her answer with a little jerk indicative of contempt. "A man, ma'am," she intimated, "very shabbily dressed. He says he must see you on business, and that you'll know him when you see him."

Ella Hamlyn smiled. "What a singular message!" she commented, "however, in that case, perhaps I had better see him, whether he sees me or not. Where is he?"

"In the hall, ma'am," she was told.

A light step carried Ella to the door of the room, and she peeped out into the tiny square ante-chamber of the compactly-built flat. In it there stood a lean, brown-skinned, sinewy fellow, with a soft felt hat in his restless fingers. At the sight of him Ella Hamlyn recoiled.

"I—I will speak to him, Ruth," she stammered; "you may show him in."

The maid stole an inquisitive glance at her and retired. In another moment her visitor had been ushered in and the door was closing upon the curious Ruth.

Ella had drawn herself up, very pale and stern.

"So, Jim Spinifex," she said, "you have dared to track me down. For no good purpose, I'll be sworn. Do not think that you can blackmail me, my husband knows all, he knew all when he married me."

The other grinned. "Well guessed, Ellie," he responded, "but don't be too quick. I knew fast enough you'd have told Hamlyn the truth, you always were that sort. But don't—don't——"

He drew nearer, screening his mouth with a hollowed palm.

"Don't call him your husband," she was bidden, "he can scarcely lay claim to the title so long as—as Bob Lorime is alive."

Ella gasped and caught at the table to steady herself.

"Bob!" she said, in a horrified whisper. "Bob alive?" The man she had called Jim Spinifex nodded.

She moaned and hid her face. Mr. James Spinifex shrugged his shoulders.

"I'll allow it's a bit of a jolt for you," he added, "but that's the fact. Howsomever, I'm not disposed to be hard on you, and Bob having sent me over here to make inquiries I can as easy put him off the scent as not. If you like I can tell him you're dead and buried, and then you'll be safe from him for good. The question is, how'll it pan out for me if I do?"

Ella was swaying to and fro. "Bob!" she murmured "Bob alive—and I his wife—not—not Gilbert's."

Jim Spinifex trifled with his soft hat. "Take it cool," he said. "All I want is to be paid for the trouble of holding my tongue. Hamlyn need never know. See here, I'll be content with a thousand dollars—two hundred pounds, and you can send it me by instalments. Fifty pounds'll do me now, in cash or jewellery. That's a pretty thing you've got on."

He extended his hand to the jewelled watch that swung at her belt. Ella sprang back and touched the bell.

"Go! go!" she exclaimed, "the sight of you is hideous to me. You contaminate his house with your presence. Go."

Her visitor faced her threateningly. "Not me!" he retorted; "I suppose you don't want me to go to Hamlyn and tell him you're not his wife."

Ella sneered. "Fool!" she said, "that would do you no good. Fate has tied a knot and I must untie it as best I can. But you will not stand to win by my method of doing it."

The other stared at her. "What are you going to do?" he queried.

Ella wrung her hands. "What do wounded creatures do?" she asked, wildly. "Creep away and hide themselves from all the world. Go, before I send for the police to fling you out."

Mr. Spinifex's jaw dropped and a low whistle broke from him. The maid was opening the door of the room. He turned and went out, muttering to himself in a dazed kind of fashion.

The Day Closes.

"RUTH, is your mistress not at home?"

Gilbert Hamlyn was standing on the threshold of the small kitchen of the rear of his flat. He had just entered with his latch-key and found the other rooms of the suite in darkness. The parlour-maid rose from the tea-table, where she had been gossiping confidentially with her fellow-servant.

"No, sir," she said. "Mrs. Hamlyn went out this morning about ten, sir. I got a cab for her, sir, and she took a hand-bag. And if you please, sir, she left a note for you on the toilet-table."

Hamlyn reflected an instant. Then he took a match-box from his pocket, passed into his own and his wife's sleeping apartment and lit the gas. On the toilet-table there lay a square, delicately-tinted envelope, addressed to him in her familiar handwriting. He picked it up and opened it, muttering a mild anathema.

"Called away suddenly, I suppose," he said. "Someone must be ill, yet she has so few friends in Eng——"

The word was left unfinished, and he started violently. His eye had fallen on the letter. It was brief and amazing.

"I must go away and leave you—for ever. Something has happened. Never seek to learn what. I have taken nothing but a few clothes and a little money. I could not take any of your presents. Blame me, hate me, forget me. Good-bye.—

"ELLA."

The paper fluttered from Hamlyn's fingers. The wife of a twelve-month, and gone from him without a word of explanation!

Digitized by Google

He had rescued her from what a depth of misery and danger, and she had deserted him! That was what the world would call it—deserted! Gilbert Hamlyn ground his teeth; he was a proud man.

Gradually his love—the strong, steady, pitiful love of a generous man—reasserted itself. There was some mystery behind this sudden departure. He knew that she loved him, not with the caprice of a girl, but with the passionate self-surrender and pathetic trust of a woman who had suffered and found consolation. He remembered her strange, tender mood of the morning.

Putting his cold hands to his burning forehead he tried to think. While he stood, wrestling for self-control, the parlour-maid's voice came to him arousingly.

"Please, sir," he was informed, "a person to see you. He won't give his name, but it's the same one as called to see Mrs. Hamlyn this morning. He wouldn't give his name then, either!"

Gilbert Hamlyn turned, bewildered yet attracted by the reference to the unknown morning visit. But he was too reserved to question a servant.

"Very well," he said, pulling himself together and crumpling the letter in his palm. "You may show him into the drawing-room. I will see him at once."

He glanced at his face in the mirror as he passed it—he seemed to have grown suddenly very white and old. He threw off his overcoat and wiped the perspiration from his brow—it had broken forth in drops of beaded sweat. Then he entered the drawing-room and paused, surprised at the sight of his shabby, sinister-looking caller.

"I—I have not the pleasure of knowing you, I believe," he began. The other interrupted him with a gesture.

"My name is Spinifex," he said, and his accent was that of a low class American from the Western States. "There's no reason why you should know it, but I don't think it can do any harm."

"Upon my word, Mr.—Spinifex," observed Hamlyn coldly, "you take an extraordinary tone. May I ask the reason for this visit?"

"You may," he was answered. "I believe you have quite recently discovered your loss of something that many men would give a good deal to lose, but which, I daresay, you would not be sorry to regain, need I say that I allude to your wife?"

Gilbert Hamlyn strolled forward and seized the speaker by the collar. "Blackguard and scoundrel!" he said hoarsely, "for blackguard and scoundrel you are, it is written in your face. What do you know of my wife?"

Mr. James Spinifex threw off his grasp.

"Go slow," he observed, "you can't bluff me, and I don't need to bluff you. I know something that you want to know, and whether you end by knowing it or not depends on me."

He studied Gilbert Hamlyn with insolent deliberation.

"You want your wife's present address," he said; "well, I've got it—in my head, and nowhere else. There's only one thing that will bring it out, and that's dollars. You'll never find your wife again on your own, and you couldn't persuade her to come back if you did. Now, if you're in the mind to part with a couple of thousand dollars, and will put yourself in my hands, you shan't regret it."

"And if I refuse?" demanded Hamlyn. Mr. Spinifex snapped his fingers.

"I guess you can say good-bye to Mrs. H. for the rest of your earthly career!"

Hamlyn hesitated.

"Why has she gone away?" he asked.

Mr. Spinifex made a motion of irritation.

"Hadn't you better ask her that?" he said. "If you've got the cash, or can get it, I'll manage you an interview with her at once, if not you'll have to wait. But this is a case in which there's no time like the present."

Gilbert Hamlyn touched the bell.

"Supposing, Mr. Spinifex," he remarked, "I were to send for a policeman and have you arrested?"

The other sat down and stretched out his legs indolently.

"Go ahead," he said, "only I guess her name will be in all the papers to-morrow and her history. 'Ellie Lorimer, relict of the well-known crook and swindler, Bob Lorimer, and now wife of Mr. Gilbert Hamlyn, the successful writer.' H'm!"

Hamlyn abandoned the bell.

"Very well," he answered, slowly, "you and I, Mr. Spinifex, will have a little deal together. And if you play me false I shall know what course to take."

He re-entered the lighted bedroom, wrote out a cheque, and put on his overcoat.

"What am I risking?" he said to himself. "Possibly a great deal! Would to Heaven I had not lent my revolver! But there is no time to get it back, or opportunity to get another. Stay!"

He went out into the hall, took a thick walking-stick from the stand and felt it peculiarly. It was a sword-stick he had carried once or twice on special "commissions," when a firearm would have been inadmissible. The spring was in order, and the blade slid easily in its sheath. He put the stick under his arm, picked up his gloves, and regained the threshold of the drawing-room.

"I am at your service," he said. Mr. Spinifex bowed, clapped on his soft hat, and followed the journalist into the open air.

Hamlyn hailed a cab.

"I shall have to call on a friend as we go, for some cash," he remarked, "after that, no doubt you will direct the driver." His companion assented curtly, and Hamlyn gave the jehu the address. For the cab to reach it, for Hamlyn to leave Mr. Spinifex and return, was but the work of a quarter of an hour. As the journalist emerged from the shop of a large art dealer and jeweller in Piccadilly, the American stood up on the front of the hansom and spoke to the driver. The locality that he mentioned was a street in Pimlico not far from Victoria. The cabman saluted with his whip and drove off.

During the journey neither Hamlyn nor his companion spoke, each was covertly watching the other. At the point specified by the American they descended and the latter paid the fare. This done he grasped the journalist's arm.

"Pardon me, Mr. Hamlyn!" he observed, "but this is a curious neighbourhood, and you had better let me pilot you."

Hamlyn yielded reluctantly, to be led through street after street each dingier and more squalid than the other. Mr. Spinifex was evidently taking, of set purpose, a confusing route. Hamlyn lost track of his movements completely.

Finally his guide halted, and, drawing Hamlyn down a flight of area steps, tapped on a door at the bottom. At the end of a flagged passage, however, beyond the threshold of a room, a lamp was burning. The American pushed his companion towards it, and they gained a large, bare sitting-room, with dusty, barred windows, looking on a back street, where a gas flame was burning in a bracket attached to a wall. There were long serge curtains to the windows, Spinifex crossed and drew them closely.

The man who had ushered them into the apartment was short and square-shouldered, with a sullen, low-browed visage, and soiled, much crumpled linen.

"Waal," he said in a drawling nasal twang, "so you've got our joker. I reckon he's not come empty-handed?"

"I guess not," was the answer. "And now, Mr. Hamlyn, you have another thing to do, that is, to write a little note to your wife."

Gilbert Hamlyn started.

"Then she is not here!" he exclaimed.

"Not much!" said the shorter of the two Americans, "that's what your note is for, to bring her here. Luckily for you, Spinifex had me wait about for her this morning and follow her when she came out, or she'd have given all of us the slip."

"That's so!" added Mr. Spinifex, thrusting towards him a blotting pad, a bad pen, some cheap note paper, and some envelopes. "And a line will do it, something like this:

"MY DEAR WIFE—I am in the power of dangerous enemies. My life will depend on your accompanying the bearer. You will recognise my ring which I give him to show you. Be swift and secret.

"Not bad, aye, for an impromptu. That turquoise of yours is just the thing, and it will do for a keepsake for Hoby, won't it, Hoby?"

His assistant smiled grimly. "I guess I'm not likely to be able to spare it back again. Hurry up, Hamlyn, if you want Mrs. H. to be here to-night."

"Yes, get a move on you," said Spinifex sharply; "it's easy enough. When Mrs. Hamlyn left the flat she went to a big hotel, booked a room in a false name and settled down for a spell. Ellie Lorimer never was a fool, and she knows that to lie low under the hunter's nose is the best way of putting him off the track. Hoby will slip up with your note, and bring her down in a cab. Just you write as I dictate."

Gilbert Hamlyn took up the pen and put it down again. "I will not write a lie to entrap my wife," he exclaimed; "how do I know what your plan is?"

"Bah!" retorted Spinifex, "I could forge just such a letter, take your ring by force, and get her here on my own. But I want your fist, it's safer. And as for the lie—I'll soon make it true."

He lowered his hand to his heel, pulled from his boot a gleaming sheath-knife, and held the point to Hamlyn's throat.

"Write!" he said, brutally. A curious smile crossed Hamlyn's face, and he obeyed without further parley.

A few moments later Hoby's square, slouching form was disappearing through the door on his mission. Spinifex motioned the journalist to a battered sofa, and sat down himself, laying his knife on his knee.

He lit a cigarette and puffed at it calmly. Hamlyn, his stick planted between his knees, his palms crossed upon the horn handle, regarded him steadily. Slowly the journalist's fingers changed their position, so slowly that a church clock hard by had chimed out two quarters before they settled upon the hidden spring.

"You have remarkably large rats here," he said, glancing across the room. "May I ask if you make pets of them?" Spinifex started, caught up his dagger, and turned his head. "Rats," he ejaculated incredulously, "where?"

There was a gleam of steel in the air, and he looked back again towards the journalist to find a slender blade pointed at his breast.

"A word, a motion," said Gilbert Hamlyn, "and you are a dead man!"

The American laughed in his face, struck the sword blade aside with his dagger, and slipping out of his chair darted, weapon in hand, at the journalist.

Well was it for Gilbert Hamlyn that he was a practised amateur of fencing—in a dagger and rapier duel the dagger wielder is at an advantage. His short, strong blade forms a more powerful lever in a parry, and if he can but get inside his adversary's reach he has him at his mercy.

The American having shown fight, Gilbert Hamlyn knew his danger and leapt back. Spinifex followed him up, and the two sprang from side to side of the room with agile, tactlike footsteps, thrusting and parrying as they went.

Driven to bay in a corner, the journalist lunged, and his point pricked the American's shoulder, but before he could recover his weapon, Hamlyn had received at close quarters a stab with the American sheath-knife that made him reel. It had been planted over the heart. But luckily he wore his watch in an upper pocket, and the metal had turned the blow. Spinifex felt it, and struck again; the blade gashed the muscles of the swordsman's right fore-arm.

Suddenly he saw that the American had backed to the fire, and was striving with one hand to extricate a folded paper from his pocket. Succeeding, he swerved, and, still standing on his guard, flung the paper towards the fire. It missed the bars, and fell upon the hearth.

The American stooped sideways to pick up the paper. Hamlyn flung himself upon him. Sword and dagger met, clashed, and the point of the long blade buried itself in the throat of James Spinifex. He staggered and fell, the dagger wrested from his hand.

Hamlyn snatched up the paper. A leaping flame of the fire illumined it. It was an attested copy of an American death certificate. And the name of the dead was Robert Lorimer!

As he stood wondering what it might mean, there was the sound of feet in the passage without. Hamlyn dropped his weapon, caught up a clumsy poker from the grate, and leapt to the side of the door. It opened, and his wife entered the darkened room followed by the man Hoby. As the latter passed the hidden journalist, Hamlyn struck desperately with all his force at the American's head. He fell with a groan.

Gilbert Hamlyn threw down the poker, caught his wife in his arms, and drew her through the door, down the passage, and out into the street. He had forgotten his trusty sword stick, but in his hand he still clutched mechanically the attested death certificate of his wife's first husband.

* * * * *

The servants at the flat stared when their master and mistress came back together, and they saw that Gilbert Hamlyn's right arm was tightly bound with a crimson handkerchief and his face rather paler than its wont. Ella had somehow staunched the bleeding in the obscurity of the four-wheeler which had brought them from Pimlico, and in which she and her husband had exchanged their amazed and amazing explanations.

The discreet doctor who was sent for to provide the wound with more professional bandages asked no questions, but warned his patient to rest for a day or two.

When he had gone there was a romantic little supper at the flat, during which Gilbert Hamlyn and his wife sat on the same side of the table, and talked a great deal, if they did not eat much.

"It was a clever lie, my darling," said the journalist at last. "but thank Heaven it failed. Yet, if they had not laid a second plot to get us both into their power and exact I know not what terms from us, it might have succeeded, at least in parting us, if not in enriching them. But I am glad I gave the scoundrels their deserts. I wonder if I ought to have informed the police—I may have killed one or other of the villains."

Ella shivered. "Wait," she said, "we will look in the papers for a day or two and see if anything is reported."

"Discretion is the better part of—honesty!" commented her husband. "Well, we will lie low, for a time at any rate."

As it proved, they had no need ever to depart from their policy of silence and inaction. The Americans, killed or wounded, were never heard of again. And it was in vain that the journalist explored the recesses of Pimlico in search of the scene of his desperate duel.

R. Norman Silver.

£5 A Week for Life!

This is the

HUGE PRIZE OFFERED BY

Pearson's Weekly.

For Particulars, See Page 85.

Digitized by Google

ONE TOUCH OF CUPID.

Which Gives Us Fresh Views of Life.

She had always been counted, above all else, a good woman. Indeed, goodness was so entirely the aim of her existence, the incentive for her strivings, that she fell into the common error of narrowing her life and its interests.

That hers was the virtue of the untried, the untempted, she did not know, and not knowing, she deemed herself strong and brave and true.

The rigid line along which her life was patterned formed the criterion by which she judged others. Consequently her judgment was often severe.

She looked with disgust upon the follies and weaknesses of other women. In her eyes there was never justification for sin.

"Women should so train their wills that temptation should be impossible," was her verdict always.

Duty being the keynote of her life, it came about that she married a man whom she "esteemed" but did not love. True, there was no one else whom she loved at that time. Nevertheless, somewhere in the exalted regions of her nature was a sense that told her how inadequate was the placid response which this man's regard awakened in her.

She felt instinctively that she would never be really happy with him. There were chords in her being which he never touched, depths which his love of her did not stir.

But she made up her mind to be content and to forget the visions of forbidden blessedness which that inner sense had told her was hers by right.

So she married and settled down to an existence of seeming happiness. The world spoke of the match as ideal and envied her the harmony of her lot, for the world knew nothing of her subjective life.

There were times when dissatisfaction lifted its head and stared her relentlessly in the face. Times when the old dreams and imaginings came thronging back. But she stifled them resolutely. Had she not promised to be true? To her that meant true in thought as well as deed.

With the birth of her little girl came new duties, new interests to fill the blanks and hollows of her existence. In watching the baby form develop, the precious mind unfold, she forgot dissatisfaction.

For three years she lived in this new-found happiness and smiled to feel that the old restlessness had left her, never to return.

Then she met the other man.

The revelation did not come at once. There was a vague intimation of it perhaps the first instant that her glance met his. But it was in talking with him of the things she loved that she first felt the delicious dawning of a joy never before experienced.

"It is mental congeniality," her heart explained to her conscience, for she wanted above all things to be honest with herself.

But as the days sped by she found the changing situation harder to explain. This new exhilaration, this wonderful joyousness—what was it? Why was it? Could simply the pleasure of a hostess in entertaining her husband's friend be such as this?

Then came the flashing moment of ecstasy when her wide eyes, meeting his, read the whole truth, and, reading it, gazed back in mingled fright and shame and joy.

In the quiet of her room that night she tried to think, to reason, to explain. But instead of the firmness and high resolve which she had always believed would be hers under such circumstances, she felt a wild wish to hug this great gladness to her heart and keep it always.

In vain did she chide herself, over and over. In vain did she lean above her sleeping child, reminding her soul again and again of the sacred calling which was hers. No thought of husband, child or duty could drown the music of this great experience.

A long night of reproaches and resolves made her no less responsive to the glow and thrill of the other man's presence next day. In shame and in delight she let her gaze drink deep of the concentrated sweetness in his eyes.

She would not think now, nor reason. She would not face herself as before in the quiet of her room. Beyond the present she cared not to live.

To see him daily, to talk with him, to feel that he loved her, was happiness so great that neither remorse nor resolve could strangle it.

"I am going away," he said to her, a week earlier than his intended departure.

Stunned by the unexpectedness of the announcement, unable to consider anything save the one black thought that he was to leave her, she stood facing him dumbly, her eyes fully speaking the despair that descended upon her.

"You understand," he said at length, as he released her hand.

"Yes," she said, "I understand."

He left that afternoon. She made some excuse and did not accompany her husband to the station with his friend.

As she saw the carriage drive away, it seemed to her that she must and would do some desperate thing. But she did nothing more desperate than to sit with clenched hands and miserable eyes, staring blankly at surroundings from which all shine and colour were now blotted out.

Months passed before her struggling will could assert itself above the awful numbness and despair which had threatened to throttle it. But the time did come, at last, when she could look at the world again with calm eyes of hope and faith.

It was then she felt the transformation. It was then she knew that in place of her former harshness and prejudice was a warm, sweet kindness, a great compassion, a wide sympathy for all those on earth, whose fate it seems to suffer and to love.

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

THE DESPISER OF LOVE.

The Story of a Man who Chose Wealth.

THERE was a strong personality about Edwin Dale that raised him far above his fellow clerks at Chard's Bank. On the best of terms with one and all, yet none could say they knew him well. Some indefinable characteristic in his nature acted as a barrier to anything approaching friendship, and, apart from the daily association his fellow clerks had with him in the routine of their avocations, Dale was a stranger to them.

Different from most men, he seemed totally unaware of the existence of personal pronouns, and as reserved men always seem to be keeping something back, endless efforts were made off and on by the employés at Chard's to learn something of this enigma. But they were as ignorant at the end of twelve months as on the first day Dale joined the firm.

The various heads of the firm considered him a model clerk. He was as punctual as the sun, and accurate and precise in everything he did, and at the time of the opening of this story had just been appointed confidential clerk to the junior partner, Mr. Arthur Chard.

It was an old custom at Chard's that when one of the rank and file received sudden promotion to any important or confidential position, to celebrate it in the form of a supper, for which the recipient of the new post had the privilege of paying. On this occasion, however, and it was openly mooted as being the only one on record, there was no conviviality.

Dale explained that he knew what was the custom, and what he was expected to do, but pleaded indisposition—he called it liver. He hoped, nevertheless, that his enforced absence would not in any way interfere with the ancient precepts being upheld, and he would be more than pleased if they would allow him the privilege of suggesting that the Holborn——

His little speech was not permitted to go beyond that point, for one of the features of the supper was the ceremonials attached to it, which naturally necessitated the presence of the principal. So the supper was indefinitely postponed.

The possession of an affected liver is an affliction that only those who have realised the ownership of that special piece of the internal anatomy can truly understand and sympathise with, yet Dale, despite his, managed to demolish a good many epicurean dishes at his club that same evening, and as we find him now—is calmly smoking a cigar with two aristocratic-looking young men, while taking sips of liqueur coffee.

"What are you going to do with yourself to-night, Dale?" asks the elder of the two strangers.

"Oh, I think I shall turn in—I feel as if everything jars to-night."

"Come and have a turn in the card-room," suggests the other.

"I never play cards," Dale quietly replies.

"What's the difference between cards and backing a horse, old chap? Come, that's straining at the gnat a little, isn't it?"

"There's a vast difference. You back a horse by speaking three words, or by a mere nod—but cards, pshaw! breathing bad air, smoking, drinking, and losing a night's rest!"

"If Dale did that, what on earth would become of Chard's Bank, I wonder?"

"Oh, I suppose I should be compelled to resign, and no doubt my successor would be chosen from that class who have no brains to fuddle."

"Thanks, Dale."

"Well, you asked for it, Jack."

"If Dale is really going, I'll give you one in five for fifty, Jack."

"Not good enough; I'll take two hundred."

"Split it?"

"Any way you like."

"I wonder," thought Dale, as he slowly strode along Pall Mall, "what those two men would do if they knew I was on the brink of—of what—say ruin? This is almost Thursday. By Monday I must raise two thousand seven hundred. If I owed it to a man I don't think I would have any compunction in being dubbed a defaulter, but I cannot, no I cannot let Jessie in, she has sacrificed a lot for me, and I've been blackguard enough in that quarter. No, I see but one course open. It will provide the evening papers with a good bill. Absconding bank clerk—enormous defalcations—yes, and as soon as Jessie saw it she would return the two-seven to Chard's. I'll go to see her now."

"Is Miss Caister in and alone?" Dale asked the question from the boy in charge of the lift at Cambridge Mansions.

"I think so, sir, but I've been away for my supper. Going up, sir?"

"Yes."

Arrived on the fourth floor, he quickly crossed the balcony, and touched the electric bell on the door, whereon "Miss Caister" was printed.

"Is Miss Caister in?"

"Yes, sir."

"Alone?"

"She is, sir."

"That will do, I know the way."

In a room furnished with exquisite taste—if slightly foreign in appearance, sat Jessie Caister reading. When she heard the well-known footsteps of Dale she ran to meet him.

"Oh, Eddy, my love, this is kind of you. Have you come for supper? Are you in a hurry, because I will order it at once if you are?"

"No, dear, I'm neither in a hurry nor hungry. I've come just to have a talk—if you'll have me."

"Ah, but have you come to talk to me nicely, or to hedge that bet on Will-o'-the-Wisp?"

"Who told you that I had a bet on Will-o'-the-Wisp?"

"Sir John Farren himself. He came this morning and asked me what the price was. I told him——"

Digitized by Google

"A hundred to six."

"And then he offered to buy part of the book."

"The fool."

"I don't think he is a fool at all. He certainly allows that man Edgcombe to sponge dreadfully, but apart from that I don't think Sir John is at all foolish. But we are talking shop. Come and sit here by me, and put your arms round me, and love me as you used to do."

"No, dear, I would bore you, I——"

"You bore me, Eddie, you know you couldn't."

"It is sweet of you to say so, dear, but what I want is sleep. Let me lie down here for an hour, will you?"

"Will I? You stupid boy. Now wait a minute, don't be so impatient. Lift your head—no, this way. Isn't that better?"

"Yes, darling."

"Are you warm enough, or shall I put this rug round you?"

"Put it over my feet. Ah, that's splendid. Call me when it's time for me to go."

"Is that all?"

"All! What do you mean?"

"Don't you want a kiss?"

This was the lady bookmaker over whom all London was agog. No paper with a society column but had some personal item concerning Miss Jessie Caister—the usual paragraphs. How she preferred her soup cold, and never was known to tie her bootlaces in a double knot. Rumour, and the ever-moving current report, gave the most brilliant details of her career, all of which were wonderful pieces of news to the lady herself.

One particular item of truth, however, if put up for auction in Fleet Street, would have obtained a fabulous price, but that was a secret between Jessie and Dale.

And she sat in the subdued light watching the sleeping form of the man she loved, not a movement of his escaped her. If in restless turnings he moved the cushion from beneath his head, she would promptly and gently replace it. She was perfectly happy, and he?

The tender pressure of her lips—their very warmth, was still upon his when his brain became troubled with dreams. At first they were mere reflections of his active thoughts, the passing in a clouded phantasm of daily scenes and troubles. A period of deep sleep followed. Then he became conscious that he was dreaming again, but the dream took the form more of a vision. Someone was speaking to him, he knew not whom, nor could he tell what was said at first. Gradually, however, the buzzing in his ears took more definite sound, and he saw a figure kneeling beside him—and understood.

In his imagination he said to the figure at his side:

"Have you come to warn me?"

"No, to offer you your choice. Which will you have?—and your wish shall be granted. Honour, health, fame, happiness, or wealth?"

"Give me wealth—give me wealth."

"Eddie, Eddie, wake up."

"Give me, give me, oh——"

"What, dear—some water?"

"I was dreaming, Jessie."

"You are ill, darling. Do let me give you something—a little brandy?"

"No, I will go home. I'm all right except a touch of liver; it will be well in the morning."

And he went.

Settling day arrived, and Dale had failed to raise the necessary money. On the way to the office he pondered deeply over his affairs. His objection to robbing Chard's bank was not from any sense of honour—for he was absolutely unscrupulous—but it would end all his scheming and ambition.

"I will see Jessie and put her off for a week and do a plunge. It is my only chance!" he muttered, as he entered the bank.

Fate, however, in the shape of a fortune, rescued him from himself. Some old idiot—his thankful way of putting it—had left him seven or eight thousand a year. The old idiot in question was his father, who had died without leaving a will—at least none was found, fortunately for Edwin Dale, for he had long left the family circle with the proverbial shilling.

As soon as all the necessary legal arrangements were settled, Dale went away, "to let the thing blow over a bit," was his motive.

Much talk ensued at the club over Dale's good luck, but the general surprise was nobody knew Dale possessed a father. Major Bousfell and Sir John Farren were discussing Dale and his affairs one morning, and Sir John staggered the Major by remarking:

"I suppose he will marry Jessie Caister, now?"

"By Heavens, I hope not!"

"Ah, Major, have you a tender spot for that quarter?"

"Not I, my boy. I was meaning that Jessie Caister is far too good for him."

"You haven't a very exalted opinion of Dale seemingly?"

"I should think not; he is a cold-blooded cur!"

"I say, that's strong for you, Major."

"Yes, but I mean it."

"Well, I think Dale is strangely selfish, but I am certain Jessie Caister loves him—dotes on him."

"Aye, and he?"

"Who could fathom that statue?"

For six months nothing was heard of Dale. He seemed to have dropped completely out of existence. Sir John Farren was ruminating over the fact one Saturday morning. Sir John was an ardent footballer, and every Saturday during the winter assiduously scanned the lists of the teams in the sporting papers, and seeing the name of Dale, of course it recalled memories of Edwin.

"Hullo, Jack!" The newcomer was Major Bousfell. "Have you seen this?" handing over a paper.

"The vile sneak!" remarked Sir John after reading. "It's odd, I was just thinking of him. But how on earth has this come about?"

"Simple as possible. The Earl of Torpington and family are at Cannes for the winter. Dale has evidently found the climate there equally charming."

"It will kill Jessie Caister."

"Not it; she will be well out of it."

"I'll go to see her."

"Don't, Jack. She'll never like you again if you tell her. Your presence will always recall the misery—take my tip!"

"No; I'm off at once."

Ten minutes sufficed to reach Cambridge Mansions.

"You are an early visitor, Sir John."

"Yes. I say, Miss Caister, I wish you would drop the handle, I hate it!"

"But I cannot call you Mr. Farren."

"Why not call me Jack like the others? And you and I are such old friends! I mean to call you Jessie. Miss Caister is such a lot to get out, isn't it?"

"Yes—Jack."

"Now, Jessie, I want you to think as well of me as you can, because I'm going to run the risk of—of making you hate and despise me!"

"Whatever is coming? Are you broke, Jack?"

That was the maximum of calamities that Jessie thought could be wrong with Sir John Farren.

"No. I am not going to speak about myself at all. And, first of all, I'm going to ask you a question, and don't think it is out of mere curiosity or impertinent."

"You are going to frighten me, Sir John."

"Sir!"

"I mean Jack."

Digitized by Google

"Do you love Edwin Dale? Oh, Jessie, forgive me. I was brutal to ask so bluntly."

"Tell me all—quick, quick, is he dead?"

"No."

"He is ill, dying in some foreign land, and I here? Oh, tell me where he is."

"He is neither ill nor dying, but, Jessie, he is dead to you."

"To me?"

"Don't you understand? He is a cur and has——"

"No, no, you don't know. What has he done? I forgive him, whatever it is—even if it is murder."

"He is married."

"Married!" with a gasp.

"Yes, he's married Lady Isobel, second daughter of the Earl of Torpington."

"Leave me, Jack."

"No, I won't yet."

"I want to be alone—to think."

"Let me manage a bit for you. How is your book?"

"Full. I shall never take another bet. This is the hand of Providence; I should never have taken up such an unwomanly occupation!"

"Nonsense! I'll take your book over, if you'll let me."

"No, Jack. I mean what I said, so do go."

"And you won't hate me for bringing this bad news; but remember you have escaped marrying a blackguard!"

"I shall never hate you, whatever you do; you have been very kind to me this morning. I would rather have heard it from you than anyone. Now go."

"Now, then, Jack, you fool, pull yourself together, else you'll be in fine trim this afternoon," and with this admonition to himself he walked off as straight as a British soldier—which he was.

* * * * *

"I am going with father and the girls to Daly's to-night. Will you drop in?"

"I may if I get back in time, but in all probability I will have to run down to Newmarket."

"Whatever for, Edwin?"

"Well, you see, Isobel, every man in my position is supposed to do something these days, so I mean to keep a few horses."

"But we have enough, surely?"

"I mean racehorses, my dear."

"Oh, Edwin, cannot you find anything else than that?"

"I knew, of course, that you would object to any scheme I suggested, particularly if it would give me pleasure."

"I hate betting and horse-racing."

"Don't be foolish, Isobel! It is the duty of those who can afford it to try to improve the breed of racers in England to purify the turf generally."

"I am sure your motives are purely philanthropical, dear, but I dislike the idea all the same."

"Of course you do! You dislike anything I do, and will soon dislike me also, I suppose."

"Is that kind, Edwin?"

"Well you goad me to saying nasty things. You seem perpetually trying to thwart me."

"Do I, Edwin? Well, I won't even comment on your doings for the future, except that I do wish you would see someone about your cough."

"Oh, hang the cough! I beg your pardon, Isobel; come back—I am very sorry. Isobel!"

She had gone.

"I wonder what on earth is the matter with me. I used to have myself under better control. Isobel is very irritating sometimes; she either can't, or won't, see how her constant worrying annoys me, but I was a fool to swear. Yes, I'll go and see her."

Without speaking or knocking, he made an attempt to open the door of his wife's boudoir, but found it locked.

"Let me in, Isobel!" he asked pleadingly.

No answer.

"Isobel! Do you hear?"

"Yes, I hear, but I am busy, and prefer my own company just at present."

Dale's lips twitched slightly; it was a unique experience for him to be baulked in anything.

"Open this door at once, or I'll smash it in."

"Please yourself, of course."

For a moment his temper got the better of him, and he burst open the lock and entered the room.

"You had better continue the dictates of your breeding, and beat me now."

"Look here, madam"—grasping her by the wrist—"I want you to fully understand that I am the master of this house, and will be obeyed. Don't think you've got one of your blue-blooded puppets to deal with now."

"At least the blue-blooded puppets don't bully and swear at their wives. Edwin, you are hurting my wrist. Edwin, oh, you brute!" With an effort she managed to escape from him.

"My Lady Isobel requires taming, and objects to the process."

"You will not have the opportunity of repeating your cruelty."

"Ah, you purpose showing only the velvet paw—a wise discretion on your part—very wise."

"Don't flatter yourself. I mean to leave you to-day."

"Oh, surely not. Will it be for good?"

"Do you think I am going to live with a man little less than a wife-beater?"

"I didn't know you had any private income."

"I shall go home again."

"I don't somehow think you will."

"Do you imagine that your threats will prevent me?"

"Well, my dear, your father is indebted to me for a few thousands, and has been for some considerable time. If he allows you to remain in his house against your husband's wishes I will—ah, request an immediate settlement—and I know he hasn't got it, and matters might become strained. Think the matter over, my lady, but don't do anything rash."

When Dale returned in the afternoon he was surprised to find that his wife had gone to Cadogan Place, and at once jumped to the conclusion that she had left him for good; whereas Lady Isobel had merely gone to see her father to verify Dale's statement regarding the loan and to ask his advice.

All the pent-up venom and passion in Dale's nature appeared to suddenly spring into life, and instead of the calm, sneering, calculating man of the world, he was changed to a fiend incarnate. His features were distorted to ghastliness, and the violent fit of coughing that now and again attacked him with terrible violence only added to his awful appearance. James, the butler, when summoned, stared horror-stricken at his master.

"James, have my things packed for a year's foreign tour, and send them to Charing Cross Station."

"To-day, sir?"

"Yes, at once, and I want you to pay all the servants off and shut up the house as quickly as you can. If Lady Isobel returns she is not to enter this house on any pretext, do you understand?"

"Ye—es, sir."

"Have her clothes and things sent to Cadogan Place."

"I believe this is her ladyship coming in now, sir."

"Yes, go and obey the other orders."

"You have changed your mind too late, my lady; you can return to your father's house, no one wants you here."

"Edwin! Whatever do you mean?"

"Neither more nor less than what I said. In an hour's time this house will be shut up, so if you want any of your effects you had better see after them."

"Edwin, dear, you are not well. Oh, surely you don't mean this just because of the few words we had this morning. Edwin, speak to me!"

Digitized by Google

"It's too late, I tell you; my mind is made up."

"Oh, Edwin, darling, forgive me; I didn't mean to vex you like this."

"Get out of my way. I am going."

"No, no. I cannot let you go like this. Edwin, my love, my husband, forgive me."

She stood facing him, with her arms pleadingly extended, and as he made a stride forward, she flung herself against him, crying and imploring him not to leave her. He tried to disengage himself from the nervous arms that were round him, but they held him with the strength of despair. Losing every atom of control of himself he flung her violently from him, and Lady Isobel fell with a crash against the marble fireguard, her head striking the outer rail with a horrible thud—she was dead.

Dale left the house a different man—he hadn't the remotest idea that he had killed his wife. The evil passions deserted him as quickly as they had risen, and he felt almost inclined to go back and make it up with Isobel; and possibly might have returned on that errand, but for one reason. He didn't love her, and had never done since his marriage, which, in fact, was only a means to attain an end.

"It is always well," Dale mused as he walked towards Cambridge Mansions, "to keep one good card in reserve, if only to gain the lead. Yes, I will play mine now, and when it scores, as it is sure to, Jessie and I will leave this miserable climate and go somewhere where there is warmth and sunshine."

"Miss Caister said she would be back by six, did she? Ah, then, I will wait, it is nearly that now."

A bright red fire gave not only actual heat to the room, but reflected a warm glow on the surroundings, and as Dale sat watching the ever-changing pictures in the grate, his thoughts gradually released from their continual strain, ran riot for a while, but the warmth and soothing influence soon impelled reflections of that last visit, and everything that occurred, even to his dream, was vividly depicted in his mind. The reverie was interrupted by the sound of voices and footsteps approaching, and Dale turned to see who it was just as Jessie and Sir John Farren entered the room.

"How do you do, Jessie? How are you, Jack?

"What's the matter? Can't you speak?" as Jessie and Sir John drew back.

"Yes, Dale, kindly drop Christian names for the future. In fact, I think we had better drop acquaintanceship altogether. My wife and I don't——"

"Your what?" meaningly.

"My wife, sir," taking Jessie's hand.

Dale sank into a chair; he tried to articulate something, but the red stream of life choked his utterance, save a sickening gurgle; he had burst an artery.

When Sir John returned to Cambridge Mansions, after taking his wife to a neighbouring hotel, two men accosted him.

"Excuse me, Sir John," said one. "Is Mr. Edwin Dale upstairs?"

"He was; why do you ask?"

"We're two police officers, and we have warrants for his arrest for forgery and murder. Do you know where he is, sir?"

"Heaven knows that; he is dead." C. E. Cowan.

£50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

A reader of SHORT STORIES won a prize of £10 in 1894 and with the help of this money emigrated to America making a fortune out of the cycle boom of 1897 and 1898. He recently wrote a letter, under the nom-de-plume of "Dayton," to the Editor of SHORT STORIES, inclosing dollar bills to the value of £50, and asking that this money may be offered as prizes in five sums of £10 each.

The Editor has given the matter very careful consideration, and has arrived at the conclusion that, as his anonymous correspondent was in great want when he won his prize, the most satisfactory manner of distributing his gifts of £50 would be to offer them to those who can give the best reasons for receiving them.

You may be wanting to emigrate to one of our Colonies. You may want £10 to buy something you have needed for a long time. You may want to clear off some small debts that have been worrying you. Or you may want to trade with the £10 and, like "Dayton," turn it into a fortune.

Whatever your reason for wanting it may be, write it down in the space below, and send it to "The Competition Editor of SHORT STORIES," Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Dayton 4," by Tuesday, January 20th.

Readers may send as many reasons as they like, provided each is written on a separate coupon. Another coupon will appear next week. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors may enter only on this understanding.

CUT OFF THE COUPON HERE.

FOURTH COUPON.

My reason for wanting £10 is.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

Name.....Address.....

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. A celebrated French artist in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman and friend of Lady Peggy.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

The House in the Rue Burgoyne.

Of the scene that followed I find it difficult to give an adequate description. The whole vast mass of spectators rushed pell-mell to the spot where Adams, who had been lifted from the horse, was lying. Loud and violently excited voices filled the air with shouts, one faction contending that Adams, having failed to ride the horse, the race, so far as Maraschino was concerned, was void; the other as vehemently asserting that, having secured first place, the horse must be held to have won. And in the midst, unconscious of the loud voices, the flushed and angry faces, the din and clamour of the crowd, the young jockey lay, unmindful of it all.

Stanley had hurried to his side, and, resting the lad's head on his knee, was trying to force some brandy through the fast-closed lips. Somebody called, another fetched a doctor, there was a moment's pause—a pause in which the violent clamour died away, and then in a quiet voice the doctor gave his verdict.

"He is dead," he said slowly. "The cause?" he shrugged his shoulders. "Heart affected, I should say, but we shall tell better later."

"I say the man was drugged," cried Stanley, starting to his feet, "drugged, and by you!" and, like a flash, he sprang at Eastacres, striking him in the face. The next instant he was surrounded and dragged back. The Duke, pale as death, save for the livid mark upon his cheek, retained his self-control, and listened quietly to the regrets and apologies of the stewards of the race for Forbes' unprovoked attack.

"Mr. Forbes is suffering from great excitement," he said calmly. "He has had much trouble of late—domestic and otherwise. He has dropped a good deal of money over the race, I fancy."

Then, with a sneer at Forbes, he turned away, murmuring a few words in my ear as he passed. I nodded in reply, and signed to Baron Rolla to approach me.

"Where is Belinda?" I asked.

"My dear lady," he returned, "I was about to ask you the same question. I left Miss North at her own request to find out what was happening to that poor young fellow, Adams; when I returned she had vanished, gone, no trace of her to be seen."

"She may, perhaps, have left the course, and be waiting for us in your motor, Baron."

"I have already looked there, but in vain."

"What can have happened?" I asked in agitation.

The Baron smiled.

"Nothing for which you need feel concerned, I am sure," he said. "Miss North is an adventurous young lady, possibly we shall find her exploring the stables, or——" he paused, "she may have come after me to inquire for herself into Adams' condition. I will go and find out."

As he spoke he hurried off, and, a moment later, was in close conversation with Stanley, who, quieter now, and more like himself, was ready to answer the Baron's questions.

The latter returned, looking rather troubled.

"No," he said slowly, "Forbes cannot help us at all. He suggests," the Baron frowned as he spoke, "he suggests that the Duke of Eastacres may have driven her home. Is it likely, do you think?"

"Not for an instant. Eastacres has only this moment left the course."

"Then," said Rolla dubiously, "I don't know what to do. I have questioned the officials closely, and no one remembers to have seen her. She is certainly not here," he glanced at the rapidly thinning crowd.

"We had better go at once to the Hotel D'Auteuil," I said. "Belinda is quite likely to have started off by herself. In all probability she took a fancy for a ride on a tramcar. She's a dreadful responsibility, Baron; one never knows what she will do next."

"A responsibility I should be more than thankful to accept," he said, flushing.

I shook my head.

"I'm afraid it is no good for me to raise false hopes, Baron," I said with a sigh. "There's only one man who has any chance of winning Belinda, and that's the Duke."

"The Duke!" Rolla gave me a quick, curious glance from his keen black eyes. "Incredible," he said, astonished out of his self-control, "Miss North has told me over and over again that she disliked——" He paused, bit his lip, angered at his lack of reticence.

"Oh, as to that," I returned lightly, "young girls often affect dislike for a man when, in reality, they feel very differ-ently. Take my word for it, Baron, Belinda will marry Eastacres yet."

Digitized by Google

He looked politely incredulous, and escorted me to his automobile. We arrived at the house of my friend the Marquise in a few minutes, to find that Belinda had not yet returned.

The Baron seemed surprised, almost, I thought, alarmed. I was amused at his anxiety, amused though a little apprehensive.

My apprehension increased when Paul de Sonnaz joined with Rolla in declaring that a vigorous search should be instituted for Belinda.

"Who does she know in Paris besides ourselves and the rest of our set, Lady Peggy?" questioned Paul.

"There is Mrs. Murchison-Lee," I suggested, "she is putting up at the Nord, I believe. Belinda may be there, or——" I paused, "she may have gone to Mrs. Forbes. She's rather fond of Sheila."

"We will go to both places," said Rolla, and Paul eagerly fell in with the suggestion.

I had no option but to accompany them. Paris was full, and the streets crowded, but we went at a good round pace, and, regardless of the cries of the unfortunate cochers and enraged pedestrians, whirled round to the Nord and on to Sheila's. The latter was out, also Midge; at neither place had Belinda been seen.

"We will return to my aunt's," said Paul quietly. "If she is not there"—he paused, his boyish face turned pale, and a look of resolution tightened his mouth.

Meanwhile, for all my calmness and my self-possession, I was undergoing a purgatory of doubt and fear.

I knew where Belinda was—had known it all along. At that moment she was in a house in the Rue Burgoyne, the house where Honoria and Mark Striven lived, the very house to which Honoria had warned her never to come.

A verbal message had reached Belinda, presumably from her weak-minded ladyship, begging and praying the girl to come to the Rue Burgoyne at once, as Honoria was in great trouble and distress. Those who have read my previous articles do not need me to tell them the effect of this appeal on my charge. Then and there she rushed off without a word to me, without a look at Rolla, filled with pity for her friend and indignation against those who were troubling her.

A fiacre was waiting into which Belinda stepped with unsuspecting readiness, and was driven away to the house in the Rue Burgoyne.

In that house the Duke of Eastacres was to play his last most desperate card, to force her into marriage.

It was now close on seven o'clock. I had hoped that Belinda's absence would be unremarked until much later. If I felt uneasy before, judge of my state of mind when, with a sudden inspiration, Paul rose to his feet and shouted to the Baron to alter his course.

"I know where she is!" he exclaimed. "Ten thousand to one Belinda's gone to see Eastacres' sister. She told me about her only yesterday, how unhappy the poor creature was and what a brute the Duke had been to her. What do you say, Lady Peggy, isn't it possible she may be there?"

For a moment I could not speak, my heart throbbed so violently that the agony was most acute. Gasping, I put up my hand.

"She's not likely to be there," I said, and then, white with pain and agitation, I fell back in my seat with a faint request for air.

I really felt very ill, and the concern the two men displayed was genuinely excited. All the same, I took advantage of the attack to gain time. It was quite an hour before I felt sufficiently recovered to leave the café where Paul had brought me.

During that hour I had contrived to send a word of warning to the Duke. Whether or no my message would have the desired effect, I could not say. I could only hope and pray for its success.

"And now," said Rolla, when at last I was able to take my seat in the car, "what are we going to do?"

"Go as quickly as possible to the Rue Burgoyne," said Paul. "Belinda has not returned home. If she is not at Honoria's I shall begin to be alarmed."

Without further question or delay we started. It was a long drive to the house, which lay outside Paris, some few miles from the town, and the sun had set when at last we reached our destination. The house stood by itself, in a large garden thickly planted with trees. It was gloomy and deserted in the extreme, the windows were all shuttered, and the garden gate was barred; the whole place spelt desolation, not a sign or sound of life about it!

There was no bell or knocker at the gate, so, after a little demur, Rolla forced it open and led the way up the moss-grown path to the house door. Here we waited for some ten minutes, pulling an old and rusty bell handle at intervals, or knocking loudly on the panels of the door.

At last an answer came. An old woman, rather dirty and stone deaf, appeared, and told us that the family were away!

She paid no heed to Paul's impatient questions, but repeated the formula with a queer shake of the head, until in despair he gave up trying to communicate with her, and flung off down the garden path. Rolla followed more slowly, while I, for reasons of my own, continued to loiter some distance behind them both, and gazed intently at the upper windows of the house. At length I was rewarded by the appearance of the signal upon which the Duke and I had agreed. The shutters of the attic window were unbarred, and from the open casement streamed a handkerchief. For one second only it fluttered in the breeze, but in that second the world seemed changed. It told me that Belinda was in the house and that things were shaping as the Duke and I desired, that I was so much nearer £20,000.

An immense weight was taken from my mind. I rejoined my two companions with a feeling of triumph, almost exultation.

"What next?" said Paul anxiously. "Shall we not communicate with the police? It is after nine, and one shudders to think of Belinda robbed, ill-treated, perhaps." He paused, and in the faint light of the May evening I saw his face was very pale.

"We will not go to the police," I said firmly, "neither will we make any further inquiries of a public nature. Whatever is done now must be carried out with the greatest discretion."

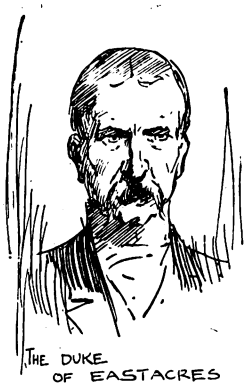
He looked puzzled, and showed signs of making protest.

"You at least should understand my reason," I said severely. "Belinda is a young, a high-spirited, hot-tempered girl, ready to throw conventionality and custom to the wind—ready, if needs be, to risk her whole future for the sake of an impulse. You know this as well as I. You realised to the full the girl's generous, guileless, but most thoughtless disposition. Yet you encouraged her in every imprudence, assisted her in every whim. And now"—I threw out my hands indignantly—"what is the result? Belinda is missing, gone where and to whom? Ah, you have much to answer for, De Sonnaz. As I live, I fear Belinda has left her friends, abandoned her future, disobeyed her father, and run away with David Carr."

"Impossible!" said Paul.

"It is easy to say that now," I retorted. "You evidently thought otherwise when you encouraged her to speak of him, calling yourself his friend and a lot of other rubbish. A nice friend you've been to Belinda, at all events. Oh, don't excuse yourself," as he broke out into protestations of innocence and regret, "the thing's done, the mistake's been made. What we have to do now is to avoid all scandal and bring her quickly back to the Hotel D'Auteuil. You, Baron," I turned to Rolla, "must go to the British Embassy and find out if Carr has been or is likely to go there to arrange for his marriage.

Digitized by Google



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

with Belinda. Paul must return to the Marquise and narrate a colourable story as to Belinda's and my absence. For myself," I paused, "I intend to find my charge."

The Baron murmured his admiration of my intrepidity, and readily agreed to play the part assigned to him. Paul was not so easily disposed of.

"You are wrong, Lady Peggy," he said firmly. "Belinda gave her word she would not see or speak to Mr. Carr without your knowledge. I will swear she has not broken her word."

"Where is she, then?" I asked impatiently. "You waste time, precious time in useless discussion. Believe me or not, as you will, but do not hinder me. I must go."

With a nod to the two men I hastened off, past the house in the Rue Burgoyne, out towards the open country. Rolla and De Sonnaz gathered that I possessed certain knowledge of the girl's whereabouts that I did not wish to share with them, and did not attempt to follow or to question me. A few minutes later, to my intense relief, I heard the sound of the automobile travelling swiftly towards the city.

I took a deep, hard breath. The strain of the last few hours had been severe; that which was to follow would be even greater. I shrank back at the prospect. I was almost tempted to return to the Hotel D'Auteuil and leave matters—and Belinda—to chance.

I should have a few hours' rest and quiet, and to-morrow—with a sigh I dismissed the pleasant prospect. No rest, no quiet for me till the marriage of Belinda to the Duke was an accomplished fact.

I waited another hour, and then, when the clocks from the neighbouring churches chimed half-past ten, I retraced my steps, entered the old iron gate, traversed the weed-grown path, and stood once more before the portals of the house in the Rue Burgoyne.

All was silent and still therein. I had half expected to hear angry voices, Belinda's and the Duke's. I had dreaded the former's cries of distress. The strange, the deathly stillness of the place quickened my sense of fear. What if the Duke had played me false, what if Belinda were not in this grim house? What——?

I all but cried out in my alarm, and eagerly sought to find a way by which I could enter the house without the knowledge of those within. The front door was fast locked, so also the small door at the back. The windows, still barred and shuttered, afforded me no chance of ingress. I was in despair, and had almost resolved to formally demand admittance, when the flash of a lamp in a window in the side of the house from a room on the first floor caught my eyes. Immediately, following the train of thought suggested, my glance fell upon a block of outhouses, disused stables, and wood-sheds, which, though fallen on evil days, were in a better state of preservation than the rest of the property. Moreover, and this had first attracted me, they were built so close to the house that there was but the distance of a few feet between them. And from the window of the room above the stable one could look straight into the window of the room from where the lamp had shone. The room, where, unless I had been shamefully deceived, Belinda and the Duke were now quarrelling.

I formed my resolution quickly, and acted upon it then and there. Five minutes later found me leaning from the window of the stable, listening intently to what was happening in that room so short a space away.

It was an ideal position. I could see all, hear all that passed, my presence being unsuspected.

The room was lit by a small hand-lamp, placed on a table near the window. Bending towards each other, so that the flicker of the flame lit up their faces, were two figures—Belinda and the Duke!

"Where is Honoria?" she cried, "and by whose orders have I been kept in this place, this wretched room, for hours? I came here in response to an appeal for help from your unhappy sister, and when I came——" she paused, "you know what happened," she cried angrily. "I see it in your face—mean, treacherous, false——"

He stopped her with a gesture.

"You were brought into this room," he said calmly, "and the door—a thick, stout door, was locked on you. All that has happened to you since you left the racecourse this afternoon was pre-arranged. By whom, you ask? Can you not guess—it was your most devoted slave," and he bowed in a mocking fashion, pressing his hand to his heart.

"And Honoria?" The girl's face had grown white; she glanced half fearfully over her shoulder towards the door. "Where is she?"

"Honoria, to the best of my belief, is with her husband at the Hotel du Nord. They have gone to see your friend, Mrs. Murchison-Lee."

"Then—then—I am here alone with you?" The words were forced from her white lips; she trembled, and grasped the table for support.

"Alone with me," he replied softly.

She turned upon him swiftly, suddenly, all traces of weakness gone, her eyes flashing, the red blood mounting to her cheeks.

"What do you want?" she said fiercely.

"That is a simple thing to answer. Listen, and you will comprehend exactly how the matter stands. We are here, you and I, in a lonely house some distance out of Paris. You will stay here until to-morrow. And then," he smiled—"then if you wish you shall return to the house of the Marquise D'Arteuil. And do you know what will happen then? The Marquise will refuse to receive you. Society will be closed against you."

"What then?" Belinda asked, with scorn equal to his own. "My friends will believe no ill of me. My enemies can say what they like. It will not trouble me."

"Your friends will not be able to believe you. This"—he drew out a note—"this will testify to the truth of what I say, that you came here to meet me by appointment, an appointment made by yourself. Ah! you may well turn pale. Did you think to outwit me? Look"—he thrust the letter in her face—"your writing, your words, your signature. 'Come, come this evening, ten o'clock in the Rue Burgoyne.—Belinda' Yes," as she gave a quick and startled cry, "yes, it is true. You sent me the note and I, I am here."

He stepped towards her, and took her arms roughly.

With a cry she broke from him, and flung herself against the door. It would not yield despite her strength; the panels did not give an inch. Eastacres waited till the fury of her onslaught had abated. Then he drew near her.

"Sit down," he said, "and let us talk the matter out. It will not help you to make all this noise, no one can hear; be reasonable and listen to what I have to say."

"I will not marry you," she said, "and if I promised to-night, I should break my word to-morrow."

"You will promise for to-night, for to-morrow and for always," he said persistently. "If not, at the first sign that you intend to go back upon your word, I send this note and the account of the circumstances that preceded it, to your father, to David Carr, and to the principal papers in London and Paris. Do you think your David will believe in you then?" he sneered.

"He will always believe in me," she answered, "nothing could shake his trust in me." At the thought of the young engineer her eyes grew soft, the beautiful mouth trembled. I was sorry for her at that moment, truly sorry. But I was none the less determined that she should not marry Carr.

"Men are not credulous as you suppose," Eastacres answered. "Consider the facts. You leave the racecourse without a word to your friends, without a hint to anyone, and drive here in a hired cab. You do this on the very day that Honoria wrote to say she was calling on you at the Hotel D'Arteuil as soon as she left Mrs. Murchison-Lee's. You had that letter?" "I thought so," and he smiled malevolently.

Digitized by Google

"I forgot it," Belinda answered, "as I forgot everything when I had Honoria's message begging and praying me to come here."

"Where is that message?" said Eastacres grimly.

"It was brought me by a boy. He said he was employed here to——" she paused, frightened at the look on Eastacres' face.

"There is no boy employed here," he said curtly. "Honoria and Mark have but one servant, an old woman."

"Then, then"—she paused—"it is all a trick," she panted, "a vile, horrible trick. What shall I do?" She glanced round wildly. "David, David," she cried, "what shall I do?"

"Face facts, my dear Belinda," said the Duke, "and acknowledge yourself beaten. To-night I ask you to be my wife. After to-night"—he paused significantly—"you, not I, shall be the one to plead. Refuse me, and I will make your life unbearable. Everywhere I will follow you, everywhere you shall find averted faces. Your friends shall one and all turn from you. This David that you talk of, you shall lose even him."

"Never," she said proudly; "come what may, David will stand by me."

"To his undoing," was the reply; "what chance would he have of rising in the world with a wife like you? A woman of whom scandal told a thousand tales. You yourself would refuse to marry him."

He spoke quickly, coldly, without a touch of heat or passion, but his words carried a terrible conviction. Belinda had been long enough in Society to understand that much of what he threatened could be done. The Duke was strong-willed, persistent, untiring. He would work out his purpose to the end, no matter at what cost. For the first time terror, real and tangible, showed in the girl's face. She was very young, very lovely, and life had been pleasant to her. She could not face the thought of coldness, suspicion, such as Eastacres pictured, unmoved. Something of the world's cruelty—our world's—she had seen meted out to Sheila Forbes on her re-entry into Society. But Belinda was threatened with something far worse to bear. No wonder she faltered, no wonder that even her high spirit quailed. David, her rock of strength, her shelter from all harm, even he would turn from her, or rather she must, dare not appeal to him.

With natural quickness, the Duke realised what was passing in her mind. With a sudden change of manner he drew close to her, and in a voice exquisitely modulated besought her to yield.

"Be my wife," he pleaded. "Don't harden your heart against me. I love you with all the strength, the passion of a man who has known and tasted life and love. Dear one," he clasped her hands, "don't refuse me. You shall not regret your choice. I vow it, I swear it. I lay my heart at your feet. I put my life into your hands. Dearest"—he kissed her fingers eagerly, "dearest, will you not listen to me."

With a gesture of contempt she tore her hand from his grasp, and with all the insolence of youth and inexperience laughed—laughed in his face.

"Love," she said scornfully, "coming from your lips! The word is defiled. You don't know the meaning of it. Love!"—she threw back her head—"Oh, how I scorn and how I hate you," she said fiercely. "Do what you will, slander me if you can, spread your lies broadcast, still I defy you—still I reject you, and will, unto the last."

Her words, her look, swept from him all gentleness, all tenderness towards her. His face hardened, his eyes glittered, cold, cutting as ice. He paled to a deathly whiteness, and with a swift and sudden gesture he advanced towards her.

"Now," he said, "for the last time, will you be my wife?"

"Never," she answered, "never. You shall kill me first."

A strange look came into the Duke's face, the look that gleams from a man's eyes when for a moment the fierce primitive instinct, the desire to kill, beats down the thousand civilising influences that war against it. I held my breath, wondering what would happen next. Would he kill her? Would he, in his fury, crush out that fair young life rather than let her marry David Carr?

[This question will be answered in next Tuesday's issue.]

Your Editor Chats.

I DON'T pretend—no editor does—to be able to please everybody, but I am certainly surprised that H. M. L. should have felt justified in writing me a very long letter, proving to his own satisfaction that Short Stories is not worth the penny asked for it. He starts with the cover and points out that the coloured pictures on it are not nearly so attractive as the old plain buff cover in which it used to be wrapped. Next, he takes the serial story, which he regards as "devoid of human interest," and regards Brett as "a conceited idiot." The "Belinda" series next comes under his knife, and these articles he politely terms "balderdash," adding that, from his knowledge of the world, such things as are related never take place in High Society. There is much more of this sort of thing, ending up with the remark that the least interesting portion of the whole paper is that "egotistical column of self-glorification known as 'Your Editor Chats.'"

Of course I don't take this sort of letter seriously, but I give you extracts to show you how really funny some people unconsciously are. The best test of the popularity of any publication is the circulation book, and the fact that the circulation of Short Stories has during the past year almost doubled itself, is sufficient refutation of the ridiculous criticisms my correspondent makes.

Moreover, I have received hundreds—several hundreds—of letters from readers within the past few week testifying to the excellence of both "Belinda" and the serial story. All these letters have been spontaneous expressions of their writers' feelings and go to show that H. M. L. is alone in thoughts. His knowledge of life in High Society is certainly not wide, or he would have known that every line of "Belinda" was absolutely true. Those things which seem most incredible are the most interesting. If they were not, I shouldn't trouble to publish the series.

Another powerful new serial will start in a few weeks from the pen of one of your favourite authors.

Scotch readers will be pleased to hear that another Tartan cover will be issued with Short Stories dated February 14th. The Tartan will be that of the Clergy.

Your Editor.

Result of the "Burglar" Competition.

THE Gramophone prizes have been awarded to:

P. Hart, "The Hollies," Vicarage Road, Waddon.
S. A. G. Macquoid, 32 South Street, Greenock.
W. B. Good, 22 Cambridge Road, King's Heath, Birmingham.
Mrs. M. Matthews, 12 Jacob Street, Toxteth Park, Liverpool.
E. Moore, 285 Borough Road, Birkenhead.
E. Barker, 129 Queen's Parade, Scarborough.
Mrs. E. M. French, 194 Birkbeck Road, Beckenham.
D. Ryan, 11 Upper Elmwood Avenue, Ranelagh, Dublin.
L. Judd, St. Monica, Whitton Road, Twickenham.
S. Bryant, 18 Llantwit Street, Cathays, Cardiff.

Digitized by Google

Love Problem No. 5.

WAS HE . . JUSTIFIED?

How Should a Man Act when in Love with an Engaged Girl?

THERE must have been something more than coincidence in it. Every morning as the 'bus swung round the corner of Majoram Street, it had to wait a minute or two owing to the street being so crowded.

The first time Jack Sutcliffe noticed it from his seat beside the driver was one morning in September. When the 'bus jolted clumsily to a standstill he glanced up from his paper and found himself gazing straight at the most comfortable little breakfast party he had seen for some time.

There were only three people—father, mother and daughter. At the first two he glanced carelessly, but as soon as his eye rested upon the girl, his heart was gone in a moment. Such a bit of a girl as she was, with the most ridiculous untidy curls you ever saw, and a little nose you could have ruled lines with, it was so straight. And then her mouth, why, you couldn't have measured it to save your life, for first it dimpled into a smile at one end and then drooped at the other, and the next moment opened into the merriest little laugh you ever heard. Not that Jack Sutcliffe could hear it, although he soon began to wish he could.

Next morning the 'bus stopped again at exactly the same corner. He glanced eagerly towards the window and saw the same three persons seated as before at the breakfast table. But this time he looked beyond the elderly people and bestowed his attention entirely upon the girl, finding her more bewitching than before; and when the 'bus presently rumbled forward again he turned in his seat so as to feast his eyes and his heart until the last possible moment.

He began to look forward to the morning ride, and when on one occasion the 'bus actually swung its way round the corner and down Majoram Street without stopping he was quite indignant with the driver; scarcely spoke to him until they reached his destination, and was irritable at business all the morning.

Of course this sort of indefinite adoration could not go on for ever, and as Jack was a practical man, he began to cast about for means to obtain an introduction. Here again Fate befriended him, or so he thought. The same lucky chance that had caused him to glance at the window just as the 'bus stopped, now led him to accept an invitation from a friend to a literary evening, when one of the first persons he saw was the very girl he had tried for several weeks to meet!

"How much is the subscription to this affair?" he whispered excitedly.

"For the session?"

"Yes. I want to join. Am I eligible?"

"Oh, yes. Five shillings."

"Right. I say, that's—that's not a bad-looking girl over there, the one with a pale blue top-dress, and a black skirt."

"Oh, Miss Mellor?" His friend laughed slightly. "Curious you should have noticed that identical girl. Do you know, I'm engaged to her, or practically so. Not settled in so many words, but it's quite understood on both sides."

"Oh—yes—yes, of course."

The next moment he found himself standing opposite to the corkscrew curls and the dimpled mouth, and all the other perfections. Then his friend said something—he knew not what—and she smiled in such a maddening way that poor Jack found himself wondering what would happen if he suddenly seized her in his arms and kissed her. But the next moment he realised that his friend was staring at him in surprise and he bowed confusedly.

"Very pleased indeed," he murmured; "the 'bus stops every morning, you know."

After this, seeing their looks of amazement, he pulled himself together and managed to talk sensibly. But all through the evening he paid very little attention to the literary proceedings. Several times when she happened to turn her head she found his eyes fixed upon her, with an earnestness which indeed was one of Jack's best characteristics.

Such an evident case of love at first sight both flattered and alarmed her. It set her thinking too, and girls of twenty think quickly, almost as quickly as boys of twenty. We may as well admit at once that she was not by any means engaged to Jack's friend, although he undoubtedly was first favourite.

Of course Jack had no idea she had so quickly guessed the state of his feelings, and indeed would have been very sorry had he known it; for he was an honourable fellow and had no idea of endeavouring to supplant his friend.

But one thing he could not help noticing afterwards, and it hurt him quite as much as having his hopes dashed at the moment when success was in sight. His friend, although by his own statement, engaged to be married, or practically so, still continued to spend his spare evenings in what he vaguely termed "knocking about town."

Now Jack never accompanied him on these expeditions, for he had very soon severed his connection with the worshippers of Bacchus, but he lodged in the same house as his friend and could not help noticing that frequently when the latter returned home his footsteps were decidedly unsteady. On more than one occasion he was brought home in a cab and Jack was called downstairs to help him to his room.

So long as Fred Winston was single and with nobody's happiness dependent upon him, Jack held, and rightly, that this conduct was entirely a matter for his own consideration. But his engagement to Miss Mellor—which was presently announced—made the case much more serious, especially as he appeared to make no effort to keep straight. In fact, he was, if anything, worse than before, for the restraint necessary when he visited the house in Majoram Street made him abandon all self-control as soon as he was free.

A very awkward question rose in Jack's mind. None of the Mellors had any idea of the double life led by Winston. Probably the knowledge of this would end the engagement at once. Jack had an uneasy feeling that it was his duty to tell them, although the mere thought of becoming a tale-bearer, and with interested motives, as people would say, was most repugnant to him; and probably Miss Mellor would never speak to him again whilst loving Winston all the more.

Besides, Winston might reform either before or when he married. On the other hand if he did not do so, his wife's life would be a tragedy. But there were thousands of women with drunken husbands—that did not affect the present case. But it was not his business to interfere—it is every man's business to save his friends when they are in danger. But what right had he to judge Winston? he was not going to judge him, but to bring the truth to light and leave it to those whom it concerned to decide.

And so on for half an hour until at last all the doubts and difficulties had been swept away and he stood face to face with his duty.

Digitized by Google

That night when Winston arrived home he tackled him fair and square.

"I've something rather unpleasant to say to you, old man," he said; "but it's got to be done."

"Well?"

"It's this," said Jack steadily; "you're going to be married. Miss Mellor is a girl who's been very tenderly brought up, and if you come home to her in this state——"

"Well, what if I do?"

"You'll break her heart, that's all," said Jack earnestly. "Don't you see, old chap, it's no use thinking you'll change after you're married. If you don't stop now, you never will stop while you live."

"Will you mind your own business?"

"I'm sorry, but——"

"Never mind being sorry, keep yourself out of my business, that's all."

"I had rather the duty had fallen to anybody else, Fred, but I shall have to tell them next time."

"You may tell them now if you like, you sneak, I can easily explain your motives to them afterwards."

"If it means losing Miss Mellor's good opinion," said Jack quietly, though his heart sank at the thought; "and that's the most serious part of the affair to me, I'll still do what I say."

But the other man stumbled out of the room, uttering all sorts of threats against his former friend.

TWO WEEKS LATER.

MISS MELLOR sat beside the drawing-room fire with an open letter in her hand. Her eyes were red and swollen and the little curls were rumpled and tossed about more untidily than ever. Since receiving Jack's Sutcliffe letter—the writing of which had troubled him, poor fellow, quite as much as the reading troubled her—she had made careful inquiries about the life led by Fred Winston.

For she was a very earnest little champion of those whom she loved, and she was fully resolved to prove Jack's statements false and then crush him for once and all. She had asked him to call to-day—he was due now—but alas, the statements he had made were only too true!

"Not that I shall be any nicer to him on that account," she said to herself, shaking her dainty little head till the curls almost rattled; "I shall be just as nasty as I possibly can, because I quite understand why he wished to get rid——"

The door opened and Jack Sutcliffe walked in. His face was very pale, for he knew the reception he might expect from this imperious, warm-hearted little partisan. The interview was certainly short, and that was all the better.

"I asked you to call, Mr. Sutcliffe," she said, speaking unsteadily at first; "because I wished to tell you personally that your statements about—about Mr. Winston—were quite untrue and—and awfully mean."

"I wish they were untrue," said Jack miserably.

"But they are all true," she continued, her lip quivering; "and our engagement has been ended. Probably that was your desire," she added, with a sudden rush of bitterness, and then looked up to see if her words had hurt him.

He said nothing, for what could he say? It was not the moment in which to justify himself; but, of course, she misunderstood his silence and flung a last taunt as he rose to go.

"I want you to know," she said, "that I understand your reasons for trying to break off my engagement with Mr. Winston; but if you had been really fond of me," she added, with an effort; "you would not have tried to break my heart and—and ruin my happiness."

And with that she fled from the room, for the tears were struggling to the surface.

Jack found his way to the front door alone.

TWO YEARS LATER.

DEAR MR. SUTCLIFFE.—I hear you are giving a paper at our literary society on "Elizabethan London." Father has an old book on this very subject if you care to borrow it. I shall be at home to-morrow evening if you will call, and shall be very glad to see you, as I have something else to explain, yours faithfully,

EILEEN MELLOR.

Jack read this letter just before his breakfast one morning nearly two years after the events just related. He read it through carefully about half a dozen times—he is a poor man who never passes through this stage of life—and then propped it against the coffee pot and stared at it all the time he was eating his breakfast.

Surely it was the most wonderful letter that had ever been written! Such a beautiful undercurrent of friendliness ran through all the words, as though Cupid had pinned them together with one of his famous arrows! Such a thoughtful consideration for his success in giving the paper before the society! And then the delicate hint at the end, why, she meant to take back her unjust suspicions of course. As though it were necessary! And yet—it would be pleasant to hear her withdraw those cruel words—oh, if only he were free to say what he really thought of her, but he was not free—and besides, her friendliness would certainly not extend so far——

He had a firm conviction that their interview, two years ago, formed an insuperable barrier to prevent him from ever speaking to her on a subject dearer than ever since prohibited. He could never propose to her, no matter how free she might be, for the first words he spoke would rouse her suspicions of his motives. Though she withdrew her words twenty times over, it could not set him free to say what he wished. There was only one element of satisfaction in the whole business—that Fred had been persuaded to go to an uncle in Canada where he was doing famously and—as he admitted in a letter to Jack—was already engaged again.

Jack went round to the house in Majoram Street the following evening, and was shown into the same room as before. Next moment the door was opened again and she entered. Jack spoke first to remove the confusion that was painfully evident in her face.

"I am much obliged to you for the offer of the book."

"Yes," she answered quickly, "and I want to—to say how sorry I am for the unjust words I used when we last met. It was a very hard duty for you and——"

"Don't say another word," said Jack quietly, "this acknowledgment of my motives pays for all."

"Your motives were as true as they could be. I'm quite sure now that you only spoke because—because——"

"I can never explain the reason now," said Jack sadly.

"You had a reason?" she murmured, and came and stood closer to him and presently sat beside him on the sofa. "You had a reason?"

"I had indeed."

"And I suppose it really was a—a good reason?" she continued, stooping to pick a stray thread of white cotton from the floor.

"The best reason I ever had for anything in my life," said Jack passionately.

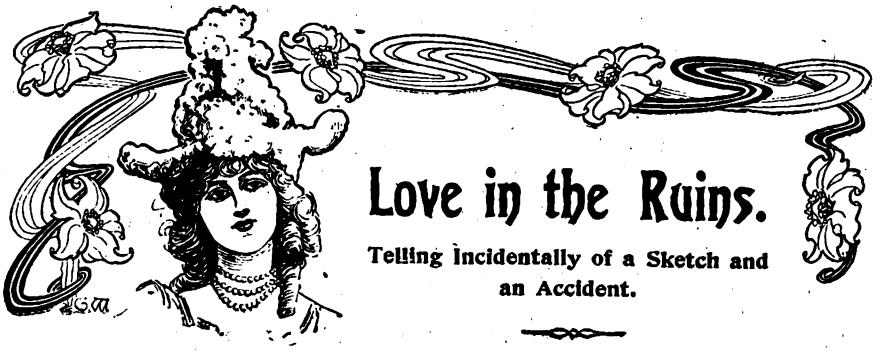
"It must have been very—very interesting," she whispered, almost inaudibly. "Won't you tell me—what it was?"

* * * * *

"Dear me!" said Jack three hours later as he walked briskly down Majoram Street, "I've forgotten all about that book. I must call round to-morrow!

Wal Frank.

Digitized by Google



Love in the Ruins.

Telling Incidentally of a Sketch and an Accident.

ISABEL DE LACY sat in solitary state in the beautiful old drawing-room of the Priory, furnished in mediæval style with its old Bayeux tapestries on the walls and the old carved oak furniture, black with the passing of centuries. Reclining on a low chair, she leant her head against a softly-tinted Liberty cushion, which showed off to advantage the mass of soft, silky, golden hair which wreathed her brows like a queenly diadem. A dainty work-basket was at her side, a book lay half open on her dress, but she neither sewed nor read just now, and seemed lost in thought.

She mused on the strange destiny which had left her, a mere girl, sole mistress of this beautiful old Norman Priory, one of the show places of England.

Hugo de Lacy, one of the Norman barons who had accompanied William the Conqueror over to England, had been given these broad lands in recognition of his deeds of valour in the king's service. He had built himself a castellated keep as was then so prevalent among the Norman noblemen, and had returned to France to wed the lovely Jeanne de Crétigny, who had plighted her troth to him ere he sailed with the Duke of Normandy to conquer England.

Alas! the fair Jeanne had grown weary of waiting for her lover, who tarried so on England's shores, and Hugo de Lacy returned only to find she had just been wed to Estienne, Sire de Morneville. The young baron challenged his more fortunate rival, killed him in single combat. He alighted from his charger, tore the mailed gauntlet from the dead man's hand, steeped it in his blood, and then made his way to the Chateau de Morneville. Boldly entering the presence of the lady of the castle, he walked straight up to her and struck her brutally in the face with the crimson-dyed gauntlet.

"Here, false jade! Your black-hearted treachery has caused the death of your husband, and the lover whom you foully betrayed has steeped his hands in blood; accursed of men, denounced by God as a murderer, he goes from you henceforth to expiate in the cloister the crime you have goaded him into committing."

Jeanne flung herself at his feet and implored of him to forget her baseness and marry her, since he had removed the only obstacle to their union.

Hugo's soul turned sick at the vileness of this woman whom once he had loved, he plunged his rapier in her heart, spurned her dead body from him, and fled to England, where the brilliant knight and warrior was seen no more, except under the monk's cowl.

He built and endowed the Priory de Lacy in the grounds adjoining the castle he had erected, when he hoped to bring back from France his beautiful bride. Several holy men gathered round him, and for several centuries the monks of St. Hugo were far famed all over England for their great piety and saintliness. The barony of de Lacy had gone to a younger brother of the luckless suitor, and some generations further the then baron de Lacy obtained from King Edward III. that the broad lands of De Lacy should once more revert to their original owners, and the friars were expelled from the Priory, while Percival de Lacy took up his abode in the old castellated keep built by Hugo.

The Priory had never again been used as a monastery, and had gradually fallen into decay; it was now a most picturesque ivy-covered ruin, standing in the grounds.

Poets delighted to describe it, painters to reproduce it on canvas. The place still bore the name of the Priory, but the family really resided in the restored and a good deal modernised original old keep. The last owner, Gerard de Lacy, had died very shortly after his wife, who had gone off in a decline, and their infant daughter Isabel had been left as sole heiress of this beautiful place.

She had been brought up by an uncle, and had resided little at the Priory, but a couple of months ago she had come of age, and had at once asserted her independence by shaking off the shackles of her uncle's guardianship, and, in spite of all remonstrances, had insisted on coming to take up her abode at the Priory, unchaperoned by any one, her sole companion besides the staff of servants being a school friend, Fanny Mainreed, an orphan like herself, but not so favoured by fortune, as she had next to no money, and was going out to be a governess when her former school chum, the great heiress Miss de Lacy, hearing of the straits she was driven to, had engaged her nominally as her companion.

Miss Mainreed, however, had soon found that her duties were a mere sinecure, and that she was really treated as a friend and sister. Isabel was in a pensive mood just then, her sprightly companion having gone to do some shopping in the village. Isabel scanned the long future lying before her in no very bright or hopeful way.

She had unfortunately formed the unreasonable notion that no man would love her for herself, but that if she ever married she would only fall a victim to a fortune-hunter; and she had firmly made up her mind never to wed. Only such a resolution to a girl of one-and-twenty is not very conducive to cheerfulness, and Isabel wondered what she would do all alone in the long years to come. Fanny, her chosen friend whom she dearly loved, would marry; she, lucky girl, was dowerless; and when men would seek her hand she would know it was for herself and not for her broad acres or her gold.

Her meditations were suddenly broken in upon by the entrance of Miss Mainreed, who came dancing into the room holding a tiny slip of cardboard in her hand.

"Oh, Bell, just look, here is something exciting to break the monotony of our dull lives!"

"Well, Fanny, what is it? I think it must be the near neighbourhood of the cloisters which depresses you!"

"Really, Bell, to tell you the truth, I cannot think why you do not fill this beautiful old place with a jolly house-party, and then we could have dances, tennis, ping-pong, badminton; it would be simply ripping. But just now, with only us two girls, it is a bit tame."

"What would Mrs. Grundy say to the two of us girls, as you say, entertaining a lot of people."

"Oh come, Bell, you know you do not care a rap for that respectable old viper-tongued matron, or else you would not have elected to live here just with me, and no staid old chaperon in a beribboned cap and spectacles to act propriety! So you need not pretend to be afraid of Mrs. Grundy."

"Well, no; as a matter of fact, I do not care a straw about her. But it is such a bore having to entertain people whom one feels no interest in; women who will envy me my dresses or my servants, men who will make love to me just because, as the French say, 'The pill is well gilt!'"

"Come now, Bell, none of that nonsense to me; as if any man would not love you for your beauty without ever thinking of that dross we call gold! But look here, I am keeping the poor fellow on tenter-hooks all this time."

Digitized by Google

"What poor fellow?" and Isabel looked up bewildered.

"A knight errant, my dear, who, having heard of the fame of your beauty, lies at your gates languishing for one pitying look from you!"

"Fanny, don't be a goose," Isabel remonstrated severely. "Do be sensible; what is that man you are alluding to?"

Fanny drew up her pretty rose-bud of a mouth into a bewitching pout.

"Oh, well, if I am to be snubbed every time I open my mouth, I shan't speak again, never no more, so there!"

Isabel reached out her hand, and twitched the card out of Fanny's fingers; she had been nervously twisting it into the shape of a curl paper. Isabel carefully smoothed out the creases, and flattened it on her knee, then she read what was on it—Harold Varly.

"Fanny," she said, pretending to be severe with her irrepressible young friend, "may I ask who is Mr. Harold Varly?"

"Oh, certainly you may ask!"

"Well, and will you answer?"

"Awfully sorry I cannot comply with your wishes, but the fact is I have not the very least idea of who or what Mr. Harold Varly is."

"Fan, you are a provoking minx!"

"Yes, that's very much the same sort of thing only differently worded which the curate told me this afternoon."

"Fan, Fan, I do believe you are flirting with that unfortunate young man."

"Well, I have nothing else to do, and you know 'Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do.'"

"Seriously, Fanny, if you have no conception of who is Mr. Harold Varly, why on earth were you in possession of his visiting card?"

"Well, Bell, this time I shall be quite candid with you. Old Johnson met me in the hall, and handed me this card, saying a gentleman was at the lodge gates asking for permission to paint the ruins of the Priory."

"Oh!" said Isabel, "I wish my home were not a show place, not really belonging to me, but a sort of public property. Besides, the official day for visitors to see the Priory is Saturday and this is Monday. I think one day a week is quite enough to throw open my grounds to a herd of visitors."

"Well, then your answer is that Mr. Harold Varly may whistle for permission to paint the ruins. Poor fellow! I am sorry for him; perhaps his daub might have brought him in a few pounds, and the poor beggar may be terribly out at elbows. Bell, do let us see him at least before you give your final answer."

"Oh, as you like, if it pleases you." She rang the bell as she spoke.

"Tell the gentleman who has just sent in his card that Miss de Lacy will receive him."

The old butler bowed acquiescence to his mistress's orders, and promptly retired to do her bidding.

In a few minutes he returned, and throwing open the drawing-room door, admitted a tall, gentlemanly young fellow, who seemed not one whit abashed at the sumptuousness of the drawing-room to which he was admitted. He bowed, and advanced towards the two ladies.

"Miss de Lacy?" and he looked inquiringly at both.

"I am Miss de Lacy," Isabel said, acknowledging his bow by an almost imperceptible bending of the head, while Fanny smiled quite graciously at him.

"I have come to beg a favour at your hands, Miss de Lacy."

"Yes," was the chilling, unencouraging response; but he proceeded—

"The fame of your beautiful Priory ruins has spread all over England; my speciality in the painting line lies in reproducing old abbeys and castles, and I have travelled specially from London here to paint De Lacy Priory."

"Any guide-book would have told you that the day for visitors is Saturday."

"Yes, but I do not wish to go there on the visitors' day. I must, for at least a whole week, go to the Priory day after day if I wish to make a good picture of it."

"And you wish me for a whole week to forego the privacy and seclusion of my grounds?"

Mr. Varly looked surprised at the ungraciousness of the tones. Very good looking and highly cultured, he was mostly a favourite with ladies, and was not accustomed to be received with such scant courtesy at their hands.

"I do not think I would interfere very much with your privacy," and he added with a smile; "You must pay the penalty of being the owner of such a beautiful, historical place!"

"There is no must in the case." Isabel looked at him haughtily. What presumption of him to come and tell her she must do so and so.

"Oh, come, Bell, dearest; don't be so obdurate. I am sure Mr. Varly won't be in our way at all; will you now?"

The young artist smiled at this fair advocate who so unexpectedly backed up his request.

"Well, I shall try not."

"And, in fact, it will be rather fun to go down every day and see the picture. Oh, perhaps you won't want us to do that though, will you?"

"Only too pleased, I am sure," he quickly responded.

"And you will let us have a little pencil sketch of the Priory, will you?"

"Yes, certainly; but you seem to forget Miss de Lacy has not yet granted me permission to paint on her premises."

"Oh, Bell, Bell! it is Mr. Varly," cried Fanny. "He must have been killed by that old wall falling on him."

Digitized by Google

Isabel smiled faintly.

"No; but my friend Miss Mainreed has done so."

"Has Miss Mainreed authority to grant this permission?"

"Miss Mainreed does very much as she pleases. Don't you, Fanny, dear?"

"Oh, that's because you are such a darling. You do not know, Mr. Varly, how good Miss de Lacy is; why in the village they simply worship her."

"Fanny," Isabel interrupted severely, horrified at her friend's outspoken praise of her to an utter stranger.

"I can quite believe it," Mr. Varly assented politely; but Isabel thought she detected a slight veiled sarcasm in his tone, and she felt intensely and unreasonably angry at the artist's presumption.

She rose saying:

"It is needless to prolong the interview, Mr. Varly; to please my friend, Miss Mainreed, I grant you permission to come every day to the Priory as long as you will find it necessary to do so to complete your picture. But I lay no conditions, and you will please not feel obliged to execute a sketch of the Priory in payment for this."

"Most certainly, madam, I shall not force any daub of mine on your acceptance," he laid stress on the pronoun; "but Miss Mainreed will perhaps honour me by accepting a rough outline of the old ruin, as a small token of my gratitude for her successful pleading in my favour."

"Thanks, awfully. I shall be delighted," Fanny frankly responded.

Mr. Varly bowed to Isabel.

"I am deeply obliged to you, madam, for the gracious permission you have been pleased to grant me," and again Isabel detected that same ring of sarcasm in his voice.

He turned to Fanny, hesitated; then both spontaneously held out a hand, and his leave-taking of her was most cordial.

"Good-bye, Miss Mainreed, I can't tell you how grateful I am to you."

When he left the room Fanny turned to her friend.

"Bell."

"Yes, dear."

"You are horrid!"

"Am I? I had no idea I could ever be that to you!"

"No, not to me, silly; you know you never are that to me, but to that poor young man."

"Well, child, were you not gracious enough to him for the two of us?"

"Oh, come. I suppose you will say I flirted with him, you always say that. But you know I can't help it, it is part of my nature to be amiable to all gentlemen when they are at all nice, like this Mr. Varly. Whereas you put your worst foot forward. I am sure he has gone away with the worst possible opinion of you."

"A matter of the most supreme indifference to me."

"Yes; but I cannot bear to think that any one can have a bad opinion of you, my own dear Bell."

"Well, my dear, you see I am a man hater, and in the presence of the objectionable sex I never do shine to my advantage."

"But a man hater is such an anomaly for a woman; there are heaps and heaps of women haters, like Lord Kitchener——"

"Oh," interrupted Miss de Lacy. "I see your theory is that men have a right to spurn us; but we must grovel at their feet and be ready to accept the first man who proposes to possess himself of our money-bags!"

"Tush, there you have mounted on your hobby again! Why I have no money-bags, not the very tiniest of wee ones, and yet I mean to marry!"

"There goes the tea bell, far more welcome than all these discussions on the merits of man!"

* * * * * * *

Four or five days passed, Isabel in her walks about the grounds avoided the Priory ruins, and therefore saw nothing of the stranger. Fanny went down twice or thrice to see the progress of the picture, chatting pleasantly with Mr. Varly each time. She spoke most enthusiastically of his talent as a painter, of his agreeable conversation, &c., and her friend laughingly answered by an allusion to the inflammatory nature of her little heart.

"You are quite shameless, Fan, you are actually carrying on two flirtations at the same time. I am quite sure the Rev. Mark Linten does not pay us the frequent calls he does for the sake of my society!"

Fanny flushed hotly.

"Well, I happen to meet Mr. Linten when I am visiting among the cottagers, or when I take a walk through the village, and he will insist on walking back with me. I cannot do less than ask him in to have a cup of tea with us."

"How strange that I never meet Mr. Linten when I go out. I wonder how much premeditation has to do with these chance meetings!"

"Oh, Bell, shut up, do, there's a dear; look, it is a lovely moonlight night," and she moved to the open window and looked out on the lawn over which was shed a halo of light almost as strong as the sun's rays. "Let us go out, do, we might saunter down to the ruins; you know at this hour you are quite safe from meeting the unfortunate knight of the mahl-stick to whom you so grudgingly gave permission to paint the dear old Priory."

"If you wish to speak the exact truth, you might just say it was you who gave the permission."

The two girls passed out arm in arm through the window, and a pretty picture they made in their white dinner dresses, just slightly open at the neck, with sleeves reaching only down to the elbow. They wandered past the shrubberies and beautiful sloping lawns, across the little wood till they reached the magnificent old ivy-covered ruins, which never looked so picturesque as when thus lit up by the silver beams of the moon.

Neither of the girls were superstitious, and they loved to roam about the deserted cloisters at night, quite regardless of the village legends which asserted that Hugo de Lacy's spirit could not rest in his grave, and that moans and groans proceeded from the Lady Chapel, where he was supposed to have expiated his crimes with prayers and fastings. They seated themselves on the well-worn steps of what had been the high altar, and awed by the solemnity of the hour and place, neither of them carried on their usual chaff and fun. Suddenly Fanny clutched her friend's arm.

"Oh, Bell! What was that?"

"Fan, child, don't be silly. I heard nothing."

"But I did hear; it was not fancy, it was just like a moan."

"Oh, come, what nonsense; just an owl hooting over the towers of the Priory."

"Hush! Listen! Oh, Bell, you must have heard this time."

There could be no mistake; both girls distinctly heard a deep-drawn moan, as of some one in great pain. The blood of the hardy Norman barons coursed through Isabel's veins; she did not faint or go into hysterics, but calmly said—

"Come, the sound issues from the Lady Chapel, just at the back of the cloisters, we must go and investigate what it can be."

Fanny was not so plucky as her strong-minded friend, but she was too unnerved to stop behind while Isabel went on to see what was the cause of these uncanny noises which caused them this feeling of uneasiness. Passing rapidly through the cloisters they stepped into the Lady Chapel, and the first thing they saw was the figure of a man lying prone on the ground, surrounded by a heap of stones, which seemed to have detached themselves from the wall and fallen on the unfortunate man.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Bell, Bell! it is Mr. Varly! He must have been killed by that old wall falling on him!" piteously exclaimed Fanny.

Isabel, always prompt in all her actions, was very soon kneeling by the unconscious figure.

"He is not dead, Fanny, or else how could his groans have attracted us here, but he is badly injured; our coming here to-night was providential; had he passed the night here he would have been dead before morning."

Fanny felt numbed and quite helpless; Isabel was calm and self-possessed, passing her arm under the injured artist's head, she gently raised it; a gaping wound from which the blood flowed copiously had been inflicted by a sharp stone just at the back of the head; she bound it up as best she could with her handkerchief and strips of her skirt, which she tore ruthlessly.

"Run, Fanny, as quick as ever you can to the house, and tell Johnson to come with the two footmen and a mattress so that Mr. Varly may be borne to the house with as few jars as possible, and send the gardener for Dr. Elliott."

"But, Bell, where is he to be taken to?"

"To the house, of course. When a human being is in trouble or suffering, he loses all personality, and is only a brother who needs our help and sympathy. Mr. Varly has been injured severely on my premises, through my fault, so to speak, from my negligence in not having the dangers of these crumbling walls seen to; and we are bound to nurse him and see that he pulls through."

Very gently the men bore the sufferer from the ruins to the house, and with the help of the old housekeeper, Mrs. Bently, who had been Isabel's nurse, they settled him comfortably in the big four-post bed of the best spare room.

When Dr. Elliott arrived he looked very grave, said it was a serious case, that most probably brain fever would set in after such a bad cut in the head. It was most unfortunate, he said, that the patient had lain for several hours before he was discovered.

The two girls shuddered to think what the consequences would have been, had they not mercifully had that strange fancy for a moonlight ramble.

The doctor's surmise proved only too true; the next morning the artist was in a state of high fever and raved incessantly, babbling of his mother and his childhood, as most of us do when old age or a severe illness overtakes us.

Isabel, Fanny, and Mrs. Bently watched and nursed him with untiring care and devotion. Isabel did not rest content with the opinion of the village practitioner; she felt herself responsible for the life of this man who had come to grief as she persisted in asserting, through her carelessness in not having the bad state of the ruins seen to, so she telegraphed to London for one of the ablest physicians of the day. His verdict was much the same as Dr. Elliott's. The patient could only pull through with the greatest possible care and forethought, half the battle lay in the nursing.

"Then we shall save him!" and Isabel resolutely set to with a will; the man should not die, she would save him, if human power could do so.

Mrs. Bently did her best too, though she repeatedly protested she did not know what the world would say to these two motherless girls having taken in this stranger with no one in the house but servants to act propriety.

"Come, Nana," Isabel would answer; she always clung to this familiar old name of her childhood, when speaking to her former nurse, "would you have me cast out that poor fellow when he nearly met his death in my grounds, and all on account of my culpable negligence, simply because that old viper, Mrs. Grundy, will pick holes in us? Besides, Nana, you are here to chaperon us."

Fanny suggested their having the curate in to play propriety; but Isabel did not quite see how the presence of two young men in the house, instead of one, would shield their reputation, so Mr. Linten contented himself with calling every day to inquire, and he caught glimpses of Fanny when it was possible.

After weary days and nights of watching, the crisis so much dreaded passed, and Harold Varley was pronounced to be out of danger at last.

"And I am sure our patient owes his life to you, Miss de Lacy—the most devoted of his three nurses," said Dr. Elliott.

With returning consciousness the young artist realised what had happened, and he showed the greatest distress over the trouble and anxiety he had given his nurses.

Directly he was pronounced to be out of danger and when he ceased to be delirious, Isabel's visits to the sick-room became very rare, and finally ceased altogether; she now left him exclusively to the care of Fanny and Mrs. Bently. Mr. Varly said nothing on the subject, but quick-witted Fanny noted the eager, wistful look in his eyes every time the door opened to admit any one, and how wearily he turned his head on the pillow when he found it was not Isabel who entered.

One day when he was alone with Fanny, he turned to her:

"Miss Mainreed, from the very first day I set foot here, you have been my friend; will you promise me one thing?"

"Depends on what that one thing is," responded Fanny warily, but smiling at the same time.

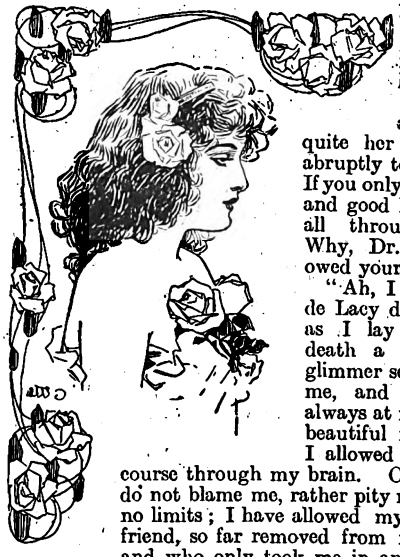
"I am quite strong enough now to be taken back to my lodgings in the village. Will you have me transferred there this afternoon?"

"Certainly not, Mr. Varly; after all the trouble we have had over your case it is most ungrateful of you to wish maliciously to have a relapse. You are absolutely unfit to be moved yet. Besides, Isabel would not hear of such a mad freak."

"It is just because I do not wish to t[illegible] further on

The kiss had hardly been given when the door softly opened and Fanny entered.

Digitized by Google



Miss de Lacy's hospitality that I implore you to allow me to leave this house."

"Well, it is not a nice way to requite her hospitality thus abruptly to leave her house. If you only knew how devoted and good Isabel was to you all through your illness! Why, Dr. Elliott said you owed your life to her!"

"Ah, I do know all Miss de Lacy did for me; often as I lay between life and death a sort of conscious glimmer seemed to return to me, and I could see her always at my bedside like a beautiful ministering angel. I allowed mad thoughts to course through my brain. Oh, Miss Mainreed, do not blame me, rather pity me, my folly knows no limits; I have allowed myself to love your friend, so far removed from me in every way, and who only took me in and nursed me out of pity, as she would have done a stray dog. There are times when I wish I had died in the ruins before this fatal love entered my heart. It is hopeless and will but wreck my life!"

Fanny gently took his hand.

"Hush, hush! do not excite yourself, you are hardly strong enough to battle against such strong emotions. Let me whisper a little bit of comfort to you. I do not think Isabel is so indifferent to you as you imagine."

"Oh, Miss Mainreed! surely it could not be—I so unworthy of her in every way; besides, how could I ever bring myself to ask her to be my wife, I, a poor struggling artist, when she is so wealthy. It would be degrading to my manhood to think of such a thing—I never could!"

"Tush! That's stupid pride."

"Well, but it is impossible she can love me; why, she never comes near me now, and I so hunger for the sound of her sweet voice, or one kind look from her eyes."

"Trust me, Mr. Varly, and all will be right; but you are not to talk of leaving this yet, till I give you leave, and perhaps you will not feel inclined to then!"

Fanny, on leaving the sick-room, went to seek her friend. Having vainly looked for her all over the house, a sudden thought struck her, and she went in quest of her in the grounds. Reaching the Priory ruins, she paused ere crossing the threshold of the Lady Chapel, as she caught the sound of subdued sobbing.

"Well, I do not suppose it is Hugo de Lacy's ghost crying over his murdered sweetheart!" she mentally ejaculated, as she passed under the archway and down the steps which led to the crypt of our lady's shrine. Isabel was seated on the fragments of the broken wall which had so nearly caused the death of Harold Varly; in her hand she held the beautifully-executed though unfinished sketch of the ruins which had lain forgotten in the Lady Chapel ever since the night of the accident.

"Bell darling!" softly murmured Fanny; and Isabel hastily sprang to her feet. With a guilty look she flung from her the picture at which she had been gazing.

"Really, Fanny, you should not creep up to people like this and startle them!" She had never spoken so harshly to her friend before; but Fanny heeded this not.

"Bell, why are you making yourself so needlessly miserable, why do you no longer come to see Mr. Varly?"

"Fanny, you presume too far on the privilege of friendship. I am not miserable," and she raised her head haughtily, "and if I were I do not quite see how my going to see Mr. Varly would make me happy. You evidently judge from your own feelings, and think that is the height of bliss!"

Fanny broke into a merry, rippling laugh.

"Oh, Bell, come, this is rich, you do not surely imagine that I am in love with Mr. Varly?"

"Well, if you are not, you have been trifling in the most unwarrantable, unladylike way with his affections, as he most certainly loves you, and you have given him every encouragement."

"Well, I declare, people do say love is blind, but I never before realised to what an extent! Why, Bell, have you been jealous of me all this time, and is it this which has made you so cold to poor Harold Varly, and driven him to the verge of despair? Surely, if you are not as blind as a bat, you would have known long ago that he worships the very ground you tread on!"

"Oh, Fanny, it cannot be, he and you are such friends, I have been thinking every day I should have to wish you joy of having secured the affections of the best and noblest man that ever was."

Fanny turned away her head to hide her blushes.

"Well, so I have, as a matter of fact, but not the man whom you think endowed with every earthly and heavenly perfection; mercifully, we women vary in our tastes, or else what rows there would be over the chosen few. This morning, as I was walking down the lane, I stopped at the stile and met Mark Linten, and—and—well, I have promised to be his wife. Will that convince you that I am not in love with Harold Varly, nor he with me?"

Isabel threw her arms around her friend.

"Oh, Fanny, please forgive me, I have been so rude, so snappish to you, but, oh, I have felt so utterly wretched in every way. I despised myself for having, as I thought, been so unwomanly as to let myself love a man who had never cast a thought on me!"

"Well, dear, I should be sorry to think of how many thoughts the poor fellow bestows on you, his very being is wrapped up in you."

"But, Fanny, how do you know all this?"

"I am not blind, and, besides, he has just confided his woes to me, and told me that never will he ask you to be his wife, because he is too poor, and you too rich! So there is the answer to all your fine theories about men seeking you for your gold!"

"But how are we ever to marry if he will not propose to me?"

"Why, propose to him yourself, of course!"

"Oh, Fanny, how could I?"

"What a nuisance you both are with your woman's pride, and his manhood's dignity! I am sure Mark and I were not half so fussy with all those high-flown sentiments. When we found out that we loved each other, he told me so quite plainly, and asked me to marry him, and I said 'Yes, thank you!' and then we kissed, and the whole business was settled in about ten minutes!"

Isabel could not help laughing over her friend's description of the curate's courtship of her.

"Well, dearest, and I am so selfishly engrossed in my own affairs that I have never even congratulated you. But I shall bring to bear all my influence upon my uncle, the Bishop, and see if I cannot secure Mr. Linten a good, fat living."

"Oh, you are a perfect duck! Now go to that poor fellow, and turn his black despair into ethereal bliss!"

Isabel repaired to her room, and, having donned her most becoming dress, a softly-tinted blue tea-gown with lovely frills and ruffles of old lace at the neck and wrists, she tapped at the door of the sick-room.

"Come in," was the response, but Harold had long ago given up expecting a visit from Isabel, and he did not look up from the book he was reading. She glided up to the bed and sank gently on the chair at his side.

"I am so glad you are better, Mr. Varly!"

At the sound of her voice, so long waited for in vain, he started, and a hectic spot gathered on either of his pale cheeks.

Digitized by Google

"Miss de Lacy, this is indeed good of you to come to see me."

"I am afraid I have sadly neglected you lately," she whispered softly, "please forgive me."

"I forgive you? Why, Miss de Lacy, what have I to forgive? It is I who never can repay all your many kindnesses to me. But I am quite strong again now, and I wish as soon as possible to relieve you of the burden of my presence."

"Is my hospitality to you so irksome, then, that you are so anxious to be gone?"

"No, but—Miss de Lacy, you cannot understand what I feel on the subject."

"Yes, I think I do, in a way, Mr. Varly. I have been down to the ruins and seen your sketch of the dear old Priory. Won't you finish it when you are well enough to take up painting again, and give it to me, please? That is if you will be generous and forgive me my horrible rudeness to you that first day you called."

"Miss de Lacy, is it possible that any daub of mine can meet with your approval?"

"It is the fact of its being done by you which lends it all its charm in my eyes," this she said so low that it needed the quick ears of love to catch the sounds.

He took her hand and tried eagerly to scan her face, but she perversely and womanlike averted her eyes from his.

"Isabel, is it possible, but, nay, I am absolutely unworthy of such untold happiness."

"Well, but try, at any rate, if it lies within your grasp!" She still kept her eyes on him, but did not draw away her hand clasped within his.

"Isabel, my darling, you know I love you, but it is folly to think of wedding me, you, who can choose from among the highest and noblest in the land. Your pity alone dictates these compassionate feelings of yours for me. I shall leave this place, and you will soon forget the penniless young artist who disturbed your thoughts for a short time!"

"Nay, Harold, I am not going to let you wreck both our lives, yours and mine, for I could never forget you, and never think of marrying any one but you, so please do not be both proud and selfish."

"Good Heavens, do you call selfishness my condemning myself to perpetual darkness by exiling myself from your presence. Why, it is positive agony to me to think of it, only I want what is best for your happiness."

"Will you kindly allow me to be the best judge of that? I shall begin to think you do not love me."

"Isabel, doubt not that my love for you, deep and true, shines forth as the gold which has been through the refining influence of the cleansing fires. But, what will the world say? That I have married you for your money."

"What need we care for the world or its sayings if we are happy in each other's love!"

"My own true darling," and he drew her down towards him, and pressed a passionate kiss on her lips.

At this very critical juncture, when to them outside their own two selves, the whole world was blank, the door was gently opened and Fanny entered the room.

"Oh, my goodness! I am afraid I am intruding, but I knocked and knocked, so that I imagined Mr. Varly was asleep, and as it was time to give him his port wine I came in. But I suppose you were too much absorbed in each other to hear my taps, besides, I expect our patient is having a far more refreshing tonic than any port wine, however old the brand," and she looked mischievously at Isabel's crimson cheeks.

"Fanny, you are really too bad," remonstrated Miss de Lacy.

"Ah, well, bless you, my children! and she raised her hands with mock solemnity, "you have evidently kissed and made it up, like two naughty children. If any one were to write your love story, it might quite appropriately be called after Burne Jones' picture, 'Love in the Ruins'!"

Lily Butler.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

AND

£1,000 IN CASH CONSOLATION GIFTS.

THE MOST LIBERAL PRIZE EVER OFFERED BY ANY PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

The prize of £5 a Week for Life will be paid to the person (perhaps you) who correctly solves the set of pictures which appear in "PEARSON'S WEEKLY," under the conditions published in that paper.

Each of the pictures represents the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom, and every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:

FIRST CONSOLATION CASH GIFT: £100.

2nd	Cash Gift	£50.
3rd	" "	£50.
4th	" "	£25.
5th	" "	£25.
6th	" "	£25.
7th	" "	£25.
8th to 57th	Cash Gifts	£10 each.
58th to 97th	" "	£5 "

So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a Week for Life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash prizes.

In order to form some idea of the size of the prize of £5 a Week for Life, we would ask you to glance over the following figures. Assuming that you live to the age of 70—which is quite reasonable—you will have received one of the following amounts, according to how old you are when you start receiving the prize:

If you are	60	you will have received	£2,600.
"	50	" "	£5,200.
"	40	" "	£7,800.
"	30	" "	£10,400.
"	20	" "	£13,000.
"	15	" "	£14,300.
"	12	" "	£15,080.

From this table you will be able to calculate exactly the amount of money which will come to you.

The first set of pictures will appear in the issue of Pearson's Weekly published on January 23rd. Order a copy to be reserved for you.

Digitized by Google

Alma—a Sketch.

THE BARRIER BROKEN DOWN.

"Please fetch the book, Harry," said Nan with a confident air. "You'll find it, I think, on the library table."

I slid unwillingly from the rail of the verandah, where I had been sitting industriously watching the sunbeams caressing Nan's hair as she sat sewing. Ardently I wished that I might follow their example, but this my little lady would not suffer.

For months I had laid steady siege to her heart only to meet with repeated refusals from her. Had it not been for a certain something in her manner I would have been as utterly discouraged as she seemed to wish me to be.

Without being afflicted with great conceit, I was yet almost sure that she was not unmoved by my pleadings; some emotion, some response they woke in her that she could not always conceal, nor had she ever told me outright that she did not love me. When I put the question to her point blank, she always evaded it in skilful fashion. Once when I pressed her very hard she had hinted at some secret that was keeping us apart, but never again had I been able to lead her into any reference to it. To all my questionings she remained silent; to all my vows to win her in spite of any or everything, she listened, smiling rather wearily and saying that if she gave me time enough I would tire myself out. In the meantime she was glad to be my very good friend; more she would not be.

To-day we had been having a discussion concerning the wording of a quotation, so her challenge put me on my mettle. I assumed an air of confidence equal to hers and entered the house in search of the book, leaving the sunbeams for the time being master of the situation. They made her hair look so pretty that I did not grudge them their short supremacy.

I had heard Nan speak of her father though I had never seen him, so when I saw a white-haired man seated at the library-table I felt sure that it was he. He was writing and did not look up.

"I beg your pardon, sir, but your daughter——"

"Yes, yes, my daughter!" he interrupted eagerly, and I was startled by the melancholy of the dark eyes that he raised expectantly.

"Miss Nan sent me."

The light died out of his face. He pushed back the snow-white hair from his brow with a gesture of great weariness, then drummed idly on the table with his thin fingers.

"Ah! you mean Nan—yes, to be sure," he said dully. Then suddenly with an accent of apology. "But, pardon me, sir, you are looking for something—what can I do for you? Won't you be seated? You see I forget now that Alma is not here to remind me, and I am so engrossed in writing her life. That's odd, isn't it? She is dead, yet here is her life," pointing to the closely-written sheets of paper which were strewn about him. He pulled a budget from a long envelope.

"Here is a fair copy," he said, turning again to me. "Won't you read it—it's only a sketch."

I took the paper mechanically, feeling vaguely uncomfortable, but not knowing what else to do. He leant eagerly towards me.

"Sit down, sir, sit down," he commanded querulously. Fearing the result of opposition upon his apparently overwrought nerves, I again obeyed.

"I want an unbiassed opinion of it," he told me confidentially.

"They all tell me it is good and sometimes I think that it is, yet," mournfully, "I know I am not capable of doing justice to the subject; hers was such a beautiful life."

"I shall be glad to read it, sir, and will let you know what I think of it," I made answer, hoping thus to effect my escape. But I was not to be let off.

"No, no!" he replied quickly, "read it now; read it"—cunningly—"aloud."

Loath as I was to pry into any matter not intended for me I knew that I must humour him. My hands trembled, and I was strangely agitated as I unfolded the pages, for I was possessed of a feeling that almost amounted to certainty that the reason for Nan's refusal of my love was soon to be made clear to me. The reading of these pages seemed like disloyalty to her, and yet? I looked up before I began to read. Nan stood on the threshold of the room. Her eyes were brimming with tears but she nodded encouragingly to me, so my doubts were set at rest. This is what I read:

"Never shall I forget the day that she came to us, my darling, my blessing; how my pulses beat and my head reeled when the nurse laid in my arms this tiny living creature, bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh. My tears mingled with those on the mother's white cheek when I leant over to lay our treasure once more beside her. In the years that followed other little ones came to us and I loved them, but never, God forgive me, as I loved her. That first wondrous tendril that crept forth from the root of our happiness twined inextricably about the warmest spot in my heart.

"She was so like a beam of sunshine in the house; her first thought even as a little child seemed always to be for others. It is natural for us to idealise those whom we have lost, to fancy them as perfect, but I do not idealise my Alma. She had her faults like any normal child, though when she was taxed with any mischievous wrong-doing she admitted her fault and was ready to take her punishment. There was never any trickery or deception about her, and her fervid, 'I'm so sorry!' was something which her father, at least, could never withstand.

"One awful time there was when we came near to losing her. A dread disease of childhood attacked her, and for days her mind was fever-clouded. At last, one night as I sat holding her hot little hand in mine, she looked at me and, even in the dim light, I recognised the reason in her eyes.

"'Daddy,' she said feebly, and I made answer as best I could.

"'Alma's been very ill, hasn't she, daddy?'

"'Very ill, yes, darling,' I said, 'but you'll soon be better now.'

"'I think I will for I saw the angels, daddy, and I asked them please to let me stay because my daddy would miss me so. Don't cry, daddy,' and she fell into a peaceful sleep.

"She had asked the angels to let her stay so that I might not miss her! That was so characteristic of her—always considering the happiness of 'her daddy,' or someone whom she loved.

"As the years passed, and 'my little girl' grew into 'my daughter,' I watched her maturing beauty jealously, proudly, selfishly, dreading unspeakably the time when someone would take her from me. Kind indeed were the fates which withheld from me all knowledge of the future.

"It seemed at first that I was not to lose her, for, when she finished school, she begged to be allowed to take up the study of medicine under my direction so that we were together more constantly than ever. Our preference for each other was of such long-standing that it was an accepted fact in the household and never caused any jealousy or unpleasantness. I was her guide, philosopher and friend, and she was my right hand man. She took entire charge of my study, kept my books, and copied my manuscripts whenever I would let her.

Digitized by Google

"For several years she was quite indifferent to the young men who sought her out. Their friend she was glad to be, but nothing more.

"'They are not any of them half so nice as my daddy,'" she told me laughingly.

"Even when the inevitable came she fought against her happiness for fear of grieving me, until her lover took the law into his own hands and told me how things were. He was a straightforward, manly young fellow, an engineer who had accepted an appointment that would take him to South Africa in a few months. He said that Alma loved him, but would not become engaged to him because she knew how we should feel to have her go so far away. I sent for Alma, and when she came shyly in I saw that what Fred had told me was true, so I gave her to him. I had had my full share of her bright young life.

"Even in her new-found happiness she never forgot me; devoting, in fact, so much of her time to me that at first Fred rebelled, but—

"'I shall be leaving him so soon, my poor old daddy,' she told him, 'and,' with a look that should have compensated him for anything, 'you will have me always.'

"On her wedding morning she came to my room in her spotless bridal white, and with her own dear fingers tied my necktie, and gently reminded me of one little point and another which she knew I should be apt to forget. Indeed I was in more need than usual of reminding that day, for I felt dazed and numb. I could not realise that after that day the old home would know Alma only for brief visits, the first of which could not be for many months.

"After she left us all her letters told eloquently of her happiness, and after she was settled in her new home she kept a sort of journal, which she sent us each week, so that we became quite well acquainted with some of her neighbours and surroundings.

"At the beginning of the second year she wrote with some uneasiness of Fred's failing health. A little later there was a break in her letters, and then a cablegram told us that he was very ill with fever. Then again came unbroken silence. We were nearly wild with anxiety over them, and when I could bear it no longer I arranged to go to them. Before I left I wrote rather sharply to Alma, telling her that in some way she should have managed to send us further word of how it fared with them. As soon as the letter was posted I regretted having written it, for I felt that I had been over hasty. My girl would not willingly have exposed us to this dreadful uncertainty. Something must be very wrong with one or both of them.

"When I at last arrived at their house in the hot little inland town there was an air of hush and gloom about it that sent a chill through me in spite of the heat of the sun which beat down upon me. As I mounted the steps leading to the porch the door was flung open and I was face to face with a white-haired surgeon, who had been a good friend of mine at home.

"'My poor old friend,' he said, as he wrung my hand, and looked pityingly at me.

"'Alma, man!—Alma!' was all that I could say.

"'The child is dead,' he said gravely, 'and, God help you, the mother's dying!'

"I flung off his kindly hand with something between a sob and a curse.

"'No, no, you would not let her die!' I said wildly, and rushed into the house only to be stopped on the threshold of a room by the shadow of Fred—gaunt, sorrow struck, white. The world seemed peopled with shadows that day, and the shadow of death lay over all.

"When I was calm again they led me in to her. It seemed at first that she would not know us, but when Fred spoke her name, though his husky voice sounded strange to me, she opened the glorious eyes in which the light of suffering still lingered.

"'Poor boy!' she said, as he clasped her hand. Then she saw me, and she smiled feebly.

"'Daddy, daddy, so you did get here. I'm so glad. I'm sorry I could not write, Fred will tell you,' she murmured, as I leant down to kiss her. The words cut me like a knife.

"'Take care of Fred, daddy,' she begged a little later. Her voice was weaker now. 'Try not to grieve too much for me—it's not really so hard to go though I have been so happy with you both. First daddy, then my Fred.' A wonderful smile broke over the pale face, with unwonted strength she raised herself slightly, and looked lovingly at each of us in turn, then, with a sigh, sank back among her pillows.

"'So happy all my life!' she breathed.

"The beautiful life was ended. My daughter, my Alma, had passed away. She had laid down her life for another—for Fred. He told me how, after she cabled to us, that he grew steadily worse, how devotedly Alma nursed him, hardly ever leaving his side.

"His pay had not come, and for a time she was sore pressed for money, and he being often delirious did not realise either this, or how unwise it was for her to tax herself as she was doing with the care of him. For a long time there was no doctor to warn him, for she, because of her knowledge of medicine, constituted herself both doctor and nurse in order to cut down expenses. It was only by chance that the old surgeon had called one day, because of a promise to me that he would look Alma up. He took matters in hand very quickly, but the mischief to Alma was done. While Fred mended slowly day by day, she grew weaker and less able to withstand the ordeal that was before her."

* * * * *

The old man sprang to his feet.

"And I wrote her that letter," he cried. "I wrote her that letter," he repeated, as the tears coursed down his cheeks. Nan came to him gently, soothing him as best she could. A man came hurrying in, looking very apologetic.

"I'm so sorry, miss," he explained. "I must have gone to sleep just a little minute, and your father slipped away," and he led the old gentleman out of the room.

Nan turned to me.

"Now you know all about it," she said tragically. "There's insanity in the family you see."

I put my arms around her, and she did not repulse me.

"Is that why you will not marry me, Nan?"

"Isn't that 'why' enough? When my own father——"

"But, darling, that's quite different. It's not hereditary or anything like that; it's simply the great trouble he has had, and the brooding over that letter. Isn't that so, sweetheart?"

If she had not looked so pathetic I could have laughed at her.

"I never thought of it that way, but I suppose it's true," she said. "Do you want to marry me now that you know, Harry?"

I considered that a superfluous question.

"Do you love me?" I asked.

And at last—

"Yes, yes, yes—ever so much," she answered me. I triumphed over the sunbeams. May Hueston.

Result of the "Feature" Competition.

THE Gramophone prizes in the above competition have been awarded to the following readers:

A. E. Piggott, 11 Clayton Terrace, Chapelizod, Dublin.
Miss A. Blair, South Bank, Atherton, Lancs.
L. E. Lydeard, 6 Woodbine Terrace, Hexham.
Jas. MacArthur, Main Street, Glengarnock.
W. Waters, 1 Hawthorn Villas, Aberkenfig, Glam.
J. Garner, 27a Lotherton Street, Harpurhey, Manchester.
B. Arnold, 57 Plumstead Road, Woolwich.
A. F. Vincent, 107 Faraday Street, Walworth, S.E.
W. Thomson, jun., Kirk Hill, Penicuik, Midlothian.
H. C. Flowerdew, Pied-à-Terre, St. Peter's Park, Broadstairs.

Digitized by Google

Making it Sprout.

"WHAT on earth are you doing with that little water-can, Tommy?" "Sprinkling the baby's head so's his hair'll sprout."

Temporarily Incurable!

TIMPKINS: "Hallo, Simpkins, you've got your leg straight again? I thought you said it was incurable." Simpkins: "Well, you see, I got my damages against the railway company last week, so now I'm all right."

The Merchant's Device.

VISITOR: "Are all these ladies waiting for change?" Merchant Prince: "Oh, dear no! They are connected with the house. They stimulate trade by struggling with customers who try to approach the counter."

Heard at the Dance.

SHE: "But you don't know my name! What have you put on your cuff?" He: "Oh, I've put down 'Pearl Necklace.'" She: "But there are lots of pearl necklaces here!" He: "Yes; but I've also put down, 'Small and rather tight'—I mean the necklace, you know!"

A Large Order.

"AND the name is to be——?" asked the suave minister, as he approached the font with the precious armful of fat and flounces. "Augustus Philip Ferdinand Codrinton Chesterfield Livingstone Smith." "Dear, dear!" (Turning to the sexton): "A little more water, Mr. Perkins, if you please."

John's Industry.

"YES, I know," said old Mrs. Homespun, "John is sort o' lazy like about some things; so are we all for that matter. But he ain't downright lazy. He'll work hard enough when he gets the work that suits him." "It is good o' you to say so," said Uncle George, "but what kind o' work does suit him?" "Well," replied Mrs. Homespun reflectingly, "there's—there's—well, John is awfully industrious at smoking, for example."

Breaking It Gently.

SOME time ago a troopship was returning from abroad and among the passengers was an old lady, who had a favourite parrot, which she placed under the special care of one of the sailors. On going to attend Polly one morning he was surprised to find the poor bird dead, and knowing how very much upset the old lady would be to hear of the death of her favourite, and not feeling equal to imparting the sad intelligence himself, he employed a brother tar, who was famous for his gentleness in matters of that nature. Going up to the old lady with a very sad face and touching his cap he said: "I don't think that 'ere parrot of yours will live long, marm." "Oh, dear," said the poor old lady. "Why?" "'Cos he's dead," was the comforting reply.

Father Wanted the Light Put Out.

DAUGHTER: "I love him. He is the light of my life." Father: "Well—that's all right; but I object to having my house lit up by him after midnight."

A Soft Answer.

BROWN: "But why do you stop so often? Can't you keep up with me?" Typino (who is rather shaky in her spelling): "Oh, yes; but your language is so eloquent that I frequently find myself spellbound."

A Horse of Experience.

RIDING MASTER: "Give him his head, ma'am—give the horse his head! He knows more about this business than you do!" Miss Westend: "Well, he certainly ought to! I have had only one season's lessons, and he's had twenty!"

Didn't Want to Dust Unnecessarily.

SHE: "Is that friend of yours whom you are expecting a tall man?" He: "About six feet two inches. Why do you ask?" She: "Because in that case I shall have to dust the ornaments on the top shelf."

A Terrible Penalty.

MABEL: "That's what I get for giving my maid my cast-off Worth gowns." Constance: "What's happened?" Mabel (bursting into tears): "That rich old Moneybags caught her in a dark corner and proposed to her, and she accepted him."

Hopeless.

PHYSICIAN (severely): "I have no hesitation in saying, sir, that your wife's nervous fits were occasioned by your staying out so late every night." Witherby: "Good gracious, doctor, I didn't know she was suffering from an incurable disease!"

A Ruffled Air.

COUNSEL (cross-examining complainant): "Was the defendant's air, when he promised to marry you, perfectly serious, or one of levity and jocularity?" Complainant: "If you please, sir, it was all ruffled with him running his hands through it."

Base Ingratitude.

HE: "I am really surprised at Dr. White. After being our family doctor for years, and treating me for all sorts of things, and to think of all the money we've paid him, too!" She: "What has he done?" He: "He wouldn't pass me for the life insurance company!"

Time's Changes.

"I THOUGHT you said about a year ago that you would not ride a bicycle, as your husband did not like you to make yourself conspicuous?" "So I did." "Well, why do you ride now?" "For the same reason. My husband does not like to have me make myself conspicuous."

Tumley's Mistake.

MISS VERE DE VERE: "Only think, Mr. Tumley, they have a custom in Spain that when one admires anything the owner immediately presents him with it." Mr. Tumley (desperately): "I admire your hand very much, Miss Vere de Vere." "I beg your pardon, Mr. Tumley, but we are not in Spain."

Couldn't Injure His Cheek.

THE stories told about the brazen cheek of commercial "gents" have been increased in number by the following: Railway Official (breaking the news gently to the wife of a commercial traveller): "Ahem! madam be calm. Your husband has met with a slight—that is to say, one of the front wheels of a passenger locomotive struck him on the cheek, and——" Wife: "Well, sir, you needn't come round here in order to collect damages. You won't get a penny from me. If your company can't keep its property out of danger, it'll have to take the consequences. You should have your engine insured."

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID NEW SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Mr. Brett's Quest.

A NUMBER of priceless diamonds having been most mysteriously stolen from an Albert Gate Mansion, and four of the custodians of the jewels murdered, Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, in conjunction with the police, is called upon to help clear up the mystery.

The diamonds, it appears, were sent over by the Sultan of Turkey in charge of a number of Turkish officials, and, being of political importance, the mission was placed by the British Government in the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, of the Foreign Office. Upon the night of the robbery and murder, Mr. Talbot disappears.

The Earl of Fairholme, being engaged to be married to Talbot's sister, intrusts Brett with the finding of Talbot.

Brett's first clue is the statement of Mr. Winter, a Scotland Yard detective, that Mr. Talbot and a lady have been seen in Paris, Talbot having signed his name in a hotel register. Brett goes to Paris to see if the signature is genuine.

On his way he falls in with Captain Gaultier, a King's messenger, from whom he learns that Hussein ul Mulk, the Sultan of Turkey's nephew, who had fled from Turkey, is in Paris. Gaultier promises Brett an introduction. Meanwhile Brett has discovered that the signature in the hotel register is not in Talbot's handwriting.

Brett now wires to Fairholme to join him in Paris.

He suspects Hussein of having caused the diamonds to be stolen, and with a view to eliciting information regarding Talbot's whereabouts, pays a visit to the Turk.

Hussein admits complicity, and even allows Brett to see the diamonds which his agent had just brought in.

No sooner does Brett see them than he discovers that the stones are imitations, and immediately tells Hussein so. The agent is furious, but Brett proves his assertions by crushing one of the gems under his heel.

The agent, seeing that the game is up, decamps, but his destination is ascertained by Fairholme, whom Brett had stationed outside the door.

Subsequently Brett and Fairholme together visit the Cabaret Noir, to which the agent had retreated.

This Week's Instalment.

"THIS is the Cabaret Noir?" said Brett questioningly.

"But yes, monsieur," said the waiter.

"There is no other of the same name in Montmartre?"

"But no, monsieur."

"A gentleman, a friend of mine, came here a few minutes ago in a fiacre. He was small, slight, so high"—illustrating the stature by his hand. "He was dressed in dark blue clothes with shiny boots. He was ——"

But Brett's eager description was cut short by the appearance of a new character. Through a narrow door leading into the bar came a handsome, dark-eyed woman, aged perhaps twenty-five, well dressed, shapely, and carrying herself with the easy grace of a born Parisienne.

Her hair was jet black. Her large dark eyes were recessed beneath arched and strongly pencilled eyebrows. Her skin had that peculiar tint of porcelain-white so often seen in women of southern blood when the face has not been tanned by exposure to the weather.

Yet there was nothing delicate in this lady's appearance or manner. A rich colour suffused her cheeks, and her language was remarkably free both in volume and style. She addressed a few observations to the waiter in the common vernacular of Montmartre, the only translatable portion being the question why he was standing about the floor like the ears of a donkey when there was work to be done.

Her manner changed somewhat as she addressed herself to Brett and his companion. There was sufficient of the landlady in her demeanour when she said, "And what would messieurs be pleased to command?"

Now if there was one type of femininity more than another which Brett thoroughly understood it was the saucy, quick-witted, handsome adventuress. He knew that the woman scrutinising him so coolly came well within this category.

He could not tell, of course, in what way she might be associated with the gang whose proceedings contained the explanation of Talbot's fate, but he instantly resolved to adopt a determined position with the lady who half-petulantly, half-curiously, was awaiting his reply.

He came nearer to her.

"I am glad," he said, "that I have met you."

The woman looked him boldly in the eye. "Was it for the happiness of seeing me that monsieur has visited the house?" she said.

"That might well serve as the reason," he answered, "but the pleasure is all the greater since it was unexpected."

"You are pleased to be facetious," she replied. "Will you not tell me your business? I have affairs to occupy me."

"Assuredly, I have driven here as quickly as possible from No. 11, Rue Barbette."

This attack, so direct and uncompromising, did not fail to have its effect. A stony mask of suspicion fell almost imperceptibly across the woman's impudent pretty face.

There was just a tinge of stage laughter in her tone when she cried: "Really, how interesting. And where is the Rue Barbette, monsieur? In what way am I concerned with—No. 11, did you say?"

Brett well knew how to conduct the attack upon this lady. His voice fell to a determined note, his eyes looked gravely into hers as he answered: "It is useless to pretend that you do not understand me. You are losing moments worth gold, perhaps diamonds! Within a few minutes the police will be here, and then it will be too late. Help me first, and

Digitized by Google

I will let the police take care of themselves. Refuse me your assistance, and I will leave you and your friends to the mercy of the district commissaire."

A dangerous light leapt into the woman's eyes at this direct challenge.

"Monsieur is pleased to speak in riddles," she said. "This is a restaurant. We can execute your orders, but we are not skilled in acting charades. You will find better performers in the booths out there;" and she swept her hands scornfully towards the boulevard, with its medley of tents, stalls, and merry-go-rounds.

Brett smiled. "You are a wilful woman," he said, "and think you are serving your friends by adopting this tone. In effect you are bringing them to the guillotine. Now listen. If I leave you at this moment you do not see me again. You will know nothing of what is going on until the police have lodged you in a cell. Neither you nor your associates can escape. I promise nothing, but perhaps if you tell me what I want to know there may be a chance for you. Otherwise there is none. Shall I go?"

And he turned as if to approach the door.

For an instant the woman hesitated, and Brett thought that he had scored.

"Here," she said, lowering her voice, though there was still the menace of subdued passion in her accents. "Who is your friend?"

"A gentleman," he said, "whose identity in no way concerns you. You must deal with me, and it would be better if you had asked who I am."

"I know," she said laconically. "Come this way, both of you."

The Lady from the Circus.

SHE indicated a passage through a flap door located at one side of the counter. Brett followed her into a passage behind the doorway that led into the bar. Fairholme seconded him.

The trio passed rapidly through a door at the end of the passage, and quickly found themselves in a long, low room, usually devoted to billiards.

The place was dark and smelt evilly of stale tobacco. Daylight penetrated but feebly through the red blinds that blocked up three windows on one side. The woman drew two of these blinds, and thus illuminated the interior, but Brett quickly saw that the windows opened on to a yard, and the place was thus thoroughly cut off from all observation from the street.

"Now," she said, "I will show you something."

She walked towards the fireplace at the end of the room. On the mantelpiece was a square of iron sheeting, painted white and studded with curious looking spikes in circles, triangles, and straight lines. From a box close at hand she took half a dozen small glass discs, red and blue. She placed these in a line on some of the spikes at intervals of two inches. Then she retired to that side of the room where they had entered. The distance was perhaps thirty feet.

Before Brett or Fairholme could vaguely guess her intention she whipped a revolver out of her pocket. It would be idle to deny that they were startled, but the woman paid not the least attention to them.

She steadily levelled the weapon and fired twice, smashing the two outer balls of the six. Then she transferred the pistol to her left hand and smashed another pair. Then she turned her back to the target, adjusted a small mirror attached to the butt of the revolver, and smashed one of the remaining bulbs by firing over her left shoulder. Sweeping round with a triumphant smile towards the barrister, she said, "I can do that in fifty other ways, but five will suffice."

"It is very clever, madam," he said. "May I ask why I am indebted to you for this display?"

She replaced the revolver in her pocket. "It is my answer to your question, monsieur," she said. "That is the way I and my friends often talk to people who annoy us, and now I shall wish you good-day. You will find other sights in Montmartre to interest you."

Brett laughed easily, and bowed low.

"Believe me," he said, "I will find few performers so expert, and may I add, so discreet. We will meet again, and perhaps test your skill in other directions."

Without another word the party returned to the front room of the restaurant and Brett and Fairholme passed into the street where their cab was waiting.

"I suppose she meant," said Fairholme, "that if we were not jolly careful she would put a bullet through our hearts as easily as through those glass bulbs."

"Such was her intention," said Brett drily. "But women never have true dramatic genius. That was a piece of melodrama which might suffice with many of her class. It amused me, but it was a waste of time on her part."

"Anyhow," said Fairholme, "we shall not get much out of her in the way of information."

"Oh, yes, we will. She will tell us everything. She has told me a great deal already."

"What?" cried his lordship. "Did that shooting affair convey anything more to you than what I have said?"

"Of course. What need was there for such a trick? In the first place it is very simple. You or I could do it after ten minutes' practice with an expanding charge and a show pistol. Secondly, she admitted that the Cabaret Noir is a centre of operations for the gang in whom we are interested. By the way I should like to know her name."

He directed the driver to wait for them at a street corner some little distance further on. Close to where they stood an itinerant vendor was selling some mechanical toys.

Brett bought one. The price was twenty sous. He gave the man a two franc piece and refused the change.

"Do you know," he said, "who is the proprietor of the Cabaret Noir?"

"Certainly, monsieur," replied the gutter merchant; "it is Gros Jean. His name is, I think, Beaucaire."

"Ah. And the lady who lives there, a dark pretty woman with white skin, who is she?"

"That is his daughter," said the man. "She is known as La Belle Chasseuse."

"Why such a name?"

"Because she is clever with fire-arms. She used to be in a circus, but she left the profession a year ago."

"And does she live here constantly?"

"I cannot say. I think she goes away a great deal. She was travelling recently, she came back—let me see—last Tuesday evening."

"Thank you," said Brett. The two re-entered their cab, and Brett told the driver to proceed as rapidly as possible to the Rue St. Honoré.

"I hope to goodness," he said to Fairholme, "that Captain Gaultier has not left Paris already; these Foreign Office Messengers are liable to be dispatched to the other end of the earth at a moment's notice."

"Why do you wish to see him?" said Fairholme.

"Simply to obtain definite information of that which I already know. La Belle Chasseuse was the woman who accompanied the man made up to look like Jack Talbot during his journey from London. If Gaultier can see her and assure me that I am right I will simply be convinced concerning that which I already know to be true."

"By Jove," cried Fairholme, "that never occurred to me; I wonder if it is so."

"Mademoiselle Beaucaire is quite an adept in two things. She can break tiny glass bulbs and she can flirt. She chose to exhibit the first of these accomplishments to us, and convey what was intended to be a warning: in reality she gave us some valuable information."

ARE YOU IN NEED OF £10?
See page 73.

Digitized by Google

"I suppose," said Fairholme, "that this crowd will watch us pretty closely, won't they?"

Brett leant back in the cab and laughed heartily.

"We are the most interesting persons in Paris to them at this moment," he said. "That poor chap who sold us the toys, and gave us the information we wanted, will have to change his position, I am afraid. One of them is following us now. Let's see who it is."

At the next street corner he stopped the cab suddenly, and jumped out, followed by Fairholme.

A minute later another vehicle dashed into the street. In it was seated a lady, closely veiled; but a large feather hat and the grotesque pattern of a black veil could not wholly conceal the pretty, determined face of La Belle Chasseuse.

Evidently she had no one at hand to undertake the mission, so she had followed Brett in person.

He signalled to her and her driver. Astonished, the man pulled up.

Brett instantly advanced and took off his hat with that pleasant smile of his which usually went straight to the female heart, but which now thoroughly lost its effect upon the furious young woman who looked at him from the interior of the voiture.

"Allow me," he said, "to offer my friendly services. It is a close day and mademoiselle has, I am sure, many other calls on her time. I will save you at least an hour, and myself nearly the same period. I am going to secure the presence of a witness to identify you as the lady who crossed the channel last Tuesday in company with a gentleman. You both drove to the Grand Hotel, and your companion signed the register there in the names of Mr. and Mrs. Talbot; is it not so?"

She bent forward and looked at them viciously. Her eyes sparkled with annoyance at being caught so easily in her self-imposed piece of espionage.

"Monsieur is clever," she said.

"Thank you," he replied, still smiling, "I can occasionally hit the mark with a guess as well as mademoiselle can with a pistol. But, believe me, I only intend at this moment to be polite. Of course, the presence of a witness to identify you is unnecessary. Mademoiselle can now return to the Cabaret Noir, whilst my friend and I will proceed direct to the Grand Hotel. It saves so much trouble, does it not?"

For a moment the woman looked as though she would have liked to produce that infallible revolver and shot him on the spot. Then she angrily commanded her driver to return.

Fairholme had surveyed the scene with open-eyed amazement. "Well," he said, "that beats anything. You really have a splendid nerve. The whole business reads like a chapter out of one of Gaboriau's novels."

"That is the way people live in Paris, my dear fellow. Life is an artificial matter here. But all this excitement has made me hungry. Let us have déjeuner."

On Guard.

On their way to the hotel, Brett, yielding apparently to a momentary impulse, stopped the cab at a house in the Rue de Chaussée d'Antin. Without any explanation to Lord Fairholme he disappeared into the interior of this house, a quiet, staid-looking place, and did not rejoin his companion for nearly ten minutes.

"It is perhaps not of much use," he explained on his return, "but I do not like to leave any stone unturned. The man I have just called upon is a well-known private detective, and I can trust him to look after my business without taking the police into his confidence. Two of his smartest agents will maintain a close watch upon both the Cabaret Noir and No. 11, Rue Barbette during the afternoon."

"You do not seem to expect much result?"

"No; we are tracking some of the most expert and daring scoundrels in France. It is hopeless to expect them to provide us with clues; they simply won't do it. No one but a genius in criminality would have risked such a dramatic move as the impersonation of Jack Talbot, or dared to put in an open appearance at the Grand Hotel. So my agents here can only

Tramped the Room in Pain.

A WOMAN'S SEVERE ORDEAL.

BILE BEANS EFFECT A COMPLETE CURE.

LIVER COMPLAINT, INDIGESTION AND NEURALGIA ENDED.

In the centre of the Lincolnshire Fens, under the shadow of the famous Boston Stump, lives Mrs. Margaret Goy, who, the other day, told a Boston Guardian reporter a remarkable story of her restoration to health by Bile Beans for Biliousness, after years of acute suffering. Mrs. Goy resides at White House, Boston West, and said:

"All my life I have been a great sufferer from indigestion, liver complaint, and neuralgia. I have walked up and down the room for hours, suffering terribly, and unable to keep still. Last winter, the pains in my face, back, and chest were so bad that I could hardly breathe. Time after time I would be driven nearly mad with pain. For a month at a time I have been unable to get any sleep, and I became so despondent that I really thought I should never get better. I could not eat any solid food, but had to subsist as best I could on milk and similar nourishment. I went to nearly every druggist in the town, in the hope that I might obtain something to alleviate the pain, and spent pounds in this way, but with no result. I also obtained the advice of two medical men. They said the trouble was really due to indigestion, and gave me some medicine which relieved me a little, but I soon was as bad as ever again.

"At last a gentleman who called at our house recommended me to try Bile Beans for Biliousness as he said they had cured him of liver complaint. After I had taken a few doses the pains were much relieved. I continued taking the Beans until the neuralgia completely left me, and I have not been troubled with it since. The indigestion and liver complaint have both disappeared, and now I can eat and enjoy my meals without discomfort. As the result of taking Bile Beans I now feel better than I have done for years."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are a certain cure for indigestion, neuralgia, biliousness, liver and kidney disorders, pains in the side, loins and back, constipation, piles, dizziness, sleeplessness, nervous and general debility, anæmia, and all female ailments. Also for colds, chill, lumbago, rheumatism, and as a preventative of influenza. Bile Beans may be had of all chemists or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of prices, 1s. 1½d., or 2s. 9d. (2s. 9d. box contains 3 times 1s. 1½d. size). They are sold only in boxes; never loose.

Digitized by Google

hope at the best, to get sight of any messenger or assistant scoundrels who may turn up at either of the places indicated."

"May we expect to be busy to-night?"

Brett did not answer for a moment. It was evident that whilst he rattled on in a careless strain his active brain was busily employed in discussing the future.

"I hope so," he said at last. "Of course I cannot tell. Our only chance is that we may be able to guess the course of the hidden trail. If to-night does not yield us some information our chances of solving the mystery will be remote, in which case we may as well abandon the quest."

This faint-hearted reply naturally surprised Lord Fairholme considerably. To his mind a considerable measure of success had already been achieved, and he utterly failed to understand why his friend should take such a pessimistic view of affairs at the very moment when they appeared to be opening up somewhat. Brett noted the Earl's perplexity and smiled with genial deprecation as he said—

"Do not be afraid, Fairholme, I will liberate Mr. Talbot and clear his name so effectually that all difficulties will disappear from the path of your marriage."

"Then what is it that makes you so downcast?" cried Fairholme.

"I hate to be beaten at the final stage, and I have a premonition that were I in England—had I but the power to proceed unchecked and unhindered by officialdom—I would soon lay my hands upon the man who originated the Albert Gate mystery. But we are in France for the first thing—in a country of queer legal forms and unusual methods. At home I can always circumvent Scotland Yard; here I am in the midst of strange surroundings, and know not what may happen. Therefore, we must possess our souls in patience and await developments. The agent I have just employed has promised me to report every two hours at the hotel until eight o'clock. Then I will take personal charge of the Cabaret Noir, and——"

"What about me?" cried Fairholme.

"You, my dear fellow, will remain in my room at the hotel and await orders."

This arrangement did not seem to suit the active young Englishman who had been so suddenly plunged into the excitement of a criminal chase in Paris.

"Really, Brett," he said, "I hate to grumble at anything you propose, because you are always right, but you must pardon me for saying that I do not see what particular value my presence here has been to you."

"What?" laughed Brett, "not after your dramatic appearance in the Rue Barbette this morning."

"Oh, anyone could have done that. All I had to do was to break in a door at a given hour."

"Exactly so," said Brett, gravely. "I wanted a friend whom I could trust to implicitly obey my orders, and you did it. I am sure you will fall in with my wishes now."

So Fairholme was silenced on this point, but he ventured to put another question.

"How long am I to sit chewing cigars in your room, then?"

"All night if necessary. If I do not appear by seven o'clock to-morrow morning you had better go to the Embassy and tell one of the secretaries everything connected with our visit to Paris. He will then take action through the police in proper form, and after that you must simply await developments."

"Do you mean to say," said Fairholme anxiously, "that you are contemplating another risky bit of business to-night?"

"Once I take my stand outside the Cabaret Noir about 8.30 I cannot tell where fate may lead me. If I am lucky I will certainly return, whatever be the personal outcome. If, on the other hand, I learn nothing, you may as certainly expect to see me about 2 o'clock a.m."

£5 a Week for Life.

Turn to page 85.

At the hotel Brett found awaiting him a letter which had been delivered by the mid-day post. It was from his elderly assistant in London, whom he had told to make a close scrutiny of all inhabited houses within a certain radius of the Carlton Hotel. The man had done his work systematically, and in only three instances was he called upon to report doubtful cases. Two foreign restaurants in side streets contained a number of residents concerning whom it was difficult to obtain specific information.

One of these establishments he believed to be a resort of Continental gamblers driven from Soho by the too marked attentions of the police. The other was a place of even more questionable repute, and in both instances he had utterly failed to obtain the slightest information from the servants, who apparently "stood in" with the management.

The third dwelling which courted observation was a flat situated above some business premises in another quiet street. So far as he could learn, it was tenanted by an elderly lady who was a helpless invalid, and was waited on by a somewhat curious couple.

"They are Italians, I think," wrote the ex-policeman, "and are very uncommunicative people. I have twice called, on one pretext or another, but when the door is opened it is always kept on the chain, and I cannot see more than the face of a man or woman and a few inches of wall beyond. Still, I have no reason to doubt that the view taken by the milkman and baker is correct, namely, that the owner of the flat is confined to her bed and is suffering from a nervous disease, which renders it imperative she should be shut off from all noise. The landlord informs me that these people have occupied the place for nearly two months. Their rent is paid in advance, and they have not given the slightest cause for complaint. There are, of course, in this district a large number of private hotels and lodging-houses, but they seem to be run on regular lines, and although some of their patrons might well demand closer observation, I have come across nothing suggestive of any suspicious circumstance whatever with reference to them. I have kept back my report until I was able to give details concerning the other houses in the district, and I will now fall back upon the second part of your instructions, i.e., to maintain a close watch upon the three establishments which I have picked out as being more unusual in their habits than the others."

This was all.

Preparations.

Brett read the concluding portion of the report to Fairholme.

"He is a level-headed, shrewd chap who sends this communication," he said—"one of the few men whom I can trust to do exactly what I want, neither more nor less. I think when we return to London we must endeavour to get that chain taken off the invalid lady's door, or, at any rate, obtain some specific facts concerning her disease from her doctor."

Fairholme smiled. "I am glad to hear," he cried, "that you do anticipate our return."

"Oh," said Brett airily, "I never count on failure."

Soon after three o'clock a report arrived from the agent in the Rue du Chaussée d'Antin. It read:—

"Nothing unusual has occurred in the vicinity of the Cabaret Noir. The customers frequenting the place are all of the ordinary type and do not call for special comment.

"A Turkish gentleman quitted the house, No. 11 Rue Barbette, at 1.15 p.m., but returned shortly before two o'clock. Half an hour later a man, whom my assistant recognised as a member of a well-known gang of flash thieves, entered the place. His name is Charles Petit, but he is generally known to his associates as 'Le Ver.' He is small, well dressed, and of youthful appearance, but really older

(Continued on page 94.)

Digitized by Google

Statistics for the Deaf.

FROM an analysis of 1,000 cases of deafness which have come under his personal observation, the editor of the "Journal for the Deaf," has been able to prepare some remarkably interesting facts. These are contained in a special article in the December issue of this publication. Catarrh of the ear, discharging ears, nose and throat complications, influenza, colds in the head and rheumatism are all carefully considered as causes of deafness. Different forms of treatment are discussed, and a large number of cases described, which have been cured by the Drouet method of external application, after other procedures (even operative) failed; in one case, in particular, two aurists, an operation, and artificial aids to hearing had given no relief. As names and addresses are given, these cured cases can be communicated with by anyone who desires to make further inquiries on the subject. To obtain a free copy of the Journal, it is only necessary to address—The Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. With the Journal is also enclosed a Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice by correspondence, with full instructions for home treatment.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

BORAX
Extract of Soap.

A Good Resolution.

The dawn of a new year is resolution time for countless thousands the world over.

In the matter of home management, the housewife who resolves that Borax Extract of Soap shall help in the daily work during 1903 may rest assured that there she can make no better resolution.

For washing clothes and general house cleaning there is no soap will give half the satisfaction, both in the using and results; while its special sweetening quality—owing to the virtue of the incorporated Borax—is absolutely unique.

There is only one genuine Borax Extract of Soap.

The facsimile packet shown is to safeguard you against fraudulent imitations.

Sold in 1lb. packets—same price as the other kinds—by Grocers and Stores everywhere.

FREE SAMPLE PACKET AND SOME NOVELTIES
if you name this paper and your grocer.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

A CELEBRATED
NELSON WATCH & CHAIN
FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO.,
72, Aldermanbury Street, London, E.C.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)
2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.
Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

RUN NO RISK
KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE
THE WORST COUGH

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium, 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

Itch and Burn of Eczema

Promptly Relieved and Cured by
"ANTEXEMA"—You may try it FREE.

Are you tortured from morn till night with burning, itching, scalding Eczema—worse when you get into bed; no rest day or night; the various remedies you have tried have been of little benefit? If you suffer like this, or with any skin trouble, great or small, send for a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA," together with copyright treatise on "Skin Troubles," and 200 testimonials from grateful sufferers who have been cured. Sent in plain wrapper, post paid. "ANTEXEMA" is sold by all chemists at 1/1½ (post free from us for 1/3). Refuse injurious substitutes.

THE "ANTEXEMA" COMPANY, LONDON, N.W.

Digitized by Google

than he looks. He is still in the house inhabited by the Turks."

"What is the meaning of 'Le Ver'?" said Fairholme.

"It means 'The Worm,'" answered Brett.

"I must say these chaps do find suitable nicknames for one another. I wonder if he is the fellow we followed to Montmartre this morning?"

"Possibly, though I am puzzled to understand why he should trust himself in that hornets' nest again. Most certainly the description covers him, but we shall probably hear more details later. I wonder where the Turkish gentleman went whom 'Le Ver' seems to have followed. He could not have gone to the Cabaret Noir in the time?"

Brett's curiosity was answered to some extent by the next report, delivered about five o'clock. It read as follows:—

"Le Ver is still in the house No. 11 Rue Barbette. My agent explains that he did not follow the Turk who left and returned to the place earlier, because his definite instructions were not to leave the locality, but accurately report upon all persons who entered or left. Absolutely nothing has transpired in this neighbourhood since my first report.

"Gros Jean, the father of La Belle Chasseuse, arrived at Cabaret Noir soon after four o'clock. My agent ascertained from the cabman who drove him that Gros Jean had hired the vehicle outside the Gare de Lyon. Otherwise nothing stirring."

At seven o'clock came developments.

"Three Turkish gentlemen have quitted No. 11 Rue Barbette, but the Frenchman is still there. As it might be necessary to follow another person leaving this house, I stationed another watcher with my assistant, and this second man followed the Turks to a restaurant in the Grand Boulevard. So far as he could judge, they seem to be excited and apprehensive. They drank some wine and conversed together in low tones. At 6.15 they quitted the café and rapidly jumped into an empty fiacre, being driven off in the direction of the Opera. So unexpectedly did they leave their seats that before my agent could hire another cab they had disappeared in the traffic, and, although he drove after them as rapidly as possible, he failed to again catch sight of them. I have reprimanded him for his negligence, although he did right in at once coming to me to report his failure. In accordance with your instructions, I have ordered the watchers at the Café Noir and in the Rue Barbette to be in this office at 8.15 p.m."

"Now I wonder," said Brett, "why the Turks left the Frenchman alone in No. 11. It is odd, to say the least of it, for since the dramatic discovery of the spurious diamonds this morning they must be even more in the dark than I am. That must be looked into, but I cannot attend to it now. At this moment, if I am not mistaken, the centre of interest is the Cabaret Noir."

The two men occupied a sitting-room on the first floor of the hotel, and their respective bedrooms flanked it on each side. Brett explained that he could not tackle the table d'hôte dinner, so he made a hasty meal in their sitting-room and then excused himself whilst he retired to his bedroom to change his clothing.

He was absent some twenty minutes, and Fairholme amused himself by glancing over the copies of the day's London newspapers which had recently arrived. Suddenly the door of Brett's bedroom opened, and a decrepit elderly man, a shabby-genteel individual, disfigured by drink and crumpled up by rheumatism, appeared.

"Who the dickens——" began Fairholme.

But he was amazed to hear Brett's familiar voice asking:

"Do you think the disguise sufficiently complete?"

"Complete," shouted Fairholme, "why, your own mother would not know you, and your father would probably punch me for suggesting it could be you."

"That is all right," said the barrister cheerfully. "I will now proceed to get quietly drunk at the Café Noir. Good-bye until seven o'clock to-morrow morning—perhaps earlier, and perhaps—well, no—until seven o'clock!"

They shook hands and parted, and not even Brett, the cleverest amateur detective of his day, could have remotely guessed where and how they would meet next.

(To be continued in next Tuesday's "Short Stories.")

PRINCIPAL: (to the new apprentice) "Has the book-keeper told you what you have to do in the afternoon?" Youth: "Yes, sir. I was to wake him when I saw you coming."

HE: "I am delighted with my new doctor. He promises to make my rheumatism disappear within a month." She (shocked): "But then we shall have to buy a barometer."

"I DON'T see how you dare trust yourself to young Dr. Pills. He hasn't any patients." "That's just the point. He'll strain every nerve to keep me alive. I'm his only source of income."

YOUNG MAN: "I assure you, sir, I look forward longingly to the union with your daughter." Girl's Father: "Ah, well, that's a candid confession, anyhow. She'll certainly bring you there if she's half as extravagant as I've allowed her to be."

A REGENT STREET milliner put a basket that had four kinds of paint over it, and had been run over by an omnibus, in her show window, and crowds of women stopped to look at it and to study it, and they went home resolved to have one of that new style of bonnet.

SIR MARMADUKE JAMM: "William, my cigar boxes have emptied themselves with uncommon rapidity during the last month. Is it possible that during the short period you have been in my service——" Valet: "No, sir, I have still in my possession three boxes of my late employer's."

MR. LAFFAN (humourist, looking up suddenly from his work): "My dear, I do wish you would break yourself of that silly habit of laughing out loud when you are reading. How do you expect me to do anything——" Mrs. Laffan: "But it's the manuscript of your own book I am reading, dear." Mr. Laffan: "Ah, yes—certainly—of course! Ah—what was I saying? Oh, yes—wonderful how much more work I can do at home than I could at the office, isn't it, Marie?"

The Art of Beauty.

Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the Contents:

The Cure of Stoutness—The Cure of Leanness—The Figure—Bad Complexions: How to cure them—The Hair in Ill Health—Moles, Warts, and Superfluous Hair—Cure for Acne—Types of Beauty—How to Improve the Bust—The Eyebrows—The Eyelashes—The Figure.

Cut this out and send it with 1s. 2d. and your name and address to the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Book sent on receipt of order and money.

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ? ? is it generally thought there is no cure for ASTHMA, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS. SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints.

BECAUSE ! ! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive, post free, Free of Charge, particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. Buckingham Road, Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by his Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

Mr. O. DEACON. (From Photo.)

No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following Testimonial, one out of thousands received:

SEVERE CASE OF CHRONIC BRONCHITIS CURED.

Your cure has done wonders for me; I feel quite a new man. I do not have any of those drowsy and languid feelings, no bad taste in the morning, do not spit any phlegm, do not have any thumping of the heart as I used to, can enjoy food, do not have any pain after eating. No man can be more thankful than I am to think I am relieved of that terrible complaint, and I owe everything to your cure. My friends tell me I should have been a dead man before now if something had not been done for me. Please accept my thanks. OWEN DEACON.
Hurst. (Full address on application.)

The Director is prepared to pay £1,000 to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide enquirers.

CURABLE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Drunkenness

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence,

Mrs. C. H.
(Room 8),
195 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.
(The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 55 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

GIVEN AWAY

With this Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 470)

Paper Pattern of a

WINTER SKIRT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents. PRICE 1d.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Hats and the Girl.

"ALFRED" often does shopping where there are lady assistants. Sometimes he chats with them. Should he, on leaving the shop, raise his hat?

* * * *

It is not a rule in this country to do so, as it is on the Continent, but I think there are many cases in which we should greatly improve ourselves by adopting foreign manners. This is one of them. If you have chatted with the girl, apart from the nature of your business, you are recognising her claims to social courtesy. On leaving, you could quite rightly raise your hat. I do not say make an elaborate bow, but a slight inclination simply. Many men do it, and nothing is lost to themselves.

Addressing a Daughter.

"CHARLES G." inquires: "Is it a breach of etiquette to address a letter to an only daughter, using her initial, as in "Miss H. Brown?" Should it be "Miss Brown" only?

Yes, if she is the only daughter, and is grown up, and there is no senior Miss Brown of another branch of the family staying in the house.

A Tale of Rivals.

"EL ME" has been engaged to a girl for three years. In the same house as herself a gentleman is staying, who has been there for eighteen months. He has noticed, to use his own words, "that she lacks the sentimental expression which she used to have." Also that the man has paid her marked attention, though he knew of her engagement. He has also given her presents. During this time the young lady has twice written to "EL ME" to ask him to break off the engagement, and each time has followed these letters by a desire for its continuance. When questioned as to the reason for wishing to break it off, she said she believed the "other man" loved her more than my correspondent.

* * * *

It is evident that there is something weak in the girl's affection for you, "EL ME." I imagine the other man has gained a hold on her which is decidedly prejudicial to your own chances. His living in the same house has given him an advantage over you which is likely to prove very strong. You might have foreseen this from the first. I hope, for your sake, it is not too late. Evidently the girl suspects you of lukewarmness for not having outwitted him long ago, and possibly she is right. Are you really very fond of her? Or is it just your vanity that has been wounded by a successful rival? Think it well over, and, if you find that her having gone over to him is a matter you can regard with coolness, give her up and turn your attention elsewhere. A girl so changeable and inconstant does not seem a very enviable possession for a man.

How to Become Reconciled.

"ROO" writes, I have had a difference with my fiancée on some trifling affair. It has become so serious that we have not spoken for two days. I want to make it up, but am nervous about approaching her after our difference.

* * * *

I should take the next opportunity of speaking to her without mentioning the difference at all. Give the impression that you have entirely forgotten it, and are on the same footing as before. If she is really fond of you, she will soon resume her normal attitude towards you, and will not wait for such a formal and unsatisfactory thing as a reconciliation by apologies. I have known many squabbles settled like this. Nobody's pride is injured, which, I suppose, is the chief consideration to you.

Sudden Coldness.

"EILEEN" has been "keeping company" with a young man, who seemed devoted to her. Suddenly, without any explanation, he withdrew his attentions, and now is only coldly polite. "EILEEN" is very fond of him, so is quite miserable at this turn of affairs.

* * * *

There was certainly no justification for his conduct. If the young man has heard anything about you which has made him change his attitude, he should certainly have let you know of it. I should write to him and ask an explanation. If he does not give it, then you must conclude that he has been merely trifling with your affections.

A Lax Reader.

"PERPLEXED" (Pretoria).—I fear you do not read your "In Confidence" as regularly as you might, or you would have seen that in the issue of November 8, Miss Morris dealt with your case at length. In case you should be equally lax in regard to this paragraph, I have written to you to this effect, and sent you a copy of that number. Now, is it not rather thoughtless for a business man to send over Transvaal stamps for use here in replying to your letter? They are, of course, very nice to give to one's stamp-collecting friends, but have no postal value in Britain. However, I have sent them back to you privately, and only hope that you will find a ready way out of your trouble.

A Case for Interruption.

"J. H." was walking out the other day, and met his fiancée in the street, deeply interested in the remarks of a strange man. Should he go up and speak to her under the circumstances?

* * * *

I rather think so. Naturally you would wish to know all about the conversation with the strange man. And no fiancée would be of the right sort if she exchanged intimacies in the street with men which she did not wish her lover to hear. Besides, it might only have been her uncle or second cousin, and perhaps they were only talking family matters.

Calf Love.

"MATER" writes to me to say that her young son, seventeen years old, has fallen in love with his landlady's daughter in the country town where he works. What can she do to prevent matters from becoming dangerous? The boy is only getting a small salary in an office.

* * * *

I would privately ask the landlady to keep an eye on him if I were his mother, either in a letter or by going to the country town and seeing how matters stand. But probably the boy is not in love at all. At seventeen one usually falls in love, anything up to a dozen times, with a wide variety of people, but seldom is one so desperately foolish as to allow things to develop into premature marriage.

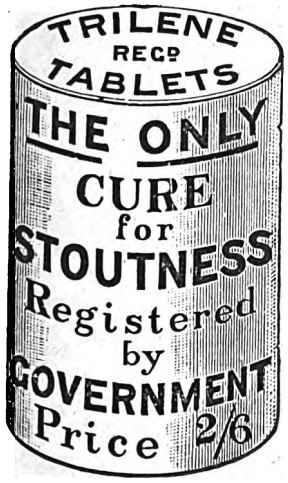
Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

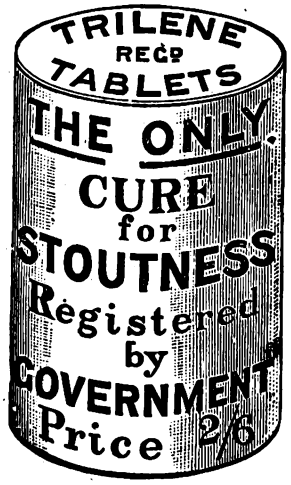
Can be CURED by taking

TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."



Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION
66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risebolm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18.b. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagilit, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

CADBURY'S COCOA

Points from the Press:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to Cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and indeed, pernicious, especially having regard to the fact that Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."—The Lancet.

CADBURY'S is COCOA and the BEST COCOA only

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are

THE REMEDY FOR THE PEOPLE.

RECOMMENDED BY FRIENDS TO FRIENDS.

NOT PUSHED BY DOUBTFUL METHODS.

DESERVING OF THEIR POPULARITY.

NOW ENJOYING A GREATER SUCCESS THAN EVER.

STILL WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Some Good Reasons for Using

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BECAUSE it is

So Rich and Creamy, yet will not disagree.
So pure and Delicious,
So Wholesome and Nutritious,

BECAUSE it is

So little Trouble, and so Economical,
And makes the simplest Meal a Dainty Repast.

As an article of Food BIRD'S CUSTARD is unrivalled for Nutriment and Delicacy of Flavour. Practical housewives always keep a supply ready at hand.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE! SEE INSIDE.

Short Stories.

No. 734.] Week ending January 24th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Suddenly the door burst open, and before her stood the man who had so nearly killed her husband. "Hide me—hide me!" he gasped in despair.

(A Powerful Incident from our Story, "To Forgive is Divine." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is compos d of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY p eparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

C. E. POPPLESTON, Esq., B.A., Mus. Doc., writing from Exeter College, Oxford, says:

"I have suffered continually from severe Headache. A medical friend advised me to try Kaputine. I did so, and in a few minutes my Headache had left me. It is a splendid remedy."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,

of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield,

for 12 stamps.

'Let's Talk of Graves' Drapery

.. THE .. 'ECONOMIC'

BALE

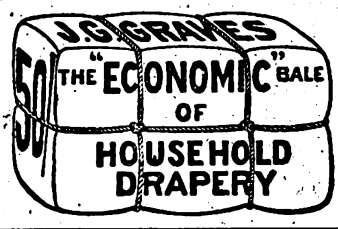
OF HOUSEHOLD DRAPERY.

£2 10s.

CONTAINS: Pair very Best Quality Twilled Sheets, Pair Heavy Blankets with white whipped edges (full size), Superior Quality Red and White or Blue and White Alhambra Quilt (large size), Pair Fine Quality Pillow Slips, 1 Bolster Case, Set of 5 Handsomely Embroidered Toilet Mats, 2 Turkish Towels, Best Quality Glass Cloth, Scouring Cloth, 6 Netted Dusters, Pair Special Design Lace Curtains, 1 Woven Turkey Table Cloth, 1 Embroidered Table Cover 36 in. square, and 1 Full Size White Table Cloth of Fine Quality.

TERMS.

Send only 8/-, the Bale will then be sent to your address (carriage paid), and, if you are satisfied, complete the purchase in six more monthly payments of 7s. each. If not satisfied, return the parcel, and your deposit will be refunded in full.



Send for No. 5 Catalogue of Drapery, Costumes, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. No Risk. Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay; Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc.

For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 9), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PACES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

& 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester

3/- THE WORLD'S WONDER. 3/-

OUR BEST CHEAPEST WATCH. With a guarantee to keep correct time for 3 years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 3/- and three stamps extra for postage. For accurate time-keeping equal to any Lady's or Gent's watch costing 5 gs. All we ask of you is to show the Watch to your friends, as by so doing you advertise our business.—SWISS WATCH IMPORTERS, 12, Goswell Road, London, E.C.

Mention "Short Stories."

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W, you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

SPLENDID SERIAL STORY STARTS SHORTLY.

Short Stories.

No. 734.] For the Week Ending January 24th, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

To Forgive is Divine.

Containing the Incident Depicted on our Cover.

RALPH JACKSON and Bernard Mason were fellow clerks in the bank of Mason and Mason, whose imposing buildings occupied a large share of the tiny High Street of Tamerton.

The bank buildings were indeed a source of great pride to the inhabitants of that small Devonshire town, and Mr. Mason, the leading partner in the firm, was also the leading person in the place, dominating the rest of the population as his beautiful house dominated the town from the rising moorland beyond it.

To be "in the bank" was considered by all the townspeople a signal honour, and Ralph Jackson was envied by more than one of his contemporaries when he was admitted into these sacred precincts at the same time as Bernard Mason, nephew of the senior partner.

Ralph was a general favourite—a handsome Devonian youth, with a dash of devil-may-care audacity about him that appealed mightily to the quieter and more gentle nature of his fellow worker and friend, Bernard Mason.

Bernard's devotion to his cheery and reckless companion was indeed a by-word in the place, and their friendship was frequently compared with the great friendship of old—with that of David and Jonathan—of Damon and Pythias.

As in character, so in face, they presented a great contrast to one another. Ralph's dark complexion—bright dark eyes and vivacious manners, told of some strain in him of other than British blood; whilst Bernard's fair countenance and serene grey eyes proclaimed him, with no uncertain voice, to be Anglo-Saxon through and through.

The two men were constantly together; they shared lodgings in a pretty cottage just outside the town; their free time was always spent in one another's company, and their brief holidays usually consisted of a bicycling or walking tour on the great moor itself—or further afield and—wonderful to relate—the eager, boyish friendship outlived their young days, and when the two men were both close upon thirty, and occupying positions of confidence in the bank, they were still, as ever, the most close and intimate of friends.

Nor was the bond broken when Bernard Mason—now in a position to make a home of his own—asked his cousin Doris to be his wife, and after a very short engagement married her and took her to live in a house at the top of the High Street—a stone's throw away from the bank.

Mason's first wish had been that Ralph should share his and Doris' home, but to this proposition Ralph himself turned an absolutely deaf ear.

"No, no," he said, when both Bernard and his wife pressed him to reconsider his decision; "I am not going to be a disturber of the peace, and no one has any right to live with a newly married pair. Let me be a friend to you both and come in and out occasionally, that is all I ask."

And so it came about that Ralph was a constant guest in the new and happy home, while neither Bernard nor Doris spared any pains to make him feel that he was completely one of themselves—their dearest and best friend! It was the same story when baby Doris came to make a third in that happy household.

All rights reserved.]

Ralph, of course, must be her godfather; she must look upon Ralph as a relation; Ralph must never feel "out of it," because the little family was so complete.

Ralph was still so much to them both—to Bernard and Doris—and they vied with each other in spoiling him and thinking of his welfare until——

* * * * *

"I am a good deal bothered by this—I want to talk it over with you." And James Mason, senior partner in the famous bank, looked up into the face of his son, the junior partner, who stood behind him, and handed him a cheque.

The two men were in the elder Mason's private room, and the younger man took the cheque from his father's hand, and looked at it with a puzzled frown.

"What's the matter with it, dad?" he said, slowly turning it backwards and forwards, "it seems all in order."

"All in order, perhaps," the elder man answered drily "only that does not happen to be my signature!"

"Not your signature?" Richard Mason looked narrowly at the cheque again; "why, dad, I could have sworn to it in a court of law. That queer squiggle in the 'm' is yours down to the ground."

"Hum—yes—very well done—too well done, in fact; it was that which caught the eye of the cashier of our London branch to whom it was presented. He writes, 'Tell me if it is all right.'"

"But he cashed it?"

"Yes—he cashed it at once, seeing my signature, and the cheque not being crossed. But on investigation something about it struck him as unusual, and he sent it off to me post haste."

"Who presented it?"

"That's the terrible part of it, Dick," and the elder Mr. Mason's face grew suddenly pinched and drawn; "this note says, 'the man who cashed the cheque presented also the inclosed note, which further disarmed all suspicion'"—and here—with a little groan, Mr. Mason handed to his son a small, folded piece of paper, on which were written the words:

Please cash inclosed for bearer, who is well known to me.
BERNARD MASON.

"Bernard!" Dick Mason staggered back from the table. "Bernard could never have known that——"

"Ah, my dear boy, I have been saying that over and over to myself the whole morning. Bernard could never have guessed that this was an impudent forgery. He must have supposed it was all right; that I really wrote a large cheque for a man called Smith—that——"

"Have you spoken to Bernard?"

"No—no—I could not face it. The elder Mason shuddered a little; "I—you know my dear boy, I have loved Bernard like a son—I cannot bear to think that he—that he——"

"Oh! he couldn't have, you know," said Dick cheerily; "let me call him in and——"

Digitized by Google

His father broke in hurriedly.

"Dick—I wish I could forget that Bernard has had money difficulties lately. I heard it by chance, but on unimpeachable authority. Some investments went wrong; he owes money and I can't get it out of my head that being in a difficulty he—he——"

The old man could not end his sentence, he buried his face in his hands and for a moment a pregnant silence fell over father and son.

The younger man broke it.

"Look here, dad," he said firmly; "we must not let any sentimental feelings interfere with right and justice. If you really think Bernard could have done so incredible a thing—then——but let me call Bernard in," he ended impetuously.

And two minutes later Bernard Mason stood before his uncle and cousin, looking from one to the other, a puzzled inquiry in his eyes.

"Yes," he said gently at last, "did you want me, uncle James? Can I——"

"You can explain this," with a strangely dramatic gesture the senior partner swept the cheque from the table, and with it the note signed with Bernard's own name.

"What—does—this—mean?"

The words broke at last from Bernard's lips—one by one, and hoarsely—"this is not—could you think——" The hesitating, husky words fell over one another in dreamingless phrases; a sudden and ghastly pallor spread over the speaker's face—his eyes grew wide, startled—to the onlookers they appeared terrified, the cheque and the slip of paper fluttered to the ground, and Bernard's hand went out and grasped at the table.

"My God!" he began; "I——" then something seemed to choke him and he looked at the other two men with a pathetic appeal in his face.

"Do not—do not—be too hard," he whispered; "I—I——" And as he again spoke the monosyllable the pallor on his face became yet more deadly, and with a strange little moan he dropped down like a stone at his listeners' feet.

Over the prostrate form the eyes of father and son met—the anguish and horror on each face reflected on the other.

"Guilty!" the old man murmured brokenly; "guilty! My nephew—the husband of my favourite niece—guilty of forgery—guilty of defrauding me who have loved him as a father." And again the white head was bowed upon the clasped hands—through whose fingers there dropped slowly the difficult and painful tears of old age.

On that same afternoon, beside Bernard Mason's bed of sickness his wife sat, silently watching him—her face drawn with agony.

Very pitifully and tenderly her cousin Dick had broken to her the terrible events of the morning—his face growing only more gentle when she cried fiercely:

"And you believe such things of Bernard? My Bernard who is the soul of honour! Go—go!" and she pointed indignantly to the door; "and never enter our house again until you can unsay what you have said to me to-day."

Through the long hours since then, Doris had patiently watched beside her husband—who lay, sunk in a deep unconsciousness from which no remedies would rouse him.

Ralph came to and fro, sympathetic, helpful, resourceful—his indignation against those who had accused Bernard, as great as Doris' own.

"Absurd, monstrous!" he repeated many times; "it must be some ghastly mistake!"

"Ah! yes—it must be some ghastly mistake"—that was the thought which repeated itself over and over again in the mind of the faithful wife who sat speechlessly gazing at the face of the man she loved.

The church clock was striking eight when, for the first time during her long watch—Bernard stirred slightly—moaned—and flung out his hand.

"How could you think it was I?" he said quickly, in a strange, monotonous voice. "Am I a cheat—a forger?" Silence for a moment, then the hurried voice began again:

"No—no—you must not question me—I cannot say—I tell you—I cannot say—I must not hurt him. I——" Doris rose and bent over the recumbent form, every pulse in her body beating wildly.

"Tell me, dear?" she said softly; "so you know who forged the cheque.

He opened his eyes at the sound of her voice, but it was plain that he did not recognise her.

"How can I tell of the hurt he has done me?" the rapid voice resumed; "I was never a sneak—not even at school—I can't tell of other chaps. And it was even then—then—ah! I can't remember—why can't I remember?"

Doris sat down again trembling from head to foot, whilst his dim, unseeing eyes looked out across the room.

"Then—then—ah! yes, I have it—then my companion—my guide and mine own familiar friend! Ralph—Ralph—Ralph!"

The cry rang through the room, rang through the house; the sick man—roused perhaps, by the very sound, pulled himself up in bed and looked wildly round him—the fire of delirium in his eyes.

"I knew the hand," he said thickly; "I knew Ralph's hand. We used—to play—at copying letters—for fun—as boys. Mine own——familiar — friend. He forged it—he forged it—and I—I will never tell a soul—not a soul—not a soul"—his voice dropped into indistinct murmurings—he fell back on the pillow again, and then once more cried aloud in a very agony of intreaty: "Ralph—Ralph—Ralph."

There was a step on the stair, the door opened and Ralph Jackson crossed the threshold, a look of profound anxiety on his face. But he was not allowed to enter the room; in the flash of a second Doris barred his way, her eyes bright with anger, a flush upon her cheek—her hands held out as though to push him away.

"How dare you come here?" she cried under her breath; "how dare you come to pretend anxiety and sympathy for the man you have struck down. I know all—Ralph Jackson—I know all—and may God forgive you for I never, never will."

Round the little grey house on the top of the moor the wintry wind howled and moaned like myriads of lost souls, as it tore across the uplands. It was a freezingly cold night in the January following the discovery of the forgery at Mason's bank—that discovery which had stricken down Bernard Mason with an illness from which it seemed more than likely he might never recover.

The doctors declared that the shock—due to the discovery of his friend's treachery and crime—had upset a brain already overwrought with work and worry about money matters, and since that fatal morning when he had dropped senseless at his uncle's feet, Bernard had never been himself, although occasional lucid intervals woke hope in the breast of his wife.

By medical advice he had been removed to a house in the most remote part of the moor, where absolute quiet reigned supreme, and in the house Doris sat on that wild January night, listening to the howling tempest without, whilst her thoughts wandered over the past months.

No compunction stirred within her towards the man who had wrought such havoc on her husband's life—only bitter anger surged in her heart and she felt actual gladness in realising that he was expiating his crime in the convict prison not so many miles away. Her information, given to Mr. Mason, and based upon her husband's delirious ravings, led to Ralph Jackson's arrest—and after a stubborn declaration of innocence, lasting throughout his trial, he finally acknowledged his guilt, acknowledging too, that he had intended suspicion to fall upon the friend who loved him—Bernard Mason.

"I never dreamt that Bernard would find me out so quickly," he said to Bernard's wife on the one and only occasion when she visited him, during his trial. "I never meant——"

Digitized by Google

"Ah!—make no excuses," she had answered bitterly; "criminals do mean anything. I can never forgive you for having broken Bernard's heart and life—never."

Thoughts of all this passed through Doris' mind now as she sat in the queer little room of the cottage on the moor. Baby Doris sat beside her. Bernard lay in a bed in the corner because the doctors advised that he should not be carried upstairs—from the kitchen behind came the sounds of a hymn being sung cheerfully and lustily by the kindly woman who did all the work of the house.

A wilder gust of wind rattling the casement roused Doris from her dream; she looked down at the golden head of the child beside her and sighed softly.

"Bedtime, sweetheart," she said, touching the child's soft curls tenderly.

"Doesn't the wind make a ugly great noise, mummy?" The child shrank closer to her mother; "and it's awful cold out there, isn't it? When I say my prayers to-night I'll ask God to take care of everybody out on the moor."

"Oh, I hope nobody is out there to-night, darling," Doris shuddered; "it is snowing hard, and the wind must cut like a knife. I hope nobody is out on the wild moor."

"Please, mummy, may I say my prayers in here?" The child said after a moment; "here, in the warm, where you and daddy are?" and she glanced towards the bed; "then I'll go upstairs with Mrs. Widdecombe like a lamb."

Doris smiled an assent, and the little one, after kissing her mother, knelt down beside a great armchair and clasped her tiny hands. She had finished her customary prayer and paused for a moment, then said, very softly:

"And oh! please, dear God, take care of all the poor people out in the wind and cold—and bring them safe home, and——"

Her innocent words were cut short—a terrific blast shook the house to its very foundation, and at the same instant a knock sounded at the door, making Doris leap round suddenly, a great terror on her face.

"Who is there?" she cried; advancing timidly to the door and lifting the latch, "who——"

The door was flung back, a rush of icy air, a torrent of snowflakes poured into the room, and with them came a man at sight of whom a cry of horror rose to Doris' lips and froze there into silent dismay.

The child knelt on; the sick man on the bed never stirred; the man at the door, and the woman looked at one another silently. Then Doris spoke.

"You?" she cried, "you—and here? How dare you? How could you——"

The man advanced into the room and shut and locked the door behind him, and then little Doris rose from her knees, looking at him with round, amazed eyes.

"Was you out on the moor in the snow?" she asked; "I asked God to bring everybody safely home—so He's brought you here; but why do you wear such funny clothes all covered with arrows?"

A harsh laugh broke from the man, the woman shivered and caught the child against her heart.

"Hush, dear, this man is a bad man," she said bitterly; "he was in prison; that is a prison dress—he has got away, I suppose!"

The scathing scorn in her tones made her listener writhe.

"Doris, forgive me, forgive me," he said coming nearer to her, a pitiful expression on his dark face, now so haggard and worn, so unlike the bright Ralph Jackson of the past—"God knows I have repented; God knows I would give my life to undo the wrong I did to give Bernard back his reason. Forgive me—and—help me—I have been wandering on the moor for two nights and a day," and with a gesture of unutterable fatigue he sank into the arm chair.

Though her soul was brimming over with bitterness against this man, a womanly instinct made Doris bring him a glass of milk from the table and some bread which he devoured ravenously—looking round him the while like a hunted animal.

"Help me to escape, Doris," he said presently; "for the sake of old times, for old friendship forgive me and help me."

The white scorn on the woman's face was terrible to see. For answer she swept back the curtain of the bed and revealed her husband's form sunk in a lethargy that was not sleep; and at the sight the convict bowed his head upon his hands and hot tears dropped between his fingers.

"Poor man," the child whispered, "he's c r y i n g—o h, mummy, please forgive him, 'cos God brought him here."

"Did you know we were here?" Doris turned restlessly upon him. He nodded.

"The last visitor who came to see me told me. I have been creeping over here to you in these weary nights—by day I have hidden where I could—knowing that any moment I might be tracked and caught. Doris—forgive me—save me!"

He slipped from the chair upon his knees in a very agony of appeal, and once more baby Doris spoke.

"Oh! mummy, please help him, as God really and truly brought him here. Please help him."

"How can I forgive you? How can I?" Doris moaned; "you have spoilt my life—and his—and yet——"

She looked at the white face on the pillow; "Bernard has so often spoken in his wanderings—and always with love—always wanting to shield you—I—I——"

Breaking off her sentence abruptly she suddenly threw open a door into a tiny inner room.

"Go in there—Bernard's clothes are in the cupboard; change quickly, quickly—lest I should repent. Bernard talks of you still—as if he loved you!"

She turned away with a sob as Ralph vanished into the inner room, to emerge presently, dressed in Bernard's clothes.

"Let me touch his hand just once," he said huskily; "I—have repented. I did what I did in a moment of mad folly, when debts pressed. Let me touch his hand."

Doris bowed her head, she could not speak, and the convict approaching the bed, took the thin hand in his own.

"Forgive me, Bernard," he almost sobbed. At the touch of his hand, the sound of his voice, the sick man's eyes opened in a look of full recognition.

"Why, Ralph," he said. "Ralph, old chap! I never told a soul, old man—I will gladly bear the penalty for you."

"God bless you," the convict's voice was choked and hoarse, "but—there is no penalty to pay, dear old man. You are the best friend a man ever had—but there is no penalty to pay. I—am I going right away—and your uncle and wife know the truth—but there's no penalty—to pay."

A smile flashed over the white face.

"Ah! that's right. I'm glad—you owned up for I should never have told of you. I've been a bit queer, I think, but seeing you has made me well! Good-bye, old chap, good luck to you, and I'm glad you told the truth, and cleared me!"

From that day Bernard Mason slowly recovered and became himself again, but the actual truth was never told him.

Letters sometimes reach him from a far western land where Ralph is carving out a new career for himself; they are the letters of a man who is striving after right.

And Doris whispers to herself sometimes:

"Thank God I helped him that night; thank God I forgave. It has given Bernard back to me."

H. Templeton.

£5 A Week for Life!

This is the

HUGE PRIZE OFFERED BY PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

(For particulars, see page 117.)

Digitized by Google

Which Shall Have Her?

Telling of Two Men's Love for a Woman.

"WHATEVER is the matter with you two fellows?" asked Dick Grayling cheerily, addressing his question to two young men about his own age, which was twenty. "You seem to be scowling at each other every opportunity you get, and you used to be the best of chums."

Ralph Connor and Val Ewing looked at him with the same scowl as they were, according to him, bestowing on one another, but they made no reply. All three lodged in the same house, in the general sitting-room of which they were now assembled; Connor and Ewing were telegraph operators, while Grayling was in a solicitor's office.

"If you fellows have had a quarrel," continued Grayling calmly, "the best thing you can do is to let me be arbitrator and square it up. I'll be absolutely impartial, for I don't like one more than the other—I mean, I like you both equally well. Now, out with it, Connor!" he concluded, turning to that young man, because a faint smile had crossed his face at the doubtful compliment of the remark about not liking one any more than the other.

"Well," said Connor slowly, with a sidelong glance at Ewing, "I don't see why we should not settle it that way, if Ewing is agreeable. One has got to give way, that's certain!"

"Of course!" assented Grayling, speaking with the confidence of a man who knows nothing about the matter. "Val will agree!"

"I don't see how you can decide," objected Ewing. "It's she who must do that."

"Oh, rivals, eh?!" queried Grayling. "Still, you might just as well permit me to be mediator, so far as possible, for you can't get out of the difficulty by one swallowing the other, which is what you would both like to do, if appearances count for anything!"

Connor and Ewing glanced at one another, and gradually a smile stole over their faces, ending in a laugh. They both appreciated the humorous side of the affair.

"We will put the matter before you, Dick," observed Ewing, straightening himself in his chair, "and perhaps you can advise as to the best way to act. You ought to know something, being a solicitor."

"You see," said Connor, getting to business at once, "I fell in love with her first!"

"Oh, tell that to someone else!" interrupted Ewing wrathfully. "I fell in love with her when I saw her at the soirée, and that was the evening before you——"

"Excuse me!" broke in Connor, stiffly.

Before he could say more, Grayling intervened.

"I'm to be the judge, and I may as well direct the course of proceedings. I gather from the evidence that you are both in love with the same girl; that doesn't require much inspiration to perceive. I don't think it matters an atom who fell in love with her first; the all-important point, in my opinion, is—Does she favour either of you?"

"That's just where the difficulty comes in!" pronounced Ewing. "I am convinced that she would favour me if Connor were out of the way, but while he will push himself forward the girl hasn't a chance to show preference. She's a very tender-hearted, sensitive, good-natured, generous, loving——"

"We'll take the rest of that evidence as read!" declared Grayling judiciously. "But I suspect that Connor thinks she prefers him, but doesn't care to show it in front of you—or, perhaps I ought to say, while you are also a candidate for her favours!"

"Precisely!" agreed Connor admiringly. "You'll make a splendid judge one day, old man!"

"Oh, one gets accustomed to seeing through things quickly in a lawyer's office," remarked Grayling, with pretended nonchalance, although he was really flattered. "I think we ought to adjourn the further hearing of this case till I have been to one or two of these Institute meetings and have seen how she treats you both."

"Won't do!" asserted Connor and Ewing in a breath.

"You must take it for granted," continued the latter, "that she would have one if the other were out of the way, and it is your business to decide how we are to determine which of us shall withdraw."

"I agree that the lady ought to decide that," said Dick reflectively, "and I ought to suggest a way of making her do it that will be fair to each of you and yet not embarrass her. It's a tough case, and we must adjourn for half an hour or so, while I smoke and think it out!"

Rather more than half an hour later he resumed his judicial capacity, but as there was a fourth occupant of the room by that time, the three friends drew their chairs together and Dick whispered his judgment, or plan, in a very unjudicial style, between puffs of smoke and smothered ejaculations. In the end, the two litigants assented, and the case was concluded.

Two evenings later there was a social gathering for young men and women at the Goldhurst Institute. This institute was intended to afford a meeting-place for recreation and amusement, reading and study for the district in which it was situated, and the ruling spirit of the undertaking was Mr. Dalgleish. The place was kept going chiefly by philanthropic persons, and Mr. Dalgleish occasionally organised concerts and lectures for the express purpose of adding to the funds. It was a good work, and he was well assisted by his daughter, a charming girl of nineteen.

This social gathering was an ordinary occurrence, so that there was every chance of obtaining a little chat with Miss Constance Dalgleish. Connor and Ewing sauntered to the entrance together; it was what they had done many times previously, and only a keen observer would have noticed that they looked anxious.

"We had better wait till we see that she is in a position where she will see us as we enter—see us both at once," said Connor. "That will be the fair way. We must do that, or the one she sees first may get the advantage."

"I don't think so, although I have no objection to that proposition," answered Ewing. "I fancy that if we went in separately it would give her the opportunity of asking the one she prefers to help her to transcribe the message. However, let us go in together; she will take the first chance of getting one of us aside, because she will be curious to know what it says, and then the fortunate one seizes his opportunity and the other withdraws."

Digitized by Google

"Withdraws for the time," corrected the other. "You forget that she may select as interpreter the one she likes least, because she would feel less embarrassed. If Dick put a heart in the corner, as agreed, why that will tell her it is a love message!"

"It's very perplexing," said Connor.

They waited outside the inner door with the glass panels, waiting for the psychological moment; twice they were upon the point of entering, but they drew back because Miss Dalgleish turned her back and became much occupied with a guest. At last they saw the object of their affections gazing steadily at the door and they entered.

"Good evening, gentlemen," said Constance Dalgleish in a pleasant tone and with an amiable smile. "I thought you were not coming. Do you know, I want your help."

"Mine?" queried both the young men simultaneously.

Then they felt small and were vexed. Each had thought to make a point, but the simultaneity of the exclamation had made them appear like parrots.

"I will be with you again in a minute! Will you take a seat over there?" And Constance flitted to another part of the room to set a new member at ease, returning quickly to the young men.

"I have an extraordinary communication," she explained, taking a letter from her pocket. "It seems to be written in a kind of shorthand, but it's all dots and dashes, and I've been told that it is the telegraph alphabet. So I thought you could help me."

"Certainly," exclaimed Connor quickly, thus gaining a point over his rival.

"Grayling is an ass!" thought Ewing. "Here's a pretty pickle we are in. She has both of us to tell her, which spoils the idea. No, it isn't Grayling exactly; it's Connor. We ought to have come in separately. I wish I'd had nothing to do with it, but had worked on my own account."

Constance unfolded the paper and disclosed the letter written in the Morse characters. A neatly-drawn heart, with a ring underneath, was designed at the top left-hand corner.

"What is it?" asked Constance innocently.

"Looks like a love letter!" said Ewing boldly, determined not to lose ground. Constance flushed slightly and appeared somewhat uneasy. Ewing took this for a sign that she had a preference for him, and this time he said hard things under his breath about Grayling. How could the girl show any preference while Connor was there?

"I think you must be mistaken," she answered. "I don't think that anyone—— Now, what is the meaning of this first hieroglyphic, a dot and a dash?"

"That is A. And the next, which begins a word, is B; it's a dash and three dots, you see. The letter begins 'A beautiful young lady.' The next sign is W. It seems to be very complimentary, Miss Dalgleish!"

Constance appeared perplexed, but the flush left her cheeks a moment later, and she sat staring at the letter. Connor and Ewing, eager to make points, alternately deciphered a word or two of the missive, oblivious of the fact that she was paying no attention.

The letter was to the effect that the beautiful young lady had captured the hearts of two men, and it besought her to make a selection promptly in order to dissipate the suspense and anxiety of the aspirants for her heart and hand. She was requested to return the letter, with her initials at the foot, to the one who was dearest to her.

"That's a peculiar billet-doux!" remarked Ewing, when the process of deciphering was completed and Constance made no sign.

"Very strange," chimed in Connor.

The young fellows felt decidedly uncomfortable. They had expected that Constance, suspecting the nature of the communication and its source, would select one of them to explain it, and that one would have been able, circumstances being favourable, to press his suit. But what could they do together? They glanced at one another sheepishly at first, but fiercely as the seconds sped away and Miss Dalgleish did not speak.

"I think that someone—that is, two persons—must have made a mistake," she said at last, looking up with a worried expression on her face, which had grown quite pale. "I must think this over. I am greatly indebted to you for helping me to find out what it means, and now you must excuse me as I have to see how they are getting on."

"What does that mean?" asked Connor, staring at Ewing. "A mistake?"

"Maidenly shyness, that's all," cried Ewing jubilantly. "You could hardly expect the girl to declare herself to one in the presence of the other, and she didn't wish to hurt the feelings of the unfortunate by as good as telling him to his face that he was rejected. That's a little stratagem to postpone matters. Look here, old fellow, you might as well go home and leave the field to me! It's a dead certainty that I'm the lucky beggar! Didn't you see the glance she gave me?"

"You!" exclaimed Connor sarcastically. "Whatever made you think she wanted you? I expect she will send that letter to me, but I hope to goodness she doesn't muddle our names!"

They waited for Constance to come and have another chat with them; they parted company, and tried to join in the merriment of others, but they found the social gathering very flat without her, and she did not seek them out. At half-past ten the entertainment was over and the visitors began to leave. Connor and Ewing lingered till the last, and then they walked up to Mr. Dalgliesh and his daughter to bid them good night.

"Good night, Mr. Connor. Good night, Mr. Ewing," said Constance, forcing a smile and making an effort to speak easily.

She did not hold herself with her usual grace and suppleness of figure; there was an effort to attract attention, quite uncommon with her. She raised her left hand to her throat as she shook hands with them, and this was clearly done so that they should look at it. They could not fail to observe it, and their hearts seemed to stand still as they did so. On the third finger of that left hand was an engagement ring!

The two young fellows did not speak a word till they found themselves in the sitting-room of their lodgings. Connor was the first to break the silence.

"She never wore it before this evening, Val, so the engagement must be new.

"No!" assented Ewing moodily. "And all the time we thought that she was falling in love with us, because she looked pretty and confused when we were gallant, and because her natural sweetness of disposition prompted her to be amiable, why, she was thinking of the other fellow! That was what made her confused when we paid her certain compliments and attentions. I am inclined to think that she never guessed that we were hit, or she would have said something to stop it."

"Yes," agreed Connor. "But she told us the truth in a neat way. Spared our feelings. Is Dick in bed? I think I should like to punch him for suggesting that silly plan. If we had waited we should have learnt the truth without betraying ourselves. I shall emigrate!"

"I shall try for a job in the country!" growled the other. "We shall appear pretty foolish!"

However, while they were awaiting the desired transfer to another post, their annoyance wore off, and they were able to see the humorous side.

As a result they were present at the marriage of Constance three months later, and wished her happiness in all sincerity.

George Day.

Digitized by Google

A JEWEL ROBBERY AND A BOOK.

The Tale of a Deep-Laid Scheme.

Although I broke into my friend Jackson's room in a manner that was not remarkable for its gentleness, it did not seem to disturb him in the least, for he continued calmly reading the book that he held in his hand, in which he appeared deeply engrossed.

This fact was suspicious in itself, for Jackson is not a man to take up a novel in the small hours of the morning. It seemed evident to me that he had recognised my step on the stairs, and having a history prepared about the book, he had taken it up as an excuse for telling the tale.

I hesitated a moment whether to advance or retire. Then I thought that the day was yet young, and Jackson's stories were worth hearing, and his cigars were very good.

So I ventured on a cough. Jackson continued reading. I tried again to attract his attention.

"Well, old man," I said heartily, "good evening. I thought I would just look in as I was passing."

Still it pleased Jackson's plans to ignore my presence, and it was not until I had crossed the room and stood directly between him and the light that he deigned to look up with a very well feigned start of surprise.

"Well," he said, springing to his feet, and shaking hands heartily, "I declare I never saw you come in. Why didn't you speak? Sit down, man, and make yourself at home."

He turned down the leaf he was reading of his precious book with much ostentation, and with a sigh laid it regretfully on the floor.

"Studying?" I suggested.

"No," he replied, "just peeping into a little book that has been unopened on my shelf for about five years. It was a most extraordinary thing altogether," he continued, gazing meditatively at the fire.

"What," I inquired, "was extraordinary?"

"Why," said Jackson, "that I should meet the author of this book this evening as he was coming down the steps of the Empire. A man, mind you, that one has not heard of for five years, although at one time his reputation was world-wide. You know him by name, no doubt. Job Roy, the man who wrote 'Stones of Great Value.'"

"Job Roy? I don't know him," said I.

"You don't know Job Roy?" cried Jackson. "You have never heard of 'Stones of Great Value'?" He sprang to his feet, and his voice fairly shrieked with excitement. He took up the book, and showed me the number of editions it had run into, then threw it on the floor, and would have raved about the ignorance of the modern man of letters for the rest of the night, had I not calmed him.

"You must remember," I said, "that we are not all so well up in men and things as you are, and that we journalists have to discuss so many subjects in the course of the year, that it is not surprising that we forget about them all. Now sit down and calm yourself, and tell me all about it from beginning to end."

"It's a long story," said Jackson, sinking back in his chair, "but when a journalist comes to me, and tells me he has never heard of Job Roy, I certainly think it is time that I should refresh his memory for his own good. Besides," he continued, gradually getting under weigh, "it's a story of your own trade; the story of a great 'boom;' the first boom in literature of modern days. For it is only quite recently, you understand, that men took to making little wars on their own account, and exploring out-of-the-way lands, and writing books on subjects, and making their fortunes in this way.

"The beginning of Job Roy's literary career, then," went on Jackson, while I was feeling for my note-book and pencil, "was the orthodox beginning of famous writers. He threw up a good trade, invested in a garret, a ream of foolscap, and a shilling's-worth of ink and pens, and proceeded to waste them as fast as human hands could work. His stories went the orthodox round of publishing houses, and returned to him in the orthodox way, having gained nothing but a vast accumulation of dirt. He came to the end of his resources, starved for a day, and was just giving up in despair when an idea suddenly took birth in his mind, which he immediately put on paper and sent out on its travels. It returned to him, of course, and, after living for half a year on his landlady's money, he took it to the last publisher he could think of, who gave more hope than the other—all in the orthodox way.

"This publisher, you must know, had just set up business when Job Roy called on him, and had plenty of time in which to read stories by unknown authors, and plenty of knowledge in his trade to recognise a good investment when it came his way.

"He promised to read Job Roy's novel, and let him hear in a day or two what he thought of it. He read through the story, and, having satisfied himself that it might make a book under certain conditions, and that those conditions would never be realised, he sent round for its author.

"'This book,' he said, smiling sweetly at Job Roy as he stood expectantly before him, thus raising his hopes to the utmost, 'is a very good book, but,' he continued, dashing all hopes to the ground, 'would probably, under the ordinary conditions, have no sale at all.'

"Job Roy's face turned pale.

"'What do you say?' he stammered. 'It is a good book, and yet it would have no sale? How can that be?'

"'It's a book, you see,' replied the publisher, 'that people would take no notice of unless it were forced under their eyes. In fact, it is a book that must be 'boomed' to go. It must be forced along, shoved, hurried into attention, have some scandal raised about it, so that it can't be disregarded. Unless we can do that, all that remains for your book is this'—and the publisher kicked a new wastepaper basket in which he had invested, and Job Roy groaned aloud.

"When he had gone the publisher lit a cigarette, and fell to considering again the manuscript that lay before him. And the more he thought about it the more he was determined that there was merit in the book, and merit, properly applied, that would not only make its author's fortune, but make him, the publisher, both rich and famous. Then he wavered again, and determined that it was too risky a venture for a new publisher to undertake, and he threw away his cigarette, put the book aside, and began reading the morning paper.

"As he glanced down the columns a certain little paragraph caught his eye. It ran as follows: 'The Duchess of Lesborough's jewels are not only the most beautiful, but among the most valuable in London at the present time. They are valued at £50,000, although the Duchess would not part with them for more than twice that sum. They have been in the family for a long while, and she looks upon them as sacred heirlooms.'

"Now, Job Roy's novel, 'Stones of Great Value,' was entirely founded on the idea of a great jewel robbery, and it was for this reason that the paragraph I have quoted caught the publisher's eye. And the stones of great value of Job Roy's estimation were set down as being worth about the same amount as the Duchess of Lesborough's jewels—and the jewels of the story also belonged to a duchess. All that was required to complete the resemblance between fiction and reality was for the genuine duchess to be robbed of her stones.

Digitized by Google

"The thought that it would be rather curious if this should happen by any strange chance occurred to the publisher. And as he was thinking an idea came to him.

"He leant back in a chair and closed his eyes, and the possibilities of the idea passed before him. Never for an instant did it leave his mind for the remainder of the day. He took it away with him at night, and thought of it, and dreamt of it—this great idea.

"On the following day he went through all the daily and weekly papers on which he could lay his hands, and every now and again he came across a little paragraph about the Duchess of Lesborough's jewels. It was evident that these paragraphs, praising the beauty of the stones, estimating their great value, and declaring them to be the sacred heirlooms of an old family, were, one and all, written by one hand, and that hand, a woman's; none other, in fact, than that of the Duchess of Lesborough herself.

"Having satisfied himself that her Grace was striving very hard to advertise her jewels, for what purpose she alone knew, and always with his great idea in his mind, the publisher set about finding out all that he could concerning the stones in question.

"It was not long before he discovered that her Grace had purchased them from a leading merchant only a few months previously.

"He also discovered that the Duchess herself was an American heiress, who had followed the fashion of marrying a Duke for his title, and that now that he was dead she was trying her utmost to make her way into Society.

"All this fitted in very well with the plans that the publisher had devised.

"Having come to this conclusion, he sent again for his friend the author—for in their mutual lack of money, and their mutual desire to gain it, a kind of friendship had sprung up between them.

"Job Roy came—in a cab.

"For three hours the two men remained closeted, with their heads together, talking. Then Job Roy went out and ordered an oyster supper, while the publisher swung round on his pivot chair, and wrote the smartest business letter that he had ever penned—a letter so forcible, cunning, and clearly put, that it could not fail to carry effect. Having read this through and satisfied himself that it lacked nothing, he put it in an envelope, and addressed it to 'Her Grace the Duchess of Lesborough.'

"The reply came by return of post in a scented, heavily-crested letter.

"'Dear Mr. Publisher,' it ran, 'Your letter to hand, What a funny idea! You had better come and have tea, and tell me all about it.—Yours sincerely, Dolly Lesborough.'

"Accordingly, the publisher went to tea that afternoon.

"He found the Duchess in a room that seemed literally to teem with silver, every other object seemed plated with gold. He trod on a carpet that sank like a bed of feathers beneath his feet. A large, American-looking hand, almost covered with rings, was held out to him. He took it mechanically, and found a pretty, merry face above—a very jolly face for a Duchess.

"The publisher recovered himself quickly. He immediately let off the compliment with which he had prepared himself on the way.

"'I am delighted to note,' he muttered, bowing low, 'by your letter that I received to-day, that the business qualities of the Duchess of Lesborough are not less deserving of praise than her beauty.'

"Her Grace laughed merrily, and clapped her hands.

"'Now, that's real nice of you,' she replied, 'for I have always reckoned that I am about as smart a business woman as they make. Didn't I hook the Duke and his title within a fortnight, in spite of all the bets that were made at the clubs? Now he, poor fellow, has been carried off by his gout, I am thrown on my own resources to get along as best I may.'

"'I notice,' said the publisher, 'that your jewels have already become famous.'

"'That's so. When the Duke died I bought all the jewels and trinkets that I could find. That's what you English seem to admire more than anything else. A woman with jewels is bound to succeed. Though, somehow,' added her Grace, with a sigh, 'your Society ladies don't exactly seem to rush to me with open arms.'

"'You must remember,' said the publisher, 'that, famous as they are, everyone has not yet heard of your jewels.'

"That's quite true. Say, Mr. Publisher, how am I to get them known?"

"The Duchess sipped her tea from a priceless little blue china cup, and looked meditatively over the rim at the publisher.

"'It was for the purpose of telling you how to do that,' replied he, 'that I called this afternoon. If you will leave everything to me I will guarantee that within three weeks the Duchess of Lesborough's jewels will be more talked about than any other jewels in London.'

"'La!' cried the Duchess, executing a pas de seul, 'and how much do you want for doing that?'

"'Only two little things. First, that you will promise not to allow your jewels to be seen by anyone until I tell you you may; second, that you will procure a dummy set before to-morrow.'

"'Done,' cried the Duchess. 'Anything else?'

"'In the afternoon I shall ask you to go for a drive. Before you go, I want you to tell your secretary, steward, butler, anyone you like, that you are going to take your jewels to the bankers. Circulate it among your household, so that everyone is talking about it. Do you think you are good enough actress to do all that without arousing suspicion?'

"'Rather!' The Duchess elevated her toe, and contemplated it. 'First an actress, then a millionairess, then a widow, then a Duchess——'

"'Then,' added the publisher, 'the first lady in British society, second only to the Queen herself.'

"'When will the fun begin?' she asked eagerly.

"'To-morrow evening,' said the other. 'But you must be very careful. How do you think these headings will look in the papers?'

"The publisher produced some carefully written manuscripts and laid them before the Duchess. The headlines were startling enough: 'The Duchess of Lesborough's Jewels—Stolen—Valued at £50,000—The Duchess Inconsolable — Clever Robbery—No Trace of the Thief—Scotland Yard Baffled.' Following these were several striking accounts of the robbery, of the jewels, and the Duchess, sufficiently exciting to produce a flutter among the evening papers, to which they would be dispatched.

"The Duchess was delighted.

"'But what am I to do with my diamonds?' she inquired.

"'Bury them,' said the publisher, 'or hide them somewhere where no one will find them. If anyone suspects it is a trick we shall be ruined for ever. I implore you to be careful.'

"'You may trust me. Now, is there anything else I can do for you? A thousand or two don't make such odds to me, you know!'

"'Thanks. I certainly have a little scheme on hand that requires financing. I am going to publish my first book very shortly. As I told you in my letter, it's all part of my scheme. The book deals entirely with a jewel robbery, and the jewels are supposed to be yours. When all the excitement is over, the book will be published, and everyone will read it. The whole affair, your Grace, is a gigantic boom, first for a Duchess, then for an author, and, lastly, for a publisher. And it all requires financing.'

Digitized by Google

"'Well, how much do you want?'

"The publisher named a modest sum. The Duchess promised to forward it, on receiving security that the publisher would carry out his part of the bargain. After going through the scheme carefully once more he took up his hat and said good-bye.

"On the day following the one on which the publisher called on the Duchess of Lesborough, her Grace procured a dummy set of diamonds from a small jeweller.

"Having given her order she returned home, and gradually made it generally known among her household that in the afternoon she would take her jewels to the bankers.

"About one o'clock the imitation stones arrived, and her Grace sat down to as hearty a luncheon as ever a Duchess consumed. She ordered her carriage for half-past two.

"'Tell them to drive to the bank," she said, as she stood on the steps. 'I am going to leave my jewel-box there.'

"'To the bank,' whispered the butler to the footman.

"'To the bank,' said the footman to the coachman, 'Her Grace is going to lock up her jewels.'

"And the carriage drove away.

"Apparently, however, the Duchess changed her mind, for she gave orders to be driven first to an outlying district, where it was imperative that she should pay some early calls.

"'I will go to the bank on my way home,' said she.

"In the meanwhile an incident occurred at the Duchess of Lesborough's residence. It seemed that the carriage had barely turned the corner of the street, when Her Grace discovered that she had left her jewel-box behind. She had, apparently, sent her footman running back to bring her the precious box, for a man, who, it afterwards transpired, was disguised in every particular as her footman, requested the butler to give him Her Grace's case, which, as he declared, she had left on her dressing-table.

"The butler ran upstairs and found the box, and hastened with it to the footman, who hurriedly carried it away down the street.

"That, however, was the last that was ever seen of the rascal.

"About four o'clock the Duchess had finished her calls, and ordered 'Home.'

"She was reminded by her servant that she had wished to call at the bank.

"'Oh, yes, to the bank,' she replied, and then, 'Why, dear me, I must have left my jewel-box behind. How careless! Well, I will take it to-morrow.'

"The Duchess had come a long way out to pay her calls, and it was nearly six before the carriage neared home.

"It was then she heard the newsboys calling her name in the street. 'The Duchess of Lesborough's jewels,' they cried, 'Stolen!—Valued at £50,000—Clever Robbery!—Evening paper!'

"She procured a copy, and the coachman, with a white face, galloped the horses homewards.

"Holding the paper as best she could with the jolting of the carriage, her Grace read the account of the imaginary robbery of her jewels, which, in reality, as she well knew, were snugly stowed away in the family safe. She smiled as she thought how smartly the publisher had done his work.

"Her secretary met her at the door of the house, and hastily began explaining things. A man, disguised as her footman, had discovered—how, Heaven alone knows—'although,' said the secretary, 'suspicion pointed to the butler as having helped him,' that her Grace had left her jewel-box behind her. He had received the box from the butler and had gone off with the stones. Another mystery—an account of the whole affair had appeared in the evening newspapers.

"Never, even in her ballet-girl days, had the Duchess acted so brilliantly as when she ordered her whole household up before her and questioned them as to the robbery of her jewels. All, however, to no effect. The mystery was as unexplainable as ever, and the Duchess left it to the public and to the press to discover what they could.

"The latter took up the matter eagerly. It had come at a time when news was scarce, and the public seemed deeply interested in the jewel robbery. On the next day the papers that claimed to have discovered a clue sold like wild-fire. Some accused the butler, some the footman, others her Grace's secretary, of having stolen the jewels. Their movements were carefully watched by the police, but all with no result. The whole affair was as pretty a mystery as had ever puzzled the public, and the press made the most of it. The Duchess' jewels were being 'boomed' as jewels were never 'boomed' before.

"Three days later public interest was beginning to flag, for nothing new turned up.

"On the evening of the third day the Publisher and the Author met together over a little dinner in the former's rooms.

"Over the wine the Publisher remarked: 'To-morrow, I think I shall arrest you.'

"For a man about to be arrested, however, the Author appeared to take the matter very coolly.

"'You think it is the best time?' he remarked, flicking the ask from his cigarette.

"'I think so. Public interest is beginning to flag a little. I will come about twelve, if you will be up by then. I want you to be gazing meditatively down the muzzle of a revolver and to babble like a baby about a jewel robbery and a confession and suicide. Think you can manage all that?'

"'Easily,' said Job Roy. 'Every author is three-parts actor.'

"'Good! I shall judge whether your arrest causes a sensation or not. If so, I shall leave things for a day or two before I have you released. Or if the magistrates are too sharp for us, and begin to suspect that it is all a put-up affair, I shall hurry things on to a crisis. Anyway, you may rest assured that they won't keep you more than a day or two, for it wouldn't be safe to let them. By the way, you might as well copy out this confession now.'

"The Publisher took a new book, uncut, and looking as though it had come straight from the press, called 'Stones of Great Value,' by Job Roy, and, opening it at a certain page, handed it to the author.

"On this page the principal character in the story confessed to having stolen the stones of the fictitious Duchess. 'Dear friend,' ran the confession, 'I can no longer live while another man is suspected of having committed a crime of which I am guilty. I have decided to solve two mysteries by blowing out my brains. For it was I who stole the Duchess' jewels. When this reaches you I shall be dead.' There was much more of the same kind, and at the foot of the confession were the initials 'J.R.,' which, should the page be found lying about loose, might be taken for the name of either the hero of the story or for Job Roy, the name of the author of the book. It might, indeed, be rather awkward for Job Roy if the confession of the hero in 'Stones of Great Value,' written in the author's own handwriting, and signed with his initials, should fall into the hands of the police at a time when the genuine Duchess of Lesborough had really lost her diamonds.

"He began to copy out the confession on a piece of foolscap, so that it began at the top of the page, and ended with his initials at the bottom. When he had finished it he handed it over to the publisher, who put it safely away.

Digitized by Google

"'To-morrow,' he cried, 'our plans will be reaching their fulfilment. We have boomed the Duchess' diamonds, and to-morrow you will be boomed, and three days later your book. Let us drink to unqualified success.'

"On the following day a man, dishevelled, waving a paper, rushed wildly into the nearest police station from Job Roy's lodgings.

"'See,' he cried, 'here is a confession of the man who stole the Duchess of Lesborough's jewels. Come and take him quick before he blows out his brains. A friend of mine, Job Roy by name, a bit of an author,' and before the astonished constables had time to realise the state of affairs, they found themselves being hurried along in a cab to Job Roy's rooms.

"The door was locked. A policeman put his shoulder to it, and burst it open. At a table, muttering incoherently to himself, was the author of 'Stones of Great Value.' To knock down the pistol and to handcuff him was the work of a moment.

"That evening the whole report of the thief's arrest appeared in the papers. Public excitement was again roused to its utmost. When the Job Roy trial came on the court was crowded.

"Nothing could be gained from the prisoner, for he could only mutter senseless words about a book and a confession. This confession was the sole evidence that there was against him. As the magistrates remarked, it seemed much more likely that either the butler or the secretary had done the deed. The magistrates were about to remand the prisoner for a week in order that the police might make inquiries about the confession, the people were rising from their seats to leave the court, when something happened that drew every eye from the prisoner to the figure of a man who now appeared in court, and caused a sensation that has not yet been forgotten by the police.

"'Your worships,' said a police inspector, stepping forward, 'I wish to make an important statement. This gentleman, a book publisher, informs me that the confession, on the strength of which the prisoner was arrested, is merely this stray leaf out of a novel he was writing. The poor gentleman, thinking no doubt that the publisher had refused his work, had temporarily lost his mind, and this accounts for the reason why he was not able to clear himself from the ridiculous charge of robbery. The book, your worship, deals entirely with a jewel robbery, and is called "Stones of Great Value."'

"And that," said Jackson, "is the end of my story. The plot has gradually unfolded itself. The Publisher's great idea has worked itself out to the end. He had boomed the Duchess of Lesborough's jewels; the Author's name was in every mouth; thousands of copies of the book were sold. Author, Publisher, and Duchess were made famous.

"As I told you, I met Job Roy to-day on the steps of the Empire, fat and well-fed. And what seems the most remarkable part of the whole affair to me is that this book, 'Stones of Great Value,' was once world-famous, and is now almost totally forgotten."

It occurred to me as a crept out of Jackson's rooms at the break of day, that even this fact was not so remarkable as Jackson's imagination.

Maud Tinwell.

BOY: "I want to buy some paper." Dealer: "What kind of paper?" Boy: "You'd better give me fly paper. I want to make a kite."

"THAT was a pretty hat that Mrs. Jones wore last night," he suggested. "Pretty?" she exclaimed with infinite scorn. "Why, I happen to know that that hat only cost fifteen shillings."

POET: "I hope you have received the little volume of poems I ventured to send you." Baroness: "Oh, yes, I have—it is charming—I wonder where I have put it." Little Karl: "Under the leg of the table, mamma, to make it steady."

Your Editor Chats.

IN a few weeks' time I shall be starting yet another powerful serial story. The name of the author is familiar to readers of Short Stories, and the reputation which he has gained for tales of remarkable power is fully maintained in this new one.

Meanwhile, I am preparing a further series of articles to follow the adventures of Belinda, and I don't think that you will be disappointed when you read them. I may say that they will differ considerably from Cynthia or Belinda, and in this way we shall obtain a freshness of style and of ideas that will be, I hope, much appreciated.

The offer made by "Dayton," the reader of Short Stories who made his fortune, has been very much appreciated, and a huge number of readers have sent in to justify their claim to the sums of £10. The result of the first competition will be announced next week. Those readers who have not already written in to give a reason why they should receive the £10 should do so at once. If they are not personally in want of the £10, then they would be doing a good turn to some needy friend to whom the cash would prove a boon and a blessing. On page 111 you will find another coupon which is the last one that will appear.

A correspondent wants to know why we do not put more illustrations in Short Stories, as he is very fond of looking at pictures, and thinks that more sketches would help to make the paper more popular. This, of course, at first glance is quite a reasonable view to take of the matter, but there are two very great objections.

One is that unless a story contains incidents which lend themselves to strong and vigorous pictures, it is not worth while illustrating. The ordinary man-and-woman-facing-each-other class of illustration is of no interest whatever to anybody and is better left out altogether. The stories in this little paper are full of powerful incidents, but these are described verbally, and a verbal description of a strong incident does not always lend itself to illustration.

The second objection is that every illustration displaces a certain amount of reading matter, and, after all, readers of Short Stories buy the paper for the sake of the stories, and although an occasional bright illustration is very much appreciated, I am sure that to fill the paper with a lot of big sketches at the expense of a number of words would not be liked.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

ASTOUNDING SOCIETY REVELATIONS.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. A celebrated French artist in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman and friend of Lady Peggy.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

Belinda Comes to England.

SUDDENLY there was a terrific thundering at the door and the next instant Stanley Forbes stood before the Duke.

I had always admired Stanley Forbes, always thought him one of the strongest and bravest of men, but never did I realise just how strong he was until that night. He dwarfed Eastacres mentally and morally and physically. Before him the Duke collapsed literally and absolutely. He seemed to shrink visibly, and I felt a touch of apprehension as I marked how Stanley towered above him.

It was all over in a moment. A short, sharp struggle, and his Grace, the Duke of Eastacres, was lying in an undistinguished heap upon the floor, with Stanley standing over him, shaking with passion. As to my feelings at that moment they were very varied. Relief at Belinda's escape—I verily believe Eastacres meant to kill her—mortification at the collapse of the scheme, admiration for Forbes warred one against the other.

"Get up," said Stanley at last. "Get up and clear off before I kill you. It is like you," he went on with a bitter sneer, "to match yourself against a girl. With me you were afraid to try conclusions. You only dared to plot against me in the dark. And even then you failed. You killed poor Adams certainly, but you failed in your attempt to ruin me. My horse won the race. I have won my money and you"—he jeered as Eastacres staggered to his feet—"you are beaten at all points. What," as the Duke glanced savagely round the room seeking for a weapon of attack. "Are you going to try that sort of game? No use, my friend, no use." As he spoke he threw back the door and motioned the Duke to go.

Eastacres slowly walked across the room. "And Miss North," he sneered, "she will remain here with you?"

"Miss North will accompany me to where her friends await her," Stanley replied.

"Those friends will be gratified to learn where she has spent the evening," said Eastacres. "Paris generally will be amused."

"I think not," said Stanley calmly. "I think you are too astute a scoundrel not to hold your tongue, when I inform you that at the first word of slander from your lips about Miss North, I charge you openly with an attempt to murder Adams. I mean it, and—I shall prove my case. Only on that condition do I let you go. You hear me?"

The Duke made no answer, but with a look of concentrated venom, hate, and bitterness, passed from the room.

I did not wait to hear the explanation that ensued between Belinda and her rescuer, but hastily made my way downstairs, and waiting till the figure of the Duke had become absorbed in the darkness, made my way in the direction of Paris, stopping the first fiacre that I met.

I arrived at the Hotel D'Auteuil to find the place in an uproar. The Marquise in hysterics, Rolla in a state of mind bordering on distraction, while Paul, very white about the mouth, walked to and fro in an excited state.

"What has happened?" I asked. "Has Belinda been found? Has anything been heard or discovered? I am half distracted with anxiety."

Paul seemed relieved at my arrival. Drawing me aside, he told me how matters stood.

"Rolla has made the most careful and discreet inquiries at the British Embassy," he said, "but he has been assured that no one answering to Carr's description has been there. In desperation and alarm I went to Stanley Forbes and asked him what was to be done. He told me that he knew where Belinda was, that in fact she had gone shopping with his wife, and he promised to bring her here within the hour. That hour is now all but past," and he glanced anxiously at his watch, "they have not yet come."

Even as he spoke the wheels of a carriage sounded on the asphalt outside. A minute later Belinda entered, followed by Stanley and his wife.

A little pale, perhaps, and a trifle self-conscious, but otherwise she showed no trace of all she had gone through.

"I'm afraid you've been quite anxious, Lady Peggy," she said sweetly. "I suppose I have behaved rather badly. It certainly wasn't a right thing to go off without a word of explanation. But you see I saw Sheila just after the race, and she was so upset at poor Adams' accident that I felt obliged to try to comfort her. To make a long story short, we went and had some tea together, took a turn in the Luxembourg, and went for a drive in the Bois to finish up with. I went home with her for a late, a very late dinner, and found Mr. Forbes waiting for me. He was terribly cross, and vowed I should get a fearful scolding. You don't look very forbidding all the same," and with that the girl kissed the Marquise, smiled on me, and sat down as self-possessed as possible.

Digitized by Google

Her account of the evening's procedure gained credence from the Marquise, and, I think, Baron Rolla. Paul was more sceptical; whether or no Belinda told him the truth I cannot say; he made no mention of the matter to me.

Belinda, inspired by Stanley, most astute of lawyers, did not confide in me—the one person to whom she should have confessed. Early next morning, however, Stanley called at the hotel, and in a short but spirited interview, told me that if I continued to countenance the Duke's attentions to Belinda—if, in short, I tolerated his society or acknowledged him as friend, he would then and there write such an account of my chaperonage of Belinda as would cause her father to remove his daughter on the instant from my care.

"There's no need for me to go more minutely into the matter," he said in conclusion, "you and I understand each other, Lady Peggy. At least I hope we do—for your sake." And with a curious smile he departed, leaving me with years added to my age!

Only on one point could I take comfort. Belinda, at all events, did not suspect me of connivance with the Duke. Of that I was quite sure; otherwise, so honest was this child of nature, that she would have left me, and gone straight to her Australian home. This being so, I might still gain my end, still win my £20,000. Beaten at one point, I could re-form and carry the day at another.

I hoped and prayed for better luck at my next venture in marrying Belinda!

We left Paris the last day in May, en route for an old friend's place in Hampshire. We were going to stay at Lady Haviland's, a charming old manor house dating back to the reign of Charles I. The London season was late that year, and about the middle of June Belinda and I were booked for a short stay with the Duchess of Staunton in Brook Street. Till then, however, we were going to recuperate at Havilands Manor.

We arrived at the little country station about five. There was a small knot of people already on the platform bound like ourselves for Havilands. I recognised Hugh, Lord Farringdon, Lady Molly Vansittart, and the Marquis of Towchester. The rest of our fellow guests were of the usual kind, smart, up-to-date, ready to flirt with anybody's husband or anyone's wife but their own. Not that one is troubled much with one's legitimate partner nowadays. It is in fact bad form to ask married couples to the same house party. No one realised this more fully than Lady Haviland. Her parties were always arranged with the utmost tact. Her week-ends were simply delightful; many an affaire commenced at the Manor.

I daresay you who read these articles will like to know something of the life in a country house among our set. I will do my best to satisfy your curiosity. To begin with, the usual hour to arrive is between five and six. You go straight to your room, where tea is brought you, unless you are young and beautiful enough to defy the ravages a railway journey makes in one's appearance, in which case you go downstairs to tea, usually served in the library or study or smoking-room. Tea is at hand from five to seven, and most of us go in for caviare, anchovy sandwiches, with an accompaniment of Kümmel, deux doigts de Madère; some, however, still cling to the beverage beloved of our grandmother—in public, that is to say. No Society woman can go on without a pick-me-up in private.

Belinda solemnly ate large pieces of rich cake, and strawberries and cream. The women did not take to my charge; Englishwomen have not the large-mindedness that characterises the Parisian. The men, however, as usual, crowded round her—Lord Farringdon deliberately absenting himself from Lady Molly, much to that little woman's rage.

Tea at Havilands is always served in the smaller library adjacent to the famous room which holds a priceless collection of volumes. The smaller library is filled with modern volumes, and is a gay room with beautiful pictures, and every variety of couch and of lounging chair. "Reading made easy," Belinda observed contemptuously, but there is little reading done either in it or in the big library. Nowadays we neither read literature nor write letters. The Society journal and the typewriter supply all our needs.

The big library is a charming room, panelled with inlaid woods; the bookcases are built into the wall, so that the books seem at home, not mere visitors or lodgers. Oriel windows look on to the grounds, stately with yew trees fashioned into wonderful shapes, under whose shade peacocks proudly strut, dragging their beautiful trains over the smooth-shaven grass.

Belinda fell in love with the house, and openly coveted it.

"There's no reason why you shouldn't have quite as beautiful a place," I said discreetly. "Farringdon has a most delightful castle in the next county, and Towchester's place, as you know, is almost as famous as Havilands."

"Do you mean that either of these gentlemen will sell their houses?" she asked ingenuously.

I was too annoyed to answer, save with a sneer. "My dear Belinda," I said sweetly, "your innocence is quite Arcadian. I am unequal to the task of enlightening you."

She gazed at me with clear and untroubled eyes, thanked me gravely—for what I don't know—and retired to dress.

Dinner at the Manor was at nine o'clock. It was then but little after seven, and I was glad of the rest and quiet; it gave me time to form my plans. Towchester and Farringdon were both very eligible. One had already showed symptoms of admiration for Belinda; the other, I made no doubt, would shortly follow suit. The question I had to consider was how to induce the girl to encourage their attentions, in the first place, and accept their offers—one or both—of marriage in the second. Hitherto all attempts to undermine her constancy to that absurd person David Carr had failed; reason told me all further attempts would fail also.

What then could be done?

With a flash of inspiration the solution of the problem came to me. Belinda was impregnable to flattery, threats, or bribes. David Carr, being a man, would prove far more susceptible. Somehow or other his affection for Belinda must be undermined. He must be engaged in an intrigue with another woman—a clever, unscrupulous woman, in whose hands he would be as clay. The fact that Carr was at that moment in Petersburg did not trouble me. He could, without doubt, obtain leave of absence if representations were made in the proper quarter, and that leave of absence I decided he should spend in England, if possible quite close to Havilands.

I sprang to my feet with a cry of triumph.

The Dean of Wilborough would gladly ask the young man to his house—the Dean and I were old friends—I had helped him to marry his sister—he would do much for me in a small way.

I hurriedly wrote a note to my old friend reminding him that the arches of his beloved Cathedral were suspected of unsound foundation, and hinting that a young friend of mine, a clever engineer, would shortly be in the neighbourhood, and would, if asked, gladly give an opinion as to their security.

The letter I knew would bring an invitation back post haste, which I decided to inclose to David with a cordial invitation.

So far so good; the campaign was well and carefully thought out, but there was one thing yet to be found—the woman. Had I been ten or even five years younger I might have attempted the rôle myself, but as things were it was impossible. Hurriedly I ran over the list of my acquaintances. Midge, too frivolous; Lady Saxby, too masculine; Molly Vansittart, too mercenary. None of them possessed the charm, the beauty requisite to displace Belinda in a man's heart.

Once more I thought of all my friends, even my enemies. Once more I had rejected all and each, when there came a knock at my door.

Digitized by Google

The next minute I was embracing—delicately, and with a due regard for the niceties of one's complexion, but quite cordially—the Princess Zouloff, the wonderful Russian beauty.

"My sweet Peggy—younger than ever, I declare. What an age since we met. I was delighted when I heard from Havilands that you were here. I came at once to see you."

The Princess smiled as she spoke, and walked with an indolent but perfect grace towards the fire, sinking into the most comfortable chair—my chair—the room boasted.

Vera, Princess of Zouloff, is one of the most beautiful women of the day. There is not a plain woman amongst the guests at Havilands Manor; some are even far beyond the average for good looks, and all have that chic which lends in itself a kind of beauty to the woman of the world. But the handsomest of them pales beside the wonderful bewitchery of the Russian lady, with her velvety white skin in such contrast to the splendour of her jewels, the rose red of her lips, and the darkness of her eyelashes and eyes.

And Belinda?

Well, she is always beautiful, but for once she had to yield the palm.

Vera's visit somewhat surprised me. We had always been quite civil to each other in Society, but beyond that our feelings had not gone. What then had been her motive for this visit, and for her protestations of regard?

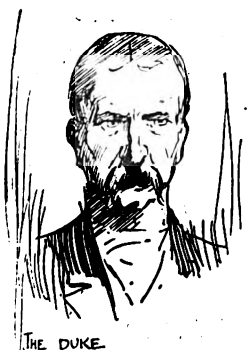
She quickly gave the explanation.

"You are looking well, dear Peggy," she said sweetly, "wonderfully well, considering all you have undergone. Imagine! To chaperon a little savage! What courage, what energy! Marvellous!"

"Not quite a savage, Vera, dearest. At any rate a very lovely and a very wealthy one. Paris went mad over her face and her millions. Eastacres, as you have heard, I suppose, is ready to die with vexation at her refusal. Paul de Sonnaz," I watched the Princess closely, "Baron Rolla, the Marquis de Belamont, all our friends, in fact, are in the same plight, and," I bent forward, "Alphonse Hervé is infatuated. He fought a duel on her behalf and was nearly killed. He——" I paused. Vera was looking at me scornfully, dangerously, from her dark, sombre eyes.

I had spoken the name of Alphonse with great deliberation and of intent. Alphonse had been the friend of the Russian beauty ever since they had met at a studio in Florence. She was a mere girl then, barely twenty, married to a man double her age and a brute. Alphonse had painted her portrait and won her heart. Society, of course, declared he was her lover, and for a time discriminating hostesses took care that where one was asked the other also should be invited. Some three years ago, however, there had come a change. The Princess had returned to her husband's estates in the north of Russia, and Alphonse, returning to Paris, immersed himself in art—until he met Belinda!

Why Vera and the handsome artist had parted I never knew! Gossip said he was tired of her violent temper and also herself, but if he had tired of his beautiful Princess, one thing was very certain. She still loved him; the more thought that another woman held her place in his heart roused all the fierce instincts of her nature—a nature which, outwardly cold as the snow fields of her country, was at heart hot and passionate.



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

For a moment I gazed at the Princess, smiling quietly to myself. I had looked for a woman—a dangerous and fascinating woman—I had found her.

"Continue," she said with a laugh. "It affords me much amusement, my friend, to hear of Hervé's infatuation, as you call it, for a little school girl. And she—she loves him?"

I shook my head.

"Not a bit. She is obstinate as one of your own moujiks, and will not look at anyone, but a ridiculous young man named David Carr. A penniless person of neither birth nor fortune—a mere engineer."

"So!" The Princess lowered her white lids, a soft smile playing round her mouth. "Where is he, this estimable David?" she asked.

"At present in Petersburg, engaged on the bridge across the Neva. Soon"—I looked at her significantly—"he will be here in England. I fancy he will be staying with my friend the Dean of Wilborough."

She bent forward and kissed me, Russian fashion, on both cheeks.

"Clever Peggy," she said, with a mocking little smile, "adorable Peggy. What will you give me, my friend, if I remove this objectionable David Carr, this impossible, whom Belinda so adores?"

"Vera," I answered solemnly, "when you like you are the most sensible woman in the world. You will do as you like with the young man and I shall be eternally grateful."

I went to dinner in the best of spirits.

Vera was gorgeous in a wonderful combination of yellow and orange, with a necklace of big amber beads and a wonderful girdle of amber and gold. Belinda, more like a Greek nymph than ever, in a dress of white silk cut square, loosely hanging sleeves, sat near to her. Vera smiled sweetly at her girlish rival, and to my amusement, though not to my surprise, before the evening was over had completely won her heart. Belinda was ready to worship the beautiful woman who had smiled and talked so sweetly. As a rule, women did not smile or talk to Belinda.

On going to my room that night, I found one or two things to interest me. At a house like Havilands everything is done that can conduce to the comfort and happiness of the guests. Their rooms are full of little attentions for one's well-being, amongst which there is a printed paper which is laid on the dressing-table in every bedroom in the house; it contains the latest telegrams of public news, which come every afternoon and evening from a London news-agency.

Among the other items of interest that evening was the announcement of the illness of the Duchess of Eastacres. Her Grace was so seriously indisposed that her son, the Duke, had been sent for, also Lady Honoria. That, of course, meant that Eastacres would shortly arrive in town, and that sooner or later we should run across him. It was vexatious, very. His re-appearance might, very possibly would, prejudice Belinda against her other suitors.

For the present, however, there was nothing to be done. Eastacres would not, at any rate, turn up at Havilands Manor.

I received the dear Dean's answer to my letter in the course of the afternoon. He expressed himself delighted to entertain any friend of mine, especially an expert in regard to Cathedral arches! So far, so good. The next thing was to write to David and at the same time drop a line to a friend in a high place at Petersburg in regard to giving the young engineer a short leave of absence.

A letter from my faithful Crawley Drummond caused me to revise my plan of action. I decided that Crawley, in a spirit of middle-aged friendliness, should write to Carr, and tell him of the welcome awaiting him at Wilborough. It was far better that I should not appear on the scene. Crawley, with his usual good-nature, took the thing off my hands, and some four days after our arrival at the Manor he strolled in—Crawley knows everybody and goes everywhere—and announced that Carr was en route for England, Hampshire—and Belinda!

"I wired, don't you know," said Crawley. "Save time and trouble, I thought. And the young man wired his reply. And now, Peggy, if I might be permitted to ask—what is your game?"

For answer I motioned to where Princess Zouloff and Belinda were in close conversation with Farringdon and Towchester.

Digitized by Google

"I'm carrying the war into the enemy's country," I said. "I'm going to hand David over to the tender mercies of the Princess!"

Crawley twirled his moustache, fixed his glass firmly in his eye, and murmured:

"Happy David!"

It was quite clear that Farringdon and Towchester were hard hit by Belinda, for they openly and flagrantly neglected the ladies who claimed their service—Lady Molly and Mrs. Shilier Le Hay. Molly consoled herself with the Duke of Sulstone, a vacuous but wealthy young man with a penchant for ladies of the ballet. Mrs. Le Hay, however, did not so easily resign her Marquis. "Towzer" was the sobriquet his friends bestowed upon him, and "Towzer" had his work cut out to free himself from pretty Nancy's clutches. Scenes, tears, hysterics, were showered upon him—and us. But for once the Marquis was obdurate, and Mrs. Shilier Le Hay, unable to bear the mortification of his defection, finally departed.

"Very foolish woman," observed Crawley. "Why will women make scenes? Had she taken the thing quietly he would have been everlastingly grateful—and have settled her gaming debts up-to-date. As it is, she's made him loathe the sight of her. As for her bills"—Crawley shrugged his shoulders—"Le Hay can't pay them," he observed.

Belinda meantime was enjoying herself extremely. Farringdon, an excellent tennis and croquet player, spent his mornings in her company, passing delicious hours on the smooth, velvety lawns of the Manor gardens.

After dinner Towzer had his turn. He possessed a fine baritone voice, and by inducing Belinda to play his accompaniments—which she did indifferently well—secured her companionship for at least an hour every evening. And in an hour, as I think I have before remarked, much can be done—especially in a house like Havilands.

One night, after a moonlight stroll in the rose-walk, Belinda sought me out.

"Lady Peggy," she said a little hurriedly, "I want you to do me a favour; I want you to tell——" She paused, evidently at a loss how to proceed. "It is like this," she cried impetuously. "I can't help knowing that Hugh—Lord Farringdon, I mean," she hastily corrected herself, "likes me. I'm half afraid he likes me very much, and perhaps he may ask me to marry him. Somehow it doesn't seem fair to let him do that. I can't very well speak to him myself of David, but if you would tell him, it would save a lot of trouble."

"Tell him what?" I said coldly.

"That, that—— Oh, Lady Peggy," she said desperately, "tell him that David and I are going to get married."

"That," I said, "would be a deliberate untruth, unless you intend to set your father at defiance."

"I shall never marry anyone but David," she repeated.

"Upon my word, Belinda, you don't give the young man much option," I exclaimed. "David Carr is a good-looking and a clever fellow. Does it never strike you that it is rather hard lines on him to be bound—as you say he is bound—to you, a girl he never sees? You must understand," I continued, "that it would be a considerable sacrifice for him to marry you. You would go to him without a penny; you would be unable to help him in his profession, indeed you would retard him. Consider how many clever, wealthy women he is likely to meet, any one of whom he might easily make his wife!"

Belinda turned very white.

"I never thought of that," she murmured.

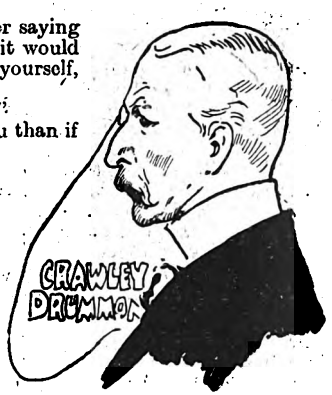
"Of course not," I answered satirically, "you were too pleasantly occupied with your admirers—none of whom, by-the-bye, would marry you without your fortune—except, perhaps, Lord Farringdon. David Carr is debarred from such pleasant companionship as you enjoy with the opposite sex. He is tied to you. You have bound him by a promise, which it will cost him dearly to keep."

"What ought I to do, Lady Peggy?" said the poor child, gazing at me with horror-stricken eyes.

"Write a nice little letter saying for the present you think it would be better that he, like yourself, should be free."

"But he will think——"

"Far more highly of you than if his freedom was curtailed," I interrupted. "The wider you open the door, the less a man wants to get out. Shut them up, and they'll break down the house to get free."



Belinda looked distressed, but evidently felt convinced of my wisdom. She brought me a note the next day couched in the terms I had suggested. I kissed her warmly, congratulated her on her strength of mind, and forwarded the letter to my dear friend, the Dean.

The first thing that David received on entering the hospitable walls of Wilborough was the aforesaid letter—written in ignorance of the fact that he was in England—within a few miles!

With masculine stupidity he put the worst possible interpretation on the missive, and imagined that Belinda had sent it to protect herself from the advances of a poor and undistinguished lover.

Smarting from fancied slight, his pride in arms, his ardour baffled, and his fond imaginings destroyed, David Carr went down to dinner at the Deanery in as moody a frame of mind as can well be imagined.

And at the dinner he found fate awaiting him—fate in the person of the most beautiful and sympathetic woman he had ever met.

Vera, the Russian Princess!

(The result of his new acquaintanceship will be told next Tuesday.)

TOM: "Didn't the encore unnerve Miss Twitter?" JESS: "Not a bit; she's used to having the neighbours hammer on the wall when she sings."

"PAPA, I know what I'm going to buy for your next birthday." "Well, what?" "A nice painted shaving mug." "But I've got a good one now." "Oh, I've just broken that."

LITTLE CHARLIE (age ten): "You have insulted my cousin Emmie." Little Bobby (age nine): "I'm ready to give you satisfaction." Little Charley: "Then give me half of your apple."

"MY dear Baron, what are you doing? Smoking two cigars at one and the same time?" "Well, you see, my dear fellow, in this beastly hole you can't get sixpenny cigars, such as I am in the habit of smoking, so I have to make shift with a couple of threepenny ones."

Result of the "Face" Competition.

THE Gramophone prizes have been awarded as follows:

H. Lay, "Cader Idris," Dynevor Road, Grosvenor Road, Tunbridge Wells.
E. Barnes, 68 Lydford, Paddington, W.
H. Smith, 50 Devonshire Street, Keighley.
Miss Ethel Hornsby, c.o. Mrs. Prosser, 67 Belgrave Road, Walthamstow.
J. Baker, 10 Broughton Street, Darwen.
W. H. Walter, 1 Danbury Street, St. Peter's Street, Islington, N.
E. A. Hancock, 5 Vernon Place, Birkenhead.
W. Cleaver, 15 Station Road, Port Talbot, South Wales.
Master W. Burnham, New Row, Thurlston, nr. Penistone.
R. L. Edwards, Sea View, St. Leonard's Avenue, Hove.

Digitized by Google

TWO GIRLS AND A SCARF-PIN.

The Story of a Boy and Girl Courtship with the Usual Ending.

"OH, Connie, you must come to us for Christmas. You surely can't refuse me." And little Lady Towers clasped her hands, and looked imploringly at her old friend and playmate.

"I have no heart for gaiety, and no suitable dress," replied Constance Carlisle, rather curtly.

"But, dear, there will be no gaiety. Roland's mother is so recently dead that gaiety is out of the question. There will be the pater and all the boys. You would like to see the boys again, wouldn't you?"

"Yes, I should like to meet your brothers again," admitted Constance. "And if there really will be no other guests——"

"Well, Mabel Huntley invited herself, and I couldn't refuse her. The boys will be furious."

"We all disliked her as children," remarked Constance. "The boys always called her a coward and a sneak. I didn't like her any better when she grew up. I saw a great deal of her two years ago, just before—before—you know, Flossie."

Flossie nodded. She knew Constance referred to her father's death, just after the loss of his entire fortune. The two years which had passed since then had exactly reversed the positions of the two friends. Flossie, the doctor's penniless daughter, and general servant to her seven brothers, was now the petted wife of the wealthy Sir Roland Towers, and the mother of his heir. Constance, the idolised only child and heiress of a merchant prince, now earned her bread as typist in a merchant's office.

"What a lovely girl Miss Carlisle is!" remarked Sir Roland Towers to a large, handsome blonde, as they stood looking over some views together.

"Do you think so?" she drawled. "She has no colour, you know. Do you admire that dead-white skin, Mr. Leigh?"

The young man was staring intently at the group round the fire, Constance in a plain black evening dress, with white roses at her breast.

"She always looks to me like a pure white rose," he said, dreamily, and Mabel tossed her head, an angry light in her blue eyes.

The evening passed like a happy dream to Constance. All was so different from her lonely evenings in her dreary lodgings. Flossie went with her to her room when bed-time came.

"It is lovely to have you, darling," she exclaimed. "But how serious you look. Has Mabel been disagreeable?"

"Flossie," said Constance, abruptly, "why did you not tell me that Vincent Leigh was to be here?"

"Because I didn't know," was the prompt reply. "Roland asked him this morning. But why should you mind? You were always such friends. Do you——?" Flossie stopped, for her friend was weeping bitterly.

"Oh, let me cry," she gasped, as Flossie overwhelmed her with caresses and questions, "let me cry, or my heart will break."

Flossie stood helplessly by while Constance sobbed and moaned, as if indeed her heart were broken. At last the girl raised her head from the couch, where she had flung herself in her outburst of grief.

"I will tell you about it, Flossie," she whispered. "Only do not look at me. I feel so deadly, deadly ashamed of myself."

"I am quite sure there is nothing to be ashamed about," said Flossie, briskly. "Have you quarrelled with Vincent? You were so cold to him to-night. Two years ago, I thought——"

Constance checked her by a gesture.

"So did I," she said, in a choked voice, "and that is just what is torturing me. I—I had hoped never to see Vincent Leigh again."

"But he adored you as a child," cried Flossie.

"As a child, yes. And that was what misled me. He petted and played with me, and I worshipped him. When I was twelve and he seventeen I gave him a scarf-pin as a Christmas gift. I had it made to my own design. He used to call me his little white rose-bud, and I had a silver pin made, a rose-bud with a tiny pearl set in it forming the head. The words 'I love you' were engraved on it. We quarrelled on Christmas Day, and I snatched the pin out of his tie, crying, 'I do not love you now, and you shall not have it back till I love you again.' Next day he was called away by his father's sudden death, and we did not meet again till seven years later, when he came to spend Christmas with us."

"I remember," nodded Flossie.

"Mabel Huntley was with us too, and I saw he admired her, but I thought—oh, fool that I was!—that he really loved me, and was trying to make me jealous. On Christmas Eve we were to have a dance——"

"Yes, it was there Roland proposed," Flossie interrupted.

"I know. That morning Vincent and I were alone in the conservatory, and he seemed so kind and loving to me. We were talking over old childish days, and he reminded me of the scarf-pin. He laughed at me for a little vixen, and then he added, so tenderly—at least, there seemed to me a world of love and wistful tenderness in his voice and eyes—'Constance, may I not have the pin again?' I was too agitated to speak, and he went on to remind me that I used always to give him a button-hole to wear every evening when he used to stay with us long ago, and to ask me to do so again. Then he said again, 'May I not have the pin again? You know you promised——' Just then Mabel Huntley interrupted us, but I thought—oh, fool, fool that I was," and Connie's slender body writhed with shame—"I thought he was serious, and Flossie, Flossie, I did give him the pin."

"Well?" cried Flossie, eagerly.

"I made him a button-hole of a white rose and spray of maidenhair fern, stuck the pin through it, slipped into his dressing room, and put it on his table. When we went into the ball-room Mabel wore it."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Flossie.

"She did," Constance went on, tears streaming down her cheeks. "I asked her where she got the pin, and she said from Vincent. She said he laughed very much over it, and said a little simpleton had fallen in love with him, and given him that as a love-token, so he passed it on to her."

"But I don't understand——" began Flossie.

"Oh, it's plain enough. He had not meant anything, and was quite scared when he saw I took it seriously. He knew if he gave Mabel the pin, I should understand. Fancy accepting the man before he asked me." And Constance laughed feebly.

"I believe there is something under this," remarked Flossie. "That was a caddish thing to do, and not like Vincent. He does not even like Mabel, though she is always running after him. And one thing I noticed to-night, she never allowed him to speak to you unless she was at your elbow. She seemed afraid of what you might tell him."

Digitized by Google

If Lady Towers noticed Mabel's efforts to keep the one-time lovers apart that evening, she observed them even more clearly next day. It was Christmas Eve, and real Christmas weather. All day the snow had been falling, and the cold was piercing. No one could go out. Mabel had perseveringly stuck to Constance all day. Even when their hostess asked Vincent to show Constance the priest's room, as the secret chamber was called, Mabel instantly begged leave to accompany them, although she was a notorious coward, and had declined to go with the others on a previous visit, on the ground that she "hated dark and uncanny places." For the priest's room was said to be haunted. So Lady Towers decided to make the fourth. The secret-room was in the picture gallery, and Vincent held back the heavy sliding panel, while the ladies stepped daintily within, holding their skirts from the dust and cobwebs. They had hardly made two steps forward when Mabel, with a loud scream of "The monk! The monk's ghost!" fell heavily to the ground.

Vincent rushed to her help, and the panel sliding to, they were imprisoned in the darkness. Mabel's screams grew frantic.

"Don't be silly," said Flossie, disgusted. "Roland and the boys know where we are, and when we don't turn up in a reasonable time they'll soon look us up."

"Not in time to save my life!" moaned Mabel. "I've cut my head open, falling, and I'm bleeding to death."

"It does seem a bad cut," said Vincent, in an alarmed tone. "I can feel the blood soaking my coat as I hold her."

"I'm dying, I know I am," gasped Mabel. "The ghost of the monk came to warn me. I can't die without confessing. Constance, Vincent didn't give me the scarf-pin you gave him. I heard what he said to you that day in the conservatory, and I saw you put the button-hole on his table. I took it, and I told him you gave it to me because you wanted the man who gave it to you to understand you didn't care for him. And I told you he gave it to me. I thought he would turn to me and grow to love me, but he didn't, and I'm bleeding to death, and I can't die with a guilty conscience. And oh, the monk! the monk!"

Here Mabel went off into a series of piercing yells, which relieved her hearers' fears as to the danger of her dying from exhaustion, and speedily procured their release.

Mabel was led off by her hostess to have her wound, which turned out to be a mere flesh cut, attended to, and Vincent turned to Constance, and took both her hands in his.

"Is that true, Connie? Did you mean to give me back my pin?"

The dark, soulful eyes met his steadfastly.

"I did, and when I thought you despised me, and had given it to Mabel, it nearly broke my heart."

"And she told me you had laughed at me, and loved another fellow. My darling, when you were a child, you said, 'I will give you the pin back when I love you again.' If you had it still, would you give it me now?"

The love-light shone in the beautiful eyes still raised to his, and the sweet, tremulous voice thrilled him with rapture as she answered:

"I gave it you back two years ago, Vincent. I would give it to you again now. For I love you, dear."

And as he clasped her to his breast, he could only murmur in his deep joy, "My little white rosebud."

Vera Serkoff.

£50 FROM ONE READER TO THE REST.

A reader of SHORT STORIES won a prize of £10 in 1894, and with the help of this money emigrated to America, making a fortune out of the cycle boom of 1897 and 1898. He recently wrote a letter, under the nom-de-plume of "Dayton," to the Editor of SHORT STORIES, inclosing dollar bills to the value of £50, and asking that this money may be offered as prizes in five sums of £10 each.

The Editor has given the matter very careful consideration, and has arrived at the conclusion that, as his anonymous correspondent was in great want when he won his prize, the most satisfactory manner of distributing his gifts of £50 would be to offer them to those who can give the best reasons for receiving them.

You may be wanting to emigrate to one of our Colonies. You may want £10 to buy something you have needed for a long time. You may want to clear off some small debts that have been worrying you. Or you may want to trade with the £10 and, like "Dayton," turn it into a fortune.

Whatever your reason for wanting it may be, write it down in the space below, and send it to "The Competition Editor of SHORT STORIES," Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "Dayton 5," so as to arrive not later than Tuesday, January 27th.

Readers may send as many reasons as they like, provided each is written on a separate coupon. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors may enter only on this understanding.

→ CUT OFF THE COUPON HERE. ←

FINAL COUPON.

My reason for wanting £10 is.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

Name..... Address.....

Digitized by Google

A Woman of a Thousand.

A Fateful Episode in the Lives of Two Very Clever People.

"THAT'S all I know about it, sir. There's the 'call' hanging up behind you."

"But I can't make it out, Summers! The new piece going so strong, money being turned away, and now, without a word of warning, and for no earthly reason, that I can see—Shakespeare! It's beyond me! Anyone on the stage?"

"Miss O'Brien, sir!"

Summers, the veteran, and, therefore, privileged stage-door-keeper, smiled ever so slightly as he spoke the lady's name.

Hartley Reeve didn't notice it, for he had turned on his heel in order to read the managerial notice once again before going through on to the stage.

"Strikes me," said Summers to himself musingly, as he watched the tall, erect figure disappear through the swing doors, "as there's going to be trouble over this bit of business. To take off My Lady Violet, as is paying hand over fist, and put on Hamlet in scratch style, as, perhaps, will only run a fortnight, ain't common sense in the guv'nor, as worships the shekels almost, and if Miss Molly O'Brien ain't at the bottom of it, I'll eat my hat!"

Meanwhile Hartley Reeve had reached the semi-dark stage. The T-piece had not yet been lighted, and he could for the moment see nobody. Then, from under an old Elizabethan archway—part of the first "set" in My Lady Violet—he saw approaching him a vision in silvery grey and furs.

"I know what you are going to say," she said, holding out both her hands, which he took eagerly, and dropped reluctantly, "and all about it. Fancy Willoughby North as Hamlet!—for he has cast himself for the Royal Dane, and you for Laertes—why, I would engage to find a better prince among the panto. supers at the Lane!"

"It isn't so much that, Molly; it is what is he doing it for?" replied the actor. "As sure as his name's North, he will have to close the theatre within three weeks. But never mind 'shop,' dear, have you thought about what I said to you yesterday?"

"Thought about it?—Yes."

"Well, dear—well?"

"I have done more, I have come to a conclusion, and——"

"Yes, darling!"

She saw that upon the next words that she should speak depended the life-happiness of this man, and, as she loved him, as such a woman could love such a man, she would not delay that happiness for so much even as a moment of time.

"Just let it be as you wish," she said, without a trace of that affectation, which is seen far oftener off the stage than upon it.

"Molly! My own Molly, now!" he whispered. "That for Willoughby North and all his works—snapping his fingers excitedly—we——"

"Sh!" interrupted Molly, pressing his arm warningly.

"Hullo, Reeve, you're betimes!" said a loud, grating voice behind the young actor. "But I see how it is, it is a case of killing two birds with one shot, eh?"

The speaker was a man of average height, but of a cast of countenance repellent in its downright ugliness. Even this might have been pardoned him, as, naturally he couldn't help it, but the evil expression of his eyes, the ever-present sneer, the overbearing hectoring manner, were things that had come by self-cultivation, and witnessed the nature of the man.

Hartley Reeve, though a leading member of his company, had a righteous contempt — amounting almost to hatred — for manager Willoughby North, which that gentleman was not slow to detect, and to appreciate—resentfully. The latter had seen, too, the evident attachment existing between Molly O'Brien and his leading man, and, for reasons of his own, had determined upon a policy, having for its object the professional ruin of Hartley Reeve.

In his own way, also, North himself was in love with Molly O'Brien, and thus had two items—each strong enough to influence the spirit that was in him—upon which to found a scheme for satisfaction and revenge.

Very curiously Reeve had failed altogether to notice the other's admiration for Molly, never imagining for a moment that there was any danger in that direction. The faintest suspicion of such a thing would not only have precipitated his own declaration, but would have led him to seek another engagement for both himself and the girl of his heart.

It was Willoughby North's remark on this particular morning that first opened Hartley Reeve's eyes and put him on his guard.

"Here early?" he said quietly, in reply to the manager's double-edged gibe. "Your wire first thing this morning startled me so that I couldn't sleep afterwards."

"Well—er—as a matter of fact, I began to have my doubts of a run for My Lady Violet, and, as one or two of the other West-end houses are doing well with Shakespeare, I didn't see why I shouldn't share in the boom."

Both his listeners knew that this was a lie, but were as far as ever from the reading of the riddle.

"I shall expect you to understudy my Hamlet," North went on, "though I don't think that you will have the opportunity of playing the part. As for you, my dear, Ophelia will be just the chance for you."

"I don't know," said Molly. "Ophelia is not a favourite part of mine. Why don't you put The Merchant up, Mr. North, I have always wanted to play Portia in London."

"Sorry, I'm sure, but the announcements are out, and—and Hamlet suits me."

Had Hartley Reeve known that this especial play had been deliberately selected for a dastardly and even criminal purpose, he would then and there have come to an issue with the coward who had schemed and planned for a man's undoing, and a woman's sorrow. But he did not; he certainly suspected North of some underhand juggling, but of what sort or seriousness he was as yet unable to determine.

For years the manager of the "Queen's" had posed as a bachelor, no man denying him, so that had he openly wooed the clever little lady who headed his company, not a soul would have thought of gainsaying his right to do so.

But he was a man with a reputation for secret methods, and was, therefore, a person to be suspected upon very short notice.

Right through the rehearsal, which lasted, with intervals, all day, up to curtain-rise almost, Willoughby North paid more than usual attention to Molly O'Brien, though Hartley Reeve's faith in his promised wife was such that it didn't trouble him to any great extent.

Ophelia's presence not being required after the fourth act, Molly whispering au revoir to her lover, slipped quietly from the stage. Passing through the swing doors into the outer passage, she both saw and heard Summers the doorkeeper, and a shabbily-dressed woman in high argument.

Digitized by Google

"You must see Mr. North? Well, you can't and won't see him, for he's busy!"

"Let me go through to him; that's all I want!"

"I daresay you do. But you don't if I know it. What's your name?"

"Never mind my name; I——"

"Haven't got one, perhaps. Leastways one you can give without being ashamed of it."

"Who is it? What is it?" said a sweet voice at the open door of the little glass office.

"That's just what I don't know, miss," replied the old commissionaire, flushed with angry irritation. "She wants to see Mr. North, and she won't tell her name or her business."

Something in the white, pinched face of the woman appealed to Molly's tenderness of heart and sympathy.

"Can I do anything for you?" she asked. "Shall I speak to Mr. North for you?"

"No, no! Not you! Not you! And yet I must see him or I shall starve—and die!"

"Well, come with me! I am going to a hotel close by here to dinner, and you shall have some with me; I am all alone, and you will be company for me. Then, too, you will, perhaps, be able to say how I can further serve you."

"Is your name O'Brien—Molly O'Brien?" queried the woman with sudden insistence.

"Yes, that is my name."

"I have heard that you were beautiful, and clever, and good, and the last I would not believe. But I do believe it now, and—and I will go with you."

"Excuse me, miss," said Summers in a low voice behind his hand, "but you'd better be careful!"

"That's all right, Summers, I can look after myself, and the poor creature doesn't look so very formidable. Whistle for a hansom for me!"

In two minutes Molly followed her guest into the cab, and was driven rapidly to a certain old-fashioned hotel in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, where she was well known.

Acting upon Molly's tip-supported instructions before she left the theatre with the stranger, Summers did not acquaint the manager with the fact of what had taken place. Molly could not exactly have given a reason for this shutting of the doorkeeper's mouth, she merely wished to first hear the woman's story, so that she could, if necessary, and possible, help forward her object.

Thus it happened that the whole fortnight during which the Hamlet rehearsals lasted, North's attention to the beautiful actress grew in fervour and intensity, so much so, indeed, that Hartley Reeve was more than once on the point of forcible expostulation. Noticing this, Molly took the first opportunity of speaking to him on the subject.

"But I can't bear to see the brute talking to you in this style," said Hartley. "The next thing will be his asking you to marry him!"

"Well, I hope he will!"

"You hope he will," he gasped. "Why, Molly, you must be mad!"

"Not even a little bit, dear. If you will only do as I ask you, to hear, see, and say nothing, as well as to trust me, you will find by-and-bye that the end justifies the means."

"It's very hard, Molly, and I don't think you ought to push me so close, and if I didn't know that you were a woman of a thousand, I wouldn't consent to it."

"There's a dear boy!" she replied, smiling bewitchingly up into his face. "It will soon be over for you, to-morrow night—Hamlet's first night—will end it all, so far as you and I are concerned—while I just want you to remember one thing, and that is, that guile must sometimes be met with guile, if it is to be successfully checkmated."

"Well, thank goodness, it hasn't to last much longer, for I verily believe that much more of it would make me want to kill somebody—Willoughby North, by preference."

"Silly boy, have patience! Good-night."

As for the shabbily-dressed woman, she came no more to the stage-door of the "Queen's" to inquire for its manager.

* * * * *

The revival of Hamlet at the Queen's Theatre, will long be remembered by those interested in matters theatrical, by reason of the strange events attending the first performance of the play, which was also destined to be the last.

So far as the male characters were concerned, interest seemed to be centred in the Laertes, Hamlet's ranting and mouthing, at the hands of Willoughby North, being received with severe silence, and the derisive booing of the "gods."

This was more marked before Ophelia's entrance in the second act, Molly O'Brien being the darling of everybody, from galleryite to stall-holder.

In one of the stage-boxes a lady, attended by a young gentleman of particularly youthful appearance, sat, so hidden by the amber satin curtain, that her face was only indistinctly visible. Each time that Ophelia was upon the stage, it might have been noticed that the lady bent more forward, and never took her eyes off the actress till the latter made her exit.

When, in act four, Ophelia enters mad, with her basket of flowers for distribution, she cast a quick glance up at the box in question, and placed, for just a second, two fingers upon her lips. It appeared to be some pre-arranged signal, for the lady immediately answered it by a similar placing of two fingers upon her lips. Then she leant back again in the shadow of the curtain, and, for the rest of the evening,

"Hullo, Reeve, you're betimes. Killing two birds with one shot, eh?"

Digitized by Google

up to the final duel between Hamlet and Laertes, gave no sign of interest in the proceedings.

* * * * *

Molly O'Brien, looking lovely in her robe of creamy white, and not in any wise disfigured by the tangle of weeds and wild flowers in her hair, stood at the wing on the O. P. side, waiting her cue.

For the moment there was nobody in the immediate neighbourhood of where she was, the stage hands, with the players who were not required, being assembled in the two first entrances to watch Molly O'Brien's great scene.

"I want an answer to a question I am going to ask you," suddenly said a voice at her side.

It was Hamlet.

"Mr. North," replied Molly, involuntarily shrinking away from him, "this is a strange time in which to ask questions."

"Yes, I know, but the five minutes you yet have are ample in which to do as I ask you."

She saw by his excited manner that the thing which she had been expecting was now to be, and nerved herself for the inevitable.

"Do you know that I love you—that I have determined in my own mind that, here and now, you shall make of me a happy man or a fiend?"

"Mr. North, you forget yourself!"

"I do not. Your answer, will you be my wife?"

"I have no answer for that question."

"By Heaven, you shall have!"

"I said you had forgotten yourself; it seems I spoke the truth."

"Will you be my wife?"

"No!"

"You love Hartley Reeve?"

"I do!"

"You shall never marry him!"

"I do not heed your threats, sir!"

"Why will you not marry me? I have fifty times as much money as your beggarly sweetheart!"

"Perhaps. You ask why I will not marry you; before curtain-fall I will tell you. Pardon me, there is my cue."

Then, walking out on to the stage, her flower-basket in her hand, she spoke in plaintive questioning, "Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?"

Upon leaving the stage after the mad scene, a note was handed to Molly by her dresser. It was in pencil, and ran:

"I have seen your signal. Send round for me to your room a few minutes before the end. I will bring your brother with me. I saw Willoughby North's eyes as they followed you on to the stage. He means mischief, either to you or to Laertes. Be warned and watch."

After Ophelia's death it was with but scant patience that the audience sat out the rest of the play.

Then was reached the last scene of all.

The rapiers were handed to Hamlet and Laertes by Osric, the former suddenly reaching forward his hand and snatching one.

With a deep groan Hartley Reeve sank down.

"Another hit! What say you?" cries Hamlet, lunging heavily.

Then all was confusion. With a deep groan Hartley Reeve sank down, blood welling out of a wound in his shoulder, Hamlet's sword having passed completely through, and been withdrawn.

At the same moment two ladies, one in walking costume, the other in evening dress, hurried on to the stage, the latter stooping rapidly and picking up the rapier which, by the jerk of the withdrawal, had fallen out of Hamlet's hand.

The uproar and consternation in the front of the house was such as has never been seen in a London theatre before or since. Ladies shrieked, people called "Murder" and "Police!" while some adventurous pittites made their way over stalls and orchestra on to the stage. No one behind seemed to know what to do, even to the extent of lowering the curtain.

Meanwhile, Molly O'Brien on her knees upon the ground, supported the unconscious form of her lover, his head upon her lap. Medical aid was at once summoned.

When at last a doctor having arrived, the unfortunate man was removed to Charing Cross Hospital, Molly accompanied him there in the cab.

Someone sent for the police, but when they arrived it was to find the bird flown. Mr. Willoughby North, murderer and bigamist in intent, had fled during the confusion.

One glance at the lady in evening-dress—now Molly O'Brien's companion—was sufficient; while the incriminating weapon in her hand—the button removed—gave promise of what he must expect if he remained.

He was never caught; for a man with money can flee and hide, where a poor man will certainly fall a sure prey to the law.

Hilda Willoughby, the wife whom he had cruelly treated, and deserted, told Molly how for eight years she had lived a life of want and misery, and that accidentally finding out her husband, under his assumed name of North, she had endeavoured, in sheer desperation, to see him, for the purpose of getting the means of subsistence from him.

There was something about her which attracted the generous heart of Molly, and from the day that the latter took her to that Covent Garden Hotel, and put new life and spirit into her with the food which she sat before her, she had never loosed hold of her.

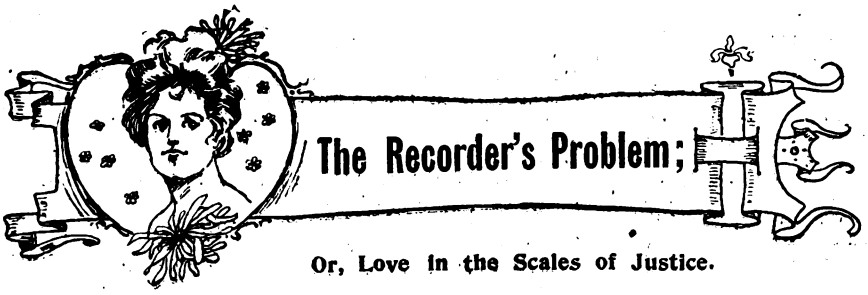
They seemed to take to each other at once. Molly was always of a sympathetic nature, and Mrs. Willoughby's sufferings, caused by the way in which she had been treated by her scoundrel of a husband, struck a tender chord in her heart.

Hartley Reeve, now that he has recovered from the wound, which with surer aim might have cost him his life, fully indorses his wife's action in the matter, and Hilda Willoughby is sure of a home with the great actor and actress, for the rest of her days.

"My dear!" she will sometimes say confidentially to a friend, "if there is one thing more than another upon which Mr. Reeve and I are agreed, it is, that his Molly is for us "a woman of a thousand."

Arthur Gunter.

Digitized by Google



The Recorder's Problem;

Or, Love in the Scales of Justice.

SIR HENRY BRISTOWE stepped into the cab which had drawn up outside the Sessions House and was driven away to his residential flat a little way out of town. The onlookers said that he appeared to be deep in thought, and that they were not surprised thereby, for the case which he was trying was a very serious one, and the evidence required careful consideration and discrimination on the part of the judge.

Some of the older people told the younger ones that they had known Bristowe as a young man; they related how he had gone up to London to study law, and they briefly traced his brilliant career at the Bar as a barrister on the Northern Circuit, and concluded with the remark: "And then he was made Recorder of this city, his own birth-place, where his father built up a big business, which is still carried on by his brother; and then he was knighted."

A man was being tried for his life, arraigned on the charge of having murdered his partner. The case should have been tried by a judge from London, but he had fallen ill in the middle of his round, the influenza had stricken three other judges of the High Court, and, consequently, the Lord Chancellor had been compelled to make provision for the uninterrupted running of legal business and Sir Henry Bristowe, as Recorder, found heavier responsibilities laid upon him.

There were many who envied Bristowe, for he had risen rapidly, and was now but little over forty. There were a few unkind and ignorant critics who said that he was not old enough to be a man of experience, but his ability was not doubted by the majority. Bristowe was unmarried, a fact that procured him many invitations to social gatherings and private parties.

Dismissing the cab with an extra gratuity to the driver, Sir Henry Bristowe slowly passed along the wide hall of the building and up the first flight of stone steps to his own flat, letting himself in and pressing an electric button inside the door to let his housekeeper know that he had returned. He went straight to his study and threw himself into a chair near the window. He gazed through the glass into the road, but he saw nothing of it, for his thoughts were far away.

"Alfred Pearse is doomed unless his counsel can shake the evidence of Basil Hurst to-morrow," murmured the Recorder. "The evidence against Pearse is circumstantial, but Hurst's testimony is clear, and it will be convincing unless Douglas can shake it. That will require all Douglas' skill, though! It is amazing to think that Hurst withstood all the ability of one of the cleverest counsel in the country. I think that Douglas himself was nettled!"

A knock at the door interrupted the reverie. In response to his "Come in," the door was opened by his housekeeper, an elderly woman, who had been nursemaid in his father's household and had remained with one or other member of the family all her life. Should she bring in his tea?

"Yes, Mrs. Oakley," he answered absently. "Yes, bring it in here. Oh, and let me have the evening paper as soon as it arrives," he added, rousing for a moment.

The housekeeper, as he termed her, although his "house" was a flat, departed and Bristowe resumed his train of thought.

"She was in Court and I watched her all the time. Does she still hold the same opinion as when she wrote that note?"

He rose from his chair and went to a writing-table; unlocking one drawer, he took from it a small packet of papers and letters, and one of the latter was selected by him. Another rap at his door caused him to thrust the packet into the drawer hurriedly, and he waited till Mrs. Oakley had deposited the tray on the table and left the room. Then he drew the packet out again and opened the selected letter.

"I am sorry that it cannot be. I cannot accept your offer, because my heart would not go with my hand; it is given to another. Let us not be estranged by this, but when we meet, as meet we must, let us press each other's hand in friendship and be really friends."

"Friends!" he repeated. "Friends! It is always the same when a woman rejects you. I love that woman as a man loves only once in a lifetime; how is it possible for me to regard her as merely a friend and see her as the wife of another?"

Replacing the letter in the packet and the packet in the drawer, he turned mechanically to his tea.

"Given to another." And this other man was Alfred Pearse whom he, Bristowe, was trying on the capital charge! If Pearse were proved guilty, then Edith Northcote——Sir Henry Bristowe lowered the cup from which he was about to drink and sat rigid as the haunting thought overpowered him once more. Yes, if Pearse suffered the extreme penalty, the Recorder's rival in love would be removed!

"And he will suffer unless some strong influence is brought to bear on the jury, some strong moral suasion." Sir Henry uttered the thought almost aloud, and he started and shivered as the sound of his own voice struck his ear.

He tried the expedient of reading the newspaper, which had been laid on the table with the tea, but he could not keep his thoughts from the trial, Edith Northcote and Alfred Pearse. In the present state of the case, the Recorder would have scarcely any difficulty in so completely convincing the jury of Pearse's guilt that the removal of his rival was certain. And then he might hope to approach Edith!

He knew not how long he sat there, but he started from his chair, stiff through having sat for a long time in one position, as he saw a woman's form before him.

"Edith!" The name came involuntarily from his lips.

Edith Northcote was a woman of commanding presence, strikingly beautiful, with that beauty which is partly made up of queenly dignity. As she stood in front of her rejected lover, the dignity of the face was slightly relaxed and an expression of intreaty was upon it.

"Why are you here? Pray be seated!" said the Recorder, motioning her to a chair with a dignified gesture. He had recovered from his surprise and had assumed his wonted bearing.

Edith Northcote sank into the chair, but rose immediately.

"I have come to ask for your assistance," she said, in a low voice of mingled intreaty and anxiety, slightly stretching out her hands as she spoke. "You are his judge, and you said that you loved me; I love him, and I ask you to save him that I may be happy!"

"I do not understand you," he returned gravely. "As the judge, I have my duty to perform, and I shall perform it impartially. I cannot save him! It is the jury with whom the decision rests, and they will decide in accordance with the evidence."

"The jurymen will decide in accordance with the moral influence brought to bear upon them," returned the visitor significantly, passionately, clasping her hands nervously. "The counsel for the prosecution will use all his influence to persuade them that the accused is guilty; the counsel for the defence will exert his powers to prove that the accused is innocent; but the jurymen will listen to and be chiefly influenced by the judge! Everyone is saying that the issue of the trial depends entirely upon you, for the evidence is circumstantial. You are one of themselves, one of their own townsmen; they honour and admire you, and they will go by what you say!"

Digitized by Google

"And I shall say that which is right according to the evidence!" declared Bristowe, his face very pale, and his hands trembling slightly. "You should not come to me—to me, the judge!—to tempt me to be false to my trust! You must go at once; I cannot listen!"

He moved towards the door to show her out, but she only turned in order to face him, and did not move one step nearer the exit.

"The evidence is against him, but he is innocent!" she cried wildly. "My heart would turn instinctively from him if he were guilty. It all rests with you in your summing up, to deliver him to the gallows or—or to me! They will decide as you suggest, and there is enough difference in the evidence for you to suggest——"

"Madam, I must ask you to retire!" said the Recorder sternly, although his whole frame was quivering with the torture which her words inflicted upon him. "If anyone saw you enter here, my reputation as an impartial and incorruptible dispenser of justice would be gone!"

He opened the door and walked to the outer door, followed by Edith Northcote. He saw how it was that she had been able to gain access to him without being announced; Mrs. Oakley had slipped out and left the outer door ajar. She did that occasionally when she found that she had not got the key handy in her pocket, and she intended to be absent only a short time. It was a bad habit which he had rebuked several times, but it is hard not to be indulgent to an old servant.

Several persons noticed that there was a light in one of the rooms of Sir Henry Bristowe's flat very late at night, but they paid no heed to the fact. Only one person, a servant in a house on the opposite side of the road, spoke to Mrs. Oakley about it; she was friendly with the elderly dame, and on the following morning she mentioned it.

"Sir Henry must have been very worried about that case, Mrs. Oakley," she said confidentially. "I was up most of the night with the toothache, and I saw a light in his private room nearly all night. And he was walking up and down the room, too, for I saw his shadow on the blind every now and then—regular-like, just as it would be when he got to the window-end of the room and got between the light and the blind somehow, you know."

Mrs. Oakley looked concerned, and said that she hoped he was not ill, and dismissed the subject.

The trial was resumed at ten o'clock, and Douglas, the eminent counsel, took up his cross-examination of the Treasury witness, Hurst, but failed to shake his evidence. There were some witnesses for the defence, but, when the prosecuting counsel began his concluding speech it was commonly thought that the accused was doomed if the judge's summing-up was in the least degree against the prisoner. Douglas' concluding speech was a masterly one; he had never surpassed the level attained on that occasion, and he contrived to throw enough doubt into the case to cause everyone to look to the Recorder. How had he viewed the evidence?

Sir Henry Bristowe placed his notes in order and prepared to sum up. His face was white and haggard, and this impressed the spectators with the feeling that he was acting with the highest sense of the duties of his office, and that the case had caused him the greatest anxiety.

The Recorder sent another glance round the crowded Court in search of Edith Northcote. She had not been present during the day's proceedings so far, but he fancied that she might appear to hear the summing-up. She was not there, and he concluded that she thought the case hopeless after his reception of her appeal last night, and that she could not endure to witness the last scene in the Court, and see and hear her lover sentenced to an ignominious death by his rival.

Sir Henry Bristowe began his speech, speaking slowly, and with an effort; the people crowded together in Court listened with feverish anxiety and the prisoner watched the judge with strained eyes. By degrees the Recorder's voice grew stronger and his tones firmer till they rang through the building. He dissected the evidence in the most skilful manner, while Douglas, Hurst, and the accused listened in wonderment.

"It's a defence of the prisoner!" thought Douglas. "A masterly defence; better than I could possibly have made, for it is done by an impartial person, and is—seemingly—so impartial! It carries conviction with it! If he keeps on like that, my man is safe!"

"If people take that seriously," muttered Hurst, "I may expect to be had up on a charge of perjury!"

The speech was finished just before six o'clock, the Court having arranged to sit till the case was terminated. There was a buzz of excitement as the Recorder ceased speaking: many thought that the verdict would be given without the jury leaving the box, and, as a matter of fact, it was as a mere form than otherwise that the jury retired. The interval afforded a breathing time and a relief from the tension of the day's experience. The prisoner was removed, the Recorder left the Court, and the public passed the time in energetic chatter. The jury returned in twenty minutes, the prisoner was brought back, and the Recorder resumed his seat. The usual formal questions were asked by the clerk, and the jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty."

"The Scottish verdict of 'Not proven' would have been more appropriate from my point of view," said a solicitor to a friend as he left the Court. "I myself would hardly like to say that the accused was innocent, but the Recorder seemed convinced of it."

"They knew each other, which is significant," returned the other, "yet I would not accuse Bristowe of partiality."

"They were rivals in a love affair," said the first, "if the rumour I have heard is true, and Bristowe lost!"

"H'm! That disposes of the partiality theory," rejoined the second man. "The partiality would have been the other way about!"

Sir Henry Bristowe returned to his residential flat, and asked that a light supper might be brought to him.

"You can leave the things, Mrs. Oakley," he said to her. "I shall not want to be disturbed, so you can clear them away in the morning."

Mrs. Oakley sat in her own little chamber reading the evening paper, when a ring at the outer door disturbed her. On answering the ring she saw Edith Northcote, whom she did not know.

"Sir Henry Bristowe is at home, ma'am," she replied in response to Edith's inquiry, "but he is in his study, and does not wish to be disturbed."

"Ah, yes, that is to the ordinary caller!" said Edith. "I am an old friend, and he won't mind my going in. You need not trouble to announce me!"

Before Mrs. Oakley could say anything to the contrary, the visitor had passed her and hurried to the door of the study. Knocking gently and receiving no reply, she went in and saw the Recorder sitting in front of the fire, his elbow resting on the arm of the chair, and his head supported on his hand. He was gazing steadily at the fire, by the glow of which she could see that his face was deathly white.

A pang shot through her; it had cost the upright judge a great deal to make that summing-up!

"I have come to thank you for what you did for me to-day!" she said gently.

But Sir Henry made no movement. She raised her voice slightly.

"You saved the life of the man I loved and restored him to me. I shall regard you as my greatest friend as long as I live. How can I ever thank you sufficiently?"

Still no movement. With a sudden chill at her heart, she approached him and bent over him; she recoiled with a cry at the moment Mrs. Oakley entered.

"He is dead!" she cried.

It was true. Sir Henry Bristowe, the Recorder, had gone to stand before another Judge and had taken with him the true story of the struggle between love and duty and the method in which he had solved the problem.

Orme Lewi

Digitized by Google

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

In Addition to £1,000 in Cash.

THE MOST LIBERAL PRIZE EVER OFFERED BY ANY PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

THIS prize is so huge that it is almost impossible for one to realise at first thought what it really means. Therefore the following hints will probably enable you to grasp the full value of such a regular income:

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE means, unless you are extravagant, absolute freedom from money troubles as long as you live.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is an insurance against depression and mental worry.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will enable you to dispense charity with a liberal hand.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy you a bigger house and enable you to live in better style.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will cover the cost of taking a cottage in the country and living there in comfort for the rest [of your days.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will pay the expenses of months of foreign travel.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy anything you can possibly want, from a piano to a motor-car.

In fact, there is no limit to the things you can do with £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE.

THE prize will be paid to the person (perhaps you) who correctly solves the pictures which appear below, together with other pictures which will appear in PEARSON'S WEEKLY under the conditions printed in that paper.

Each picture consists of certain objects, the names of which represent the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom. For example, the hull of a ship would mean "Hull." Every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:—

FIRST CONSOLATION GIFT, £100.

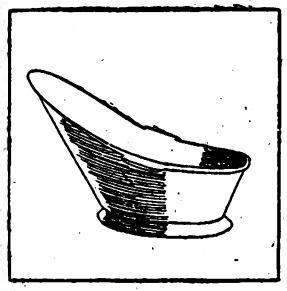
2nd Cash Gift ...	£50	6th Cash Gift ...	£25
3rd ,, ...	£50	7th ,, ...	£25
4th ,, ...	£25	8th to 57th Cash Gifts ...	£10 each
5th ,, ...	£25	58th to 97th ,, ...	£5 each

So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a week for life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash gifts.

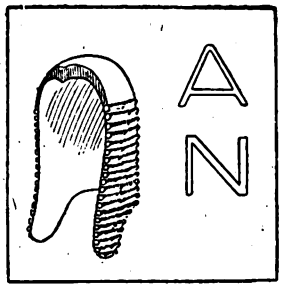
If you find out the names of the railway stations represented by the pictures shown here, you should write down the name under each, put your name and address at the foot, and then

Get a Copy of Next Week's "Pearson's Weekly."

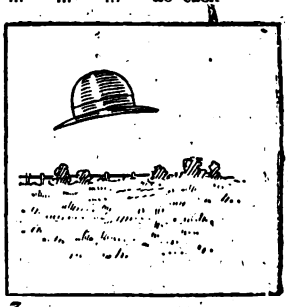
☛ If you are unable to secure a copy of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, drop a reply post-card to the Publisher, PEARSON'S WEEKLY, Henrietta St., London, W.C., and he will get you out of your difficulty. ☚



1.



2.



3.

4.

5.

6.

Write your Name and Address here .....

Digitized by Google

Didn't Like to Resist.

MRS. MCBRIDE (entering the kitchen): "Bridget, didn't I see that policeman kiss you?" Bridget: "Well, mum, sure an' yez wouldn't hev me lay mesilf opin to arrist for resistin' an officer, mum."

Prepared for Emergencies.

HE: "If you loved me why did you at first refuse me?" She: "I wanted to see what you would do." He: "But I might have rushed off without waiting for an explanation." She: "I had the door locked."

Then He Wouldn't Stay Long.

SHE: "Papa says that when coming to see me you must not come in a 'bus any more." He: "Really! Does he expect me to walk all this distance?" She: "Of course not. He says all he asks is that you will come in a carriage, hired by the hour."

A Permanent Cheek.

HER head had dropped upon his shoulder. "If only," he whispered, "thy cheek could remain there for ever." Little thought he what was to be. Little thought he until he got home and tried to remove her cheek from his dress coat with ammonia and alcohol.

She Could Teach Him.

MAY: "It is strange you have never learnt to waltz. Have you tried?" Jack: "Oh, yes; but I could never get past the first stage." May: "The first stage? What is that?" Jack: "To put my arm round the girl's waist." May (coyly): "I think I could teach you."

Father Understood.

"WHAT did you say that young man's name is?" asked Mabel's father. "Mr. Isaac Oliver Upton," was the reply. "H'm! I begin to understand." "To understand what?" "A remark that was made about Mr. Upton. I was told that he seldom wrote his name in full; that he nearly always used his initials."

A Hint.

HE was a lively fellow, and fond of her, but it didn't occur to him that a girl expected something else besides going to places and having fun all the time. "Anything on hand this evening?" he asked, coming breezily in, for the sixth time that week. "Well, no," she replied hesitatingly as she looked down at her empty fingers.

The Parrot Gave Her Away.

"I GAVE you that parrot as a birthday present, did I not, Matilda?" he asked. "Yes; but surely, Albert, you are not going to speak of your gifts as if——" "It was young and speechless at the time?" "Yes," with increasing wonder; "and it has never been out of this parlour." "There are no other young ladies in this house?" "No, there are not." "Then why—why when I kissed your photograph in yonder album, while waiting for you, did that wretched bird imitate your voice, and say, 'Don't do that, Charlie; please don't'?"

She Hesitated No Longer.

JUDGE: "What is your age?" (Female witness hesitates.) Judge: "Don't hesitate in answering the question. The longer you hesitate the older you'll be."

A Handy Substitute.

KINGSLEY: "Don't you think it retards digestion to read a newspaper at mealtimes?" Bingo: "On the contrary I find it a great help. When the breakfast is a failure devour the paper."

Still Aristocratic.

NEIGHBOUR: "How did your daughter's marriage with that foreign count turn out?" Mrs. Brickrow: "Her last letter states that he has spent all her money, and she is taking in washing; but then I presume she washes only for the nobility."

Wasn't Certain.

ETHEL: "So Arthur proposed last night?" Maud: "Yes." Ethel: "And did you accept him?" Maud: "I was so awfully excited I don't know whether I accepted him or not. If he comes to-night I did, and if he doesn't I didn't."

Curing Him.

"MY dear," said Mr. Bunker to his wife, "what has become of that box of cigars you gave me on my birthday?" "It is upstairs." "Well, get it, please. Jimmy wants to smoke, and I think we can give him all he wants in about three seconds."

How he Kept Baby Quiet.

MR. NOOPOP: "My baby cries all night. I don't know what to do with it." Mr. Knowitt: "I'll tell you what I did. As soon as our baby commenced to cry, I used to turn on all the gas. That fooled him. He thought it was broad daylight, and went to sleep."

Afraid of a Mistake.

BRIDEGROOM (about to marry the youngest of three sisters): "My dear friend, I want you to stand immediately behind me during the ceremony, and keep your eyes open. I am very near-sighted, and I'm afraid they may substitute the oldest sister at the critical moment."

A Landlord in Gloom.

WIFE: "Who was that who called?" Husband: "One of my tenants to pay me his rent." "Did he pay it?" "Yes." "Then why do you look so gloomy?" "He didn't say anything about wanting fifty or sixty pounds' worth of repairs." "What of it?" "That shows he's going to leave."

Before and After.

MRS. F.: "You write such short letters when you are away. I don't see why you couldn't write me nice long ones, as you did when we were engaged." Mr. F.: "Honestly, my dear, I didn't suppose you would have any time to read them. In the days when we were engaged you had no housekeeping to attend to."

Why She was Unworthy.

SHE: "It cannot be. I am not worthy of you." He: "Nonsense." "It is true." "Impossible. You are an angel." "No, no, you are wrong. I am an idle, silly girl, utterly unfit to become your companion through life." "This is madness. What sort of a wife do you think I ought to have?" "A careful, calculating, practical woman who can live on your small salary."

Best to Begin Early.

"SHALL I have to get married when I grow up?" asked little Flossie one day of her mother. "Just as you please, dear," answered her mother with a smile. "Most women do, however." "Yes, I suppose so," continued the little girl musingly, "and I think I'd better start and look out for a husband now. They say that Aunt Jane has been at it for twenty years, and hasn't caught one yet."

Digitized by Google

The Gift of Roses.

The Love Story of the Second Violin.

DICKY AUBER had often read of cases like his own—with this important difference; the stories usually ended happily, whereas he knew that for himself it would be madness to hope for anything save disappointment.

He was in love, desperately, madly in love with Nella Renshaw, a clever and popular actress, the admired of all admirers.

He enshrined her in his heart the very first time he saw her, which was the day on which he commenced his engagement as violinist in the orchestra of the London theatre at which she was playing a leading part.

He made no effort to check this hopeless love which grew and grew as he watched her night after night.

He could only see her when the action of the piece brought her well forward upon the stage; but he soon learnt to know when these places came, and was always ready for her so as not to lose a single second of the time that she was in his view.

Once her eyes met his upturned gaze. That night he walked to his poor lodgings with his head among the stars. After that he found her look turned towards him on several occasions. On those nights he lay awake for hours asking himself whether the smile in those beautiful eyes could possibly have been for him; but by morning he had called himself a fool for imagining for one instant that what was obviously an accident in her acting, could have any significance for him. Yet, for all his wise reasonings, those glances made him absurdly happy.

Then came a blow that hurt him cruelly. Nella was to tour in America. Even the pleasure of looking at her was now to be denied him. He would not see her for a long time—perhaps never again.

A farewell performance was announced, and, sad at heart, Dicky took his accustomed place. Before then he had always felt a thrill of pleasure and pride when came the thunders of applause in acknowledgment of Nella's superb art, but on this night it filled his heart with sadness and a great lump came to his throat. This was the last time that he would see the triumph of the woman he loved—the last time.

Then, as the curtain fell, he did a thing that he had never dared before to do. He quickly made his way to the stage door and waited there to watch her departure. As she passed him the fragrance of her dainty silks and laces seemed to hold his whole soul in bondage, and when her rustling skirt brushed him he nearly swooned.

She carried a magnificent bouquet that had been presented to her, and when she was half way to her carriage a rose dropped from it on to the pavement. Dicky darted forward and picked it up. Murmuring something, he knew not what, he stepped to the side of the carriage, and handed it to her.

As she took it she looked straight into his eyes. Then, quickly drawing another blossom from among its lovely fellows, she smilingly thrust it with the other back into his hands.

"Keep them, and—and—thank you," she said.

As the carriage drove off Dicky was staring in wonder at the exquisite flowers. Because of this he did not see that which would have filled his heart with an even greater joy. Her eyes had filled with tears.

Every now and again, during the year that followed, audacious thoughts filled Dicky's mind as he gazed on his most cherished possessions—two withered roses. Soon after, however, he usually read in some newspaper one of the numerous accounts of Nella's trans-Atlantic successes. Then his splendid hopes collapsed dismally. Yet they were always there, and though he did not know it, grew stronger and stronger until they became part of his life.

At last Nella came back. She was to open the Autumn season at her old theatre and once more Dicky could see her every night. He played first instead of second violin now and his position had been altered to one from which he had a far better view of the stage.

It was not that thought, however, which set his heart pounding with excitement as he went towards the theatre that day—the day on which he was to behold her again after a year. In his heart there was a great hope that she would recognise him in some way or another. Surely she must. Then he would wait at the stage door, and perhaps she would speak to him again.

Bitter and terrible was his disappointment. Not even a glance came his way.

The next day he was not at his place in the orchestra. Instead he sat at home in his room before a table covered with manuscript songs. They were those which he had written out of his great love.

Slowly, almost mechanically, he took them up and scanned every note. Then, having seen that all were as perfect as he could make them he gathered them together in a heap.

He was going away—where he did not know or care. During the last year he had so lived on the almost unconscious hope born in him by the gift of roses, that the realisation that it had been founded on nothing had dazed his every faculty. It was as though he had fallen from the clouds.

At first, when the wish to leave the place of his sorrow had come to him, he had determined to burn his songs; but they were his children—the only children of his love—and he could not. Then came a wild desire that she should know of his heart's longing, and, after examining them all to make sure that they, at least, were worthy of her attention, he gathered them together to send them to her.

He took the withered roses from his breast. She should have them too. Pressing them passionately to his lips he laid them tenderly on the top of the pile.

Then the stupor that had dulled his understanding went, and in its place an awful despair seized him. He laid his head on his arms and sobbed—sobbed as only can the man from whom is taken his only hold on life.

For a long while he lay. Then there came a tap at the door. He did not hear it. The door opened gently, and a woman entered. It was Nella. Quietly she stepped to the table. Her eyes rested on the roses. She read her name on the dedication of the song on which they rested and a great sob, half of sorrow, half of joy rose in her throat. Very tenderly she touched the bowed head.

Dicky started up and stared at her without comprehension. Then a light came into his eyes. "You?" he said, huskily.

"Yes, I," she answered, smiling.

"But—but—I——"

"Tell me," she said, stopping him; "why you kept those flowers?"

Though her voice was without emotion Dicky saw something in her face that sent the blood leaping in his veins. He rose, and drew her to him.

"Because I love you," he whispered, his voice almost fierce with joy.

It was Nella who wept now.

"Dicky," she sobbed, "when I didn't see you in the orchestra, I fancied all sorts of dreadful things, so I asked your address from the door-keeper—I knew your name from the very first—and came here to find out what had happened to you. Why didn't you write to me while I was away, Dicky? I thought you would understand when I gave you the flowers. Oh, Dicky, Dicky, I have loved you ever since I looked down into your eyes that night. I thought that you loved me until I went away and you did not write. Then I was miserable, Dicky. But it doesn't matter now!"

"Nothing matters now," said Dicky, and he kissed her on the lips.

Ernest Herbert.

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID NEW SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY,

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Mr. Brett's Quest.

A NUMBER of priceless diamonds having been most mysteriously stolen from an Albert Gate Mansion, and four of the custodians of the jewels murdered, Mr. Brett, barrister and detective, in conjunction with the police, is called upon to help clear up the mystery.

The diamonds, it appears, were sent over by the Sultan of Turkey in charge of a number of Turkish officials, and, being of political importance, the mission was placed by the British Government in the care of Mr. Jack Talbot, of the Foreign Office. Upon the night of the robbery and murder, Mr. Talbot disappears.

The Earl of Fairholme, being engaged to be married to Talbot's sister, intrusts Brett with the finding of Talbot.

Brett's first clue is the statement of Mr. Winter, a Scotland Yard detective, that Mr. Talbot and a lady have been seen in Paris, Talbot having signed his name in a hotel register. Brett goes to Paris to see if the signature is genuine.

On his way he falls in with Captain Gaultier, a King's messenger, from whom he learns that Hussein ul Mulk, the Sultan of Turkey's nephew, who had fled from Turkey, is in Paris. Gaultier promises Brett an introduction. Meanwhile Brett has discovered that the signature in the hotel register is not in Talbot's handwriting.

Brett now wires to Fairholme to join him in Paris.

He suspects Hussein of having caused the diamonds to be stolen, and with a view to eliciting information regarding Talbot's whereabouts, pays a visit to the Turk.

Hussein admits complicity, and even allows Brett to see the diamonds which his agent had just brought in.

No sooner does Brett see them than he discovers that the stones are imitations, and immediately tells Hussein so. The agent is furious, but Brett proves his assertions by crushing one of the gems under his heel.

The agent, seeing that the game is up, decamps, but his destination is ascertained by Fairholme, whom Brett had stationed outside the door.

Subsequently Brett and Fairholme together visit the Cabaret Noir, to which the agent had retreated.

They discover nothing definite, Brett however suspects that Jean Beaucaire, the proprietor, and his daughter, who is known as La Belle Chasseuse, are implicated in the mystery. He therefore decides to visit the place alone, disguised as a wine sodden and decrepit old man.

This Week's Instalment.

What the Police Did.

MONTMARTRE by day and Montmartre by night are two very different places.

This Parisian playground, perched high upon the eminence that overlooks the Ville Lumière, does not wake to its real life until its repose is disturbed by the lamplighter. Then the Moulin Rouge, festooned with lamps of gorgeous red, flares forth upon an expectant world. The Café de l'Enfers opens its demoniac mouth to swallow ten minutes' audiences and vomit them forth again, amused or bored, as the case may be, by the delusions provided in the interior, whilst other questionable resorts shout forth their attractions and seek to beguile a certain number of sous from the pockets of sightseers.

The whole district is a place of light and shade. It is artificial in every brick and stone, in the very pose of every stall, the lettering of every advertisement. And so it flourishes by gaslight, but by day it is garish and forlorn.

Prominent among the regular houses of entertainment was the Cabaret Noir, which, between the hours of 9 p.m. and 1 a.m., usually drove a roaring trade. Situated as it was, in the very heart of a mountebank district, its patrons embraced all classes of society, from the American tourist with his quick eyes fastened upon the vagaries of demi-mondaines, to the sharp-witted Parisian idler, on the alert for an easy and dishonest means of obtaining money which might present itself.

Among such a crowd a wine-sodden and decrepit old man was not likely to attract particular attention.

He sprawled over the table close to one of the windows which commanded a view of the side passage that led to the rear of the building. Although none of the noisy crowd which occupied the café could suspect the fact, the half-closed eyes of this elderly drunkard noted the form and features of every individual who entered or left by the main door, whilst at the same time he paid the utmost possible attention to the comings and goings of any person who used the passage by the window.

To facilitate his observations in this direction he querulously complained to the waiter that the atmosphere was stuffy, and prevailed upon the man to raise the window a few inches, thus admitting a breath of clear, cold air.

Brett had previously ascertained from his agent that Gros Jean and his daughter were still in the private part of the building. No other visitor had put in an appearance, and so the time passed until the clock in the café marked eleven, without any incident occurring which could be construed as having even a remote bearing upon his quest.

Brett began to feel that his diligence that night would not be rewarded.

At five minutes past eleven, however, a pink-and-white Frenchman, neatly attired, unobtrusive both in manner and deportment, entered the café and seated himself quietly near the door. He ordered some coffee and cognac, and lighted a cigarette.

Digitized by Google

The barrister, of course, took heed of him as of all others, and he would soon have placed him in the general category that merited no special attention, had he not noticed that the new-comer more than once glanced at the clock and then towards the corner bar, whence, it will be remembered, a small door led towards the billiard saloon in which La Belle Chasseuse had displayed her prowess with the pistol.

In such a community the stranger's self-possession and reticence were distinguishable characteristics. So Brett watched him, largely for want of better occupation.

"That is a man of unusual power," was his summing up. "He is elegant, fascinating, unscrupulous. Although apparently out of his natural element in this neighbourhood, he has some purpose in putting in an appearance in such a place as this at a late hour. Perhaps he is one of mademoiselle's lovers, though he looks the sort of person who would be singularly cool in conducting affairs of the heart, and most unlikely to wait many minutes beyond the time fixed for an appointment. His hands are large and sinewy, his wrists square, and, although slight in physique, I should credit him with possessing considerable strength. Being a Frenchman, he should be an expert with the foils. The effeminate aspect given to his face by his remarkable complexion might easily deceive one as to his real character. As a matter of fact, he is the only unusual man I have seen during my two hours' lounge in this corner."

Brett had hardly concluded this casual analysis of the person who had enlisted his close observation, when the private door into the bar opened and Mlle. Beaucaire entered.

Without taking the least heed of any of the numerous occupants of the café she turned her back upon them, and apparently busied herself in checking the contents of the cash register. Beyond this useful instrument was a mirror, and Brett at once perceived that from the point where she stood she could command a distinct reflection of the pink-and-white Frenchman.

The latter was gazing at the clock, and whilst doing so stroked his chin three times with his right hand. Immediately afterwards La Belle Chasseuse three times rang the bell of the register, and then, having apparently concluded her inspection, quitted the bar as unceremoniously as she had entered. Half a minute later the Frenchman finished the remains of his cognac, lit another cigarette, and passed into the street.

It was with difficulty that Brett restrained himself from following him, but he was certain that no one could leave the residential portion of the building without using the passage—a view of which he commanded from his window—and he resolutely resolved to devote himself for that night to shadowing the movements of the ex-circus lady.

His patience and self-denial were soon rewarded. A light, quick step sounded in the passage, and a shrouded female form shot past the open window.

Then the inebriated individual, now hopelessly muddled by drink, staggered towards the door and lurched wildly round the corner, just in time to see mademoiselle cross the Boulevard and daintily make her way between the rows of stalls.

The air seemed, however, to have a surprising effect upon the old gentleman, for the simple reason that to simulate drunkenness and at the same time keep pace with the lady's rapid strides was out of the question.

La Belle Chasseuse was evidently in a hurry, for she sped along at a surprising pace, until she reached a crossing where the rows of stalls and booths were temporarily suspended. At one corner stood a cab, and towards this vehicle she directed her steps. Before Brett quite realised what was happening, the door of the

BOVRIL

REPELS

INFLUENZA.

Digitized by Google

cab opened, Mademoiselle jumped inside, and, as if he had been waiting for her appearance, the driver whipped up his horse and drove off at a furious pace.

At that instant a small victoria with a sturdy pony in the shafts, which had just deposited a lively fare in the vicinity of the Moulin Rouge, drove along the street.

Brett sprang into it and said eagerly to the driver:

"Whip up your horse and keep that cab in sight. I will pay you double fare."

The man tightened his reins and raised his whip in prompt obedience to the order, when suddenly two men jumped into the vehicle from opposite sides, seized Brett and forced him down on to the seat, whilst one of them said in stern tones to the astonished cabby:

"Take us at once to the Central Prefecture of Police."

The man recognised that these new-comers were not to be trifled with. Without a word or a question, he rattled his horse across the stone pavement, and Brett, choking with rage at this interference at a supreme moment, realised that for some extraordinary reason he was a prisoner, and in the hands of a couple of detectives.

By this time the cab that contained the lady had vanished, but the barrister made one despairing effort.

"For Heaven's sake," he said to his captors, "take me where you will, but first follow that cab and ascertain its destination."

"What cab?" said one of his guards sarcastically.

"The cab which I wished our driver to overtake at the moment when you pounced upon me."

"This is a mere trick," broke in the other. "Don't bother about his cab. We have got him safe enough, and let the commissaire deal with him now."

"Listen to me," cried Brett. "You are making a frightful mistake. Your action at this moment may cause irretrievable delay and loss. If you will only do as I tell you ——"

"Shut up," growled the first man, "or it will be the worse for you. Your best plan, my good fellow, is to keep a quiet tongue in your head."

It was not often that Brett lost his temper, but most certainly he did so on this occasion. He was physically a well-developed man, and for an instant the wild notion came into his head that he might perhaps succeed in throwing the two detectives into the roadway and then overpower the driver, taking charge of the vehicle himself and trusting to luck to again catch sight of the vanished lady and her companion, who, he doubted not, had awaited her arrival at the quiet corner, where she joined him.

Unconsciously he must have given some physical premonition of this desperate scheme, for the two policemen tightened their grasp upon him, forced his hands higher up his back, and bent his head forward until he was in danger of having either his neck or his shoulder dislocated.

"Will you keep quiet?" murmured the chief detective. "You cannot escape, and you are only making your affair more disastrous to yourself."

Then Brett realised that further resistance was hopeless. He managed to gurgle out that if they would allow him to assume a more comfortable attitude he would not trouble them any further.

Gingerly and cautiously the two men somewhat relaxed the strain upon him, and he was able to breathe freely once more.

Then he laughed, almost hysterically, but he could not help saying in English:

"The shadow of Scotland Yard falls upon me even here. Poor old Winter, how I will roast him over this adventure!"

"What are you talking about?" demanded one of the men.

"I was only thinking aloud," replied Brett.

"And what were your thoughts?"

"Simply this, that the sooner I meet your remarkably astute commissary the better I shall be pleased."

A Disconcerted Commissary.

THE journey across Paris proceeded without further incident, until they reached the prefecture.

The two detectives hurried their prisoner into a large general office, where he was surveyed with some curiosity by the subordinates lounging about a huge fire, whilst one of their number reported his arrival. After a brief interval he was taken into an inner office. Behind a green baize-covered table was seated a sharp-looking man, whose face was chiefly composed of eyebrows, pince-nez, a hooked nose, and a furious imperial.

This individual turned the shade of the lamp so that the light fell in its full radiance upon the face and figure of the prisoner. He produced a huge volume, and turned over its leaves until he reached the first vacant space, ruled and numbered for the description of all persons brought before him.

"Your name?" he said sharply.

"Reginald Brett," was the reply.

The Frenchman required this to be spelt for him.

"Age?"

"Thirty-seven."

"Nationality?"

"English."

"Profession?"

"Barrister-at-law."

The official consulted a type-written document, which he selected from a mass of papers fastened by an indiarubber band. Then he looked curiously at the prisoner.

"Are you sure this is the man?" he said to the senior detective.

"Quite positive, monsieur."

"Then take off his wig and get a towel, so that he may remove some of his make-up. The rascal should be an actor. I never saw a better disguise in my life."

Brett knew it was hopeless to attempt explanations at this stage, so he readily fell in with their directions, and in a few seconds he stood revealed in something akin to his ordinary appearance.

Now the French Commissary of Police was no fool. He was an adept in reading character, but he was certainly puzzled after a sharp scrutiny of Brett's clear-cut, intelligent features. Nevertheless, he knew that the criminal instinct is often allied with the most deceptive external appearances. So he turned to the detective, and said:

"Tell me, briefly, what happened?"

"In accordance with instructions, monsieur," the man replied, "Philippe and I ascertained the movements of the prisoner at the Grand Hotel. During the afternoon he received messages from London and from some persons in Paris, which documents are now probably upon his person. He quitted the hotel at eight o'clock, disguised as you have seen. He called for a moment at a house in the Rue du Chaussée d'Antin, the number of which we noted, and then made his way to the Café Noir in Montmartre. There we watched him from the door for nearly three hours. He feigned drunkenness, but held communication with no person."

Digitized by Google

"Ha!" cried the commissary. This struck him as an important point, as he made a memorandum of it.

"Soon after eleven o'clock he rose hastily and quitted the café, crossed the boulevard, and hailed a cab. We would have followed him, but there was no other vehicle in sight. As our instructions were to arrest him at any moment he seemed likely to elude us, we seized him. He struggled violently and told us some story about his desire to follow another cab, which he said had disappeared. We saw no cab such as he described, and we treated his words as a mere device to abstract attention. We were right. A moment later he made an attempt to escape, and we were compelled to use considerable force to prevent him from being successful."

The commissary turned his eyes upon the prisoner and was seemingly about to question him when Brett said with a smile:

"Perhaps, monsieur, you will allow me to say a word or two."

"Certainly," said the official, who knew that criminals generally implicated themselves when they commenced explaining matters.

"You are acting, I presume," said the barrister, "in obedience to reports received from the London police with reference to the murder of four Turkish subjects at Albert-gate, and the theft of some valuable diamonds belonging to the Sultan."

This calm summary of the facts seemed to disconcert the Frenchman. It astonished him considerably to find his prisoner thus indicating so clearly the nature of the charge to be brought against him.

"That may be so," he admitted.

"It is so," went on Brett, "and in this matter you are even more hopelessly idiotic than I took you to be. I have told you my name and profession. I am a friend of Mr. Talbot, the English gentleman who has been spirited away in connection with this crime, and I have in my pocket at this moment a letter from the British Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs authorising me to use my best efforts towards elucidating the mystery and tracking the real criminals. Here is the letter," he continued, producing a document and laying it before the amazed official.

"I was on the point of making an important discovery with reference to this case when these too zealous agents of yours seized me and absolutely refused, even whilst I was a prisoner in their hands, to follow up the definite clue I had obtained. It is an easy matter to verify my statements. The authenticitv of this letter will be proved at the British Embassy, whilst a telegram to Scotland Yard will place beyond doubt not only my identity, but my bonâ-fides in acting for Mr. Talbot's relatives and the Foreign Office. Further, an inquiry made at the Grand Hotel will produce unquestionable testimony from the manager, who knows me, and from my friend, Lord Fairholme, who occupies rooms there at this moment."

"Lord Fairholme," stuttered the official. "Why, that is the name given by the other prisoner."

"Do you mean to say you have arrested the Earl of Fairholme?" gasped Brett, struggling with an irresistible desire to laugh.

The Frenchman covered his confusion by growling an unintelligible order, and bent over the letter which Brett had given to him. In half a minute one of the detectives returned, and with him was Fairholme, upon whose honest face indignation and astonishment were struggling for the mastery.

"Oh, surely that cannot be you, Brett!" cried his lordship the moment he entered the room. "Well, of all the silly fools that ever lived, these French Johnnies take the cake. I suppose that they have spoilt the whole business! If the brutes had not taken me by surprise I would have knocked over a dozen of them before they arrested me."

Living Skeletons.

AN ILLUSTRATION FROM LIFE.

WE are all familiar with the living skeleton or professional lean man of the side show, whose leanness is due partly to bad nutrition, and partly to the fact that by means of purgatives he expels the food from his system before it has time to be fully absorbed.

In his case the emaciation is intentional, but there are scores of cases where it is quite the reverse, and brought about entirely by imperfect digestion and general ill-health. In such cases Bile Beans for Biliousness will be found a sure and speedy remedy, as the following plain statement of fact goes to prove. The story comes from Mr. George Blanchard, of Morley Street, Kettering, and was told by him to a "Kettering Guardian" reporter. He said: "For seventeen years I suffered from acute indigestion, which steadily became worse till at last my doctor gave me up as incurable, and I came to be looked upon as dying. I had violent pains in my sides and stomach, which latter was always distended with wind; and though I belched incessantly I found no relief, for the simple reason that the wind kept forming as fast as I could get rid of it. Every morsel of solid food I swallowed seemed to turn to wind, and also brought on severe fits of vomiting, which shook my whole system.

I had to leave off taking solid food altogether, and subsist entirely on liquids. As a consequence I became so weak that I could hardly drag one foot after the other, while my limbs wasted away till they were no thicker than those of an infant! To add to my misery, I suffered also from dizziness and profuse sweats. As I have said, I had medical advice, but derived no benefit and after a time was told by my doctor that he could do nothing more for me, and that I should never again be well. At this I abandoned hope and made up my mind for death. "I was in this pitiable condition when my wife chanced to read of the marvellous cures effected by Bile Beans for Biliousness and we got a box. I began taking them, and soon realised that I had at last found the right thing. The stomach pains ceased gradually as did also the vomiting. The flatulence and dizziness disappeared, and I began to regain strength. All this time I had been taking Bile Beans regularly, and continued to do so, till now I am well and strong again and feel better than I have done for twenty years. I can strongly recommend Bile Beans for Biliousness to anyone suffering as I did from indigestion, dizziness, stomach pains, vomiting, or weakness. Their effect is truly wonderful."

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED.)

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids.

½lb. 1s. 4d., 1lb. 2s. 4d., 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free.

Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, &c., by

MRS. CONYERS,

Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

Digitized by Google

"Silence," shrieked the commissary, upon whose mind was dawning the consciousness that he had committed an outrageous blunder.

"What did you say your name was?" he demanded fiercely.

"I told you my name an hour ago," said his lordship haughtily, "and if you had not been so beastly clever you would have believed me. I am the Earl of Fairholme, a fact that can be readily substantiated by dozens of people here in Paris, and this is Mr. Reginald Brett, a friend of mine, who would have probably discovered the mystery of my friend's disappearance and the whereabouts of those diamonds by this time if you had not so stupidly interfered."

His lordship was hardly coherent with annoyance, but the cute official had now convinced himself that a stupid mistake had been committed by his department.

He became apologetic and suave. He explained that their mysterious proceedings had to some extent committed them in the eyes of the police to secret knowledge of the crime which had so thoroughly aroused the detective departments in both London and Paris.

Evidently Scotland Yard had not advised the French police of Mr Brett's official connection with the hunt for the murderers. The agents of the Paris Bureau had watched Brett's coming and going during the whole day, and the detectives' suspicions, once aroused, were intensified when his friend, Lord Fairholme, sought the aid of two uniformed policemen to break in the door of the Turkish residents in the Rue Barbette.

Even now, politely concluded the commissary, he would regretfully be compelled to detain them for a little while, until he verified their statements. Meanwhile, they would not be subject to any further indignities, and might procure such refreshments as they desired. They would probably be set at liberty within a couple of hours.

At 1.30 a.m. Brett and Fairholme were ushered forth from the doors of the prefecture, and stood in freedom in the street.

"Where now?" said Fairholme.

"To the hotel," replied Brett wearily. "I must have sleep, so I consign the Turks, and the Sultan's diamonds, and everyone concerned with the Albert-gate mystery to perdition for the next eight hours."

Brett Reviews Progress.

NOTWITHSTANDING his weariness, Brett rose early in the morning. His companion slept like a top, and the barrister had to shake the earl soundly by the shoulder before the latter woke into conscious existence and sat up in bed sleepily demanding:

"What's up? Where's the fire?"

"I want you to dress at once," said Brett cheerily, "and join me at breakfast. You must leave for London by the 11.50 train."

"Am I such a nuisance then that I have to be packed off at a moment's notice?" said the earl.

"By no means. Decidedly the contrary in fact. As matters in France evidently require persistent attention on my part for many days, perhaps weeks, I think it is hardly fair to leave Talbot in confinement any longer. Your mission is to restore your prospective brother-in-law to the bosom of his family, and I regret that it is impossible for me to accompany you."

"Are you serious, old chap?" was the startled answer.

"What has happened since one o'clock this morning to make you so confident?"

"Nothing that is not already known to you. Had I succeeded last night in following Mdlle. Beaucaire to her destination, I might have been able to accompany you to London this morning. As it is, Heaven alone knows what sort of dance she may lead me. However, you complete your toilette, my dear fellow. I have ordered breakfast to be served in a quarter of an hour. Then you can eat and listen."

During the first portion of the repast Brett seemed too busily engaged to unburden his mind. It was not until he had lit a cigarette and pushed his chair away from the table, so that he could assume a posture of complete ease, that he commenced:

"You slept so soundly, Fairholme, that you have not had time to review all the circumstances of yesterday's adventures. Otherwise I am sure you would have reached the same conclusions as suggest themselves to me. Curiously enough, although dog-tired when I went to bed, I woke about seven o'clock feeling thoroughly rested both in mind and body. I procured some coffee, took a bath, and went out for a stroll, with the result that I returned and aroused you after reaching finality in some of my conclusions, and deciding upon a definite plan of action for both of us."

"It is really very decent of you, Brett, to constantly assume that I can see as far through a brick wall as you can, especially as you know quite well that, although I am fairly well acquainted with all that happened yesterday the only tangible opinion I can offer is that the Paris police interfered with you at a most inopportune moment."

Brett smiled. "That is because you have not accustomed yourself to analysis," he said. "However, I will summarise my views, and if you can find any flaws in my reasoning I will be glad. The first thing to observe is that the diminutive Frenchman drew upon himself the special vengeance of the Turks when I exposed the attempt to foist upon them a collection of dummy diamonds. Yet he actually had the nerve to return to the Rue Barbette later in the day. He has not been seen since, so the little scoundrel is either dead or a prisoner in Hussein ul Mulk's flat. As I cannot permit myself to participate in a murder or even in illegal imprisonment, I am regretfully compelled this morning to take the police into my confidence and inform them of an obvious fact which escaped their penetration yesterday."

Fairholme whistled.

"I must say," he cried, "I gave a passing thought to the incident myself last evening when your spy reported that the Frenchman remained in No. 11 after the Turks had quitted it."

"Yes," said Brett. "You see all you need to cultivate is the habit of deduction and you will soon become a capital detective."

The Earl laughed. "I hope you will tell that to Edith," he said, "and perhaps you may change her opinion concerning my reasoning capacities. She thinks I am an awfully stupid chap as a rule."

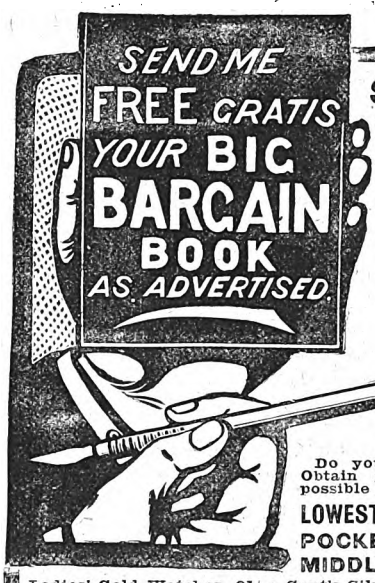
"That is because she is in love with you," said Brett.

"Well, now, that remark puzzles me more than anything else you have said." His lordship darted a quick look at the barrister in the endeavour to learn whether or not he was in a chaffing mood.

Digitized by Google

Curing Catarrh without Operation.

THE editor of the "Journal for the Deaf" and "Review of Diseases of the Ear, Nose and Throat," has been quietly investigating the much-praised method of treating catarrh by burning the inside of the nose with a wire, heated red hot by electricity and by other operative methods. Out of 1,000 cases presented at the Drouet Institute for diagnosis, he found 522 (over one half) had been treated previously and that 38 of these had undergone several operations, the only effect being a depression of the patient's general health, and in some instances an aggravation of the catarrhal ailment. In contrast with this are published in the "Journal" several cases illustrating the cure by the Drouet method, where several operations had failed. Those who wish to read the full details of the cases and the editorial comments on this subject can obtain a free copy of the "Journal" by addressing the editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. With the "Journal" is also sent a Patient's Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice by correspondence and instructions for home treatment. The editor advises patients, however, when possible to visit the Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are, in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.



SEE FOR YOURSELF
THE ENORMOUS SAVINGS that will result from Dealing Direct with
H. SAMUEL
A POSTCARD SENT TO-DAY will bring you his
BIG FREE GUIDE
200 Pages. Over 3,000 Engravings.
Do your shopping at home. Obtain goods of the highest possible quality at LOWEST FACTORY PRICES.
POCKET THE MIDDLE PROFITS!
Ladies' Gold Watches, 21/-; Gent's Silver Watches, 8/6; Real Silver Albertis, 3/9; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Cutlery, Plate, and all Household Requirements.
A SAVING OF HALF YOUR USUAL OUTLAY.
FREE PRIZES TO ALL BUYERS. SELECT YOURS WHEN ORDERING. SEND A POSTCARD AT ONCE.
H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, Market St., MANCHESTER.

GIVEN AWAY
with this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 471.)

PAPER PATTERN of this
Child's Combinations.
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

MACKINTOSH'S
IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

ZOX for Neuralgia at Night.
GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from
THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"Why should a woman seek to depreciate anything she values?"

"Simply because it denotes a secure sense of complete ownership. Miss Talbot would never dream of such a pretence as to your intellectual powers if you were merely a friend."

"Well," said the earl dubiously, "that is a new point of view for me at any rate."

"It is a fact nevertheless. But we have not much time, so we must reserve to another opportunity any further consideration of feminine inconsistency. The fate of the Frenchman must be determined to-day, and to decide the question I must act through the police, so a conversation with our friend the commissary becomes inevitable. And now to return to the hypothetical part of my conclusions. I began by assuming that the individual who planned the Albert-gate outrage and subsequently sought to bamboozle his employers by palming off on them a set of spurious diamonds, is far too acute to attempt to dispose of the real gems for many months yet to come. He obtained sufficient funds from the Turks, in pursuance of what may be termed the legitimate part of his contract, to enable him to live for a considerable period without further excitement. Closely associated with him in the present adventure is La Belle Chasseuse. Neither of them would endeavour to procure safety by flight to a foreign country. They will seek rather to court insignificance by living in a normal and commonplace manner. What more easy, for instance, for Mademoiselle than to return to the life of the circus, whilst her lover—granted that he wished to remain in her company—will obtain some suitable employment in the same circle. There is a suspicion of a joke in the statement, but I am quite serious. The mere consciousness that they have in their possession a vast fortune, which time alone will enable them to realise, will serve as an inducement to undergo the period of hard work which in their case means safety. You remember that the lady's father, Gros Jean, visited the Gare de Lyon yesterday?"

Fairholme nodded.

"I think you will find that he was depositing there the necessary luggage for a contemplated trip into the interior, so that Mademoiselle might slip out late at night quietly and unnoticed and join her lover at some preconcerted rendezvous, a thing which we now know she did. I cannot, of course, be certain whether the Frenchman who signalled to her in the Café Noir was himself the favoured individual. It is possible. By the way, what height is Talbot?"

"About five feet nine."

Brett pondered for a little while.

"Yes," he communed aloud, "I think I am right. That pink-and-white Frenchman is the master mind in this conspiracy. And to think that the unintelligent muscles of a couple of thick-headed French policemen should have crudely interfered with me at such a moment!" He sighed deeply.

"Never mind," he went on, "it cannot be helped. I must keep to the thread of my story. Mademoiselle Beaucaire left the Cabaret shortly after eleven o'clock. We cannot be certain that she went to the Gare de Lyon, but the cab unquestionably set off in that direction. It is a long drive from Montmartre to the Lyons station. We will give her, say, until twelve o'clock to reach there. Now, unless she was journeying to some suburban district—a contingency which upsets the whole of my theory—there was no main line train leaving for the south until 1.5 a.m., and that is a slow train, stopping at nearly every station south of Melun. Let us suppose that they guard against every contingency. She and her companion wish to escape the scrutiny of detectives. It will at once occur to you that they run far more risk of observation if travelling by a fast express than if they elect to journey by the common place trains which only serve the needs of country districts."

"It did not occur to me," said Fairholme candidly. "Still, there is a lot in the idea all the same."

"Very well. To sum up, I imagine that the pair, providing the two travelled together, would break their journey south at some quiet town in the interior early in the morning, and subsequently proceed to their destination by easy stages."

"I am still fogged as to what you mean by their destination?" said Fairholme.

"I mean the circus, the music-hall, the café chantant, or whatever place mademoiselle and her astute adviser may select as a safe haven wherein to avoid police espionage during the many months which must ensue before they dare to make the slightest effort to dispose of the purloined diamonds."

"And how do you propose to follow them up?"

"I cannot tell at present. My movements depend upon the results of the inquiries I shall make to-day in theatrical circles, and particularly at the Gare de Lyon, where I shall not meet with success in any event until the night staff comes on duty."

(A further splendid instalment next week.)

EVERY WOMAN

should have a copy of

ETIQUETTE FOR WOMEN

A Book of Modern Modes and Manners.

By One of the Aristocracy.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 1s.
Post Free 1s. 2d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of
"Etiquette for Women." I inclose 1s. 2d.
"Etiquette for Men." ,, ,, 1s. 2d.

Name .....

Address .....

EVERY MAN

should have a copy of

ETIQUETTE FOR MEN.

By F. V. HOWARD.

This volume gives in a simple style full and accurate directions for the due observance of modern etiquette for men.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 1s.
Post Free 1s. 2d.

Digitized by Google

ACTRESS MADE A STAR

—BY—

HYPNOTISM.

Under the Strange Spell She Carried the Audience by Storm—Famous in a Night.

Doctor John D. Quackenbos, professor in Columbia University, New York, astonished his associates of the Medico-Legal Society the other night by telling them how a young actress bounded into fame in a single night under the hypnotic spell. It is the case of a Trilby in real life; not the trick of a charlatan, but a sober, actual accomplishment of latter-day science. The new Trilby is a favourite with theatre goers. Her first appearance on the stage was made at a New York theatre, when, under the hypnotic spell, she carried the audience by storm; she was called before the curtain again and again—at a bound she was famous. The press of the city united in applauding her splendid work. This is only one of the many marvels of this wonderful power. The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia has recently issued a new book by twenty eminent hypnotic specialists, which is being distributed free throughout the country for the purpose of educating and protecting the public. It is one of the most weird and fascinating works ever written. It is richly illustrated with the finest engravings, and its vivid descriptions of the practical uses and possibilities of this marvellous mind-power fill one with awe and amazement. Among the many intensely interesting subjects treated are: How to hypnotise instantaneously; how to influence a person secretly without his knowledge; how to develop Personal Magnetism and use it in business, society, etc.; power of the human will; how to cure the most obstinate diseases and bad habits by magnetic forces without drugs or medicines; how to make people like you; how to win in business, in society, in love; anyone can develop personal magnetism; rules which will absolutely develop this power within a short time; the transmission of thought; the development of soul power; how to make a business man listen to you when he would send anyone else away; how to sell a man goods when he does not want to buy; a legitimate way to double your salary; how to keep people from influencing you; hundreds secretly influenced and controlled in body and mind without their knowledge; how to implant a suggestion or command in a subject's mind that he will carry out a week, month or a year hence, just as the hypnotist may wish; how to hypnotise by mail or by telephone; how to develop within yourself that inward power, that force of character, which instantly gives you a control over people without saying a word or making a single gesture. For the benefit of the public we wish to state that if you will write the American College of Sciences, Dept. W. L. 9, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A., a copy of the above book will be sent to you by mail absolutely free of charge. The college guarantees this offer to be absolutely genuine, with no conditions attached. It is proposed to give away several thousands of copies of the book so that the public may learn the wonderful secrets of this marvellous but much misunderstood science.

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Wind and Pains in Stomach,

Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, and

Female Ailments.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

CONTAINING 56 AND 168 PILLS RESPECTIVELY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Non-Love Problems.

YOUR questions, "KNOWLEDGE," though I should be most happy to answer them, do not quite come into my province. You would, I should think, find articles published on the subject of string work, such as the making of hammocks, in some boy's paper. I do not think that there is any paper published devoted entirely to swimming and diving, but you will find that the sporting dailies publish everything of interest on that subject; also those magazines which are devoted to athletics.

* * * *

You ask "Should you raise your hat to a girl each time if you see her several times a day?" No, is it not etiquette to do so. Raise your hat the first time, but if you see her several times later, either, if she gives you encouragement, go up and chat with her, content yourself with a smile of recognition, or turn your head in another direction.

The Baby in Society.

"S. D." is a married woman with an only child, now aged two years, and able to walk and talk a little. "S. D." entertains friends a good deal, particularly on Sundays. Should the child be in the room when the friends are there, or would it be better for it not to appear?

* * * *

I think I should do what many married women in good social circles do. Let the baby enter and leave at a given moment. When the conversation has lagged a little, arrange that the baby, which will have to be dressed in its nicest clothes, shall enter. Let it stay for five or ten minutes, or as long as it interests the company, and then retire again. It is rather annoying to guests to have a baby continually in a room, as even the best of them are apt to be embarrassing, especially if you have any young men visitors. I know a young man who was asked to recite at a little gathering, and the whole time of the performance the baby was making caustic criticisms in an unknown tongue, which so upset him that he never visited the house again.

A Secret Love Affair.

"MAUREEN" is sixteen, and has been meeting a youth for a year and a half without her parents' knowledge. They have now heard of it, and have forbidden her to see him. She asks me if it would be very wrong if they wrote to each other occasionally. She has told him that he must not speak to her for a year, at least.

* * * *

Your parents have evidently not forbidden you to write to him, so, until they do so, I suppose you are at liberty in that respect. I should not say there was anything wrong in your communicating with each other, though a great deal depends on the nature of the young man, and his age. If he is your own age, I can scarcely see why your parents should be so strict in the matter, as boy and girl friendships often lead to the happiest marriages in after life. But as you are only sixteen, it is impossible for me to advise you to disobey your parents. They probably understand how to deal with you rightly far better than I do.

A Case for Patience.

"K. K." is very much in love with a girl, and in their correspondence has concluded that she returned his affection. When he proposed, she answered that she did not love him enough for marriage, but only cared for him as a friend. He pressed her very hard, but she said that, while she did not care for any other man, she had not considered the question of marriage. After more pressure on "K. K.'s" part, she gave him permission to renew his offer in a year's time. He asks, "Can a girl grow to love a man whom she does not meet or hear from?" "K. K." says that at one time he thought she cared a great deal for him, but through his own actions he fears he lessened her good opinion of him.

* * * *

I think the girl is quite right. Evidently she has not made up her mind as to the true state of her own feelings towards you. There are very many people who, while conscious of affection towards others, are not sure whether the sentiment is one to be called love. Some people cannot love in a passionate sense, but can only experience the strong affection associated with brothers and sisters, or great friends. Possibly this is the state of the girl's mind towards you. She is too honourable to pretend to feel what she does not, and wishes to let a year pass before giving you a decided answer. During that year, in which you will be parted from her, she will decide in her own mind whether you are or are not essential to her happiness. If the former case, I think you will hear from her long before the year ends. If she is able to wait as long as this without seeing you, I fear you must conclude that she does not return your affection sufficiently for marriage. Accept her wishes provisionally, and keep to their terms. Send her presents, as you say she wishes you to, but leave it to her to make the next declaration.

An Interfering Mother.

"FLO" met last summer a young man who paid her great attention. When they parted, he wrote to her several letters couched in intimate vein. Then they suddenly ceased. For three months she heard not a word from him, until quite unexpectedly she met him. To her amazement he indignantly asked her why she had ignored his letters. She told him that since the early autumn she had not heard a line from him. The only suspicion "FLO" has, is that her mother, who is known to be opposed to the young man, has intercepted the letters and kept them from her. But "FLO" dare not accuse her mother of so doing. What had she better do?

* * * *

It is certainly not a nice thing to suspect one's mother of doing. I do not think even the best motives on her part would justify such conduct. If she objected to the man it would have been her duty to write to him herself and request him not to pay you attention. As you are not sure, I should advise you to confirm the suspicion before acting. Arrange that the man shall write to you on a definite date. If you do not get the letter, you will understand that it has been intercepted. If so, I should then ask your mother if she knows anything about it; and if she does you will have reason to be very much annoyed. However, do not let that estrange you. After all, she has probably done it out of a desire for your own good.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

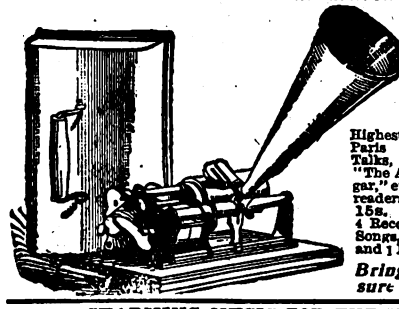
ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

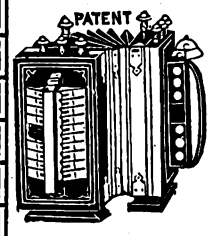
CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount. Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,

MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s 1½d. tins everywhere.

To CURE Drunkards

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 23lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

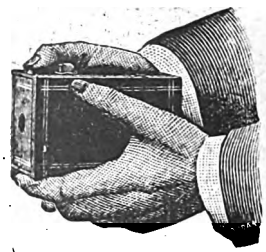
THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A KODAK FOR 5s.

THE NO. 1 BROWNIE.

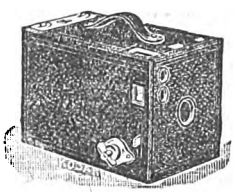


THE No. 1 BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2¼ by 2¼ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 Brownie is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark-room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK.



THE No. 2 BROWNIE.

THE NO. 2 BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2¼ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE. PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK Ltd., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, London, W.C

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 735.] Week ending January 31st, 1903. [Price One Penny.

So engrossed were they in each other, that they did not hear the sound of a match being drawn sharply across a rough surface, nor see the thin tongue of flame that stole upward from Molly's dress.

(A Powerful Incident from our Story, "The Heiress of Studely Chase." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

"Health," the well-known Medical Journal, Edited by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., says of Kaputine:

"There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ this remedy, and popular experience of its use fully warrants the recommendations with which it is offered."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,

of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield,

for 12 stamps.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Watches

A SOUND ... INVESTMENT.

APPROVAL. BEFORE PURCHASE TERMS ....

Lady's Sterling Silver Watch and Albert in Case for ... 30/-

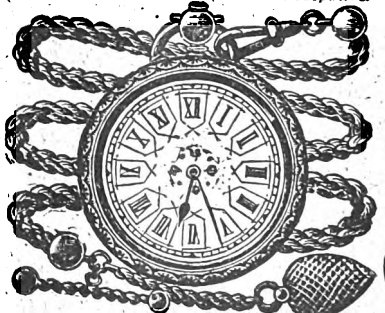
METHOD: Send only 2/- with order, the Watch and Albert will then be forwarded; if satisfied, send 2/- per month until the balance is paid. (Cash Purchasers receive HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT).

The Full Amount of the deposit will be refunded if you are not satisfied.

Description. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement, fitted with all Modern Improvements, and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial, Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted 5 Years.

Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, &c., &c. Post Free.



GOOD AGENTS WANTED.

Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division Street, Sheffield.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 22lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU— NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE Delamere Crescent, London, W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Distinction in Dress

At Moderate Cost

is the enjoyment of all who shop by post during

NOBLE'S Money-Saving SALE.

Free Gift presented with this Costume.

SALE CATALOGUE Sent Post Free.

MODEL 1592.

Fashionable Coat and Skirt in the J. N. Serge or Costume Coating. Price 12/9, carriage 6d. extra.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., 148 Brook Street Mills, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 735. Week Ending Jan. 31st, 1903. One Penny.

The Heiress of Studely Chase.

How a Man Yielded to a Woman's Temptation.

Telling of the Incident shown on the Cover.

"MOLLY!"

No answer.

"Molly!" in a higher key,

Still silence.

"Molly! Molly Craven!"—very sharply.

Molly jumped.

"I beg your pardon, Stella. Did you speak to me?"

"I did. Three times. I was about to offer you a penny for your thoughts, but, judging by your deep abstraction and that dreamy smile, they are evidently priceless."

"On the contrary, dear Stella, I offer them to you gratis. I was thinking of—The Ball"—very gleefully and in large capitals.

"Ah, yes, your first ball. You won't think so much of balls when you have been out a few years. But everything is fresh to you," added Miss Fitzgerald rather enviously.

It was the witching hour of twilight, tea had just been brought in, and dishes of bon-bons and cakes such as girls love, stood ready; Molly's aunt and chaperon slumbered peacefully on a distant sofa, and everything invited confidences. The two girls drew closer together and began to chat.

"Isn't it dear of grandfather to give this ball for my birthday?" exclaimed Molly. "I do think I am a lucky girl to have such a grandfather, though, of course, it's sad to be an orphan."

"I don't know," said Stella, thoughtfully, as she nibbled a bon-bon. "I rather wish I were a well-provided-for orphan."

"Oh, Stella!"

"Well, I haven't anything against the pater and mater exactly, except their madness of a quarter of a century ago when they married and brought up a large family on nothing, but the lot of an orphan in your circumstances rather appeals to me."

"Oh, Stella!" repeated Molly.

"My dear, you don't know what it is to be poor," returned Stella. "I do. We haven't enough to pay our way. In fact, we don't pay our way. And if you saw the ridiculous sum which the pater sportively calls my dress allowance, you'd wonder how I manage to appear decently garbed."

"But you dress so very handsomely," observed Molly, looking at her guest's elaborate tea-gown. "Something simpler might——"

"Sweet simplicity and white muslin are all very well for you," snapped Stella; "but they don't suit me."

All rights reserved.]

The two girls were certainly very different in style, yet both possessed no ordinary amount of beauty. Molly was fair, with sunny locks, a roseleaf complexion, and velvety brown eyes, a dainty little creature all softness and fluffy whiteness, fresh and sweet as a moss rosebud.

Stella was tall, and her figure had the full maturity of womanhood. Her eyes were blue, black-fringed, and of extraordinary brilliancy. Her complexion was equally brilliant, her mouth like a scarlet geranium bud, and her hair of midnight darkness, rippled in rich natural waves over her well-shaped head.

"Yes," she continued, after a pause; "it's terrible for people in our position to be poor, and that is why I am so sorry for your cousin Edgar. He is wretchedly poor for a man in his position, and, I suppose, will never be better off, as you are your grandfather's heiress, and Edgar will only inherit the barren title. It seems hard."

"It may seem so," replied Molly coldly; "but you must remember that Edgar is only a very distant cousin, while I am the only child of my grandfather's only child. But, really, this is not a subject——"

"Talk of angels," interrupted Stella, as a strikingly handsome man entered the room; "here he comes. And Sir Gilbert, too. Ah, and Mr. Le Marchant."

Mrs. Verinder woke at this moment, and tea and conversation became general until the party dispersed to dress for dinner.

Molly was the first down, looking very fair and sweet in her simple white gown, and she went into the conservatory where she had a favourite nook sheltered behind a magnificent palm; there she sank down on the luxurious lounge, to indulge in a delicious day dream. A step roused her, and she looked up, her heart thrilling with joy, but it was not Paul Le Marchant; it was her cousin Edgar.

"All alone, Molly?" he said, coolly taking a seat at her side.

"I like to be alone," replied Molly, not very graciously, but at eighteen it is difficult to conceal one's feelings, and Molly wanted that seat left vacant for another man.

Edgar took no notice of the hint, but went on to ask his cousin to promise him the first dance at her birthday ball on the following night, a request she reluctantly granted. A short silence followed.

"I wish," began Edgar after a pause; "I wish, Molly——" and there he stopped.

Digitized by Google

"Yes?" put in Molly abstractedly, listening to some sound in the distance. Surely that was Paul's step.

"We have always been good friends, Molly," Edgar began again. "I have always enjoyed my visits to the Chase, and looked forward to seeing my dear little cousin. Sir Gilbert has always been kind to me, and I am sure he would be pleased if the earnest wish of my heart were granted, and my little cousin became my wife. Do you think, darling, you could learn to love me?"

"I'm quite sure I couldn't," answered Molly heartlessly. "But I'm very much obliged, and all that, of course."

Edgar looked rather taken aback, but urged his suit in impassioned language which left Molly quite unmoved.

"I am very sorry, indeed I am, if you really feel unhappy," she said, with perfect composure; "but I don't love you, and I could not possibly marry you. And I don't believe you love me either, although you say so. I feel you don't."

"I do love you, but perhaps I am too late; perhaps that fellow Le Marchant——"

"Not another word," cried Molly, very pale, and with a certain childish dignity that sat oddly on her cherub face. "I will not hear you. I don't love you; I don't even like you; and I don't believe you are a good man." And here her dignity broke down in a burst of tears, and she fled. She stumbled headlong into the arms of Paul Le Marchant, coming to find his little hostess in her favourite nook, behind the palm where he had had many a quiet chat with her already.

"My darling, my own Molly," he exclaimed, losing his head in his distress at her affliction. "Don't cry, my sweet, I can't bear it. Only tell me what is wrong. What has happened? Why were you crying?"

"I don't know at all," answered Molly, looking up radiant through her tears, and Edgar Craven went as completely out of her mind as if he had never existed. "I think—because I'm so happy, dear Paul."

For just as she knew that Edgar did not love her, no matter how strongly he protested his passion, Molly knew that, though he had never told her so, Paul Le Marchant loved her. He pressed her to his heart.

"My darling," he whispered; "I have loved you since I first saw you, but you were so young, just entering society, and I felt I ought not to speak until you had seen the world and learnt to know your own heart. But now—shall I ask your grandfather for you, Molly? I will go now, at once."

"And I will go with you," declared Molly valiantly; "grandfather never refuses me anything."

Left alone, Edgar Craven stood stroking his long drooping moustache absently and reflectively.

"Awkward," he murmured; "very awkward. Well, that little scheme's at an end. Little fool! But she wasn't fool enough to believe me. I didn't make love convincingly, I expect. It's uphill work making love to the wrong girl. Ah, if my glorious Stella had been in her place!"

After dinner, Mrs. Verinder and Sir Gilbert sat down to a game at chess, Molly and Paul Le Marchant went boldly to look at a new plant in the conservatory, and Miss Fitzgerald shortly afterwards disappeared. Edgar thought he knew where to find her, and was successful in his search. Stella was pacing up and down the picture-gallery, holding a blue paper in her hand and looking very worried. She smiled as she saw Edgar, and allowed him to join her in her walk.

"It's so cool here," she said, "and I like to walk among all these dead and gone Cravens. They look as if they never had had a care. Oh, to be the heiress of Studely Chase! Oh, to be without care and worry!"

"What is it that worries you so?" he asked.

"Bills; want of money; debts," she said. "I owe—oh, I don't know what I owe. And my dressmaker is pressing me for something on account, at least; and I have nothing. I've been unlucky at cards, too. My only chance is——"

"To marry a rich man," Edgar put in, as she paused. "I love you, Stella, but I am poor."

"I know it," she said quietly, "and I love you, but I can only marry a rich man."

"And Molly, the heiress of Studely Chase, stands between me and riches. I shall never be a rich man."

"If Molly were to die," began Stella softly, "has Sir Gilbert the power to choose another heir?"

"Failing Molly, I am next in succession," he answered shortly, "and Sir Gilbert has no power to leave the estate away from me. And he is seventy-nine."

Their eyes met.

"If we were in a novel," went on Stella, in the same soft voice, "you would manage to get rid of her—somehow."

"It would hardly work in real life," returned Edgar lightly. "I don't care to risk the gallows."

"But there are—accidents!" came the soft whisper.

Edgar stopped suddenly and the two stood looking at each other.

"For instance?" he asked, after a silence.

"Let us suppose we are writing a novel," Stella answered. "We want to get rid of a woman who stands between the happiness of two of the other characters. It would be easy enough in a novel. She might be thrown from her horse, or catch small-pox, or be drowned skating, or——"

"Yes?" breathlessly.

"I read in the papers some time ago," said Stella, with seeming irrelevance, "of a man who lit his pipe on the top of a 'bus and threw the match, still alight, carelessly away. It fell on a lady's bonnet and set fire to it. Had it not been for the presence of mind of a passer-by, who extinguished it, the woman would have been burnt to death."

"Well?" said Edgar, as Stella again paused.

"We might work that incident—into our novel. The girl to be removed might be at a dance in a dress of filmy chiffon, a most inflammable material. She might be sitting talking to a partner—say, on the stairs—and some man, lighting a cigar, might throw the match aside. It might lodge in her dress, quite by accident, of course, and the way to happiness for the other two is clear."

Edgar was deadly pale.

"Stella, it's too fiendish!" was all he said.

She turned away.

"Well, so let it be," she answered. "I have a headache, and am going to my own room."

But he caught her in his arms.

"Stella, Stella, I can't lose you!" he murmured; and she nestled to him.

"Think of all it means," she whispered, in a voice of beguiling sweetness. "Riches, luxury, beautiful Studely Chase, and me. She stands between you and all that. And she will marry Le Marchant, whom you hate, and reign here, mistress of all that might belong to you and me. Think, think, Edgar."

* * * * *

The night of the birthday ball had come. Studely Chase, that grand old mansion, was illuminated brilliantly, masses of flowers hid the walls of the ball-room, and were used profusely in all the rooms. It was a most successful ball, the guests agreed, and the heroine of the occasion, Sir Gilbert's grand-daughter, looked radiantly lovely.

Molly's pale green chiffon robes clung round her lissom form, her pearls, her grandfather's birthday gift, were exactly suited to her innocent childish beauty, her eyes shone like stars, her cheeks were each a lovely rose of happiness and excitement. She looked like some radiant vision from fairyland.

Digitized by Google

Stella Fitzgerald was as beautiful in a wonderful confection of amber silk, but she lacked the fresh, innocent air which was Molly's greatest charm.

The dance went on. Molly had danced the first, according to promise, with her cousin Edgar, and the next with Paul. There had followed a few duty-dances; and then came Paul's turn again.

"Let us sit this out, darling," he urged. "Let us go to our own little nook behind the great palm. The conservatory is pretty full; but I don't believe anyone has found out our seat."

No one had, for the seat was in a secluded corner, not easily found by those who did not know it. But Edgar knew his way to it, and soon followed them.

The young lovers were deep in that happy castle-building for the future, which is so sweet in the first dawn of love. They were too absorbed in each other to notice Edgar's approach.

Had Paul looked up he might have seen the white, set face behind the palm; but his eyes were fixed on Molly's sweet face, and he saw nothing else. He did not even hear the sound of a match drawn sharply across a rough surface, nor see the thin tongue of flame that stole upward from the soft, light material that lay on the ground behind Molly.

Suddenly—and never will Paul forget the sickening horror of that moment—Molly's face of innocent happiness changed to an expression of wild terror, and she sprang to her feet, a mass of flames which seemed to have burst forth as if by some infernal magic.

Maddened by pain and fear, the girl would have rushed past him, but he caught her and threw her down, tearing off his coat to throw over her, and trying to beat out the flames with his bare hands.

There was a great outcry, and the sound of hurrying feet, and women's screams, and the flames seemed mounting higher and higher, and Molly's struggles ceased and she lay very still. Then Paul was conscious that help was rendered and the fire extinguished, and then he staggered to his feet, sick and giddy, and looked down on Molly, lying motionless and unconscious.

"She is dead," he said dully; and then blackness seemed to swallow him up, and he fell forward in a deep swoon.

He had been very badly burnt on arms, shoulders, and hands, but he was not in any danger of losing his life. But Molly—bright, happy, pretty Molly, her grandfather's idol, her fiancé's priceless treasure, the worshipped heiress of Studely Chase—lay at the point of death. The house was hushed to solemn silence, while doctors and trained nurses took possession of it.

Stella Fitzgerald fled before the gloom to her own home; and Edgar Craven went abroad, both to await news of the success or failure of their plot with what patience they possessed, and to stifle what feelings of remorse they might chance to experience.

The doctors gave little hope, for the shock to the system had been very great, but though Molly went down to the very jaws of death, she did not die. Perhaps the great love of old Sir Gilbert and of Paul kept her in this world and would not let her go, for slowly, very slowly, she crept back to life, and one glad day the doctors proclaimed her out of danger.

It was a very slow recovery, for months elapsed before she was able to leave her rooms, and it was a warm, sweet day in June when she for the first time walked out in the park with her lover. A very little tired her, and she looked white and fragile as they returned to the house and sat down on the terrace where tea was to be served.

"Sir Gilbert has promised me that I shall carry you off to some more bracing air as soon as the doctors sanction it, my darling," said Paul, as he carefully placed her on the lounge put ready for her. "You are willing, aren't you?"

But Molly only smiled and blushed in answer. Sir Gilbert was just then coming along the terrace looking very grave, and holding some letters in his hand. After carefully preparing Molly for bad news he read aloud one of the letters, which was to the effect that Edgar Craven was dead, found shot through the head at Monte Carlo.

"You see it is thought to be a case of suicide," said Sir Gilbert, "for he had been losing heavily at the tables, and, in fact, was a ruined man. Curiously enough, the letter found on him which led to his identification was the letter from me, in which I told him you were rapidly recovering. Molly, darling, how ghastly you look! I ought not to have told you this."

"It isn't that!" she gasped. "At least, I'm sorry for poor Edgar, but—I never told you before—indeed, it went quite out of my head in all that dreadful illness, but it has come back to me now; it was Edgar set me on fire."

"What?" shouted both men.

"It was. As the flames shot up and I sprang to my feet, I half-turned round, and I saw Edgar. Even in that awful moment I knew he had done it. Why he did it I don't know at all, but I know he did it, and did it to kill me."

"He was my next heir," observed Sir Gilbert, "but it seems too fiendish to suppose that his motive."

"Yet it is the only conceivable motive," said Paul, as he drew his newly-recovered treasure closer to him, "unless he was mad. It was more like an action of madness than anything else."

But they never knew the part played by Stella Fitzgerald.

"Yes, he must have been mad," continued Paul, "and now that he has gone to his account we must try to forgive him. Let us forget him, my Molly, and think only of our own happiness. Shall you be able to travel in a month, sweetheart? May I have my wife with me by that time? Will you trust yourself to me then?"

And Molly laid her hand in his and answered very sweetly and simply—

"Yes, Paul; then, and always!"

Vera Serkoff.

OUR COMING SERIAL.

In a few weeks we shall start a new serial story of great dramatic power from the pen of Mr. R. Norman Silver, the author of "The Golden Dwarf," "Tales Told Off Duty," "The Brains of the Force," and other stories known to readers of this little paper. The new serial is quite the best thing Mr. Silver has yet turned out. Something more about it next week.

£5 a Week for Life!

This is the

HUGE PRIZE OFFERED BY PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

(For particulars, see page 143.)

Digitized by Google

Footprints of Fire.

THE STORY OF A LOVE THAT CAME OF SWEET CHARITY.

"I'm very sorry, Lyell, but it's impossible!"

"Impossible, man! Why?"

"I had rather not say, or, to put it another way—you, yourself know why as well as, or even better, than I do."

"A mare's nest, my boy! a mare's nest, and you've found it!"

"That's a matter of opinion; I've expressed mine."

"Well, Pierpoint, of course you are aware that you are throwing away a good thing. The boat is new-built; while, as her skipper, all you would have to do would be to quietly cruise in the neighbourhood of a certain part of the coast of Cuba till, well—till something occurs."

"It is just that something which prevents me from accepting your offer. I am willing to tackle most things, if only they are straight and above board; but when it comes to mixing myself up with shady foreign politics with the main idea of making a big profit out of both sides, why, you must excuse me. I'm not having any!"

"Very well, then! I thought to do you a good turn. With a brand-new master's certificate, it would have been a fine chance for you I should have thought, to have got a command at the start. It's your loss, not mine, that you think otherwise. I'd take the Queen Mab out myself if I wasn't tied here by business."

"Didn't know you held a ticket," said the other.

"Ah! you see you don't know everything, my dear Pierpoint. By the way, seen the fair Mabel lately?"

"No."

"Well, I have; and it will be news for you that through the death of that old half French uncle of hers, she has come in for an enormous sugar plantation in Martinique. As her father's heiress she was always prospectively wealthy, but now—there's no knowing what she is worth."

"Miss Stanhope's money is nothing to me," replied Harry Pierpoint hotly.

"Miss Stanhope!" said the other, with a provoking smile that was half a sneer. "Things are changed a bit, aren't they? I should think, too, that money would be particularly attractive to you just now, when you haven't overmuch of it to boast of."

"Look here, Lyell!" blazed out Pierpoint. "You're a big shipowner; I'm just a sailorman, without a ship. You're rich—I'm poor; but that doesn't give you the right to insult me!"

"I never supposed that it did."

"We've known each other since we were youngsters," went on the other, ignoring the interruption, "and I suppose that old acquaintance inclined you to give me the refusal of this precious Cuban job of yours. But there was no need to introduce Mabel Stanhope's name into the talk. Still, as you have mentioned it, and in such manner, I will just say that I consider you to have shown your hand with regard to her; and that I shall do my level best to win her, in spite of her money, and in spite of all you may do to prevent me. Good morning!"

"Conceited idiot!" snarled Cuthbert Lyell, as his visitor closed the door behind him; "he may say and do what he likes. I mean to have the handling of that West Indian property and also of Mr. Stanhope's not inconsiderable accumulations! The girl—well, she isn't a patch on that pretty New England Puritan I met at Scarborough two months ago. The rich young shipowner! If they only knew! Only a step from the Bankruptcy Court, and no salvation except in this Cuban privateering business. Once get that through, however, and possession of Mabel Stanhope's money-bags, then, hey for Rhode Island—Lettice Fairfax—and paradise!"

Ringing the hand-bell on his table sharply, the summons resulted in the entrance of the chief clerk.

"Oh, Carter, is the Queen Mab ready to out-dock on next tide, if necessary?"

"Yes, sir; and everybody's signed on now except the captain. You said you would arrange that."

"Quite right, Carter! quite right! I have arranged it! The skipper is found; and I am taking steps within the hour to see that my instructions are properly carried out. What is our balance at the bank?"

"About three thousand, sir. But that is wanted, you know, to-morrow, for Simpson's acceptances. You said you would transfer from your private account at Elyn Mills sufficient to replace that."

"So I will, Carter—this afternoon. Meanwhile, make out a cheque for two thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds and bring it to me to sign. I have a payment to make before one o'clock.

"I'll do it! Yes, I'll do it!" Cuthbert Lyell muttered to himself as the door closed on his subordinate. "I'll sail the Queen Mab myself! The game is played out here, anyway, and by going I can kill two birds with one stone—make my Cuban profit and be at Martinique when Mabel Stanhope arrives there to take possession of her inheritance!"

* * * * * *

There was much excitement, and indeed, revolutionary agitation in Cuba about this time in connection with the election of a President.

Havana was in a turmoil from end to end; the Creole population and the American whites having very different ideas with regard to a State head. Contraband munitions of war were, therefore, purchased in Britain by the former in preparation for a probable, or at any rate, possible struggle.

Cuthbert Lyell had early intimation of the Creole requirements, and being absolutely destitute of moral principle, and in a hopeless state of financial difficulty, determined to fill his pockets by means at once dishonourable and cowardly.

With rifles and small guns that would burst at the first fire; with cartridges that were guiltless of lead; with swords that would buckle at the first blow, he planned to stow the Queen Mab to the Plimsoll line. He was to receive payment on his bills of lading before transhipment, so that, the last case over the side, he could steam away with impunity.

The risk was great, there was no doubt about that; but the gain was so much the greater in proportion that to such a desperate man as Lyell it outweighed all other considerations.

Digitized by Google

The Queen Mab, a five hundred ton steam yacht, lay in Tilbury Dock, waiting only her skipper and sailing orders.

Lyell knew that Mabel Stanhope contemplated leaving for the West Indies, with her father's sister as companion, in the course of a few days; but it was only when he had definitely decided to sail his ship himself that something occurred to him which, from his point of view, could he only carry it out, would render his schemes with regard to the young heiress, surely and completely successful.

First dispatching a wire to the chief officer of the Queen Mab, he then drove in hot haste to Earl's Court, and asked for Mabel Stanhope.

"Miss Stanhope," he said, "it is in my power, I think, to be of service to you, if you will let me."

"It is very kind of you, Mr. Lyell; but how?"

"You leave almost at once, do you not, for Martinique?"

"Yes, at the end of the week."

"Have you taken your passage?"

"No; but my aunt and I propose doing so to-morrow morning."

"I am glad, because, as I have said, it enables me to be of service to you. For some time past a small steamer has been building for our firm for the West Indian branch of our business. Unable to secure a suitable commander for her, and wishing her to start on her maiden trip before the end of this present week, I have decided to take her out and home myself."

"Are you a sailor, Mr. Lyell? I should never have thought it!"

"Oh, yes; now, if you and Miss Stanhope will so far honour me as to accept a passage in my vessel, I shall be only too delighted, and will land you at St. Pierre as safely and in as good time as would the Royal Mail people."

"Of course it is very good of you, Mr. Lyell, and I should like it very much if I thought we should not inconvenience you in any way."

"How could that be?" he said, drawing a step nearer to her and speaking with an intensity the meaning of which she could not mistake, "seeing that the best that I can offer you would scarce be worthy of your acceptance or even of your consideration!"

Had Mabel Stanhope stopped to think she would probably have declined the proffered service; but, her aunt coming in at that moment, Lyell artfully addressed himself to her.

"Miss Stanhope," he said, with all the suave, respectful gentleness that elderly ladies so much appreciate, "I want to enlist your aid in persuading your niece to agree to a proposal that I have just made her."

The good soul, for the moment, let her thoughts run upon the only one sort of proposal having a supreme interest for her sex. Lyell soon undeceived her, however, his explanation of the position meeting with her unqualified approval.

"My dear," she said to Mabel, "it will be so much more pleasant being on a friend's ship; and as we can have everything ready in twenty-four hours there will be no difficulty."

"I leave the Thames for Harwich to-morrow morning on the ebb tide, and shall expect you to join us there the day after at noon. I shall be at the dock station to meet you."

Although he had succeeded in effecting his object, he could see that Mabel regarded both himself and his proposition with a certain amount of mistrust and hesitation; but he felt pretty sure that the old lady would innocently further his ends, and prevent any backing out, even at the last moment.

"That is all settled, then," he said, as he rose to go. "From Harwich we go to Rotterdam, where I am to take in a few stores, from there making a straight course for Martinique. Good-bye! or rather—au revoir! I will give orders at once to the steward to prepare a state room, and to make things as comfortable as we can for you."

"Aunt!" said Mabel. "I wish we were not going in this vessel. I don't like Mr. Lyell, I can't exactly say why, but I don't like him."

"My dear," said Miss Stanhope, with quiet insistence, "this is mere prejudice. Why shouldn't we accept a passage in a friend's ship. I should like to know? I do not say that Mr. Lyell is my idea of a nice sort of man, but that is no reason why you and I should not avail ourselves of his very opportune invitation."

There was nothing more to be said after that, and Mabel resigned herself to the inevitable.

* * * * *

As Cuthbert Lyell stands waiting on the Harwich platform the arrival of the London train, he more than once takes a letter out of his pocket, and reads it with evident disturbance of mind.

The letter was to the following effect—

"LYELL,—From certain things that I heard at your office, where I called again in the afternoon, I gather that you have yourself gone as skipper of your boat. This, with the fact I have also learnt that Miss Stanhope and her niece are to travel with you to Martinique, is convincing proof to my mind that you have some devilry afoot, which has Mabel Stanhope for its object. Believing this, and knowing you, I hereby warn you that I am on your track, that Simpson's acceptances have this morning been publicly posted against you as forgeries; that you can never show yourself in the city of London again, and that should you seek the coercion of Mabel Stanhope for mercenary purposes, I will follow you step by step till I have linked you hand and foot to justice. HARRY PIERPOINT."

"Confound the fellow! He hangs on like a bull-dog. But there, he can't by any possibility overhaul us before I have completed my little scheme."

At that moment the London train stood in the station.

"Quartermaster!" said Lyell, to a sailor in attendance. "Look after the ladies' baggage, and see that it is taken on board at once."

"Aye, aye, sir!"

"Ah, Miss Stanhope! Steam's up, and we haven't any time to lose. Miss Mabel, I have some news for you. You know Pierpoint—Harry Pierpoint?—well, he's had an awful accident! Fell off a gangway plank at the docks, and was crushed between the quay and the ship's side!"

At first he thought he had gone too far, for she stopped short and caught hold convulsively of her aunt's arm.

She did not speak, but looked at him with white face, and lips that trembled violently.

"Mr. Lyell! Is this really so?" said Miss Stanhope, distressfully. "We were so fond of Harry Pierpoint, surely he is not ——?"

"I fear so," replied the arch-liar. "My information has it that he died directly after being brought up out of the water. I feel it deeply myself, for he and I were schoolfellows, though never meeting much in after life."

Judging it best to get Mabel on board as soon as possible, Lyell whispered to Miss Stanhope that the stewardess would be the best one to look after her niece.

The old lady quite agreed with this, and when the Queen Mab had received her skipper and his guests, she soon moved out into the stream, and in obedience to the order of "Full steam ahead!" was in full run for the Scheldt and Rotterdam.

* * *

For obvious reasons Lyell had not stopped at Madeira, but had pushed on with all speed for Martinique.

It was on the nineteenth day from Rotterdam that the towering top of Mount Pelée appeared on the horizon.

From its summit rose a steady, fairly large column of smoke, while even at that distance there came on the wind a fine, impalpable grey dust, which settled on everything and everybody.

At any other time Lyell would have wondered, and been disturbed at this evidence of volcanic activity, but now his whole mind was bent on other things

Digitized by Google

His first words to the pilot were significant of his fears.

"Has the Royal Mail come in?"

"Yes," said the pilot, "twenty-four hours ago, and left for Jamacia."

Lyell could only hope that his lucky star would shine for him, and that Pierpoint would not have come across the Atlantic to circumvent his plans.

After dinner he suggested that as soon as all the usual port formalities had been observed he should escort the ladies ashore the next morning before six o'clock, and see them safely bestowed in the Convent of Notre-Dame, at the village of Morne Rouge.

The good sisters were glad to be of service to the two Englishwomen, and Lyell promised to call the next day, and see how they fared.

But that call was fated never to be made.

* * * * *

St. Pierre, the chief town of Martinique, was situated on the lower slopes of the mountain, its tree-dotted streets extending right down to the shores of the bay.

In a small hotel down by the waterside, kept by a middle-aged creole couple, Harry Pierpoint, passenger from Southampton on board the Royal Mail steamer, Orinoco, sat watching out of a window a man coming towards the house, from the upper part of the town.

"There he comes! I will meet him and make him tell the truth about Mabel and her aunt."

As he swung out of the doorway into the street Lyell saw him, and saw also that there was no evading the man who, as he had threatened, had followed hard in his very footprints.

It was just about eight o'clock as the two men met face to face, but the words which were ready to spring to Pierpoint's lips were never uttered.

Suddenly the air became dark, a strange rumbling sound coming from the direction of the crater of Mount Pelée.

Faint flashes of flame, too, were visible through the ever-increasing volume of smoke.

"Save yourself!" shrieked Lyell, as the other got within almost touching distance of him. "The mountain has burst, there will not be a creature alive here in an hour!"

Not waiting to hear Pierpoint's reply, the fear-stricken schemer made at a frantic run for where he knew his boat to be waiting for him to take him off to the Queen Mab.

"Quick—quick!" he shouted to the two men at the oars.

Then it was that, turning his head, he saw through the gloom and shower of dust, Pierpoint racing to stop the boat from leaving.

"Stop! Lyell! Stop!" was borne on the wind. But it was too late.

As the exhausted pursuer reached the spot Lyell gave a powerful push with the boat-hook, and the two men laying with a will to their oars, the boat was soon well on its way towards the little steamer.

"The Queen Mab was lying well in-shore, so that the distance to travel being but small, Lyell was on board in less than ten minutes.

His feet had barely touched the deck when, with a belching roar that shook earth and sea for miles around, the mountain burst on the side nearest the bay, and poured forth a death-dealing cloud of smoke, ashes, flames and dust that in a moment dealt ruin to the town, wiping out, at a stroke, forty thousand human souls.

Nearly every ship in the harbour was sunk at her moorings; the Queen Mab, overwhelmed with hundreds of tons of fine dust, being the first to disappear.

The Cubans would not now get their "faked-up" weapons of war, while Cuthbert Lyell would assuredly never receive the reward of his fraudulent scheme.

When the morning broke all that was visible of the yacht Queen Mab were the trucks of her topmasts, and the dead body of its owner washed hither and thither between them on the swell.

* * * * *

The nuns at the convent at Morne Rouge did not, as a rule, admit men within their walls, but, at the earnest intreaty of Mabel Stanhope they consented to receive and nurse back to life, Harry Pierpoint, whom Mabel, in company with two of the sisters, had found crushed, burnt, and half dead, in a niche under the walls of the Cathedral.

How he had escaped instant death was a marvel, but, as he related later on to Mabel, the depth of the recess must have protected him from the terrible shower.

Everyone knows that the side of the island where lies the village of Morne Rouge, escaped the devastating hand, so that the nuns were able to go out in parties and succour where succour was needed.

To Mabel was left the bringing back to life of Harry Pierpoint.

It was weeks before he could realise that the gentle, tender-handed vision by his bedside was indeed the one whom at home he had worshipped at a distance.

As for Mabel, she learnt, while ministering to his wants, the true love which comes sometimes with the pitifulness of sweet charity.

Long before he could sit up he had told her all his heart, and she—she gave him that which she had found—the love of her life.

One day she told him that the great inheritance which she had come to see and to take possession of, had, in a moment of time, as it were, been swept away, burnt up, and buried out of sight for ever.

"Don't be angry with me when I say that I am glad," he said. "I am but a poor man, and you were more than rich enough already before this other matter fell to you. You it is that I want, not your money."

"Really me?" she said, smiling down happily upon him.

"Yes, darling, really you, and only you!"

* * * * *

Harry Pierpoint and his wife, Mabel, never by any chance speak of the ill-fated owner of the Queen Mab. And it is best so.

The nearest reference to the subject that the former ever permitted himself, was when he once likened the marks he had left in the earth of a certain memory to "footprints of fire."

E. Ralph.

WHAT WOULD YOU DO WITH £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE?

10 Gramophones for S.S. Readers.

IT is not everyone who can afford to buy a piano, or even a musical instrument of any sort, and to such persons a Gramophone—which is another name for a talking and singing machine—would be a much-prized gift.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by stating on the back of a post-card—in not more than fifty words—what you would do with the sum of £5 a Week for Life—which, as everyone now knows, is a prize being offered by Pearson's Weekly in a competition.

A Gramophone will be given to each of the ten readers whose method of using the money is considered best.

Post-cards only must be used, and they should be addressed to the LIFE EDITOR, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, February 3rd.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Ancient and Modern;

OR,

THE OLD CHEST AND THE YOUNG LADY.

THE chief occupations of Mr. Raymond Spencer were the pursuit of his hobby for collecting antiquities and receiving and reciprocating the attentions of the young ladies of his rather extensive circle of friends and acquaintances.

He had gathered together many curiosities from various parts of the globe and of different periods, and the mere mention of something ancient was sufficient to deprive him of rest till he had seen it and made an attempt to acquire it. Being possessed of a fair income, he could afford to indulge his hobby to a considerable degree.

Raymond Spencer was one of those men who have the power of attracting the other sex. If he were at a county ball, he obtained the best partners, for he was a good dancer and his manner was irresistible; and if he were at any other society function, he was the ladies' man par excellence. His detractors said they could see nothing in him but conceit; if there was really nothing in him, then it must have been his very conceit that carried him through so triumphantly. Certainly he had a marvellously good opinion of himself, and never doubted his ability to win over the members of the opposite sex.

"I do not intend to marry yet," he remarked on one occasion confidentially to a friend. "Unless," he added, "a really good chance should offer itself!"

From this it will be seen that he anticipated no difficulty in capturing the heart and the hand of any lady upon whom his critical choice might fall.

At length he met Miss Owen-Williams and his choice fell upon her. She was young, pretty, rich (which was not the least attraction) and she had a liking for antiquities. Raymond Spencer sat down one evening and deliberately thought the matter out; he arrived at the decision that she would suit him and that he would take the necessary steps to secure her.

Miss Owen-Williams, however, was not so easy to conquer as he had imagined, and he was vexed at his progress; he hardly knew whether she encouraged his advances or not. At the end of a month he learnt that she was returning to her married sister's mansion on the Welsh coast, and he resolved to follow her. Without properly considering his words, he announced to her that—by a strange coincidence!—he had been making arrangements for a stay of four or five weeks quite near to the spot she had mentioned, so he hoped to meet her at the houses of mutual friends in the neighbourhood.

He found little difficulty in obtaining rooms at a good hotel, and it was just as easy for him to secure invitations to various houses, for (as already mentioned) he had many friends and acquaintances.

He made many excursions on foot in the vicinity in the hope of meeting Miss Owen-Williams alone, and thus getting an additional chance of making progress in her favour. He succeeded two or three times, and after a fortnight, he congratulated himself on making headway. She was more pleasant when he met her in society, and she seemed even more agreeable when they chanced to meet during a walk.

It was during one of those excursions that he made a discovery which divided his attention. He was passing a small, rather out-of-the-way house—cottage would probably be a more fitting description — when, through an open door, he observed a big, strange-looking chest against the back wall of the room. It was an immense piece of furniture for that dwelling; it was quite out of place there; and it was of very ancient design and manufacture. The collecting instinct impelled him to enter the humble dwelling, to the surprise of the old woman and her daughter, who were seated at the farther side, sewing or knitting.

"I am very tired," he explained apologetically, "and I should be thankful for a cup of water and a rest. Would it be troubling you too much?"

The woman nodded hospitably; the girl looked confused. She was comely of form and not far removed from being pretty of feature, and she was conscious of the appreciative gaze of the newcomer.

"Certainly, good sir!" responded the dame, speaking with a slight accent. Turning to the girl, her mother uttered a few words in Welsh.

Raymond Spencer went to the chest and sat down on it without waiting for a formal invitation. The old dame looked a trifle hurt.

"This is a very old chest, madam," remarked Spencer, who was now able to get a better look at it.

"If you sit on that stool," replied the old woman, pointing to a rough piece of furniture, "you will be able to appreciate the beauty of the chest still more!"

Spencer concluded that she did not like him to sit on the chest, and this was not a good sign from his point of view. She would not be so much inclined to part with it. He did as she suggested, drawing the stool close to the chest and examining it carefully. It was of oak, with heavy metal bindings along the edges and at the corners; the metal parts were ornamented with carvings some of which were undoubtedly heraldic designs. It had no lock, but had evidently been originally fastened by some kind of padlock, now lost.

It was a massive thing; it had clearly existed for centuries and was likely to endure for several more. Raymond Spencer's eyes sparkled at the thought of having found this treasure; it was worth a lot of money, but no doubt the old dame could be tempted into parting with it for five pounds. That sum would be a small fortune to her.

So engrossed was he in the examination of the chest that he did not notice that the girl had brought him a glass of milk. He excused himself in his most courtly fashion, and took the glass with a profusion of thanks, whereat the maiden blushed and looked happy.

"This chest must be quite one hundred years old, madam," he said artfully as he sipped the milk, "and it must be in your way. Would you be willing to dispose of it? I daresay I could get £5 for it, which would enable you to buy a nice neat piece of furniture to take its place."

"What!" gasped the dame in her native tongue. "You want me to sell that? And for £5! Why, it has been n our family for centuries—not for one century, but many!" Then she remembered that her guest could not understand and she replied to his offer in English, but in a milder tone, the first flush of indignation having worked itself out. "No! I cannot sell it! It goes with the family, sir. It has been handed down from father to eldest son all the time, but I have no son, so it will go to Maria when she marries! I cannot sell it!"

"Just as a fancy price," said Raymond Spencer with affected unconcern, "I would give ten pounds, but that is a high figure. Ten pounds! That would buy a lot of things!"

He was pretending to examine the chest as he spoke, but he kept a watch on the woman's face from the corner of his eye. She shook her head determinedly, so he decided to say nothing more for the present. After chatting a while with them, and principally with the girl, he left the cottage, after asking permission to call again to look at the chest.

"It requires a little scheming, that's all!" murmured Raymond Spencer as he trudged along towards his hotel. "Antiquities and girls are much alike; make up your mind to have either the one or the other, and you're sure to win. That is, if you possess the necessary qualities that are demanded in such circumstances, as I do!"

It will be noted from this remark that his conceit had not diminished.

Miss Owen-Williams was not so agreeable that evening, but Raymond was not dismayed; he would win in the end. If he could get hold of that chest, it would help him in his love suit, for Miss Owen-Williams was proud of her descent from the princely families of Wales and this fact, coupled with her love of the ancient, would make the chest an attraction. He pictured to himself how nicely it would fill one nook in the house he intended to furnish lavishly—partly with her money—when he was married to her, and he smiled every few minutes with self-satisfaction.

He made his way to the cottage earlier in the day, on the morrow of his first visit, and found Maria alone. That was a piece of good fortune and he made the most of his opportunity.

"You wish to see the chest again?" asked the girl, and she blushed when he answered: "Yes, the chest and you!"

He sat down on the stool and she sat by his side, replying to his questions. They had no papers to prove the authenticity of the age of the chest, Maria told him, but the tradition handed down from generation to generation was to the following effect:

The chest had been the property of Llewelyn ap Gruffudd, the last of the Welsh Princes of Wales, who was killed in a chance encounter with an English knight in 1282. The chest had passed into the possession of a distant relative of Llewelyn, and had changed owners many times since that date, passing through the hands of great Welsh families and finally, about two hundred years ago, into her father's family. The heraldic designs were said to be those of Llewelyn and of other families, but she (Maria) did not know one from another.

Spencer was perfectly satisfied that it was a rare treasure and he intended to possess it; he could not keep away from the cottage, but paid visits whenever he believed that Mrs. Pritchard was out. Maria and he became great friends and he took several tracings and rubbings of the carvings on the wood and metal.

The time he had intended to stay had expired, but he was located at a house in the neighbourhood. Miss Owen-Williams resided there during the greater part of the year, so he could pursue two objects at once time.

They sat side by side on the stool, looking at the chest.

He was passing out of the Pritchard cottage one afternoon when he saw Miss Owen-Williams and a Welsh peasant talking together. They parted as he came in sight, the lady going in the opposite direction and the man walking towards Spencer and the cottage. Raymond was perplexed for a moment, but he returned the man's civil "Good morning" and explained the meeting by telling himself that Miss Owen-Williams doubtless knew the man by reason of his being a tenant on the estate or something of that kind.

He turned and looked back, just in time to see the man enter the Pritchard dwelling, and then an idea struck him. He might be Maria's lover! He, Raymond, had flirted with the silly girl in order to get all possible information out of her, and to win her over to the idea of selling the chest. She might be able to influence her mother in time. Maria herself was not averse to selling it. Now, if that man were her future husband, or likely to be, he must be conciliated.

"I must get on the right side of him, get them married, and then induce both to brave the old lady's anger and sell me the chest! That's the plan. No more flirting with Maria! I must pay a little more attention to the lady over there, for she seemed a bit frigid last night, and I find from Lark and Mark's letter that my finances would be better if supported by her fortune!"

David was the lover's name and he worked at a hotel as a porter. Raymond was very pleasant to him and offered to help him. Maria appeared somewhat embarrassed when Raymond first surprised her in David's company, but he was so genial that her confusion quickly vanished.

Within a fortnight Raymond had completely conquered David, a simple, good-natured fellow, but he made no mention of the chest. David intended to marry as soon as he could get a better situation, and this gave Raymond the opportunity.

"It will be such fun to get Miss Owen-Williams to help me to get David Morgan a better post, and she can do it!" muttered Raymond in high glee. "It will be a regular round, and they will all play my game! She helps him into a situation; he thanks me, because I obtain her help. He lets me have the chest; the chest helps me to win her. Thus, she helps me to win herself! Funny, isn't it?"

Digitized by Google

The ceiling, which he was addressing, did not apparently see the joke, for its stony exterior did not wrinkle. But Raymond was highly pleased.

He spoke to Miss Owen-Williams about David Morgan. Yes, she knew him well, and the rest of his family; she would be happy to assist him, but how did Raymond know him? Raymond had to explain and he told half the story; he really gave himself a lot of trouble to enable David to marry, and the wedding took place very soon afterwards, much to Raymond's delight, for he was getting tired of the waiting.

"Now's my time!" said Spencer to himself, the day after the wedding. "I must approach David while his gratitude is warm. And I must finish my double business in this part of the country, for I've had enough of it."

David and his bride had hired a cottage some three miles away from Mrs. Pritchard, but their home was just as near for Raymond as the dwelling of Mrs. Pritchard. He knew that the coveted chest had been removed there, at his own suggestion. His heart beat high at the prospect of victory. At last!

"Good morning, David!" he saluted. "You seem very happy!"

"Thanks to my good friends, sir!" replied David gratefully.

"Well, David, as you acknowledge that I assisted you to happiness, you will not hesitate to do something that will give me the greatest pleasure."

"Not a moment, sir!" said David sincerely. "What can I do?"

"You have an old chest, given you by Mrs. Pritchard. It is of no use to you, and I should like to place it with my other treasures of that nature. Will you sell it to me for five pounds?" As he spoke he drew from his waistcoat pocket a £5 note and held it towards David.

The latter opened his eyes in wonder, and Raymond could scarcely repress a smile at the quick way in which the simple fellow was jumping at the bait.

"Well, now!" cried David, speaking slowly, "if I had known that you wanted it, I would have let you have it with pleasure, sir, but I never dreamt of it, so——"

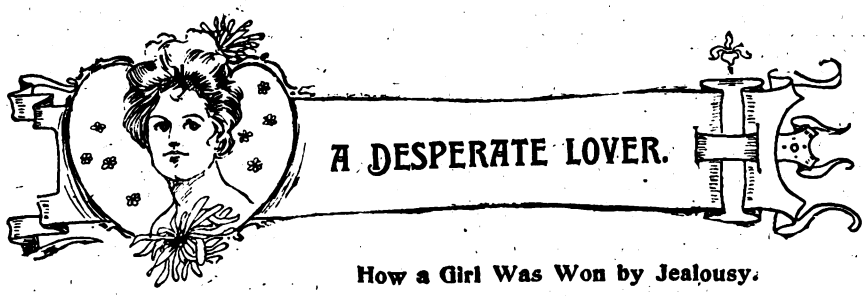
"What?" gasped Raymond, turning cold.

"Miss Owen-Williams gave me £10 for it only this morning! Mrs. Pritchard said she would agree to that, as the lady was descended from another great Welsh family. But," he added quickly, "I would readily have sold it to you, for all that, if I had known, for you have been so good! Miss Owen-Williams said I ought to thank you for your attentions to Maria and for your unselfish goodness—that was exactly what she said, sir, and she laid stress on the unselfish—in getting me that situation. She said that she hoped she would find a husband who was unselfish and not conceited enough to think that a woman could be bought or could be fascinated by his vanity. I don't know why she said that, but she did, and she told us that she was going away from the district for a time, as there was someone hereabouts she did not wish to see and perhaps that person would be gone when she came back!"

David prattled on innocently enough, not comprehending the effect of words.

Mr. Raymond Spencer escaped as soon as he could and left for home on the following morning, a wiser and less conceited man.

H. Bramley.



A DESPERATE LOVER.

How a Girl Was Won by Jealousy.

She entered a large jeweller's shop, and Bob, who had seen her from the opposite side of the street, crossed over and passed in immediately after her.

Stopping at the first counter he asked to see some diamond rings. He could see Gladys further down the shop, but she did not see him until he turned round as she was going out.

He called to her.

This was their first meeting since about two months before, when she had for the seventh time firmly, but gently, refused to marry him.

"Won't you help me select one?" he asked, nodding towards the tray of rings spread out over the showcase.

"Why, Bob," with a light laugh, "are you in earnest?"

"Certainly. You know I'm — er — aw — well, you know."

"Is it an engagement ring? Oh, do tell me about it! Who is she and——"

"Here is her picture," and he produced a photograph from his pocket. "But I don't believe you know her."

"Oh, isn't she pretty!" she cried, enthusiastically.

"Isn't she," agreed Bob.

"What pretty eyes! And what a sweet mouth."

"Of course."

"When is it to be?" she asked, after studying the picture intently for a moment.

"Oh, I'll tell you about it after awhile. Now, which of these rings do you think would be most suitable for the girl who would so honour me as to become my wife?"

She looked them over carefully, and finally holding one up to him said: "Take this one, Bob."

Gladys waited at the door while Bob paid for the ring.

"His wife!" she exclaimed under her breath. She was beginning to awaken now; to realise that he really was about to drop out of her life.

They had been friends for years. In their school days a friendship had sprung up which had lasted.

She had liked him better than any of the other boys. Did she regret to lose him now? She believed she did.

Bob joined her and they started down the street together. He held the ring in his hand, but she did not notice it.

Grasping her hand, he slipped it on her finger before she had time to resist.

"It's yours, Gladys," he said. "And you're mine."

She stopped and looked at him in astonishment.

"What is the matter with you to-day, Bob?"

"Don't you understand? You're to be my wife. Don't you see you're wearing the engagement ring?"

She flushed and stammered a little.

"But, Bob, that other girl? Aren't you going to marry her?"

"Only joking. That's my cousin's photo. I had just received it by post. You see, I was becoming desperate, and did this as a last resort."

"You think you are smart, don't you?"

"Then you refuse me again?"

"I didn't say that."

R. L. Rogers.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

Carr in Vera's Clutches.

It was past midnight when, in response to her low-toned invitation, I entered Vera's room. She had returned from Wilborough about half past eleven; the dear Dean was old-fashioned and kept early hours, and, what was worse, insisted on his guests doing the same.

Vera was in a charming negligée of pale yellow silk, her dark hair curling in soft masses, fell below her waist. She looked very young and very lovely.

"He is charming, this David of yours, dear Peggy," she said softly.

"He has fire and fervour enough for a Russian almost. I find him quite to my taste."

I laughed in frank amusement, and drew a chair close to the fire—we burn fires all the time in our bedrooms except perhaps in the extreme heat of summer.

"And what of the poor young man himself?" I asked. "Is he already fascinated?"

The Princess shrugged her shoulders, and proceeded to light one of her special cigarettes.

"He is, I think, appreciative of my society." She leant back as she spoke, blowing clouds of perfumed smoke into the air.

"And"—I bent forward, resting my hand upon her knee—"how long?" I asked significantly.

The Princess closed her eyes, then with a little yawn and a stretch of her long white arm, she murmured softly:

"I think that David stays a week with the Dean—is that not so, dear Peggy?"

I nodded, and, declining the offer of a Russian cigarette, departed, well pleased with the progress of affairs.

Belinda was a little subdued for the first few days after she had dispatched her note to David. She glanced wistfully at her post each morning at the breakfast-table, hoping against hope that he would write and protest against her decision. Needless to remark he did not write; the Princess took care of that.

She kept him furnished with the latest gossip from Havilands, and as from the first she had spoken of Belinda with admiration and friendliness, he was inclined to give her statements full credence. He had not mentioned his attachment for Belinda to the Princess; neither, so Vera contrived to make him understand, had anybody else, it being a favourite speculation of hers as to whom "her sweet young friend" would eventually marry.

"Dearie," she said one evening to my charge, "you are behaving very badly to poor Farringdon. He worships the ground you tread on. It is the truth"—she shook her head reproachfully at Belinda's shrug—"and his affection is so sincere, so disinterested! Were you penniless to-morrow he would love you just the same. Now Towzer is, of course, another matter altogether. He wouldn't dream of marrying a woman without money. Poor thing, he could not afford to."

"I wish, oh, how I wish I had no money," said Belinda earnestly. "Or, rather—for I have none myself—that my father was quite poor. If only I were free"—she stretched out her arms with an impatient gesture—"free to live, to love, without regard to money, rank, position. It is much happier to be poor. It is splendid to work for one's living. I hate to feel helpless, dependent on other people's wishes, ruled by other people's wills."

"It is the penalty you have to pay for riches, dearie. All the same, there are compensations. Sometimes one meets a rich man worth loving. Look," she pointed to Farringdon, who was watching Belinda with a quiet steadfastness that made him for the moment quite good-looking.

He was a favourable specimen of British manhood; tall, well set-up, straight-limbed, with the figure of an athlete, he had a certain distinction of manner which went far to redeem the plainness of his face, and the somewhat ordinary tenor of his conversation.

Belinda changed colour as she met his eyes. The Princess noted it, and flashed a look of scorn over Belinda's head. Then she murmured:

"To be sincere, to be faithful—ah, what we women would forgive our lovers if they were but faithful and sincere! I have met but one such in my life—a young man, English, with all the faults and all the virtues of his race. I have met men as handsome, many more clever than he, but never one so simple yet so true.

Digitized by Google

"Imagine," she slipped her arm in a caressing fashion round Belinda's shoulders, drawing the girl's fair head level with her own dark locks, "he is in love with me! And—" she paused, "for the first time since how many years, my heart stirs at the thought of him.

"He is very good to look at, this young man. Tall—he overtops both you and me, Belinda—dark-haired, with eyes of a strange shade of purple. His name"—she paused, letting her face rest on Belinda's face, grown suddenly white and fixed. "You are not well, my dear," she asked kindly; "the room is hot perhaps? Shall we stroll into the garden for a while?"

"No, no. I am quite well. His name, what is his name?"

"You are quite interested, I declare. Remember"—she shook her white hand warningly—"remember he can't fall a victim to your blue eyes, he has already shown a preference for mine. What, still curious?" as the girl showed signs of irritation at the delay. "Well, then, I'll tell you. He has a beautiful name. My friend is called David."

"David!"

Belinda repeated the name in a harsh voice, with white lips and trembling limbs. All vestige of self-possession and reliance left her. The art of Society, that art which trains and teaches the repression of feeling, fell away from her. The lessons that she had gained from the world were useless to her. She had received a crushing blow, and for the moment reeled under it.

The next her native courage came to her aid. She forced herself to smile, and murmured, somewhat tremulously, that David was a favourite name of hers.

"I once had a friend of that name too," she said, and gazed appealingly at Vera as though asking in dumb, piteous fashion, the beautiful foreign woman to assure her that this David was not hers—not the David that Belinda so dearly loved.

Vera smiled sweetly, but volunteered no further information, and Belinda, for once, lacked the strength of mind to ask for it. She came to me, poor child, full of her grief.

"Lady Peggy," she said, "does the Princess know David Carr?"

"It is not improbable," I answered.

"Did you"—she paused. "Please tell me," she asked wistfully, "if—if that was your reason for speaking to me as you did? I mean was that why you thought I ought to write and tell him he was free?"

"To be candid, Belinda, that was partly my reason."

"But"—and a tinge of colour flushed her cheeks—"David cannot marry the Princess; she has a husband already. He wouldn't be so wicked as to love a married woman."

I smiled discreetly, my belief in Vera being greater than my confidence in Carr's powers of resistance.

"Besides, he can't think so very much of her, or else he'd follow her to England, just as he came to Cairo when I was there."

"Well?" I said with a half-laugh.

"Lady Peggy, you don't mean he is here? Oh, no, he wouldn't, he couldn't be so cruel as to be here in England and not come to see me."

"My dear Belinda, be a little reasonable. We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that he is in this country—if you like, in this county. What then? He has received an intimation from you that he may, without breach of honour, regard himself as free. He has evidently accepted his freedom. Surely he is not to blame if he uses it, and," I watched her narrowly, "stops away from you."

"I never thought that," she cried, "I never dreamt that he would take it like that. Lady Peggy, please, please find out where David is. I won't do anything you do not wish. I will not write to him, I will not even try to see him. But, but I must know if he's in England."

"I will do my best to find out, dear," I replied, "but I must beg you to try to control yourself a little better. I don't mean now," I laid my hand gently on her shoulder—"who should you confide in but me? But with others who know you less, and do not think of you so kindly, you must show more reserve. Whatever, however, you suffer it must be done in secret; to all appearances you must not have a care."

"I'll do my best," she said, in a quavering sort of voice, "and thank you for speaking so kindly. But I cared for him so much; I have been so true, so constant. It seems more than I can bear that he should not have been faithful."

"My dear child, constancy is only a virtue when it becomes a necessity. There was no necessity for David Carr——"

She stopped me with a gesture.

"I believed in him," she said gravely, "and he seems to have failed me, that is all."

A little chat with Vera convinced me of the fact that it was now time for David to appear upon the scene. The Dean—under the influence of the Princess and in gratitude to Carr for his favourable opinion on the structure of the Cathedral arches—had decided to give a sort of fête at the Deanery.

The grounds were to be lit up with absurd Chinese lanterns, the town band—the Dean would encourage local talent—was to make night hideous with popular airs, and there was to be dancing on the lawn, and supper—kindly thought—in the dining-room!

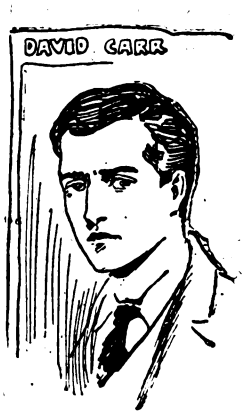
It was agreed at Havilands that we should arrive in time for supper! Vera, however, as the prime instigator of the affair, had to suffer accordingly, and drove over soon after lunch, taking her maid and her evening gown with her.

It was arranged that during the entertainment Belinda should catch sight of David. How and under what circumstances I shall tell you in due course. In order to break the shock to her a little—I did not want a scene—I told Belinda that David had arrived in England some few days ago.

"Thank you," she said quietly. "I daresay he will write, or perhaps come himself. I think I have been very wrong to doubt him. It was foolish to write that letter. I see it now. He must have felt hurt; it looked perhaps as if I no longer cared for him. I shan't worry any more until David shows me plainly that he is tired of waiting. I shall still think of him as being true," she nodded brightly as she finished with a look in her beautiful eyes, that gave me a twinge. Well, she would not keep her faith in David long. That evening would see the end of it.

We arrived at Wilborough just after ten. Dinner at the Manor had been an hour earlier, much to Lord Haviland's annoyance, and we had driven off directly afterwards. Our hostess, who nourished a platonic friendship for the Dean—much to the horror of his sister, a woman who ordered his household—was disposed to enjoy the prospect of the evening's entertainment.

The rest of us were not enthusiastic. Crawley preferred bridge to any fête in the world. Most of the men felt like him, except Lord Farringdon, who undoubtedly preferred Belinda! That young lady had, to all appearances, regained her spirits. She was looking very well, and talked in a friendly and animated fashion to Lord Farringdon all the way to Wilborough.



The Deanery looked very pretty, and the lights were quite effective in the distance. A large number of the local clergy, with their wives and daughters, were among the guests, dancing with great vigour—the daughters, I mean, not the clergy—and some few with grace.

Farringdon whirled Belinda off to take part in a waltz; Crawley, having selected with great discrimination the youngest and most frivolous-looking of the curates' wives, followed suit; the rest of our party wandered in various directions, leaving me in peace to search out Vera.

I found the Princess in the Dean's study, a place admirably adapted for reading—or repose, in which the Dean composed his excellent sleep-producing sermons. I did not enter the study, but gazed discreetly through the windows.

Digitized by Google

The picture therein was a pretty one. The room, heavy with the scent of lilac, was softly lit with rose-shaded lamps, and formed a fitting background to the man and woman sitting there.

David was fastening on Vera's gloves. The Princess was leaning back in a low armchair, David bending over her. It is a tantalising task to give a man to button a woman's gloves. He feels an almost irresistible inclination to kiss the slender fingers, the delicate wrist, the perfect arm, the glove encases. Button by button David fastened, lingering long over the task as though it were a task of love.

He finished with a sigh; then, acting on impulse, as men—the best of them—will act where a woman is concerned, he dropped lightly on one knee, and raising her hand pressed it with fervour to his lips. Her glance met his, they looked earnestly into each other's eyes; a moment only, but in that moment Belinda, like a peri at the gate of Paradise, stood by and saw them.

With a low, startled cry she turned away, hurrying like a hurt woodland creature to hide her pain.

I did not follow her; in such cases girls are best left alone. The less fuss made over them the quicker they recover. I knew quite well she would draw the exact conclusion I wished her to arrive at from the scene she had witnessed. She would believe David had ceased to care for her, and would regard a passing tribute to Vera's beauty as a declaration of love.

I expect my women readers are at this moment in a state of virtuous indignation against David. They consider him weak, foolish, and entirely unworthy of Belinda.

I notice that you middle-class women never make allowances for your men-folk. During this series a good many hard things have been said about Society women; our extravagance and frivolity are the least of the faults imputed to us. Now I am going to say a few words about you.

Since circumstances have compelled me to live amongst the middle class, several significant facts have come under my notice. When you are married, you seem to look upon your husband, not as a man "to love, honour, and obey," or the reverse, but as a sort of household fixture on whom a smart frock or a smiling face would be thrown away.

You treat him as a sort of "poor relation," who has to put up with cold mutton, glum looks, and settle the bills into the bargain. You never consider him. If your mother can't pay her taxes, you force the poor man into doing it for her. If you're worried about the baby's teeth, you compel him to share the anxiety. If you feel ill you give him an exhaustive diagnosis of your symptoms.

You appear before him in horrible, ill-made wrappers, and do not attempt to conceal the fact that your hair has not a "natural" curl. You cry loudly when he refuses a request, unashamed of red eyes and nose. You bore him to distraction, and you grudge him five minutes' conversation with another, perhaps less wearying woman. For the most part your homes are dull, your cooking is terrible, your conversation is vapid, and your taste in dress not good—ask your husbands if what I say isn't true.*

To return to Belinda—who freely shared the prejudices of her class—she remained absent for the rest of the evening, reappearing only at the last moment when we were about to start. She was leaning on Farringdon's arm, talking quite fast, and with a high colour in her cheeks. She came face to face with David and the Princess in the middle of the lawn. David impulsively moved forward, stretching out his hand.

For a moment I felt anxious. If she smiled and behaved in a reasonable manner all might yet be explained between them, and my pains and trouble go for nothing. I need not have been alarmed. Belinda stepped aside, gave a very ceremonious bow, and then passed on in silence. David, his face scarlet, returned to Vera's side.

The next morning Belinda asked me abruptly if I could not leave Havilands that afternoon.

"I can't stay here, Lady Peggy," she said fiercely. "If I do I shall say something, do something," she stamped her foot, "to the Princess. Why doesn't she go home to Russia?" the girl went on indignantly.

"She will be returning shortly," I said smiling, "next week, I think."

"Is David Carr remaining in England, do you know?" she asked.

I shook my head.

"He spoke last night of being back in Petersburg very soon. He travels, I think, about the same time as Vera."

The girl made no reply, but, the colour fading from her cheeks, left her face white as marble.

"When can we leave here, Lady Peggy?" she said wistfully.

I paused.

"What about Lord Farringdon, Belinda?" I said dubiously. "Isn't it rather unkind to him to leave so suddenly."

Belinda seemed uncomfortable.

"I told him we should most likely leave to-day," she murmured. "I said I was tired of the country and that you generally let me have my own way. And he——"

"Well, my dear," said I encouragingly, "and what did Lord Farringdon reply?"

"He said he was leaving Havilands to-morrow, and that he knew the Duchess of Staunton quite well."

"In that case," I answered cheerfully, "we will go."

And that afternoon, to the infinite regret of Towzer and the amusement of the Princess, we departed.

The Duchess of Staunton was an old lady, very wealthy, but horribly mean. The house in Brook Street was noted for its bad table, small fires, and niggardly arrangements generally.

Midge, who flitted in the second day after we arrived, declared that her Grace would starve a cat, and that Belinda was looking perceptibly thinner since she had come to town.

I suffered more than Belinda from the economy of the establishment. Indeed I had to go out most days to lunch or I would have starved. But I bore with the inconvenience cheerfully. Farringdon was daily with Belinda, who seemed to like and look forward to his calls.

One evening the Duchess gave a party. Belinda, radiant in white and pearls, danced many times with Farringdon, and sat out the numbers that she did not waltz. Things were looking very hopeful, so much so that I forgot to feel annoyed at the unexpected appearance of Eastacres, who, his mother having somewhat recovered, was about town as usual.

He bowed to me, and glanced round eagerly, seeking for Belinda. Just as she entered the room from the conservatory, leaning on Farringdon's arm, there was a slight stir about the door. A moment later and Princess Zouloff, magnificent in maize-coloured velvet, with diamonds round her throat and in her hair, swept into the room.

Belinda showed signs of discomfiture—I had kept it from her knowledge that Vera was invited—and clung in an appealing fashion to Farringdon. I was sorry for her, and a little vexed with Vera, when I realised that David was accompanying her. It was, I thought, a foolish thing to run the risk of his seeing and speaking to Belinda.

All thought of that, however, faded from my mind. With a low bow Eastacres advanced to the Princess, and in a quiet voice—audible only to those near at hand, Belinda and myself among the number, made the following announcement:

"I am grieved to be the bearer of evil tidings," he said. "But I am charged to tell you, and without delay, that news has been received within this hour of the death of your husband—Prince Zouloff."

For a moment Vera stood motionless, her face white, her eyes unnaturally bright. Then with a little cry she turned—turned to David.

"Free!" she cried, "I am free!"

Then, staggering, she fell—into his arms.

(Another powerful instalment will appear next Tuesday.)

[* I print these remarks exactly as they were written by Lady Peggy Carstairs, although I do not necessarily share her views on the subject.—ED. S.S.]

Digitized by Google

A Speculation in "Kaffirs."

A Romance of the Stock Exchange.

"DIGBY! how about that bill of Causton's; due to-day, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, if it isn't met, you know what to do?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then see that you do it! I have my doubts about Causton's."

"Doubts, sir! why, they're as sound as——"

"Don't think so! and what's more, Digby, I have a shrewd suspicion that your faith in Causton and Co. isn't altogether disinterested."

"Mr. Hunter—I——"

"Oh, I'm not quite blind, Digby—I know that you are friendly with Saville Causton—that he has a fair daughter—that you visit his house at Bayswater—three and three easily make six, my friend!"

Hugh Digby, managing clerk to Hunter and Crane, Colonial bankers and agents, hardly knew how to parry his chief's insinuation. There was a certain amount of truth about it, which really made explanation all the more difficult and embarrassing. Hunter was not by any means a man easy to get on with. Middle-aged, crabbed, and of a sourly suspicious disposition, he looked upon nearly everybody with whom he came in contact as having sinister designs as towards himself. This was especially the case with regard to his manager, Digby, but he knew the latter's value, commercially, and availed himself of it for all it was worth. Hugh Digby was, in addition to being a smart business man, a kindhearted, generous fellow of about thirty, and liked by everybody.

It was this universal popularity which probably was at the root of Hunter's personal dislike of his chief subordinate; but the banker (he was sole partner, Crane having been dead for many years) found that his firm's prosperity was largely due to Hugh Digby's splendid management, and successful enterprise, and, therefore, for purely selfish reasons, disguised his real feelings. But his jealous animosity towards his manager was nothing compared with his absolute hatred of Saville Causton, stockbroker, and a leading light on "'Change." It originated in this way.

Some twenty years or so before the date of this story, the two men met, at an up-river garden-party. One of the guests was a Miss Esther Walrond, whose beauty and personal charm attracted the attention of more than one of the many gentlemen present. Both Hunter and Causton were no exceptions to this general feeling of male admiration for the lovely Esther, while each seemed to read instinctively the other's state of mind on the subject and to jealously resent it.

From the very first, however, Saville Causton, brighter, more lovable, and decidedly better-looking than his rival, made the running in the race for love. Before the people dispersed for return to town—almost, indeed, before the sun set upon the Cliveden woods—the young stockbroker had created such an impression that the inevitable end was only a question of time. To make matters worse, from Hunter's point of view, Causton received from his host and hostess a cordial invitation to stay the night and spend the next day on the river. With an assured conviction now that his chances were practically nil, Hunter reached his bachelor flat in Jermyn Street that night, full of unreasonable wrath against the man who had apparently succeeded in getting ahead of him in the business upon which he had set his heart—or that which with him, passed for such.

Within six months, Causton had married Esther Walrond, while David Hunter had vowed bitter revenge against the happy bridegroom. The latter who had succeeded to his father's business and position on "'Change," had never a thought beyond his own immediate interests, and affections, and was consequently quite oblivious to the slow but sure influence for evil being worked to his commercial disadvantage by the Austin Friars' banker. There came a day, however, when a necessity for the temporary borrowing of £5,000, resulted in failure. All the sources for such accommodation suddenly appeared to have mysteriously closed up; a polite refusal to do business, but without any assigned reason, being, in every case, the only reply to his applications for monetary assistance.

This was David Hunter's opportunity, the one for which he had been scheming and plotting for years—and he took it.

One morning Saville Causton received a note that astonished him not a little. It ran:

The Colonial Bank, Austin Friars.

DEAR SIR,—I have strong reasons for believing that you are seeking temporary accommodation. I shall be pleased to do business with you to any amount that you may need, for one, three or six months, as may best suit you. I would rather not state exactly why I make this offer on behalf of my firm. You and I met many years ago, and you have doubtless forgotten the fact; but, being the possessor of an exceptionally good memory—at least so they say who know me—I venture to recall a passing acquaintance, in the hope that by so doing I may be of service to you. I shall be happy to honour your bill at any moment.—Faithfully yours,

To Saville Causton, Esq. DAVID HUNTER.

The letter did not reach Causton's office in Draper's Gardens till just before closing time, so the somewhat bewildered stockbroker took it home with him for consideration.

Consultation with his wife cleared the air a bit, however.

"Oh, I remember him now!" said Esther, at breakfast the next morning, and opposite whom sat a nineteen-year-old replica of herself. "Surely, Saville, you recollect that disagreeable-looking man who made himself attentive to me at the Fabers' garden party, nearly twenty years ago?"

"No, I don't remember the fellow! However, remembrance or not, his offer, odd as it is, seems genuine, and—well—I must accept it, or I'll never get out of this hole I'm in."

"Why, it's the same bank where Hugh—I mean Mr. Digby, is manager," suddenly exclaimed Vera Causton, a tell-tale colour in her cheeks.

"Great Cæsar! so it is!" cried her father. "The murder's out! I'll see him about it first, before writing a reply to Hunter."

But to the stockbroker's surprise, Hugh Digby was as much in the dark as to why or how David Hunter had made the offer, as Causton himself.

"I can only suppose," he said, "that he by some means has heard of your need for accommodation, and, for some reason of his own, wishes to be of service to you. Still, I am a bit surprised, knowing him as I do—though, of course, under the circumstances, I am glad for your sake."

This settled the matter. Later on Hunter gave Saville Causton his cheque for £5,000, taking as security the stockbroker's bill at three months. For the rest of his life will Saville Causton remember that disastrous three months, and the day that saw it close; the day upon which the bill became due.

On the morning of that day, David Hunter was called away to Vienna, and would be absent a week or more.

It has been seen what were his final instructions to his managing clerk prior to leaving by the mid-day mail, his concluding words being especially significant.

"Should you," he said, emphatically, "not carry out my instructions to the very letter, I shall hold you personally responsible."

Digitized by Google

For nearly two years now there had been a tacit engagement between Vera Causton and Hugh Digby. A fine, high-spirited, beautiful girl, she was yet as large-hearted and womanly as her father had found her mother to be.

When, the clock showing half-past eleven, there were no signs of Causton, with the wherewithal to take up the bill, somehow, though very naturally, Digby's thoughts settled upon Vera. This cornering, which, perhaps, might mean the "hammering" of Saville Causton troubled him as much if not more on his sweetheart's account, than on any other.

As if to materialise his thoughts, a clerk brought him a card bearing Vera Causton's name.

"Show the lady in, Smiles! or, stay! I'll come into the outer office."

"Oh, Hugh!" exclaimed Vera excitedly. "We are in such troub——!"

"Sh!" was Hugh's whispered caution. "Say nothing here, dear! I'll come out with you for a few minutes. Smiles, I shall be in again directly. Ask Mr. Causton to sit down if he should call!"

Up and down the ancient precincts of Austin Friars, Vera and Hugh walked, the former pouring into her lover's ear all her fears for her father.

"Not home last night? That looks serious, Vera!"

"It does—it is!—oh, Hugh, can't you think of something for me to do?"

"If I were a free man, dear," he answered her, "I mean if the conditions upon which I hold my position at the bank did not make it important for me to act, or to even appear in any such transaction, I do know of a way in which I could set things straight for your father."

"Oh, Hugh!—tell me—tell me!—Perhaps it is, after all, something which I could do!"

"I am afraid not, Vera. If only your father were here it would be all right—he could act upon the information I possess, and make a fortune in less than two hours."

"Hugh!—I will not leave you till you have told me!" said the girl with determined voice and manner.

Then he told her.

"I have a friend," he said, "who is in touch with certain things which influence the well-being or otherwise of a popular "stock" on "'Change.'"

"Yes, yes!" she interrupted him impatiently. "I understand, Hugh! I understand!"

"Well, dear, this morning I received information from Spencer, which, if acted upon by someone not hampered as I am by hard and fast conditions, and at once, would result in the making of thousands."

"Yes, yes—go on!"

"An idea occurs to me! You are not altogether ignorant, dear, of stock-dealing, are you?"

"Well, I have heard father talk about and explain time-bargains, Contango, and——"

"Stop, darling, that's it—Contango—the buying of a stock which you hope to sell any time before the next settling day."

"Yes, Hugh—well?"

"Briefly, dear, then, I have a little saved, as you know. It is on current account in the "Colonial." I am going to withdraw it now. I will then write you a letter to a broker whom I know and can trust, and you will hand that and the money I shall give you (the latter as 'cover') and instruct him to buy for you 'Kaffirs' to the amount of ten thousand pounds."

"Ten thousand pounds, Hugh!—why, supposing it turns out wrong, what will become of me?"

"Oh, that will be all right, dear! 'Kaffirs' have fallen—you buy—in less than two hours—if my information is correct, which I quite believe it to be—'Kaffirs' will go up to a giddy height; you will immediately sell; take up Mr. Causton's bill; while the extra profit on the transaction will come in very handy as a fillip-up for your father's business."

As he planned, so did he and Vera carry out the idea.

Within a quarter of an hour Vera was in the broker's room, in consultation over the matter.

Now the broker in question, in common with everybody in the City, save only Hugh Digby and his friend Spencer, was absolutely ignorant of anything having happened which would be likely to influence the fall or rise of "Kaffir" stock. When, therefore, Vera requested the gentleman to purchase for her ten thousand pounds' worth of the stock, he thought her, in spite of Hugh Digby's letter of introduction, a trifle mad.

"But my dear young lady! do you know that this stock has fallen more than one per cent. since ten o'clock this morning."

"I am aware of it!" said Vera calmly; "but nevertheless I wish you to carry out my instructions."

"Well, Miss Causton (I may say that I have known your father for many years), as a matter of sentiment, I warn you; but as a matter of business—I will act on your instructions."

The "rise" prophesied by Hugh Digby's friend came sooner than ever he expected.

At a quarter past one the stock had gone up so considerably that Vera's hopes were doubly realised, so that before two o'clock the bill was taken up and was safe in Vera's pocket.

"Now to find my father!" said Vera to Hugh, as they were snatching a hasty lunch at the Albion in Aldersgate Street.

"But there is not the slightest clue to his whereabouts," was Hugh's reply.

"Well, I believe I shall find him, and that before long," said Vera. "Anyway, see me, dear, to the Tube, Bank Station, and I will think it out during the journey to Queen's Road."

Now Saville Causton was an inveterate pipe-smoker, and invariably sought a smoking carriage when travelling by rail.

Vera's car was empty, comparatively, from the Bank onwards.

At British Museum Station she noticed a man with his overcoat collar up, board the train and enter the smoking car which happened to be next to the one in which she was riding.

Vera was nothing if not prompt and self-reliant. If the mere studying of appearances meant the defeat of purpose, she was unconventional enough to throw everything not strictly necessary overboard, and aim for the essential only.

So in this instance.

In the man who entered at British Museum, she unmistakably recognised her father, and when the train stopped at Oxford Circus, she unhesitatingly crossed the platform into the smoking car, and, coming behind Saville Causton, who sat upon a cross bench, touched him lightly upon the shoulder.

It is needless to say more than that, all explanations made by Vera, the father and daughter rejoiced together; the former, a bit ashamed, perhaps of his cowardice, loudly extolling Hugh Digby's shrewdness and timely help.

David Hunter's disappointment on his return, at finding the bill redeemed was intense. And yet there was nothing to find fault with. Hugh Digby had acted throughout with loyalty to his firm as well (though Hunter only suspected this) as with consideration for Saville Causton. It proved to be the beginning of a better state of things, for from that day forward the business of Causton and Co. prospered as in the days of old.

All this was as gall and wormwood to David Hunter; but he was powerless to stem the tide of Causton's progress towards re-success, and never again attempted to strike at his old rival behind his back. Four months after the "Kaffir" episode, invitations were issued by Mrs. Causton to her daughter's wedding.

"Who do you think I am going to send one to?" asked Esther of her husband.

"Can't say!—the Lord Mayor, perhaps?"

"Nonsense, Saville! What do you say if I have asked Mr. David Hunter?"

"Say!—why, that in the first place, he won't come—and next, that if he does show up, all the wine and milk will most certainly turn sour."

"Now, do be reasonable, Saville! Don't you think that I owe the poor man something for disappointing him, and marrying you?"

"I don't know, I'm sure—what do you say, Vera?"

"Why, that if Mr. Hunter likes to see mamma's daughter married, he ought to be given the opportunity."

"Ah, you'll see!—he won't come!"

And he didn't.

Roger Easton.

Digitized by Google

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

In Addition to £1,000 in Cash.

THE MOST LIBERAL OFFER EVER MADE BY ANY PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

THIS prize is so huge that it is almost impossible for one to realise at first thought what it really means. Therefore the following hints will probably enable you to grasp the full value of such a regular income:

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE means, unless you are extravagant, absolute freedom from money troubles as long as you live.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is an insurance against depression and mental worry.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will enable you to dispense charity with a liberal hand.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy you a bigger house and enable you to live in better style.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will cover the cost of taking a cottage in the country and living there in comfort for the rest of your days.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will pay the expenses of months of foreign travel.
£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy anything you can possibly want, from a piano to a motor car.

In fact, there is no limit to the things you can do with £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE.

THE prize will be paid to the person (perhaps you) who correctly solves the pictures which appear below, together with other pictures which will appear in PEARSON'S WEEKLY under the conditions printed in that paper.

Each picture consists of certain objects, the names of which represent the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom. For example, the hull of a ship would mean "Hull." Every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:—

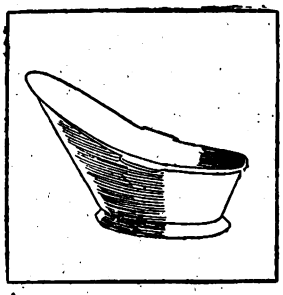
FIRST CONSOLATION GIFT, £100.

2nd Cash Gift	£50	6th Cash Gift	£25
3rd ,,	£50	7th ,,	£25
4th ,,	£25	8th to 57th Cash Gifts	£10 each
5th ,,	£25	58th to 97th ,,	£5 each

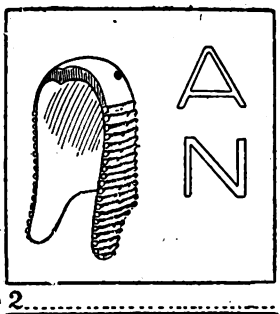
So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a week for life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash gifts.

If you find out the names of the railway stations represented by the pictures shown here, you should write down the name under each, put your name and address at the foot, and then get a copy of next week's PEARSON'S WEEKLY, in which you will find further pictures.

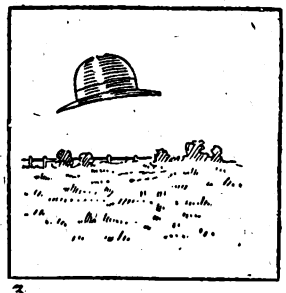
☛ If you are unable to secure a copy of PEARSON'S WEEKLY or BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, drop a reply post-card to the Publisher, PEARSON'S WEEKLY, Henrietta St., London, W.C., and he will get you out of your difficulty. ☚



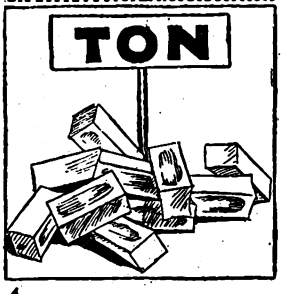
1.



2.



3.



4.

5.

6.

Write your Name and Address here .....

Digitized by Google

A Temptation and a Fall.

With a Very Happy Sequel.

A DARK-HAIRED girl in a white jersey with a red ribbon round her neck, sat at the window of a small cottage situated in the village of Tweeford. The street on which the cottage faced was narrow and dark, and the room in which the girl sat was clean, but poorly furnished.

She was very sweet and pretty, and looked as much out of place in her dingy, mean surroundings, as a moss rose in a London garden. Her brown eyes were clouded, and she spoke in a weary tone to a patient-looking old lady, who sat in an armchair by the fire—for there was a small fire, although it was a warm afternoon in September.

"It's no use, mother," said Effie, with a sigh. "We have not got the money, and we are not likely to get it either."

"I wonder, my dear, if you were to go to Radling with a letter to old Mr. Jones, whether he would give me the money."

"I don't believe so, and I don't want to go to Radling, and I hate old Jones!" cried the girl petulantly. "I'll go on the river instead; Mr. Baines will lend me a boat."

She rose and began looking behind the coal-scuttle for her hat. It was the place she usually threw it when she came in. Mrs. Jessop sighed heavily. The sum wanted was only £20, but to these two lone women it was as unobtainable as two millions.

It was owed for rent long overdue, and Effie had been to the landlord with tears in her pretty brown eyes, and begged for time, but now tears were unavailing, and the money had to be found within fourteen days.

"Dear Mr. Baines, let me go for a row," she said some few minutes later, sidling up to the boat owner.

He had a great weakness for pretty Miss Jessop, and his wife declared he would give her his pony and traps and all his business if she but asked for it.

"Let me have the Elsie—may I?" she continued, indicating a lovely little boat fresh from the painter's hands.

"Not that one, missy," replied Mr. Baines. "She 'ave just come from Lunnon this day morning, she 'ave—you take 'er, missy—she's good, she is," and he helped her into another boat of less charming exterior.

If she looked pretty on shore, the girl in the white jersey looked ten times more so on the water. But it was not of her appearance she was thinking. The fact of their wanting £20, and there being only one shilling and sixpence for the next day's dinner, occupied her mind much more, and the sun was declining when she turned the boat homeward, still undecided as to whether it should be stewed steak or "a little fish to make up."

Suddenly coming towards her round the bend of the river she saw another boat with a single occupant—and that occupant a man. As it came closer she recognised the boat as the Elsie, with her freshly-varnished sides bravely glittering in the sunlight.

"Pah!" said Effie in disgust. "Some horrid tourist down for a couple of hours, who can afford ninepence an hour."

But when he came closer she altered her opinion. The man in the boat was Jeffery Standing, whose father, the rich diamond merchant, had taken the Grange for the season.

As the boats passed, Mr. Standing bestowed a stare of hearty admiration on the girl in the white jersey, and she looked down and blushed, and hated herself for so doing.

Some hours later he passed her again. It was in the narrow village street, while she was out thoughtfully expending her one and sixpence. She had dropped her handkerchief, and he ran after her and gave it back, and raised his hat and asked if he might help her carry her parcels home as they lived almost next door, but she curtly thanked him and hurried home, uncertain as to whether he had not first taken her handkerchief from her pocket and then given it to her!

The next day Mrs. Jessop was firm. Effie must go to Radling with a letter to Mr. Jones. She put it off as late as she could, and finally departed, very much out of temper.

"It is a shame," she grumbled, "wasting a beautiful day like this hunting about for a horrid old man, and I know that I am no more likely to get the money from him than I am of seeing it opposite to me in this carriage."

Just at that moment she caught sight of a glitter between the opposite seat and the stuffed back of the carriage. She was alone in the compartment, so, bending forward, she put her hand out to feel what it was.

The next moment she had drawn out a heavy green morocco purse.

For quite a minute she stared in stupefaction at the sight, and then with a beating heart she undid the clasp.

There lay before her twenty-five pounds in gold and a lot of loose silver. If the skies had fallen, Effie would not have been more astonished. She rubbed her eyes and stared at the money, and then rubbed her eyes again. For fully three minutes she sat thus holding the money in her hands, and then came the question—"What to do with it?"

Should she give it to the guard when the train stopped and have it taken to the lost property office, and perhaps never be claimed? Or, perchance, had Heaven sent it to pay the rent; therefore, should she keep it? Nobody being present to answer her self-put questions, she arrived in Radling station, and straightway she put the money in her pocket and walked quickly away, resolved at present to keep it and see what happened. Mr. Jones was out, and was not expected back, so, heavy-hearted, and with a guilty sensation of theft upon her, Effie journeyed home, expecting every moment someone to put his hand on her shoulder and ask where she got the money from. She knew she ought to give the purse up, but she was very poor, and she yielded to temptation as so many have done. The next few days were those of the keenest agony to the poor girl. Every step that passed the house she expected to belong to the constable, and every knock at the door sounded like a summons from Radling Police Court.

She stayed indoors as much as she could, for she was afraid to meet the eyes of the townspeople, and was also afraid of hearing something about the purse, for commonsense told her nobody would be likely to lose a large sum like that and make no inquiries.

Digitized by Google

At last, a week later, came a curt and cold refusal from Mr. Jones, together with a peremptory notice from the landlord to pay the rent the next day. Mrs. Jessop alternately wept and prayed for the money, and at last Effie set her little teeth, and said to herself, "Very well, I will take the money, I am a thief, I suppose, but I shall not be alone in the world. I'll take him the money to-night, and then—and then! What?"

Her thoughts took her no further; how she was to account for the sudden accession to wealth she could not fathom, so, woman-like, she left it alone, hoping for luck to help her out when the time should come.

Having decided upon her course of action, she felt easier, and sallied forth to buy some small household requisites, humming to herself.

Having made a tour of the village and made her purchases, she went home again.

The little house was silent. Poor Mrs. Jessop had gone out, to see if a friend would help her to find the money. Effie put away her parcels and sat down, and having nothing better to do, idly read the stale country news out of the paper that the candles had been wrapped in.

All at once a small paragraph caught her eyes, and the print danced madly before her! She held on to the table for support, and after a moment managed to read the following:

Yesterday, Mrs. Mary Gibson, charged a young man of gentlemanly appearance with the theft of her purse. Her case was, that she and the accused were the sole occupants of the carriage from H—— to Radling. The purse, which contained the sum of £25 in gold besides some silver, was in her hand as she entered the carriage, because she took her ticket from it. On arrival of the train at Radling she found the door too stiff to open, and asked the accused if he would open it. This he did, and also helped her to alight, and it was then that she found her purse was gone. The accused is a gentleman of high social standing in the county, and the case is exciting a good deal of interest, as, although he stoutly denies the theft, it is understood he has been losing a good deal lately over horse racing. He stands remanded until next Tuesday.

Next Tuesday? Effie raised her eyes to the ceiling and counted the days over. Heavens! next Tuesday was to-day and perhaps even then, while she sat there, some innocent man was being tried for the theft of the purse that she—Effie Jessop—had got in her possession!

Like one possessed she dashed upstairs, and, throwing on her hat and jacket, fled down the street to the railway station, the green morocco purse tight in her hand. The Radling train (there were but three a day) was just starting as she ran over the bridge and called loudly to the guard to wait for her.

He opened a smoking third, threw her in, and the train started. Effie sank exhausted upon a seat, and gazed helplessly at the purse. Poor man! Perhaps he has been convicted and sent to prison, and if he is married, the disgrace may kill his wife! Merciful Heaven! I shall then be a murderess as well as a thief!"

Poor Effie! this last thought nearly distracted her. The train had scarcely time to draw up ere she sprang from the carriage, and was away across the station and down the street towards the Court-house. A large number of idlers were outside.

Clasping the purse tightly against her beating heart, Effie wedged her small figure through the people into the crowded court room.

A loud humming sounded in her ears and she but indistinctly heard someone speaking: "Now it only remains to decide if the prisoner is the thief——"

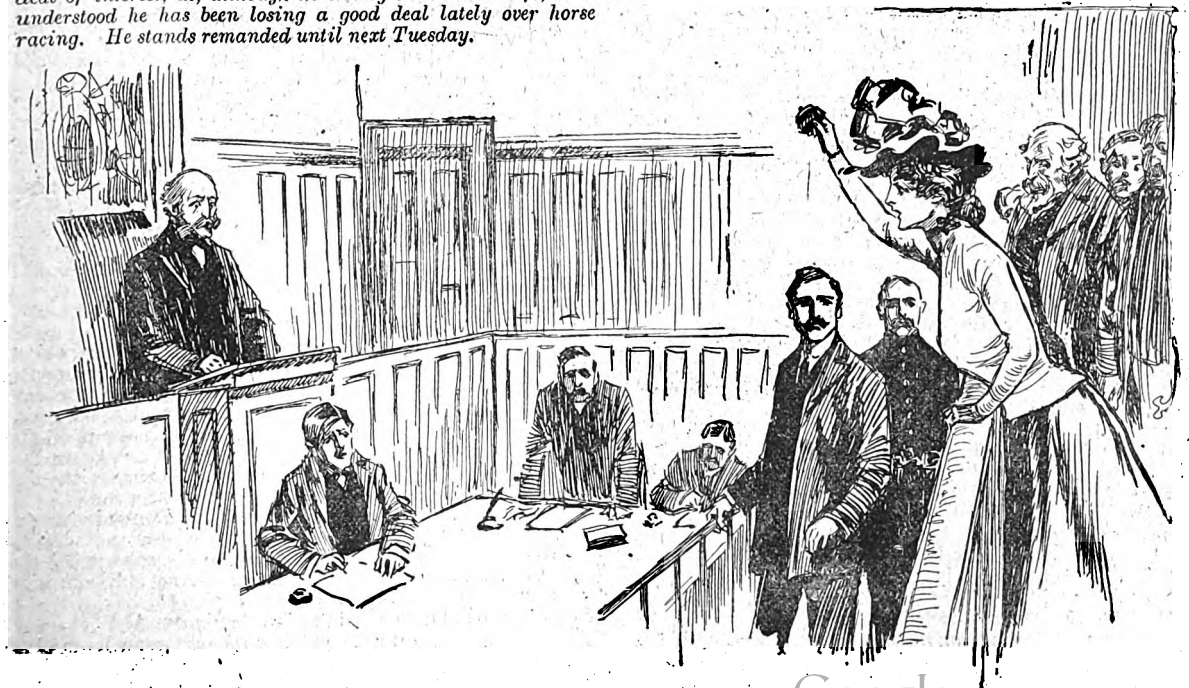
"He is not—he is not!" cried Effie, stepping forward and holding the purse high in the air, at sight of which an old woman in green glasses and a blue bonnet shrieked out: "My purse! My purse! Oh, the hussy!"

What a scene there was, and what a noise!

It was not until they threatened to clear the court that Effie's story could be heard.

The poor girl, so excited and so nervous, could hardly speak, and when the magistrate asked her why she had not given the purse up before, she could not answer at first, but on being pressed, she raised her pretty little head proudly and said:

"Because I am poor, and my mother is poor, and we wanted the money. I did not steal it, I found it, and was tempted to



"He is not a thief!" cried Effie, stepping forward, and holding the purse high in the air.

Google

keep it. I only knew an hour ago that an innocent man "—she waved her hand vaguely towards the dock where she saw a man standing—"was accused of taking the money, so—so I have brought it back, although to-morrow my mother and I will be turned into the street without a home, for want of it!" and she burst into tears.

Then someone took her out of the court and into the open air. She sat down on a seat to recover, and curious knots of people gathered round to look at her, especially two rough-looking men, who said they would like to see what a woman was like who would bring £25 back to oblige an unknown person! It was wasting the gifts of Providence, according to them!

Then someone gave her his arm and assisted her into a beautiful carriage, wherein was an old gentleman. At sight of her he seized her hand and shook it fervently before everybody and said: "God bless you, my child, you have saved my life and the honour of my family, for had my son been convicted the disgrace would have killed me!"

Effie, still dazed, looked at the old gentleman, and wondered when she had seen him before.

A young man jumped into the carriage, and, raising his hat to the people who gave a cheer at the sight of him, the carriage started.

Effie turned round. The young man was Jeffery Standing.

"You here?" she said involuntarily.

"Rather!" he said with a laugh. "If it hadn't been for you, there's no knowing where I should have been."

"Why?" she said, looking mystified. "I don't understand; were you in there?" indicating the court-house.

"Was I there? Don't you know it was I who was accused of stealing that purse?"

* * * * *

And the villagers even now say that the wedding between Mr. Standing's only son and Miss Effie Jessop was the prettiest that has ever been seen.

E. S.

Love by Proxy.

Telling of the Happiness the Love-birds Brought.

The Italian woman sighed. The murky atmosphere of a London fog and the sordid environments of a thickly populated street did not tend to diminish her mental gloom.

And business was bad.

The small cage containing a couple of paroquets on its fragile and rickety stand was her only source of income, and she did not derive therefrom as handsome an annuity as she would have wished. No one seemed to want their fortune told by the small green birds, who picked out the packets of paper stored away at one side of the cage. Even the little paroquets hopped about in a dismal sort of way, feeling compelled to show their solicitude for their respected mistress by a hopeless, despondent attitude, born of rheumatics in their little limbs, due to the damp, raw air.

Occasionally a hoarse chirp, by way of showing they were alive, broke from their throats. Then silence reigned in the cage.

Signora Democa drew her scanty shawl closer round her shoulders, shivered, and looked despondently at the pavement.

Presently she glanced up, and spied as dainty a young girl as you could wish to see tripping towards her. The girl stopped as she met the Italian's wistful glance.

"The signora will have her fortune told?"

"Trade is not good, is it?"

"Very bad, signora."

One of the birds corroborated this by a doleful croak.

The girl produced a penny. The woman rose, touched one of the birds with a stick, and, glad of something to do, it rushed at the first fortune packet with all its little might and thrust it through the cage bars. The girl laughed as she took it. The Italian's eyes flashed, and the dark, swarthy face lit up with pleasure.

"Undo, signora, and look."

She did so, and read:

"If Fortune smile not on you now,
Take courage, for it will, I trow."

"How funny! How applicable," thought the girl, smiling.

"It pleases the signora?"

"Very much."

For a moment or two she glanced at the cage, undecided how to act. Then an inspiration suddenly flashed across her.

"Would you like to earn five shillings?" she asked.

The mention of such vast wealth nearly took the woman's breath away. As for the paroquets, they cocked their heads on one side and listened.

"Yes, kind signora."

"Now, what I propose is only for your ears—do you understand?"

"A seecreet, signora?"

"Yes. Tell me, does a gentleman, tall, good—good-looking, with a fair moustache pass your corner every morning?"

"Yes, signora."

The dark eyes flashed again.

"If I wrote something in one of the little packets—could—could you make the birds give it him?"

The Italian showed a beautiful set of white teeth.

"I would try very hard."

The girl waited while the birds fumbled for another packet. The fortune teller opened it carefully. After abstracting the printed matter, she handed the envelope to the dainty woman, who scribbled something on a piece of paper, placed it inside the packet, sealed it up, and saw it replaced in the cage, the first among the row of little papers.

"You must not let the birds give it to anyone else, mind."

"No, no. The signora can me trust. I give my honour of my word."

"Here is half-a-crown. You shall have the other when the gentleman has his 'Fortune.' You must not tell him anything."

"I understand. The saints bless the signora."

With many ejaculations and salaams the woman watched the girl walk away. Then, together with her rickety stand and cage went home rejoicing.

As for the paroquets, they kept their own counsel, and dreamt of a continual fluttering towards the packets of paper which refused to be set free.

Digitized by Google

At 9.30 next morning Signora Democa sat at her usual business corner, waiting for the tall gentleman to pass. The paroquets were in a fever of excitement—no doubt on account of the brilliant morning, which was as fine as the previous day had been depressing.

At last the tall man came along. He looked dejected.

"Morning, signor. A good day a fortune to tell."

"Rubbish!" he ejaculated.

"All truth, signor. One penny does it."

He caught sight of one of the green paroquets, with its little head cocked on one side.

"Looks very knowing, that bird."

"Yes, yes. He knows plenty!"

He fumbled for a penny, gave it her, and was about to pass on when he observed a violent agitation on the part of one of the paroquets, which, being judiciously progged by the "magic wand" of its mistress, was dragging forth one of the fortune packets.

"Means business, that bird. Won't take a penny for nothing in return, eh?"

"Plenty beesiness. The signora will open his packet?" and she smiled.

Never in his life had the man done anything so childish; but things were so wrong and luck so against him, that he thought he would see what the wretched packet contained.

Expecting to see some verses of the usual cheap sentimenality, he opened the paper case, and abstracted a neatly-folded little note. When he had read the contents, his face was a study that Signora Democa never forgot.

"By all that's wonderful!" he gasped.

The fortune-teller smiled benignly.

"Does not it the signor please?"

"Where did you get this—this," he almost shouted.

"It was with them altogether amongst the papers."

Though he knew the woman was not adhering to the strict truth—perhaps for some reason best known to herself—he said nothing, but stood stock still.

"You wouldn't object to earning a sovereign, would you?"

Signora Democa could not speak for astonishment.

"You shall have it now if you do what I ask."

She nodded emphatically.

"I am going to write a note and put it in this packet. Have you ever noticed a lady, rather tall and well dressed, dark hair—pretty, yes, very pretty, pass you?"

"Sometimes, with a leetle dog."

"By jingo, yes! You must make one of the little beggars"—indicating the paroquets—"give her the packet containing the message."

"I do that, I think."

He gave her a sovereign, and then wrote—"Yours safely received. Can't make it out at all. Does it mean all is well?" sealed it up in the packet, and charging the woman to see that it got into the proper hands, and also to say nothing about it to anyone, went away, looking a good deal happier.

If the Italian was mystified and curious, one may forgive her. It was no business of hers what people chose to do, or how they did it, so long as she received ample compensation. Whether she scented a courtship, a dark plot, a marriage, a scandal, mattered not.

She rejoiced in her fortune, and awaited the trend of events.

Meanwhile the man, Laurence Godfrey, of the Inner Temple, briefless, but hopeful, walked on and cogitated deeply. Things had not gone well with him of late. His uncle, from whom he had great expectations, said that if he married a penniless girl who was nobody, he would cut him off without even the proverbial shilling.

Sweet Molly Giffard, to whom he had been secretly engaged, was the victim of her father's wrath, who would not sanction the engagement of his daughter to a penniless barrister. He had forbidden his son-in-law in prospective, the house, and commanded all correspondence to cease. Poor Molly was in much distress, but anxiously awaiting her twenty-first birthday, when she would inherit money, and—love knowing no prison bars—resolved to elope. The two had not met for more than a year, when Molly conceived the brilliant idea of utilising the paroquets as a means of conveying Cupid's messages, knowing Laurence passed the Italian daily.

Thus it was that Laurence Godfrey once more began to hope.

The morning following Godfrey's deal with the paroquets, Molly visited the Signora Democa and received the answer from Laurence. She gave the fortune-teller the other half-crown and wrote another message, which was to be given to "the gentleman who had the previous one."

Signora Democa now began to see a romance. The exchange of "fortunes" had been in progress about three weeks, and the paroquets were frantic with excitement, when, one bright, sunny morning they saw Laurence step briskly up, looking very smart, wearing a happy expression and a white buttonhole.

"Good morning, signora," he said.

"Fortune this morning, signor?"

"That will come along presently," he said. "Here's something to be going on with," and he slipped a five-pound note into the woman's hands.

"No further use for the birds," he volunteered.

The Italian failed to find her tongue. She could think of nothing but the money.

"Has—has the lady with the little dog passed this morning?"

"No, signor, not yet."

He looked anxiously down the road, and an instant later appeared perfectly happy as "the lady with the little dog"—the latter being conspicuous by its absence—appeared round the corner.

"Molly!"

"Laurence!"

That's all the Italian heard. She saw sweet Molly blush rose red and look radiantly happy.

"It is this lady's twenty-first birthday, signora," said Laurence, "and I wanted to wish her many happy returns of the day."

"So I came," put in Molly.

"Cab!" shouted Laurence suddenly.

One soon came rattling along.

"Get in, darling," he said, as he guarded the wheel from soiling her dress.

"Where to, sir?"

"St. Georges' Church, Rowland Gardens, cabby!"

"Yessir."

Then he took his place beside her in the cab.

"Oh, Laurence, I didn't mean to—to-day," stammered Molly.

"It's all right, dear girl. Banns been published three weeks ago—special licenso, and everything else."

"What will father say?"

"'Where there's a will there's a way,' I should think. Oh, by-the-bye, my uncle died last week and left me all his money Oh, Molly, aren't you glad?"

"Well—not—not very sorry," and she hid her face on his shoulder.

"It's all through those paroquets—they never made a mistake, and I've had your messages every day. When they die we'll have the little beggars stuffed."

"Yes," said the girl, "they are dear little things."

Dagney Major.

Digitized by Google

CAROL FERRARS.

The Tale of a Lady Companion.

"Really, auntie, when I am married, you must get a companion.

"Yes, I know, dear," as her aunt moved impatiently, "that you don't like strangers, but who is to order the dinner, arrange the flowers, clean the birds, take the dogs for a walk, see you to bed, read to you, start your cross-stitch, and keep it right?" Mollie paused for breath.

"Oh, dear!" sighed old Mrs. Thorn, "I had no idea you had done so much for me!"

Her niece smiled with unconscious rony.

"Mollie, dearest, are you sure you really love Archie enough to marry him?' Men can be very trying when they are husbands," put in the old lady artfully.

"Yes, auntie, I am sure I do," emphatically; "I shall be able to manage him all right. You see, I haven't studied dear uncle for ten years without gaining some experience of what men do and say when the dinner is badly cooked and the breakfast not on the table punctually at nine."

"Yes, yes, I know, but all men are not like your uncle, some men make much more fuss than he does." Mollie raised her eyebrows but forebore to make any remark. "They even swear, dear, before the servants if the plates are cold at dinner; and then they can be so mean over money, and you know you have none of your own."

"No, but I intend to have an allowance from the beginning. I wouldn't allow even Archie to dole me out a sovereign or less at a time, and make me account for every penny I spend. Don't worry about me, auntie, I am quite capable of looking after myself, and I think there are very few girls now-a-days who are such muffs over money as the old-fashioned women used to be, from all accounts. Now, do let me write out an advertisement and send it to the Morning Post," and Mollie laid down the cross-stitch sideboard cloth whose intricate pattern was always getting in a muddle under Mrs. Thorn's feeble and impatient fingers.

"There, I don't think you can possibly make another mistake in it, I've marked it all out so plainly, and where you should leave seven holes between each star I have put in the first stitch, so that it will be quite easy."

"Thanks, dear," gratefully, "yes, it does look clearer now. I don't know whether these spectacles are not so strong as the last ones, or whether it is that this pattern is more difficult, but I seem to have found it easier to go wrong than usual," remarked the vicar's wife plaintively, and Mollie, thinking of the number of times her work on her trousseau had been interrupted this last busy week, could but agree with her.

"Still bothering over that eternal cross-stitch?" asked the vicar briskly, entering the room at the moment. He bent over his wife's chair and kissed her forehead. With all his trying ways, the vicar was always devoted to the wife who had trotted through nearly forty years of wedded life contentedly beside him. They had no children and, for the last ten years, ever since Mrs. Thorn had passed through a rather severe illness, they had provided a home for the vicar's niece in return for a hundred and one little kindly offices which she had performed for them, thereby increasing the comfort of the domestic arrangements at the vicarage incredibly.

"Uncle, will you help me persuade auntie to advertise for a companion to take my place here after next month? If you like," turning to the old lady, "she might come a week before the wedding, so that I can show her all the things which I do, and then she would have got into your ways before I leave."

"Very sensible, my dear, very sensible. Come, Jennie, make up your mind to do it; Mollie will give her a week's training to show her what her duties will be."

While her uncle was talking, Mollie wrote out the advertisement and read it aloud:

"'Required immediately as companion to an elderly lady, a refined young gentlewoman with musical tastes, must be fond of the country and willing to look after pets. Apply, Mrs. Thorn, the Vicarage, Bramleigh.' Will that do? We must find someone who will take care of you," stroking the big tortoiseshell cat which had curled itself up on the window-sill beside her. Rufus stood up and arched his back and purred in reply, then stepped leisurely out of the window to sun himself and blink with overfed indulgence at the sparrows twittering and quarrelling on the gravel path below.

The gong sounded for lunch, and the discussion on the subject of the companion ceased. The vicar was strict about being punctual for church and at meals, and rose immediately the first sound of the gong reached his ears, and held out his arm to his wife. It was his invariable custom to do this, and as Mollie rose too to follow them she wondered whether the new companion would treat all his little fads with the loving tolerance that she did, or whether she would come down late for meals and hurry to church after the bell had stopped—direst offence of all in the vicar's eyes. He always expected everyone to sit waiting for five minutes at least before the gong was expected to sound for meals, and to be waiting ready dressed to start for church soon after the bells began to ring for service.

After lunch the old lady always slept for an hour, and Mollie was free to do as she liked. It was the time of the day she enjoyed most, and part of it was always devoted to her daily letter to her fiancé. The time was drawing near now, however, when she would exchange this peaceful, quiet life at the vicarage, whose quiet was only disturbed by little domestic storms in a teacup, for a home of her own, and Mollie had looked forward to that little new home eagerly through the last three years during which Archie had been building up his practice as a country doctor. Much as she loved her uncle nd aunt, and grateful as she felt to them for giving her a home, he yet longed to be independent and have a home of her own. She wrote her letter, and sat wondering not a little about the girl who was to take her place and fulfil the familiar duties which had been her care for so long.

Digitized by Google

The morning's post brought a sheaf of letters, evidently answers to the advertisement. Mollie carried them up to her aunt's room and sorted them out and read them to her while the old lady sipped her coffee and ate her dainty little breakfast.

"Oh, Mollie, dear, that sounds a very sad case, I really think I ought to engage her," said Mrs. Thorn, as Mollie read a touching tale of poverty and sorrow.

"Wait a bit; you mustn't decide in a hurry, and besides, I believe she is a humbug, and has piled it on for your benefit—elderly ladies always have kind hearts," said practical Mollie astutely.

Then she went on reading.

"I like the look of this writing," said Mrs. Thorn presently, picking up an envelope addressed in a neat, pretty writing. Her niece opened it and read it aloud. It was short and concise, and told no tale to try to win the sympathy of the reader; it stated clearly the qualifications of the writer, and there was a straightforward and honest tone about it which attracted both Mrs. Thorn's and Mollie's fancy directly.

"That is one, at any rate, worth answering," said the old lady, and laid it on one side. A few others were looked over, then Mollie took the ones Mrs. Thorn liked best and answered them.

The fire was burning brightly in the cosy drawing-room, for although the month was May the evenings were still chilly.

They were all sitting round the fire chatting after dinner, the vicar, his wife, Mollie, and her fiancé, who had come over to dine and sleep.

There was a little air of suppressed excitement about them all, for the new companion was expected to arrive that evening.

They had not yet seen her, as the address on her letters was of a remote part of Yorkshire, but she had sent her photograph for the inspection of her employers. The face it portrayed was undeniably pretty and refined looking.

A loud peal at the bell made the family jump; the vicar frowned.

"I hope she is not a noisy young woman," anxiously.

"She didn't ring, uncle; it was Johnson, our one and only cabman," said Mollie, smiling, as she hurried out into the hall to welcome the newcomer.

Pretty as the photograph had proclaimed her to be, they were none of them prepared for the lovely colouring and tall, graceful figure of the girl who, a few minutes later, followed Mollie into the room. She looked tired and nervous, but held her head erect for all her weariness as her eyes travelled from one to the other, and took in her new surroundings.

Mrs. Thorn liked her at once; she was prepossessed in her favour because she had picked her letter out of all the others as the one whose writer she hoped would prove suitable and, of course, one is always pleased to find oneself in the right. Mollie liked her because she looked friendless and poor, and because she listened deferentially to the vicar's rather pompous speech of welcome. The two men liked her because she was young and pretty, but of course they said it was because she had such a nice manner, and was refined and ladylike looking.

As soon as she had gone up to her room for the night, pleading her fatiguing journey as an excuse for retiring so early, they were free to make remarks on the new companion, and she, when she had escaped their friendly scrutiny, acknowledged to herself that she had indeed come into a haven of rest at last.

The days passed swiftly before the wedding, and on all sides the new companion, Carol Ferrars, earned golden opinions; already everyone in the house appealed to her in questions of taste and about all the arrangements for the great event.

"I feel almost jealous of you, Miss Ferrars," said Mollie aughing one day, but with a ring of truth underlying the joking voice.

"You have nothing to be jealous of," replied Miss Ferrars sadly; "you have all your happy life before you, mine is already in the past."

Mollie pressed her hand sympathetically, seeing that the girl's lovely blue eyes were brimming over with tears.

"How can anyone so young and pretty as you say such a thing?" But Miss Ferrars was silent, and went on trimming the hat which she was doing up to wear at the wedding.

Mollie repeated this conversation the next time that Archie came over.

"There is something very sad about her face," he replied, "and the curious thing is that I am sure I have seen her before. I thought so the moment she came in that night that she arrived."

"You must be mistaken; I don't think you could have seen her, she lived up in Yorkshire," replied Mollie.

The excitement of the wedding over, Mr. and Mrs. Thorn and the companion settled down to the quiet, uneventful routine of the life at Bramleigh Vicarage. The old couple had grown very fond of Carol, as they called her, having soon dropped the more formal Miss Ferrars. In fact, they remarked to each other, almost as if ashamed to say so, that really they did not miss Mollie a bit.

There was a great contrast between the two girls in character as well as in looks, for Mollie was as brisk and decided as Carol was gentle and tactful. The cats and dogs transferred their affections to Carol at once, and even Rufus, who was generally disagreeable with strangers, allowed her to brush and comb his wonderful coat the day after her arrival.

A few days after the wedding the first month of Carol Ferrars' life at the vicarage was completed.

"Would you prefer to have your salary paid quarterly or monthly?" asked Mrs. Thorn kindly, when Carol carried in her breakfast tray.

"Oh, I should like it monthly so much, if you don't mind," said the girl eagerly, colouring brightly.

"Certainly, if you will get me my purse I will give it to you now; I daresay you would like the money instead of a cheque."

Carol thanked her gratefully and took the money.

The following day Mrs. Thorn and Carol drove into the village to do a little shopping. The old lady made a few purchases at the little draper's, and put her hand into her pocket as the assistant was making out the bill, for her purse. She uttered an exclamation of annoyance.

"What a bother. I have felt my purse at home. Perhaps you wouldn't mind, dear, lending me a few shillings. It was silly of me to forget it."

Carol drew out her purse without pausing to think. She opened it; it was empty of all save one shilling.

"I am so sorry," she stammered, "I have only got a shilling."

Mrs. Thorn looked surprised.

"But, my dear," she began, "it was only yesterday that I gave you——" Then, seeing the look of genuine distress on the girl's face, she stopped. The assistant was smiling broadly; however, Mrs. Thorn was, of course, well known and extremely popular in the village, so the matter was easily smoothed over, and they left the shop.

"You must have thought it very strange, dear Mrs. Thorn," said the companion that evening, as she got out the board and sat down to play halma with the old lady, "that I had no money in my purse this afternoon, but——"

"Don't apologise or explain, my dear," said Mrs. Thorn kindly; "the money was yours, and you had a perfect right to do as you liked with it. It surprised me for the moment, but, of course, you may need it to send to some poor relative. Anyhow, it is no business of mine," and she settled down to her game.

It was noticed by the inmates of the vicarage that, as time went on, Miss Ferrars began to lose the bright look which had been one of the beauties of her expressive face; she seemed always on the alert, and the nervousness of her manner increased. Mrs. Thorn was the last to notice it, and it was Mollie, who had come on a visit to the vicarage, who drew her attention to the altered looks of her companion.

Digitized by Google

One evening after dusk, Dr. Tomlin, Mollie's husband, was returning from seeing an old labourer who had met with an accident, and to whom he had been called in the village doctor's absence. As he was strolling quietly up a path in the shrubbery which was little used, he came suddenly upon two people talking in agitated tones.

He recognised one, it was Carol Ferrars; but the other figure, which was that of a man, was a complete stranger to him.

They separated just as he reached them, and Carol said—

"Good-bye, Jim, for God's sake don't run this risk again, even to see me; think—think," and Archie's ears ached at the despair in her voice, "what it would mean to me if you were caught!"

At that moment they both turned and saw that Dr. Tomlin must have overheard the words; the man sprang forward almost as if he would seize the young doctor by the throat, but Carol threw her arm round his neck and turned him away. "Go!" she cried, panting with terror and excitement, and her companion hurried away into the dusk without the doctor having seen his face. Carol turned to the doctor and laid her hand on his arm.

"Dr. Tomlin, I feel I can trust you. Will you promise me that, if you hear anyone making inquiries for Jim Trench, that you will say that you know nothing about him, that you have never seen him?" Carol's voice was unsteady with emotion, she looked faint and exhausted.

"Dear Miss Ferrars, I would do anything to help you, but will you not trust me a little more. I am all at sea. Who is Jim Trench, and why are you afraid of him being seen?"

"I cannot stop to tell you now, Mrs. Thorn will be wondering where I am," her manner growing calmer. "But if you will meet me here to-morrow morning at eleven, I will tell you everything; but you must not let anyone else guess my secret, not even Mollie."

"I promise," said Archie Tomlin, holding out his hand.

An urgent message had been brought up from the village while the vicarage family were having their breakfast next morning, for Dr. Tomlin.

A stranger to the village had suddenly attacked a man in the street the evening before, and the village doctor wanted Dr. Tomlin to join him in witnessing to his insanity before the magistrate, was the request which the note contained. Without thinking, he read it aloud; Carol Ferrars rose to her feet excitedly.

"I don't believe it," she cried. "You won't witness against him, Dr. Tomlin, you shall not!"

"What is it to you?" said the vicar gravely. "Do you know anything about this man, Miss Ferrars?"

The colour faded slowly from her face, leaving it white as death. She sat down again, every limb trembling.

"He is my husband," she said in the silence which followed the vicar's words, and, bowing her head in her hands, broke into a storm of tears.

Mollie rose and, going to her, drew her into her arms to comfort her.

The vicar and the young doctor went down to the village together.

F. Lindsey.

"Did you ever try to stop a dangerous dog by catching his eye?" "No; I can't run backward."

She (at the theatre): "I don't understand what the detective is supposed to be doing in this piece." He: "I fancy he is looking for the plot."

He (kissing her): "And so you will be mine?" She: "Yes, dear, though I am afraid it will hurt my reputation for being such a self-possessed girl."

Stranger: "I want to buy a good watch dog." Dog Fancier: "Here is the one you want, sir. Trained by an expert. He can tell an insurance agent or a tax collector a mile off." "And what will he do then?" "Do? He'll chew 'em into soup bones." "Well, he won't suit me." "Why? Most people want a dog like that." "Yes, I know; but I'm a tax collector, you see."

Your Editor Chats.

NEW THINGS COMING ALONG.

I have a number of good things in store for readers and they will soon be coming along. One of them is in the shape of a new serial story. This will start in a few weeks, and it has been written by Mr. R. Norman Silver, whose work is already well-known to readers of Short Stories. It was he who wrote "The Golden Dwarf," "Tales Told off Duty," "The Brains of the Force," and other stories that were much appreciated by readers. The new story is fresh and crisp throughout, and is full of dramatic scenes. It is a story which will be of special interest to the fair sex in the power with which the love element is treated. At the present moment Mr. Silver is putting the last finishing touches to the story, and he tells me that of all the stories he has written, this has given him the greatest satisfaction. This remark coming from the author himself should brand the narrative as being of more than ordinary interest.

A NEW COMPETITION.

Another surprise in store for you is a prize competition on absolutely new lines; nothing of the kind has ever appeared before; it is a competition for which every reader may enter, and requires no great amount of work. I may say at the outset that it is not in any shape or form a picture puzzle competition, nor is it an anagram competition, nor, in fact, any sort of competition that has been used before. You may wonder why I don't tell you straight out what sort of thing it is, but my reason for not doing so is that there are many rival papers which would be only too glad to get an inkling of what is coming along in Short Stories in order to try to steal a march on the paper. In a few weeks your curiosity will be satisfied, and you will have an opportunity of spending a few hours in what may prove to you to be profitable employment.

A NEW SERIES.

The third surprise is a new series of splendid articles to follow the series entitled "How I Chaperoned Belinda." These are entirely different from the previous series, and have been written under very interesting circumstances. I shall be able to tell you more about them next week.

The prize of £10 in the first "Dayton" Competition has been awarded to Mr. Lewis Yelland, 84 Arabella Street, Roath, Cardiff.

The prize of £10 in the second "Dayton" competition has been awarded to Mr. W. N. Quarrington, 14 Poet's Corner, Margate.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Often Impossible.

HE: "Don't you think it wrong for people to marry their intellectual inferiors?" She: "Yes—always wrong, and in some cases quite impossible."

Not Very Complimentary.

CHOLLIE: "Would you believe it that I was threatened with serious brain trouble when I was young?" Dollie: "Indeed? How did you succeed in having it removed?"

Glad it Was Over.

HE (preparing to leave): "I assure you, Miss Sweet, the time has passed very pleasantly this evening." She (abstractedly): "Yes, it is pleasant to know that it is past."

Where She Was Kissed.

LAWYER: "Where did he kiss you?" Pretty Defendant: "On the mouth, sir." Lawyer: "No, no! you don't understand. I mean where were you?" Defendant (blushing): "In his arms, sir."

Papa Wouldn't Like It.

"IF you do not marry me I shall hang myself!" exclaimed a lovelorn young man. "Well, if you do, please go away a few streets," was the cheerful response, "for I heard papa say he did not want you to hang round here."

Character from the Pencil.

"I ALWAYS like to write with a soft lead-pencil," remarked the young man. "Have you ever given any study," inquired the cruelly thoughtless girl, "to the manner in which a person's character will manifest itself in his handwriting?"

Worth an Extra Shilling.

MR. GREEN (to Johnny, who has been hiding behind the screen): "There, I'll give you a shilling not to tell that I kissed your sister!" Johnny: "Yes, but I saw you put your arm round her waist a-cuddlin' of her. It's worth another bob not to split on that."

The Day Hadn't Come.

DESPAIRING LOVER: "Bertha, have you nothing to say in answer to the letter I wrote you last Thursday? Do you know that all my future is bound up in your reply to that letter?" Fair Maiden: "I haven't looked at it, Horace. Next Tuesday is my day for opening sealed proposals."

A Sister's Duties.

MISS MITTENS: "What does this mean, Mr. Brotherton?" Mr. Brotherton: "These? Oh, these are just a few socks, underclothes, and coats that want mending!" Miss Mittens: "But——?" Mr. Brotherton: "You promised to be a sister to me last night, you know; and my sister used to do all my mending before she was married."

Why She Did It.

"THAT'S a very clever idea of yours, Miss Nellie." "What is a very clever idea, Mr. Dolley?" "Wearing a big hat at the theatre and exasperating everybody in your rear until the curtain rises, and then relieving their anxiety by taking it off and placing it on your lap." "Yes; I know; it is a good plan. It attracts the attention both to my hat and to my hair."

Thought Too Much of Her.

ETHEL: "Are you sure that all his thoughts are of you?" Edith: "Oh, yes! Why, he has just lost his position on account of inattention to business!"

Cutting the Rough Diamond.

MILLIE: "Why do you never speak to Mr. Marples now? He is uncouth, but I feel sure he is a diamond in the rough." Clara: "So do I. That's why I'm cutting him."

The Taste of a Kiss.

"OH, Sophie! I hear you kissed Mr. Rondo, the poet, in the conservatory last night." "Um-m-m!" "Tell me. What was it like?" "Well, he has a very pronounced literary taste."

Such a Surprise!

"I'VE planned such a delightful surprise for my husband." "Really?" "Yes. He has a spring suit nearly as good as new hanging in the wardrobe, and I've put a shilling in one of the waistcoat pockets."

Kept the Men off.

MAUD: "Why has Lilian given up wearing rational costume? Did George object?" Ethel: "Oh, no; he said he approved of it, because it would prevent her attracting any other man's admiration."

Not as He Meant It.

HE knew what they always say, so he thought he would forestall her. "I suppose you've never been kissed by a man before?" he said. "Do I look as plain as all that?" she demanded haughtily.

Wanted Him to be Thinner.

MAUD: "Why did you break your engagement with poor Tom Hotchkiss?" Edith: "Hush, don't tell anyone, but he was growing so horribly fat. When grief has pulled him down a bit I shall take him on again."

Couldn't Run any Risks.

MOTHER (reading): "An inventor has just patented a machine that will toss a man 500 feet into the air by simply touching a spring." Pretty Daughter: "Goodness gracious! Let me destroy that paper before papa gets hold of it."

Giving a Gentle Hint.

"I HAVEN'T anything new to sing to you to-night, George." "Well give me something old, then." She broke into a refrain that was "a song of the day" seventeen years before. "That's very, very old, Clara," he remarked at the close. "Yes, George; I sang that to you the night we became engaged."

The Postscript Wasn't Meant.

SHE was a smart and pretty girl, and part of her duties was to write the advertisements for a large drapery establishment in the City. Her mind used to run so much upon her business that one day, when she wrote to her lover to meet her that night at home, she unconsciously added as a postscript: "Come early and avoid the rush."

She Had Inherited It.

WOULD-BE SUITOR: "Is it possible that you have never attended a dancing class?" Young Lady: "Never in my life." "Remarkable! Why, you dance charmingly; how do you account for it?" "I must have inherited it. Papa is an adept in manipulating the light, fantastic toe." "What evening did you say he wouldn't be at home?"

Flattery Won the Day.

HE kissed her boldly in the open street. "Sir!" she shrieked, "you are an utter stranger to me. What means this familiarity?" "Madam," he replied, bowing low, "though we never met before, you must excuse me. I bet my friend that I would kiss the prettiest girl I saw in the whole street." A soft, forgiving smile replaced her wrathful glance. "You are forgiven this time," she said sweetly, "but please don't let it occur again."

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Fairholme's Mission.

"The third item," continued Brett, "which demands attention in Paris is the whereabouts of the Turks. They must be found and observed. My chief difficulty will be to keep that delightful commissary from imprisoning them, if, as I imagine, we find the little thief a captive in the Rue Barbette. So you see my actions are speculative. Yours, on the other hand, will be definite."

"Ah," said Fairholme, "I am glad to hear that. If you expect me to analyse and deduce and find out the probable movements of intelligent rascals, I am sure I should make a mess of things."

"You will reach London," said Brett, "at 7.30 p.m. I suppose you have in your service a reliable servant, endowed with a fair amount of physical strength?"

"Rather," cried the Earl. "My butler is a splendid chap. He has been fined half-a-dozen times for his exceeding willingness to settle disputes with his fists."

"Telegraph to him to meet you at Charing Cross Station. I can depend upon my man Smith to use his nerve and discretion. Moreover, he knows Inspector Winter, of Scotland Yard, and should trouble arise, which I do not anticipate, this acquaintance may be useful to you. The third person who will meet you will be the ex-sergeant of police, whose report to me you heard yesterday. He will point out to you the flat tenanted by the invalid lady. You speak French well, and after a few questions you should be able to satisfy yourself whether or not the person who opens the door to you when you visit that flat is acting a genuine part. You can pretend what you like, but if admission is denied to you I want you to force your way inside and see that invalid lady at all costs. In the event of a gross mistake having been committed you must apologise most abjectly and assuage the wounded feelings of the servants with a liberal donation, whilst the ex-sergeant of police will advise you as to any other place which may demand personal inspection. I do not conceal from you the difficulties of your task, or the chance that you may get into trouble with the police. But the fact remains that Talbot, alive or dead, is concealed somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Carlton Hotel, and it is high time that this portion of the mystery attending his disappearance should be made clear. Do you follow me?"

"Precisely," said Fairholme. "My programme appears to be very simple. I am to kick down any door that is pointed out by the ex-policeman provided I am refused admission by fair means."

Brett laughed. "I think," he cried, "you have put my instructions in very direct and succinct form All I hope is that the invalid lady may prove to be an elderly fraud. It only remains for me to give you my blessing and say good-bye."

"But what about you?" said the Earl anxiously. "Suppose we come across Talbot to-night, as you anticipate, where shall I find you to-morrow?"

"You must telegraph to me here," was the answer, "and you must possess your soul in patience until you hear from me."

"No, don't protest," he went on, as Fairholme gave indications of impatience. "You need not fear that you will be left out of the denouement, whatever it be. I am sure to need your help before long, and I will cable you at the first possible moment. For that reason, should you leave your house for more than an hour or so, I hope you will make special arrangements for telegrams to reach you without delay."

"You may rely on that," was the hearty answer. "But look here, Brett. It is 10.45 a.m. now. If I have to catch that eleven-fifty train from the Gare du Nord I have no time to lose. By the way," he added, turning at the door, "is there any reason why I should not wire to Edith to expect me to-night?"

"Not the slightest," said Brett, smiling, "except perhaps this, that instead of calling upon Miss Talbot this evening you may be locked up on the charge of housebreaking."

"Um," said the Earl, thoughtfully, "I had not thought of that. It will be more fun to take her by surprise. So here goes to get my traps packed."

After Lord Fairholme's departure, Brett took matters easily. He did not put in an appearance at the Prefecture until late in the afternoon, and, as he surmised, the commissary whom he encountered the previous night had even then only just arrived at his office. Without any difficulty, the barrister was introduced to the official, who evidently awaited an explanation of the visit with great curiosity.

Brett's ill-humour at the uncalled-for interference of the police was now quite dispelled, and he greeted the commissary with the genial affability which so quickly won him the friendship of casual acquaintances.

"I think," he began, "that your agents, monsieur, were watching me throughout the whole of yesterday."

"That is so," nodded the other, wondering what pitfall lay behind this leading question.

"Do I take it that after my departure from No. 11 Rue Barbette about mid-day they maintained no further guard upon that house?"

"Assuredly. It was monsieur's personal movements which called for observation."

"Then you do not know that an individual whose identity may be much more important than mine to the inquiry upon which we are mutually engaged, is an inmate of the apartment at this moment—probably a captive against his will, possibly dead?"

Digitized by Google

The Frenchman's huge moustache bristled with alarm and annoyance.

"It is a strange thing, monsieur," he cried, "that an English gentleman should come to Paris and know more about the movements and haunts of criminals than the French police."

It was no part of Brett's design to rub the official the wrong way, so he said gently:

"Your remark is quite justifiable, and under ordinary circumstances any such pretence on my part would be ridiculous. But you must remember, monsieur, that I came here from London possessed of special information which was not known even to the police authorities in that city. I am working solely in the private interest of persons high in English society, and it would not serve the purpose of any of the Governments concerned were too much stress publicly laid upon their connection with this mystery. If I can succeed in elucidating the problem it will be a comparatively easy matter for the police to bring the real criminals to justice. As a step towards that end I have come to you now to place you in possession of a clue which may reveal itself in the Rue Barbette. All I ask is, in the first instance, that the affair may be conducted with the utmost secresy, and, secondly, that you will permit me to be present when you examine the person whom I expect to find there. I may be able to help you very materially in your questions, provided the man is alive and well."

The commissary was soothed. The barrister's judicial reference to the importance and confidential nature of the inquiry raised in his mind a dazzling vision of personal distinction and preferment.

"The matter shall be conducted with the utmost discretion," he cried. "What force does monsieur consider to be requisite in order to examine this house thoroughly, and prevent the attempted escape of others whom we may find there in addition to the man described?"

Brett with difficulty repressed a smile. "I do not think that a large force of police will be necessary. If you yourself, monsieur, and another officer will accompany me in a cab, I am sure we will be able to deal with all possible opposition. There is no exit from the flat save through the main door, and the apartment is situated on the second storey, so that escape by way of the windows is practically impossible if we act with promptitude."

The commissary could not reach the Rue Barbette too rapidly. He bundled a subordinate into a fiacre, and the three were driven off at breakneck speed.

They stopped the vehicle at the corner of the street and walked quietly to the house, attracting no attention, as neither of the Frenchmen were in uniform.

Inquiry from the concierge elicited information that none of the occupants of the flat tenanted by the Turkish gentlemen had put in an appearance since the previous afternoon. So the trio mounted the staircase, and without any preliminary summons the junior official applied his shoulder to the door.

The lock yielded quite readily. Indeed, the damage done by Lord Fairholme had been but temporarily repaired, and no special precaution had been taken to fasten the place. All was quiet within. The first room they searched was empty. So was the second; but in a bedroom, the door of which was locked and required forcible treatment, an extraordinary sight met their eyes.

The Invalid "Lady."

STRETCHED on the bed, gagged and securely tied, was the figure of the diminutive Frenchman, who, little more than twenty-four hours earlier, had so coolly suggested that Brett should be murdered.

Stout leather thongs were fastened to his wrists and ankles and then tied to the four uprights of the bed. His arms and legs were consequently stretched widely apart, and the only sign of vitality about the man was the terrible expression of fear and hate in his eyes as he looked at them.

The gag stuffed in his mouth prevented him from uttering the slightest coherent sound, whilst the agony of his frame, owing to the position in which he lay, joined to the exhaustion induced by terror and want of food, rendered him a pitiable object.

They removed the gag and cut the bonds. The poor wretch remained on his back unable to move, though he flinched somewhat when the police, as gently as possible, loosened the leather straps from his wrists and ankles, for his useless struggles had caused the thongs to cut deeply into his skin.

Brett was the first to realise the unfortunate wretch's chief requirement. He procured some water, raised the man's head, and allowed him to take a deep and invigorating draught.

"Why, it is 'The Worm!'" said the junior policeman. "I know him well. He is a pickpocket, an expert rascal in his line, but hardly up to the standard of great events."

At the sound of his nickname a flicker of intelligence came into the little thief's eyes, but he was still dazed, and did not recognise his rescuers.

"I don't care what you do with me," he murmured at last, in a weak and cracked voice. "Kill me quietly if you want to, but don't tie me up again. I have done nothing to deserve it. I really haven't. I have been acting quite square in this business." And then he broke down and whimpered further protestations of innocence.

"He is weak from want of food, and dazed with terror," said Brett quietly. "I suggest that one of you should get him some meat and wine, whilst the others remain here and endeavour to reassure him. In half an hour he will be greatly recovered. Meanwhile we might examine the place."

The commissary thought Brett's suggestion a good one. His assistant summoned the concierge and attended to the wants of "The Worm," whilst Brett and the commissary conducted a careful scrutiny of the premises.

They found little, however, beyond a considerable accumulation of dirt, for the ways of Turks are primitive and their habits unpleasant in European households. It was evident that before taking their departure the occupants of the flat had carefully removed or destroyed all documents or other articles which might throw light upon their proceedings.

The leather thongs which had bound the prisoner evoked some comment from the barrister.

"These are somewhat unusual articles," he said to the commissary. "You will notice that they are cut from raw cowhide and well stretched. In other words, they are the familiar 'bow-strings' of Constantinople, and warranted not to yield if twisted round the neck. I think they will answer for other purposes than tying people on beds."

"We must find these Turks," said the commissary. "They are desperate characters."

"Find them by all means," said Brett earnestly, "but upon no account arrest them."

"And why, monsieur?" cried the other, with elevated eyebrows.

"Because if you do you will paralyse our future actions. When all is said and done, the only charge you can bring against them is a trivial one. It is evident they merely tied up this man, either with the object of frightening him into a confession, or to leave their hands free whilst they dealt with his employers. Perhaps they had both objects in view. In either event the appearance of the police upon the scene would close their mouths more tightly than an oyster. As it is, I expect they will return, and, if possible, you must compel the concierge to conceal the fact that you have visited the house. Let him put all the blame on me. They know that I am mixed up in the inquiry, and fear me far less than the recognised authorities. Oblige me in this respect and you will not regret it."

Digitized by Google

The policeman was wise enough to fall in with the suggestion.

An hour later "The Worm" was taken in a cab to the Prefecture, as his condition was yet so hopeless that little real benefit could ensue from a searching cross-examination.

So Brett parted company with the officials, having made an appointment with the commissary for the next day at noon, when they assumed that the prisoner would be considerably recovered from his weakness and fright.

The barrister subsequently made a round of the minor cafés in the neighbourhood of the Cirque d'Hiver. After much casual questioning, he elicited the information that a well-known circus, of which Mlle. Beaucaire was at one time a shining light, was performing at that moment at Marseilles. He ascertained that during the winter season this class of entertainment perambulated the South of France and Northern Italy.

The actor from whom he gleaned these important facts said that he had a trustworthy friend in Marseilles who would easily be able to ascertain whether or not La Belle Chasseuse intended to rejoin her former profession. Brett secured his hearty co-operation by a liberal donation for expenses.

The barrister resolved to pay another visit to the Cabaret Noir late that evening, but he waited in the hotel until nearly ten o'clock in anxious expectation of a telegram from Fairholme.

At last the message arrived. Its contents were laconic.

"Right first time," it ran. "Invalid lady's name 'Jack.' Somewhat exhausted after long confinement. Edith delighted. Jack visits Under-Secretary to-night. We all purpose joining you in Paris to-morrow. Do you approve?"

Brett promptly wired "Yes," and then set out for Montmartre dressing himself in the height of fashion so far as his wardrobe would permit, and donning a fierce moustache and wig, which completely altered his appearance. He looked like a successful impresario or popular Italian tenor.

The Innkeeper.

THE fair-ground of Montmartre was in full swing when Brett arrived there. The Cabaret Noir was in charge of his former acquaintance, the weary-eyed waiter, and other assistants.

The barrister wondered whether Mlle. Beaucaire had taken her father completely into her confidence. To make certain he questioned the waiter.

"Is Monsieur Beaucaire in?" he said.

"But yes, monsieur. You will find him in the billiard-room."

This time Brett was not conducted through the private passage that led through the rear of the bar. The man politely indicated another entrance, and brought him to the proprietor with the introductory remark:

"A gentleman who wishes to see you."

The room was tenanted by a nondescript crowd, whose attention was promptly diverted upon the appearance of a stranger, and a well-dressed one at that.

The games in progress at the two tables were momentarily suspended, whilst Gros Jean, a corpulent man above the middle height, whose legs seemed to be too frail to support his rotund body, advanced towards the door, peering curiously beneath his bushy eyebrows to get a glimpse of the new comer, for the shaded light did not fall on Brett's features, and M. Beaucaire wondered who the stranger could be. The barrister almost started when he recognised his fellow-passenger, the man who travelled to Paris with Gaultier and himself. Gros Jean bowed politely enough, and murmured something about being at Brett's service.

"Oh, it is nothing of great importance," said the barrister airily, as he was not anxious to attract too much observation from the unwashed humanity who took such interest in him. "I merely wish to know when it will be convenient for me to have some conversation with mademoiselle, your charming daughter?"

"May I inquire the reason, monsieur?" said the other.

"Certainly. I have heard of her skill as an artist, and it is possible that I might be able to arrange a London engagement for her."

"Ah," said the landlord deprecatingly, "what a pity! Had monsieur called here yesterday he could have seen mademoiselle. She has now left Paris for some weeks."

"Perhaps," said Brett, "I may have the pleasure of meeting her elsewhere. I myself depart to-morrow on a tour to the South of France. It is possible that mademoiselle may be employed in some of the southern cities. If so I will certainly make it my business to call upon her."

Beaucaire came a step nearer. Clearly he did not recall the barrister's face. He well knew that his daughter's attainments were not such as to command the eager search of London theatrical managers, yet he was assured that the individual who now addressed him was not an ordinary music-hall agent, hunting up fees.

He lowered his voice, after an angry glance at the loungers in the room, which caused them to turn to the tables with redoubled interest.

"I regret," he said, "that mademoiselle is not professionally engaged at this moment. Indeed, she has not appeared in public for some months. May I ask how monsieur came to hear of her name?"

"It is the easiest matter in the world," said Brett with his ready smile, producing his note-book and rapidly turning over the leaves. "I have here the names and addresses of a large number of artists whom I was recommended to call upon. Mademoiselle's name was given to me among others at the Cirque d'Hiver, where I heard most encouraging accounts of her skill. You see, monsieur," he went on, "that in England the public are not acquainted with any other language than their own, and when Continental artists are engaged we prefer those whose performance consists chiefly of acrobatic or other feats in which dialogue is unnecessary."

The barrister's ready explanation was sufficient. Nevertheless Beaucaire was puzzled. But even the most vulgar or brutal Frenchman is endowed with a certain amount of politeness, and in this instance Gros Jean felt that his visitor should certainly be treated with great deference.

"I am most sorry," he cried, "to be unable to assist monsieur any further. If, however, you will leave me your address I will communicate with you after I have heard from my daughter. I have no doubt that she will readily come to terms."

Digitized by Google

"I think you said that mademoiselle was in the South of France?" observed Brett casually.

Instantly Beaucaire became suspicious again.

"No," he replied shortly; "I do not think I said so."

"Of course not," laughed Brett. "How foolish of me! It was I who mentioned the South of France, was it not? You see that French is a foreign language to me, and I do not express myself very easily."

Beaucaire grinned politely again, and said: "Permit me to congratulate monsieur upon both his pronunciation and facility. Few Englishmen speak French so well."

The barrister was determined not to allow the conversation to end too rapidly. He wished to note more carefully the details of this interesting household. Pulling out his cigar-case, he offered it to Gros Jean with the remark: "Your small French tables seem curious to my eyes after long acquaintance with English billiards. Are any of these gentlemen here skilled players in your fashion?"

"Oh, yes," said the innkeeper. "André there, for instance, can make big breaks. I have seen him make forty consecutive coups. Will you not take a seat for a little while and observe the play?"

"With pleasure." And Brett confirmed the favourable opinion formed of him by ordering refreshments for Beaucaire and himself and inviting the redoubtable André to join them.

He apparently took a keen interest in the game, and applauded the manner in which the Frenchman scored a series of difficult cannons.

Meanwhile he noted that between the private passage from the bar and the public one that led from the café was a room into which the light of day could not possibly penetrate. He was certain that no door communicated with it from the public passage, and he could not remember having passed one that first afternoon when La Belle Chasseuse brought him and Fairholme into the billiard-room to display her prowess as a markswoman.

It was certainly a curious apartment, and for some undefinable reason he could not prevent his mind from running upon its possible uses.

Probably the Café Noir had no cellars. The place might serve as a store room. This natural hypothesis was upset by the appearance of the waiter, who passed through the billiard-room and opened another door at the further end, through which he soon emerged, carrying a fresh supply of bottles.

"It is obvious," said Brett to himself, "that if there is no door communicating with the private passage, then the only way in which that room can be reached is by a ladder from the top. Now I wonder why that should be necessary?"

He remained in the billiard-room some twenty minutes. When Gros Jean was called on some momentary errand to the front of the house he took his departure, purposely making the mistake of quitting the room by the wrong exit. At the same instant he struck a match to relight his cigar, and while the expert billiard player, André, ran after him to direct him as to the right way he rapidly surveyed the passage. The plaster walls were smooth and unbroken on their inner side, affording no doorway exit.

Apologising to André with a laugh, he then sauntered towards the front café, where he purchased another drink at the counter. He assured himself that he had not been mistaken. The only private door out of the bar led into the passage, so that the room beyond might be regarded as an above-ground cellar, which could only be reached by a staircase through a trap-door.

"I have learnt something at any rate," he murmured as he passed out into the Boulevard, "and I imagine that my knowledge is not shared by the Paris police. Mademoiselle would have acted more wisely had she not Bile Beans Cure a Musician.

CHRONIC BILIOUSNESS AND HEADACHE ENDED.

DOCTORS FAILED TO CURE PERMANENTLY

SUFFERERS from biliousness will be interested in the remarkable story related by Mr. F. V. W. Haggard, who lives at 9 George Street, Swindon, Wilts. Mr. Haggard is a pianist who is well-known in Wiltshire; and for a long time—nearly two years, in fact—he has been a sufferer from biliousness and its attendant evils. Describing his sufferings, and the remarkable nature of his cure by Bile Beans for Biliousness, to a "Swindon Advertiser" reporter, he said:

"I have been ill for nearly two years with biliousness and sick headache, and when I was fulfilling a professional engagement this sickly sensation invariably came over me. If I went to act as accompanist at a concert or anything of the kind I could not stand the hot atmosphere, and when I retired, my head ached awfully. I tried all that money could buy to obtain relief but to no purpose. On several occasions I consulted medical men, but though their remedies proved beneficial for a short time they had no lasting effect.

At length I began to feel so ill that I thought I should have to cancel my engagements altogether, which, naturally, would have been a great loss to me.

"One day a friend of mine, knowing how much I suffered from biliousness, gave me a few Bile Beans, and recommended me to give them a fair trial. I found they did me so much good that I sent for a box, and as a result of taking them the biliousness gradually decreased. I took the Beans regularly for a time, and whenever the sickness came over me I slipped a Bean—I carried them loose in my pocket—into my mouth. They always had the effect of completely clearing my head. I continued with their use and am now entirely free from biliousness and headache and the other sensations from which I suffered so much. I am now in capital health and feel very grateful to the proprietors of Bile Beans."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are a certain cure for chronic biliousness, headache, indigestion, debility, liver and kidney disorders, pains in the side, loins, and back, constipation, piles, dizziness, sleeplessness, anæmia, and all female ailments. Also for colds, chill, neuralgia, lumbago, rheumatism, and as a preventative of influenza. Bile Beans may be had of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of prices 1/1½ or 2/9 (2/9 box contains three times 1/1½ size). They are sold only in sealed boxes; never loose.

yielded to impulse, and reserved her shooting display for a more dramatic occasion."

A Confession.

THE next morning Brett kept his appointment with the commissary. That worthy official set himself to the congenial task of examining a prisoner with the air of one who said: "Now you will see what manner of man I am. Here I am on my native heath."

He consulted bulky volumes, made notes, fussily called up various subordinates, both in person and by speaking-tube, and generally conducted himself with a business-like manner that much amused the barrister, who, however, for his own purposes took care to appear greatly impressed.

At last all was ready, and the captive of the Rue Barbette was introduced.

This precocious personage had recovered his self-possession and natural impudence during the night. By the commissary's instructions he had been well supplied with eatables, and the restrictions as to persons under detention were so relaxed as to permit him to enjoy a supply of his much-loved cigarettes. Consequently, the little thief was restored to his usual state of jaunty cheekiness.

The first part of the interrogation, which promptly ensued, was not strange to him.

"Your name?" said the commissary.

"Charles Petit."

"Age?"

"Believed to be twenty-seven, but as no record was kept of my birth I cannot be certain."

"Abode?"

"Changeable. Of late I have dwelt in the Cabaret Noir, Boulevard de Montmartre."

"You are generally known as 'The Worm?'"

"That is so."

"You have served several periods of imprisonment, and have paid over 400 francs in fines?"

"I have not kept count, but I suppose it is all written down there." And he jerked his thumb towards the conviction book, which lay on the commissary's desk.

"You are a noted thief and you obtained your nickname by reason of your dexterity in picking locks and climbing through scullery windows?"

"If you say so, monsieur, your words cannot be disputed."

"Very well." The commissary scratched a few lines on a memorandum tablet. Then he suddenly raised his quick eyes and fastened them upon the prisoner with the direct question:

"How came you to be detained in such an extraordinary manner in the house, No. 11 Rue Barbette, yesterday?"

A vacant and stolid expression intended to convey an idea of utter innocence came over "The Worm's" face.

"Believe me, monsieur," he said, "I cannot give you the slightest explanation of that extraordinary incident."

"Indeed! You surprise me. I suppose you wish me to understand that you casually strolled in out of the street and were set upon by three Turks, who gagged you and bound you with leather thongs, leaving you to starve quietly to death if you had not been rescued by reason of a chance visit paid to the place by myself and others?"

"I assure you, monsieur, that, strange as it may seem, you have almost related the facts. I went to the place in question with a very ordinary message from a Turkish gentleman with whom I had a slight acquaintance. The other Turks listened to me with the gravity peculiar to their nation, and then, before I could offer a word of remonstrance, treated me exactly as you saw."

"At what time did you go there?"

"It must have been nearly three o'clock, the day before yesterday," was the answer.

"And what message did you bring?"

"I was told to ask the Turkish gentlemen to be good enough to cross the Pont Neuf exactly at half-past six, when they could meet a friend who desired to give some information to them."

"Oh! come now," said the commissary, with a knowing smile, "that will not do, Petit. You are far too old a hand to convey such a childish message as that. What reason can you have for seeking to shield these men who treated you in a barbarous way and left you to die a cruel death?"

"On my honour——" began the thief melodramatically, but Brett here interrupted the conversation.

"Will you allow me," he said to the commissary, "to put a few questions to this man?"

"Certainly," was the answer.

"Now listen," said Brett, sternly gazing at the truculent little rascal with those searching eyes of his, which seemed to reach to the very spine. "It is useless for you to attempt any further prevarication. We know exactly who are your confederates. We are acquainted with a large number of the gang that frequents the Cabaret Noir. Do not forget that I was present when you tried to palm off on Hussein ul Mulk the false diamonds, which your confederates hoped he would accept. For you to attempt now to escape from the law is hopeless. The sole chance you have of remitting a punishment which may even lead you beneath the guillotine, is to confess fully and freely all that you know concerning the outrage which has been committed.

"No, don't interrupt me," he continued with even greater emphasis, when "Le Ver" tried to break in upon his remarks. "You will tell me that you merely acted as the agent of others, and that you yourself are not conscious of the naturo of any crime that has been committed. I know that to be so. You have been made a mere tool. You are the cat, simply employed by the monkey to pull the chestnuts out of the fire, and you have only succeeded in getting your own paws burnt. Your sole chance for safety now is to inform the commissary and me exactly how you came to be mixed up with this affair."

The Frenchman's truculency seemed to vanish under Brett's cutting words. His wizened face even manifested a faint flush of anger as the barrister pointed out how he had been duped by his employers.

Yet the order of his craft was strong in its influence, and he commenced another series of protestations.

"I assure you, gentlemen," he cried, "that with respect to the Turks I have no knowledge whatever of their pursuits or motives. I was present when this English gentleman here was debating with them, and I understood that they even went so far as to use threats against him. My mission was to give to the leaders of the Turks a package which I did not even know contained diamonds, either genuine or false. No one could

(Continued on page 159.)

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REG'D

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write

ALFOSCO REG'D

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 435

10/6

Design No. 435. 10/6.

Special Value for Half-a-Guinea. Costume made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s world-renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. All colours and sizes kept in stock. The bodice has pouched front, and is stylishly trimmed strappings of Taffeta Silk, and small buttons. Well made skirt, bell shape, inset at side, pocket, and trimmed silk and buttons to match bodice. Price only 10/6; carr. 6d. Skirt alone, 6/6; carr. 5d. BEST VALUE IN LONDON. Good fit guaranteed. This Costume made in the new "Alfosco" Tweed, all colours, will be 25/-. Patterns post free.

Design No. 1261. 10/6.

Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket. This Jacket is produced in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver Cloth; in Grey and Black Vicuna Coating; also in pretty Grey Tweeds. Price 10/6; carr. 6d. extra. This Jacket can also be ordered 33in. long, 11/6; 36in., 12/6; 39in., 13/6; and 42in., 14/6. Carr. 6d. ex. Patterns Free.

Design No. 787. 12/6.

The Costume of the Season. A marvellous production for 12/6. This smart "Alfosco" Coat & skirt is made in Allen Foster & Co.'s Venetian Cloth or Specialite Serge, all colours in stock. The Coat is lined and made in the new Russian style, trimmed Taffeta Silk and fancy buttons, full well made skirt. Price only 12/6, carr. paid 6d. ex. Measurements required are bust under arms, inside sleeve, size of waist and length of skirt in front.

Send Postcard for

PATTERNS AND NEW SKETCH BOOK

of Latest Fashions in Ladies' Costumes and Jackets.

Free on Application. Call or Write.

Design No. 787

12/6

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

(The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 55 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 472.)

PAPER PATTERN

of this

BLOUSE.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

WHENCE COMES THIS MIGHTY HEALING POWER.

All the Land Wonders at the Remarkable Cures effected by Professor Adkin.

HEALS DISEASES CALLED INCURABLE.

Ministers, Doctors and Professional Men Tell How He Has Cured the Blind, the Lame, the Paralytic and Many on the Very Brink of Death.

FREE HELP FOR THE SICK.

Professor Adkin Offers to Help All Sufferers from Any Disease Absolutely Free of Charge—Professional Men Investigate His Powers.

PROF. THOMAS F. ADKIN.
President of the Institute of Physicians and Surgeons.

In all parts of the country men and women, doctors and surgeons, clergymen and educators, are wondering at the remarkable cures made by Professor Thomas F. Adkin, discoverer of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment.

Prof. Adkin heals not by drugs, nor by Christian Science, nor by Osteopathy, nor by Hypnotism, nor by Divine Healing, but by a subtle psychic force of nature in combination with certain vital magnetic remedies which contain the very elements of life and health.

A reporter recently talked with Prof. Adkin and was asked to invite all readers of this paper who are sick or who are worried by the ills of those dear to them, to write to him for assistance. "Some people have declared," said Prof. Adkin, that my powers are of God, they call me a Divine healer, a man of mysterious powers. This is not so; I cure because I understand nature, because I use the subtle force of nature to build up the system and restore health. But at the same time I believe that the Creator would not have given me the opportunity to make the discoveries I have made or the ability to develop them, if He had not intended that I should use them for the good of humanity. I therefore feel that it is my duty to give the benefit of the science I practice to all who are suffering. I want you to tell your readers that they can write to me in the strictest confidence if they are troubled with any kind of disease, and I will thoroughly diagnose their cases absolutely free of charge and explain by a simple guaranteed home treatment how a complete cure should be effected. I care not how serious their cases, nor how hopeless they may seem, I want them to write to me and let me make them well. I feel that this is my life work."

So great is the sensation wrought in the medical world by the wonderful cures performed by Prof. Adkin, that several professional gentlemen were asked to investigate the cures. Among these gentlemen were Dr. L. B. Hawley and Dr. L. G. Doane, both famous physicians and surgeons. After a thorough and painstaking investigation these eminent physicians were so astounded at the far-reaching powers of Prof. Adkin, and the wonderful efficacy of Vitaopathy that they volunteered to forsake all other ties in life and all other kinds of treatment and devote themselves to assisting Prof. Adkin in his great work for humanity. With the discovery of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment eminent physicians are generally agreed that the treatment of disease has at last been reduced to an exact science.

In all some 8,000 men and women have been cured by the powers of Prof. Adkin. Some were blind, some were lame, some were deaf, some were paralytics, scarcely able to move, so great was their infirmity. Others were afflicted with Bright's disease, heart disease, consumption, and other so-called incurable diseases. Some were sufferers from kidney trouble, dyspepsia, nervous debility, insomnia, neuralgia, constipation, rheumatism, female troubles, and other similar ills. Some were men and women addicted to drunkenness, morphine, and other evil habits. In all cases Prof. Adkin treats he guarantees a cure. Even those on the brink of the grave, with all hope of recovery gone and despaired of by doctors and friends alike, have been restored to perfect health by the force of Vitaopathy and Prof. Adkin's marvellous skill. And, remarkable as it may seem, distance has made no difference. Those living far away have been cured in the privacy of their own homes, as well as those who have been treated in person. Prof. Adkin asserts that he can cure anyone at any distance as well as though he stood before them.

Not long ago John Adams, of Blakesbury, Ia., who had been lame or twenty years, was permanently cured by Prof. Adkin without an operation of any kind. About the same time the City of Rochester, N.Y., was startled by the cure of one of its oldest residents, Mr. P. A. Wright, who had been partly blind for a long period. John E. Neff, of Millersburg, Pa., who had suffered for years from a cataract over his left eye, was speedily restored to perfect sight, without an operation. From Logansport, Ind., comes the news of the recovery of Mrs. Mary Eicher, who had been practically deaf for a year; while in Warren, Pa., Mr. G. W. Savage, a noted photographer and artist, who was not only partially blind and deaf, but at death's door from a complication of diseases, was restored to perfect health and strength by Prof. Adkin.

Vitaopathy cures not one disease alone, but it cures all diseases when used in combination with the proper remedies. If you are sick, no matter what your disease nor who says you can not be cured, write to Prof. Adkin to-day; tell him the leading symptoms of your complaint, how long you have been suffering, and he will at once diagnose your case, tell you the exact disease from which you are suffering and prescribe the treatment that will positively cure you. This costs you absolutely nothing. Professor Adkin will also send you a copy of his marvellous new book entitled, "How to be Cured and How to Cure Others." This book tells you exactly how Prof. Adkin will cure you. It fully and completely describes the nature of his wonderful treatment. It also explains to you how you yourself may possess this great healing power and cure the sick around you.

Professor Adkin does not ask one cent for his services in this connection. They will be given to you absolutely free. He has made a wonderful discovery, and he wishes to place it in the hands of every sick person in this country, that he may be restored to perfect health and strength. Mark your letter personal when you write, and no one but Professor Adkin will see it. Address: Professor Thomas F. Adkin, Office 580 J, Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

be more surprised than myself when the Turkish gentleman produced them."

"Who sent you there with the diamonds?" said Brett.

"Even that I cannot tell you," said Petit. "It was a mere chance affair. I was seated in a café sipping some absinthe when a man asked me if I would execute a small commission for him. He explained that it was to deliver a parcel at a house not five minutes distant, and——"

"I see," interrupted Brett, with the cynical smile which so often disconcerted glib liars like Petit. "It is hopeless to expect you to tell the truth. However, I think I know a way to clear your wits. You must be brought face to face with La Belle Chasseuse. Perhaps when you are confronted with that lady in the room between the café and the billiard saloon of the Cabaret Noir——"

"The Worm" gasped out brokenly:

"Pardon, monsieur! I will tell you everything!"

Henri Dubois.

THE man's face had absolutely become livid as he listened to the barrister's words.

"Well," Brett said, "tell us now who it was that sent you to the Turks with the diamonds?"

"It was Le Jougleur, Henri Dubois."

"What?" cried the commissary, starting violently. "Henri Dubois! The most expert thief in France! A scoundrel against whom the police have vainly tried for years to secure evidence."

"I know nothing of that, monsieur," said the little man, who seemed to be strangely crestfallen, "but I am telling you the truth this time. It was he who sent me the day before yesterday to the Rue Barbette, and again yesterday, although I was very unwilling to go the second time, because, as this gentleman will tell you, they looked very like murdering me on the first occasion."

"What was the object of your visit yesterday?" said Brett.

"There, monsieur, I have told you the truth, although monsieur the commissary here thinks it was childish. My instructions really were to ask them to meet him on the Pont Neuf at 6.30 p.m., when he said he would explain everything to their satisfaction. But, above all, I was to warn them to beware of the Englishman."

"Then, why should they seize and gag you for conveying such a simple message?" demanded the commissary.

"I cannot tell. I have done them no harm. Believe me, gentlemen both, I have not the slightest idea how these diamonds were obtained, or why there should be such a fuss about them."

"How long have you known Dubois?" said Brett.

"Oh, two years more or less."

"Have you ever been associated with him before?"

"Never, monsieur. My record is there." And he again jerked his thumb towards the volume on the table. "It will tell you that I deal in small affairs. Dubois is an artist. If he found a woman's purse in the street he would return it to her with a bow, if she were rich and handsome—and with some francs added, if she were poor.

"I know little about him," he continued, "except that he is a great man. They say that he once robbed the Bank of France of 200,000 francs!"

"He is a favoured lover of La Belle Chasseuse?" demanded Brett sharply.

"The Worm" recovered his equanimity somewhat at this question. He replied with a smirk: "There are others!"

"I think not," came the quick retort. "No; there are none upon whom mademoiselle bestows such favours. She left Paris with him last night."

"The dickens!" ejaculated the little man.

"Oh, yes; and she has just passed a fortnight with him in London."

"A thousand thunders!" screamed Petit. "Her father told me she was performing in a music-hall at Marseilles."

The barrister had evidently touched a sore point, and "The Worm" was more ready than ever to tell all that he knew about Le Jongleur. But his information amounted to little more of importance. The chief fact had been ascertained, its predominant interest was the identity of the man who had planned and carried out the "Albert-gate outrage."

Brett quickly realised that to question him further was useless. Petit evidently expected to be set at liberty at once. In this however, he was disappointed, for the commissary curtly remanded him to the cells.

Brett, on the other hand, made up his mind that "The Worm" at liberty might be more valuable to him than "The Worm" in gaol. So he asked the commissary, as a favour to himself, to set Petit free, first giving the thief to understand that he owed his release to the barrister's intervention.

This was done, and Le Ver was voluble in his expressions of gratitude.

Brett soon cut these short.

"Here," he said, "are a couple of louis for your immediate necessities. I am living at the Grand Hotel, and I want you to call there each morning at ten o'clock. You will inquire at the office if Mr. Brett has left any message for you. Then if I need your services I will be able to reach you early."

Petit protested that he would serve monsieur most willingly, and soon afterwards the barrister took leave of the commissary, promising that worthy official to keep him fully posted as to further developments, and secure for him, and him only, the ultimate credit of capturing such a noted thief as Dubois on condition that no active interference was made by the police.

During the afternoon Brett received a visit from his actor acquaintance, who brought him a telegram from Marseilles. It read:

"Mlle. Beaucaire has obtained an engagement here at the Palais de Glâce. She makes her first appearance on Monday evening." Brett smiled.

"This is certain," he said to himself. "They left Paris on Thursday night and they probably will not reach Marseilles until Monday. I have plenty of time to hear Talbot's story from his own lips before I take my departure for the South."

An hour later he was seated in his room smoking and reading a magazine when the waiter appeared.

"A lady and three gentlemen wish to see monsieur," he explained.

He rose promptly, and accompanied the man to the foot of the staircase. There, near the elevator, he saw Edith Talbot, Lord Fairholme, and Sir Hubert Fitzjames, whilst with them was a tall, handsome young man, whose face bore a great resemblance to that of the girl.

Edith was the first to catch sight of him.

"Oh, Mr.—Mr. Brett, I cannot tell you how grateful I am to you! Here is my brother!"

"I am indeed glad to see you," said Brett, shaking Talbot's hand heartily.

"Then how shall I find words to explain myself?" was the reply, "for in my case there is joined to the pleasure of making a much-desired acquaintance the knowledge that to your efforts I am indebted for my liberty and possibly for my reputation."

"We have much to say to each other," said the barrister. "I suppose you have secured rooms in the hotel?" he continued, turning to Miss Talbot.

"Oh, yes, everything is settled," she cried. "Please take us all somewhere at once where we can talk quietly."

Brett answered with a smile: "Lord Fairholme and I have a sitting-room which we use in common, and which has already been the scene of many earnest conferences. Let us go there."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Point of Etiquette.

"HENRY" and his wife were staying with some relations some time ago. They had arranged to go out to a concert with one of the latter—his wife's sister. At the last moment, "HENRY'S" wife felt unwell, and did not wish to go to the concert. "HENRY" was placed between leaving his wife on the one hand and neglecting her sister on the other. Who should have the preference?

* * * *

I think the best thing would have been for "HENRY" to have seen the sister to her seat in the concert, and have then returned to his wife. At the end of the concert he could arrange to meet the sister and escort her home. He would thus neglect nobody.

A Libelled Lover.

"JESSE" was for long in love with a girl, until some friends told her things about him which were untrue. He told her the stories were false, but without convincing her, and she left him. Since this he has met another girl who seems to be very fond of him, but he does not feel that he returns her affection. In fact, the first girl was the only one he feels he can love.

* * * *

The first girl, "JESSE," cannot care for you much if she will be so easily led away from you by stories which have been told her by third parties. Have you written to her to prove to her the stories are not true, giving her clear proof, and making her ashamed of herself for crediting them? This is what a maligned man should do. If you have, and she still disbelieves you, then she cannot care for you. Better by far try to return the affection of the second girl.

'Twixt Two Suitors.

How are you to act when you are in love with one man but receiving attentions from another, whose friendship you very much like, but for whom you have no feelings of affection? To tell man No. 2 you do not care for him would hurt his feelings greatly, and although you love man No. 1, he has not proposed, or even hinted at an intention to become engaged to you. This is the position in which "SOPHIE" finds herself.

* * * *

If "SOPHIE" has no love whatever for man No. 2, she should make that perfectly clear to him. It were better he knew it now than waited until a time when the blow would be more severe. Secondly, if man No. 1 really loves her he will keep a sharp look-out on man No. 2, and soon see that he does not get the upper hand in the transaction—that is, if he is a man of ordinary construction. Meanwhile "SOPHIE" had better convey to man No. 1 in as tactful as way a possible the fact that she would much like to become engaged to him.

Too Presumptuous.

"W. J." took a fancy to a girl some time ago, and wrote to her. The letter was inclosed in that of a friend of hers, a device adopted by "W. J." so that the girl's parents should not know of it. Since this she has never showed any wish to become intimate with him. He is to meet her again soon. How should he act to gain her approbation?

* * * *

Is "W. J." sure the girl even cares a little bit for him? Her action rather suggests that she does not return his admiration. Otherwise a girl would not so strongly oppose a letter from a man, provided the letter were not too presumptuous in tone. If "W. J.'s" letter was worded indiscreetly, he owes the girl an apology, and when he meets her again should tender it. If she accepts it, then he should try to prove to her that he is deserving of her respect. Perhaps his mistake is too great eagerness to make the girl his sweetheart without even knowing whether she has taken to him.

Bad-Tempered Husbands.

"B. H." complains of the temper of her husband. Sometimes, she tells me, he behaves like a fiend, at others he is as loving as a man could be. In the former cases he abuses her and almost goes to the length of violence. At other times he brings her presents, and takes her out to amusements. How is this to be explained, and how can a wife act under the circumstances, seeing that her husband is evidently fond of her?

* * * *

It is a position which only too often happens in domestic life. Every man has his bad moments and his good ones. For a single man it matters not a bit, for he has nobody, generally speaking, upon whom to vent his ill-temper. But a married man has his wife, who accordingly suffers. Of course, everything depends on the man. There are so many ways of dealing with them. Some husbands in tempers are best met in meek silence, others fought by an equal display of heat. But the most effective cure is to convey to a man that he is making himself ridiculous.

* * * *

I know one married woman who cured her husband's ill temper by treating his caprices as nothing but a joke. He found he could not anger her at all, and finally gave up the attempt. When he found it coming on, instead of abusing his wife he went out and chopped wood. Perhaps this would act on your own husband. Try it and see.

An Old Affair.

THREE years ago "M. W." and "NELLIE" were sweethearts. Then something happened and they parted, only to see each other at rare intervals. The other day they had a chat, and, while he was talking to her, "M. W." felt as though their relations were the same as of old, and that he could resume his love for her. Do I think it is possible for two people who have been estranged for so long to again become lovers?

* * * *

It is quite possible. There must be something in common between you, which all the quarrels in the world have not finally driven away, as is clear from the fact that you felt your love returning when you chatted with her. If you really feel you could love her again, and wish to resume the relationship, I should cultivate the girl afresh. She may, of course, have altered in her own feelings, but of that you will soon be able to judge.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

TO-DAY
SEND FOR H. SAMUEL'S
GREAT MONEY SAVER
FREE!

SEE FOR YOURSELF THE ENORMOUS SAVINGS

THAT WILL RESULT FROM DEALING DIRECT WITH

H. SAMUEL.

SEND A POST-CARD NOW FOR HIS

BIG FREE GUIDE.

Contains nearly 200 Pages, over 3,000 Engravings of Astounding Bargains of Highest Value at LOWEST FACTORY PRICES. HALF YOUR OUTLAY SAVED!

Ladies' Gold Watches, 21/-; Gent's Silver Watches, 8/6; Real Silver Alberts, 3/9; Gold Brooches, 3/6; Real Gold Rings (Set with Real Stones), 6/6. And Thousands of other Genuine Bargains.

FREE PRIZES TO BUYERS! TEN LISTS IN EACH GUIDE!

DON'T DELAY! WRITE AT ONCE!!

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S

PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as.

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

Madame Sarah Bernhardt

writes:

"I desire to express to you my entire "admiration for your magnificent Gramo- "phone. Yesterday, while listening to "the Habanera of 'Carmen,' I thought "I was listening, not to the echo of the "voice of Calvé, but Calvé herself—the "marvellous and only Calvé. I am still "affected by it, and I wished to express to "you at once my recognition—and so I do.

"(Signed)

"Sarah Bernhardt."

The above is a literal Translation of the original.

THE GRAMOPHONE AND TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 City Road, London

And at Berlin, Hanover, Paris, Vienna, St. Petersburg, Brussels, Amsterdam, Milan, Sydney, Calcutta, Barcelona.

SHORT STORIES

THE DAINTY HOME STORY PAPER. TARTAN COVER No. 8.—CLERGY.

No. 736.] Week ending February 7, 1903. [Price One Penny.

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

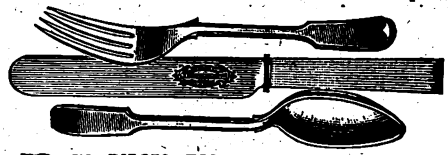
. . . THE . . .

"ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Of Household Cutlery and Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of "Columbian" Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.



51 PIECES FOR 25 SHILLINGS.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.

TERMS. Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if you are not perfectly satisfied.

No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Cutlery and Plate, etc., Post free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Warnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ros Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s¼d. tins everywhere.

Don't Suffer from Eczema

"ANTEXEMA" cures the worst cases—You may try it FREE.

Let no one endure any longer the Itching, burning, and smarting of Eczema, or any form of skin trouble, great or small. Send to-day for a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA," together with copyright treatise on "Skin Troubles," and 200 testimonials from grateful sufferers who have been cured. Sent in plain wrapper, post-paid, by the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, N.W. "ANTEXEMA" is sold by all Chemists at 1/1½ (post-free from us for 1/3). Refuse injurious substitutes.

ZOX for Neuralgia at Night.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

SPLENDID SERIAL STORY STARTS SHORTLY.

Short Stories.

No. 736.] For the Week Ending February 7th, 1903. [One Penny.

The Chronicles o' Glencrackit.

BY G. VINCENT-HOLYTOWN.

MacPherson the Diplomatist.

"So ye're determined tae gang Sooth, but at the same time ye want me to advise ye tae dae it, like."

In seemingly-abstracted fashion did the canny Andrew MacPherson address this acid remark to his nephew, Norval Menzies, a strapping youngster of twenty-two.

The younger man did not relish the insinuation, and his ruddy complexion flushed a deeper red as he replied:

"Not at all, uncle, you have taken me up wrongly. I have determined to go South and make my way in the world. I asked for no advice as to whether I should go or stay, but simply told you as a matter of respect, that I was going. Would you have me rush off without giving you some warning?"

"Ye w'u'd hardly dae that, I'm thinking," was Andrew MacPherson's ruminative reply, made with impassive face.

Harmless as the words might appear, they cloaked another stab for young Menzies.

"I shall not ask you for a penny," he flared up, "if that's what you mean."

Norval was a poor match for the elder man in any bout of words. Twice already during the interview had he lost his temper through his uncle's apparently careless remarks, which had really been designed for this very purpose. The advantage of course fell to Mr. MacPherson, who looked up in bewildered deprecation of his nephew's outburst.

"Did I say ye w'u'd?" he queried mildly, continuing. "Look here, Norval, ye'll no' need tae ask for siller tae stairt ye in life, for I'll gie ye what's necessary without asking."

"Oh, uncle Andrew, you are too kind, but I couldn't think——"

"Nae mair could your puir mither, ma man. A thochtless, freevolous lass she was, wi' nae mair sense in her heid than tae mairry a man like Menzies."

"He was my father," burst in Norval, with flashing eye.

"There's nae gainsaying that," resumed Mr. MacPherson composedly, "ye're as like him in your folly as could be. He was aye rushin' ram-stam intae a' mainner o' trouble, heedless o' advice, and he w'u'd aye scatter what little siller he had without ony thocht for the morrow."

"And yet everybody liked him!"

"Oh, ay, everybody liked him for that very reason, he lavished his substance amang them. I'm pleased tae think I can dispense wi' that spurious kin' o' popularity. I could lectur' ye for hours on the fuilish, extravagant things your puir faither and mither did when they were alive——"

"Had they no redeeming features, uncle?"

"They had, Norval, though they w'u'dna heed ma advice, they could at least listen tae it without interruption."

Norval felt deservedly rebuked, and allowed his uncle to finish without further comment.

"Aye, ma man, ye'll need siller tae stairt ye in London. Ye can prey upon the Soothron tae your he'rt's content, for he expects ye tae dae it and raither likes it. But ye'll ha'e tae dae it in a frock-coat and a silk hat, and tha'e braw things cost bawbees. Ye understaun' that rig-oot constitutes the naitional garb o' an Englishman, and he tak's it as a personal compliment when ye wear it, for he believes ye've been brocht up tae wear naithing but kilts in Scotland. Moreover, Norval, ye'll ha'e tae drop your pronoonced Scottish accent and speak the English language in a' its purity, the same as mysel'. When I was in London last, a man in a shop there (wha was selling me some guids at the time) assured me that unless I'd tell't him I was Scottish he w'u'd never ha'e guessed it. And noo, Norval, tae conclude, whenever ye're ready tae stairt for London, I'm ready tae stairt ye."

"I don't know how to thank you enough, uncle, I'm sure," began Norval, with glistening eye, but Mr. MacPherson closured him immediately.

"Dinna try then," he broke in huskily, "I promised your puir faither on his death-bed that I'd mak' a man o' ye; and I will. Aye, he was a fine man, was Menzies, I hope ye'll be like him in everything."

Andrew MacPherson's words might occasionally be inconsistent but not so his acts.

* * * * *

Long after young Menzies had left the room, Andrew MacPherson sat still, pondering sadly over his impending loneliness.

A bachelor, he found himself in the full prime of life, absolutely without relatives other than his young nephew. Upon him he lavished in his own curious, dogmatic way, the affection he had bestowed upon his only sister, Mrs. Menzies, and her husband, in their lifetime, unhappily cut short by a deadly epidemic. And now the young man was leaving him, as after all was to be expected, to push his way in the world. Andrew MacPherson had often thought of marrying, but the near departure of Norval decided it, and for Andrew MacPherson to make a decision meant immediate action.

He had always been on terms of the most friendly intimacy with the Misses Leslie, aunt and niece, who lived on the next farm. Possessing a warm liking for them both, he had never yet made up his mind which to admire the more.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

At one time the younger lady's winning ways and gentle loveliness would attract most of his attention, while at another the sound common-sense and business ability of her aunt, who was not much more than a decade her senior, would extort his deeper admiration.

At this particular phase of his mind, however, the sentimental very naturally prevailed over the practical, and he accordingly determined to approach Marion Leslie with a proposal of marriage in preference to her Aunt Helen.

That very evening he proceeded to put his fortune to the test, by calling on the young lady in question.

Awkwardly enough, he could not, of course, be aware, that his nephew had forestalled him the previous day. Indeed, out of Norval's proposal to and acceptance by Marion Leslie, had arisen his sudden impulse to rush South and fight the world on her behalf. He had not told her of his design, having (with the brilliant suddenness inherited from his father), only thought it up that morning. As we have seen, too, he did not find, or take, an opportunity of explaining to his uncle, the reason of his determination to go South.

Out of this combination of circumstances, therefore, a very delicate situation was bound to be brewing.

"Come in, Mr. MacPherson," was his smiling welcome by the young lady herself, who opened the door to him; "Aunt Helen will be in presently."

"Weel, Marion," commenced Andrew deliberately; "I dinna ken if your Aunt Helen's presence is an absolute necessity, on this occasion, I raither think no'. The fact is, that I've come tae see ye in consequence o' an interview I had wi' Norval Menzies this forenoon."

Marion flushed and toyed uneasily with her crochet-needle.

"Then he has told you!" she said, in a voice that strove not to be tremulous.

"Of coorse he has, wha' else should he tell it tae if no' tae his mither's brither?" inquired Andrew MacPherson in a tone of challenge.

"Indeed, as you say, Mr. MacPherson, to whom else?" rejoined Marion, a little more confidently; "Norval is always straightforward."

"Like his faither afore him, Marion," said MacPherson proudly; "Menzies w'u'd n'ither tell nor act a lee tae save life or siller. Efter his maist fuilish speculations he w'u'd aye come and tell me the ungarnished truth. I aye liked Menzies. . . . Weel, ye can imagine that this means a big cheenge in ma life——"

"But not to take place for a long time yet——"

"Immediately, Marion, accordin' tae the idea he conveyed tae me. He's just like Menzies, his faither, let him tak' a thing intae his heid and it's got tae be done on the spot."

"He is impetuous, I know," murmured Marion; "but such urgency in the matter must have rested entirely on your permission."

"In that connection, Marion, I intimated tae him in the plainest o' words that whenever he's ready tae stairt, I'm ready tae stairt him, and if he's like his faither afore him, he's no' likely tae dally long."

"How good of you, Mr. MacPherson," stammered Marion, blushing profusely.

"Nonsense, I couldna dae less . . Noo, ye w'u'd hardly ha'e suspected, Marion, that a bachelor o' sae mony years standing, like masel', could regaird mairriage as a desirable thing——"

Marion's gaze dropped as he continued: "But the fac' remains, Marion, that I dae, and seeing that Norval's goin' tae leave me so soon, I've decided tae get mairried——" Marion's eyes were lifted to his face with a puzzled expression—"at once, and, as I've already hinted, I've called tae ask ye if ye'll dae me the honour tae become ma——"

"Stop, stop, Mr. MacPherson," broke in Marion in an anguish of shame; "there is some terrible misunderstanding. Norval—that is—I—I am—I am already——"

The poor girl could get no further with her words, nor would Andrew MacPherson permit her to try, stopping her attempt with a peremptory wave of the hand. A keen-witted man at all times he had instantly grasped the real circumstances.

Possessing diplomacy of no mean order, this knowledge enabled him to save the situation, spare her feelings, and retain his own dignity, even at this late stage of the interview.

"There's nae misunderstaunin' ava," he said, with assumed peevishness. "The main fault o' women-folk is that they canna listen tae the feenish o' what a man's got tae say. Ma words were these—and if ye dinna interrupt me I'll try tae mak' an end o' them—I've decided tae get mairried at once, and, as I've already hinted, I've called tae ask ye if ye'll dae me the honour tae become ma—deputy tae your Aunt Helen. I'm a bashful man and I thocht ye w'u'd dae it better than masel'."

Marion, dazed but willing, promptly agreed to the request, and Andrew MacPherson solemnly took his leave, repeating to her at parting—"There's nae misunderstaunin' ava. I'm prepared tae substantiate every word I said."

When Andrew MacPherson got home, the first sound that greeted his ears, was the melodious tenor voice of his nephew in full song:—

Though I leave thee now in sorrow,
Joy may light our loves to-morrow,
Doomed to part, this faithful heart,
One gleam of joy from hope shall borrow.

The singer was at his evening toilet, and, not having heard any one enter, he got a start when his uncle spoke, at the conclusion of his stanza:

"Ye're just like your faither, Norval. Menzies was aye happiest when he had eicht or nine assorted dooms, o' his ain making, hanging o'er his heid. I observe also that ye borrow your gleams o' joy frae the same source as your puir faither did. But wha, may I ask, doomed ye tae pairt, but yoursel'?"

Norval guessed from the quizzical look on his uncle's face that his love-secret was revealed, though how, he could not imagine.

"However do you manage to find things out as you do, Uncle Andrew?" he queried in nervous banter.

"Through the studied language o' diplomacy, ma lad," replied Mr. MacPherson cautiously. "And see here, Norval," he continued meaningly; "raither than leave onybody in sorrow, I think it w'u'd be better for a' concerned if ye w'u'd stay where ye are. If ye conteenue tae manage ma beesiness affairs as ye have done in the past, I can promise ye a salary commensurate wi' an early mairriage. In fac', I've conveyed the impression, tae the richt quarter, that ye're anxious tae be mairried and settled doon as soon as convenient, and that I've raither encooraged the idea——"

Andrew MacPherson broke off the subject, to open a note that was handed in for him, and Norval's outburst of gratitude was wasted on him for the time being, for the letter was of paramount importance:

"Dear Mr. Macpherson," it ran; "Aunt Helen says she cannot recognise any deputy in the matter at issue, although she might favourably consider any reasonable proposal by the principal direct, yours sincerely, Marion Leslie."

"I'll ha'e tae gang oot again, Norval," he said.

"Is it anything I can do for you, uncle?"

"No, Norval, ma man, this is a personal maitter that canna be done by proxy. I've tried that already withoot success."

Digitized by Google

A Tangled Love Skein.

The Story of a Double Sacrifice.

"So you are sent out to be my successor here, eh?"

This was the greeting accorded to Harry Stenlake as he presented himself to a man who appeared to be anything between twenty-five and fifty—a man with a heavy moustache and beard, a complexion that made one hesitate to say that it was bronzed because there was a certain tinge of whiteness about it, and a young-old sort of look about his face. His frame ought to have had a suggestion of great strength, yet the new-comer, Harry Stenlake, could see that the man was weak.

"Yes, my name is Stenlake, and I am instructed by the firm in the Old Country to take up the duties while you have a rest before taking up a better appointment at home."

Stenlake spoke with a feeling of uneasiness; he had come out to Peru full of hope, but hope seemed to be oozing out of his finger tips. It almost appeared as if, in shaking hands with his predecessor, the hope that had been in him had passed out to James Thornton, and thus their respective sentiments had been altogether reversed.

Thornton eyed him curiously, and then invited him into the small wooden dwelling which he had facetiously called "Liberty Cottage."

It was a relief to get out of the broiling sun, and Stenlake heaved a sigh before partaking of the refreshments offered to him by his host.

They chatted about England for a while, the journey out, and kindred topics, afterwards turning to the question nearest the heart of Stenlake.

"The duties?" repeated Thornton. "Oh, I can't say that they are hard. You have a lot of natives to look after, and there are a fair number of people who are descendants of Spaniards and natives; we call them mestizos. There are good and bad among them, but you will get along without trouble if you study them a bit. Mining is the chief occupation, as you are aware, but the employees get various things from the forest trees—fruits, gum, and other articles, as well as several articles from the ground in the forest (miniature mining, I call that). We export a lot, sending it to the agent in Lima to the order of the firm. Well, you superintend all that. There isn't much knowledge of mining required to get the ore, because we have no costly machinery or up-to-date processes."

"So, on the whole, it is a pretty easy job?" queried Stenlake, with the intonation of a man who feels that he is asking a question to which he would like to receive an affirmative reply, but expects a negative.

Thornton gazed at him for nearly a minute without speaking.

"You have taken the job and I suppose you've got enough British pluck in you to stick at it and do your best, so I'll tell you how it stands. If I thought you were the sort of fellow that turned tail and left a man in the lurch, I wouldn't tell you. I'm glad that you've relieved me of my appointment."

Despite himself, a shiver ran through Stenlake's frame. He looked at the other man.

"You're strong, I should say," pursued Thornton slowly, "and you will want a strong constitution to stand these fevers and the climate generally. I was strong, but three years of it have broken me up, I fancy. Why did I come out? Well, why did you?"

"I tell you frankly," responded Harry Stenlake. "I didn't seem to get a chance of making headway at home. Luck has been against me for years. I had to relinquish my mining education because my father went smash and died, so I was prevented from taking a good berth and rising in the world. I jogged on from one thing to another, and I fell in love. But I hadn't much to offer, and we agreed to wait till I could get £200 a year. We have waited more than three years, and at last I thought that if I got a place like this, she might come out and marry me, and, later, we could go back and I should get a decent appointment. They are giving me £300 a year for this job, which I suppose is equal to £200 in London."

"I didn't come here to gain the woman I loved, but to get away from her!" laughed Thornton. But the laugh had no mirth in it. "But the difference is, no doubt, that the girl loves you, but the one I mean didn't love me, so it appeared!"

"I don't see how I can bring her here if——" began Stenlake.

"It would mean death to her!" interrupted Thornton decisively. "It is commonly supposed that you don't get yellow fever here, because it's too far inland; but you get a very good imitation, to say the least! Then there are other fevers and little 'ills' that man is heir too! However, perhaps you are better able to endure them than I, and it will lead to something better," he added, suddenly remembering that it was bad policy to scare a man. "It means a little extra waiting, that's all!"

That was Stenlake's introduction to his new sphere. During the next three days he was busy with Thornton, and he felt more buoyant. On the fourth day, Thornton took his departure, and Stenlake set his teeth and determined to do his best.

"It's all for her," he muttered, "and this may be the making of me! Thornton didn't seem much interested in my love affairs, for he never asked her name. Too eager to get away, of course. I wonder if he'll go to the girl who wouldn't have him when he gets home? Likely enough! It is strange what love will make you do!"

Harry Stenlake threw himself with ardour into the work of his new position, encouraged by the thought of Millie Darrell's sweet face and buoyed up by the hope that he would escape the evils to which Thornton had nearly succumbed. Hope, says the poet, springs eternal in the human breast, and Stenlake persuaded himself that there were reasons why he should succeed where his predecessor had failed.

Digitized by Google

"I am not so strong as he is or was," he would say to himself, "but, then, it is precisely the strong men who fall victims to these complaints of malaria and fever, because they don't take sufficient precautions."

Yellow fever and malaria seemed a long way off, but Stenlake soon learnt that he was not a great distance from the Amazon, and—well, some of the mestizos fell ill, and that was ominous.

He made himself master of the situation and soon became a favourite with those under him. There were only three Europeans among them; not exactly the sort of men whom he could accept as associates, and he was glad that they had habitations at a considerable distance from his own.

His household work was performed by a native woman, but at the end of a month she stated her intention of going back to her own village and he was forced to look about for another domestic servant. There was not much to be done, but that little must be done.

He sighed for the presence of Millie. It was not a particularly pleasant spot for her, so far from civilisation, yet he thought that they could be happy in each other's society, and in that alone. It was lonely for him, and he gradually began to have a gleam of understanding as to why some men did not take enough care of themselves. There was the temptation to drink, just to pass the time, and there was no difficulty in getting a strong drink, for the natives brewed it from certain forest products. Then the desire to walk about in order to escape the loneliness, the deadly monotony; he did it himself one night, plunging into the forest, and he returned shivering. He was wise enough to take warning. He had not brought much reading matter with him, and he longed for company.

His second domestic help was rather worse than the first, as a companion with whom to exchange a few words, and, lonely as he felt, he was usually not sorry to see her retire to her own hut.

The workers were better off than he, for they formed a village—rather a scattered one, perhaps, but they lived with their families and had neighbours. He could not associate with them; that would have meant loss of caste.

So four months passed. He had received two letters from Millie, and had just replied cheerily to the second. Yet he was not so cheerful nor so full of hope as he made out. The climate and the circumstances were affecting him.

His second help now left him and he was sorry, for he did not feel well; but he nearly jumped with delight when he saw before him a young native woman of about three-and-twenty and heard her ask, in a mixture of Spanish and a corruption of what had once been the language of the country, if he wanted a servant.

Yes, of course he wanted a servant, he told her. Did she want the situation? She did, and almost before he knew what he had done, and certainly without reflection, he had engaged her.

"Ivara," he called to her that same evening, "I have not seen you here before. Have you been at work on the estate?"

He had picked up the jumble of a lingo very well, and she understood him perfectly. She shook her head, and he fancied that the shadow of a look of disdain crossed her face. A beautiful face it was, and full of subdued dignity.

"Looks like a daughter of the Incas, the ancient Kings of Peru!" he mused, but his musing was interrupted by her reply.

"A woman of my lineage does not herd with such as they!" she replied proudly. "It would be better to die! I have wandered in search of work with those who are my equals, for I have to earn my bread, and it is hard to find suitable employment."

He was interested. He asked questions, and that evening passed more pleasantly than any since he had left England. Ivara claimed descent from the Incas, rightly or wrongly; Stenlake was inclined to say that she was right in that claim. She had told him very little, being reserved and dignified, but it was clear that she was pleased by the interest he displayed.

The time passed quite differently now; he was usually busy during the day, and in the evening he would find his tea-supper ready for him and Ivara ready to listen to the stories he told her of the island in the north of which everybody spoke so much. Sometimes she would unfold a little of the history of her own strange country, as it had come down to her by oral tradition, but she said very little of herself. She had grown up in an out-of-the-way place in the north; and Stenlake wondered whether there was some wealthy hidden city—some new Cuzco—up there.

Another two months passed, and then Harry had his first attack of fever; he had been fortunate to escape so long, if what Thornton had said was correct. On the evening of the day preceding his illness he had written to Millie Darrell, and had incidentally remarked that he did not feel very well, but it was merely a passing indisposition.

However, he had a fairly bad attack, and he came back to everyday work afterwards with a weakened frame and an uneasy mind. He had realised two things, namely, that it was not at all certain that he would be able to complete his three years, and—that Ivara loved him!

The two months of agreeable intercourse had not been without its effect on her, and he was conscious that he had abstained from mentioning Millie's name. During his illness he might have raved of her, but if so, Ivara had not understood or was hiding the knowledge within her own heart.

He had not made love to her, he told himself; he had never faltered in his loyalty to Millie, but he blamed himself for having engaged the services of Ivara, and for having availed himself of her companionship at those times when he did not require her help in the cottage. Yet it had been pleasant to pass the time, the long, dull hours, with someone of refinement and sense.

After the way in which she had attended to him during his attack he could not treat her otherwise than he had previously done; it would have been too bad to dismiss her to her own hut immediately on the conclusion of the meal to pass the time in solitude. That would have looked like ingratitude, and he was not ungrateful! So the old companionship was continued, and he defended his action by specious argument.

Ivara was not like a white woman; although refined—very refined for a native—she was but a native, and they were not capable of the finer feelings of the more cultured whites. What he had fancied to be love on her part was nothing more than the faithful devotion of an inferior; it was not love, for she would not dream for a moment that she could unite herself to one of the superior race.

"I am very glad that I decided not to alter the course of things," he remarked to himself at the close of a particularly pleasant evening. "In my weak condition a few days ago I fancied a lot of nonsense! There's no harm in enjoying a little society of a congenial kind till I can get out of this hole and get back to Millie!"

Harry Stenlake's recovery was very slow; his strength was a long time returning, and, although he went about his ordinary duties, he was conscious of a lack of strength and energy. It was this condition that made him take a perverted view of circumstances.

Digitized by Google

For nearly six weeks he struggled on, during which time he received a visit from the agent at Lima, who went away with a grave face. Then Stenlake was laid low by another attack of illness, and hovered between life and death for several days. Occasionally he had a lucid interval, and he saw Ivara waiting upon him. He shuddered and shut his eyes, vaguely wishing that the fever would take him, for he recognised only too well the look in her face.

It was love, all absorbing love! And once, only once, he detected an expression of jealousy or hate! He must have raved about Millie!

Then he must have had a relapse, for a long blank ensued. He regained consciousness one evening towards dusk, and his senses seemed to come back fully and all at once. He heard a voice, pitched in rather a high key; it was Ivara's. She was speaking English, which she had picked up by practice with him.

"I love him! He is mine! You no take him 'way! I have watch, tend him! I will not lose him!" Then followed a flow of language in her native tongue, showing that her feelings had so gained the mastery that it was impossible to confine herself to a little-known language—a strange tongue, in order to express them.

The words struck him, cutting him like a knife. She was talking to someone, surely. Had the agent sent someone to replace him so that he might return "unfit for service?"

"You no take him!" It was Ivara again, speaking in a lower tone, but with intense feeling, and again using the language that was strange to her. "You no take h m! No, no, no!"

Why was she speaking English? To the agent, or his messengers, she would speak the mixed language or Spanish. Then another voice fell on his ear, and he gasped, "Millie!"

"I do not understand. Mr. Stenlake is my betrothed husband, and I am to take him to England. It is very kind of you to wait on him, and you have earned our undying gratitude. We can never thank you sufficiently. But you are mistaken, Ivara!"

The words were uttered softly, as one speaks when one is sorry for another. Ivara must have comprehended the meaning of some of what she heard, for she answered:

"We ask him to—what?—escoger—ah! select! We go in, when he wake and ask him choose—yes, choose one! Which he loves best. See!"

"Poor Ivara!" mentally said Stenlake.

He saw his error now; the native woman, rather than being less capable of love than her white sister, was in reality more vehement. With the women of a warmer clime the emotions are deeper, less restrained, and she loved him with all the fire of her ardent nature.

Stenlake heard footsteps outside the cottage, and the voices ceased. Then he heard another speaker—a man. It was James Thornton!

"Has he come round yet? He appeared better and he ought to have opened his eyes by now." A pause, during which Stenlake imagined Thornton eyeing the two women. "I'll go in and see!"

He entered, and on seeing Stenlake looking towards him advanced with a smile.

"Ah, there you are, Stenlake! Come back to earth once more, eh? You've had a good bout this time, but you're pulling through. As soon as you get a bit stronger, I'm going to ship you off to the Old Country, so make haste and get well, my boy!"

He sat down by the side of the bed and took Harry's hand.

"What does it all mean?" asked Harry feebly. "Why is Millie here?"

He did not notice a strange look that passed over Thornton's face, nor did the strained tone of the reply attract his attention.

"I brought her, you see! You'll know all about it soon, but don't worry yourself now. You've got to get well quickly and go home. Now, if you feel strong enough I'll bring her in to see you!"

He left the room, and the next moment Millie Darrell appeared in the doorway.

"Millie, darling!" cried Harry ecstatically, holding out his weak arms.

She rushed to his bedside. At the door, watching the reunion, were Ivara and Thornton. The latter turned away, his teeth nearly piercing his lip in his effort to strangle a groan. Ivara watched for two or three seconds longer, then she also turned away with the words, in her own tongue, "He has chosen!"

In the outer room Ivara sank on a stool and wept. Thornton gazed at her curiously, but did not disturb her. When she looked up, he addressed her.

"It is not difficult to guess your secret, Ivara," he said tenderly, speaking in the dialect of the district. "I, too, have loved and lost! Let me tell you what she is doubtless telling him! When I went back to England, which was some time after I had left here, I determined to seek the girl who had told me that she loved another better than me. I found her. She still loved him. I learnt that he was the very man who had taken my place here! I felt that it was death to him if he stayed, and she had learnt from the firm that he had been ill.

"That was my chance. He might have died here, my rival! But I loved her, and gave up the chance. I undertook to return here, to relieve him, on condition that my appointment there was given to him. I have some money, and I brought her here to take him away. They can go back and be happy, while I—stop here!" There was a terrible significance in those last words. "Ivara, the women of your race have pluck. Show it!"

Ivara bowed.

"Let them go and be happy!" she said; "for his sake! I will stay and serve you, if you will have me."

"Good!" rejoined Thornton briefly. "Each of us has loved and lost. We can be companions in misfortune, thankful that we have helped to make the loved ones happy!"

George Day.

Housekeeper: "I ordered a dozen oranges to-day, Mr. Titefyst, and you only sent me eleven. How was that?" Grocer: "Well, ma'am, one of them was bad, and I didn't think you'd want it."

"I don't want mother to marry again," said a boy one day at breakfast. "Why not?" was asked, with some surprise. "Because," said he, "I've had one father, and I don't want the trouble of getting to know another."

£5 a Week for Life!

This is the

HUGE PRIZE OFFERED BY

Pearson's Weekly.

For particulars, see page 179.

Digitized by Google

. . A Chip of . . the Old Block.

A Chapter of the Life Story that . . is Always New. . . .

"Then I just won't!—and there's an end of it!"

"And that's your last word, Marcie?"

"I've said so, haven't I?—what more do you want?"

"I hardly know, dear, since you put it in that way; because—well—because your having said your last word makes it useless for me to tell you what it is that I not only really want, but am hungering and thirsting for!"

"And that's something which I've been trying my hardest this half hour past to tell you. Tim Moffat, you can't, and never can have—so there!"

"All right, my gal!" he answered her. "I suppose you knows your own mind. Anyways, I shan't trouble you again. I wishes you well, Marcie—and a coronet, if you can manage to get one."

"Well, there's more unlikely things in the world than that. I'm as good as a play-actress—ain't I? If one of them brazen hussies can gammon a lord into weddin' of her; what's to prevent me, I should like to know, from doing the same, if I gets the chance?"

"Nothin', Marcie, nothin'! You're pretty enough, if that's anything."

"You don't say so! Compliments is passing. But it ain't no good. Tim Moffat, you won't catch me with a bit o' sugar! House o' Lords, or coster's barrer, take it from me, my lad, as I'm for your betters, so you'd best make up your mind to it, and own up to a tumble."

"Oh, I own's you've chucked me; if that's what you mean. I don't blame you. I only wants to know one thing; tell me that and I'll keep out of your shadder for the rest of my natural."

"What is it?"

"Is Jack the Dandy at the bottom of it?"

"At the bottom of what?"

"Of my tumble."

"What if he is?"

"Oh, nothin', only I'd just like to know, that's all."

"Then you won't—leastways, not from me!"

"I see—it is him!"

"I didn't say so."

"Well, you as good as; and that's enough for me."

"Now look here, Tim Moffat—it may be enough for you, but it's too much for me. You're a low, sneakin' coward!—that's what you are! If Jack the Dandy likes a walk with me, what's it got to do with you? You're too much like your father to suit me. He's afraid to say 'bo! to a goose,' and you—why, you'd faint to look an egg in the face."

The tall, sturdy young fellow whom the little spitfire was scorching to the full extent of her tongue, winced, big as he was, at the insult.

They were standing on the fringe of a holiday crowd on Hampstead Heath. For the past two years Tim Moffat, limelight man at a well known East End theatre, had been the sport of pretty little Marcie Doyle. There was no "playing at love" in his sweethearting. It would have been better, perhaps, had he smiled more and sighed less. Marcie was the very essence of brightness, and of a laughter-loving abandon, and the seriousness of her lover's wooing irritated her, when it did not incline her to ridicule, and even to downright rudeness.

Truth to say, she liked him—liked him, indeed, too well for her peace of mind; but with the unreasonable perverseness of her nature, she flouted him because—she liked him.

Tim Moffat, as straightforward and honest-hearted a man as could be found between Aldgate and Mile End, worshipped the very ground the girl trod, but, like many another before and since, he was blind to his own danger.

His upbringing had been exceptionally peculiar.

His father was one of those rare natures, which, if we read of them in books, we are inclined to set down as exaggerated and unreal.

Old Harry Moffat had married a woman, who, from her very wedding-day, had been a perpetual thorn in her husband's side. Times out of number had he suffered from her frenzied temper and always with a tender endeavour to hide from friends and neighbours her failings and his own sorrow.

Twice, in her murderous rage, had she attempted his life, and no one, save his own son, knew of the truly heroic forbearance with which he had dealt with her. Now, she was dead, and so well had the secret been kept by the man whose life she had spoilt and embittered, that no breath of suspicion attached to her memory, which, in the little world in which she had lived, was as green as that of the best amongst them.

Tim Moffat was his father over again—patient, uncomplaining, and yet a manly man. Even as the elder possessed the medal of the Royal Humane Society, in recognition of more than a score of lives saved from drowning, so did the younger wear upon his breast the Albert medal, bestowed by his Sovereign's own hand, for heroism in the teeth of the fiercest fire that ever devastated the crowded east of London city.

Deep down in her heart Marcie Doyle gloried in the praise of her lover on the lips of his fellow men, and, perhaps, but for the influence of Jack Hilton, otherwise Jack the Dandy, she would have yielded to her better feelings, and cast coquetting and its kindred ways to the four winds.

This Hilton was the leading-man at the theatre at which Tim Moffat was employed. A single man, he, as is not unusual with men of his position, was a universal lover.

By that is meant that, adored by the fair sex generally, of the East End, he had at last come to believe himself to be absolutely resistless, so far as women were concerned.

Marcie Doyle was only a "hand" in a big East End firm of sweating tailors; but when the well-dressed and fascinating actor deigned to smile upon the girl, who, waiting outside the stage-door for Tim, betrayed a pleased self-consciousness of the implied compliment, he simply saw an exceptionally pretty young woman, attired, for that part of the world, with really remarkable taste and simplicity.

"Marcie," Tim had said to her as he joined her that night just in time to see Mr. Jack Hilton's effusive salutation, "don't take any notice of that man's notice of you! He's nothin' to you—he can't be nothin' to you! More nor that—it'll be the worst day's work you'll ever do for yourself, and—and for me, if you ever looks at him!"

"Tim!" she answered him with what he thought was a strangely forced laugh, "you'll never learn sense! I can take care of myself. When I want any advice, I'll ask you for it. Till I do, you can keep it!"

Jack the Dandy was one of those cunningly keen people who make a rule of curious observation. He soon found out that Tim Moffat had more than a passing interest in Marcie Doyle. It pleased him, too, to know this, and to exercise his craft in, as he phrased it, "cutting out his humbler rival."

Now Tim was nothing if not a faithful servant, and would have cut off his right hand rather than betray his employer's trust.

Digitized by Google

A time came when this sense of duty was tried to the uttermost, when every fibre in both body and soul strained and tingled till Nature almost gave up the struggle in despair.

It was one day in a particularly hot August. Tim had planned to take his sweetheart to Epping Forest. For her, it only meant the loss of a day's pay; for him, he would not only have gladly taken her loss upon himself, but would even have lavished his all upon her, would it but have made her happier.

But a call in the morning at her home, altered the aspect of things.

"Marcie," said her mother to Tim's inquiry, "she's gone out for the day to Southend."

"Do you know who she's gone with?" he asked.

"I thought as she was goin' with you!" was Mrs. Doyle's reply.

"Well, you can see as that isn't so," was all poor Tim could say.

"Yes, an' I don't like it, Tim, I'm sure she's been carrying on secret with somebody lately. She don't talk about you like she used to; an' what I don't like, she's been getting a lot of fal-lals and finery, which she can't afford, and which I know I can't."

This seemed to strike the key-note in Tim's mind.

But he didn't betray his thoughts to Marcie's mother. Ever the "chip of the old block" he would hide rather than blazon forth.

"Mrs. Doyle," he said, "she must have gone with some of her shop mates. You know what young girls are in these days. Of course, I'm disappointed at not being able to take her with me to Epping to-day, but there's more days behind the wood, and—and I'll meet the Southend boat—the London Belle—to-night when she comes in. There's nothin' for me to do till near ten o'clock; nothin', I mean, but what my man can do; and I'll slip away to London Bridge for an hour."

His talk with himself, however, as he rapidly made his way back to the theatre, was not nearly so sanguine in tone.

"No rehearsal to-day!—and Hilton not 'called' till nearly ten to-night! He's taken her; I'll swear it!—he's taken her! Well, if she cares for him better than she does for me, he shall marry her! He shan't make her believe that he's a little god, and then whistle her off his fingers! If she wants him, she shall have him; and I wish her well of her bargain!"

It was a semi-supernatural piece in which Hilton was playing that night, and in which he gained his main effect, as a modern sort of Mephistopheles, by a cunning disposition of lime and electric lights. Everything depended upon these being at the right moment in thorough working order.

Tim's first concern then when he reached the theatre, after leaving Mrs. Doyle's, was to busy himself with getting all the apparatus ready for the performance at night. The occupation soothed his nerves, and kept him from brooding too much upon his trouble with regard to Marcie. But when he had done all that could be done, and, everybody gone, he had the stage and its surroundings to himself, he could not shake off the feeling of boding depression which possessed him.

"I could ruin him," he speciously argued with himself, "if I let the lights go wrong. They'd guy him, and make no end of a row, if the devil—and he is a devil—didn't have his due! But that would be playing a bit low down, and wouldn't help Marcie or do me any good. No, if he is to be 'downed,' it shan't be by me."

He kept to his resolution to meet the Southend boat at Hermitage Wharf at nine o'clock, making arrangements with the stage-manager for a couple of hours' absence for that purpose.

"If the boat's late," he said reflectively, as he stepped on to the wharf, "and he can't 'go on' to-night, that wouldn't be my fault; and it'll teach him a lesson."

But for once the London Belle was up to time, and five minutes after nine had struck, her lights were seen slowly shooting the Tower Bridge.

It is the unexpected that nearly always happens, and though Tim almost instinctively knew what he should see, he was altogether unprepared for the coming "situation."

It took some time to get the big steamer warped alongside—time occupied by Tim in scanning the passengers in the half gloom for confirmation of his fears. But he could distinguish neither Marcie nor her escort.

Then the gangways were shipped and a stream of people crowded shorewards.

Quite at the end of the procession, Tim saw that which he had come to see.

As Marcie's foot touched the wharf, Hilton, who was immediately behind her, arranged a cloak over her shoulders.

It was at that moment that she caught sight of Tim, looking at her with a sad reproachfulness, which, frivolous as she was, cut her to the quick.

Hilton knew the limelight man, of course, and was at no loss to understand why he was there at that particular moment.

A gay, off-hand spirit of bravado was an important part of his personal stock-in-trade, and he drew upon it now, as being the best thing possible under the somewhat awkward circumstances.

"Ah, Moffat!—come down to look after me, eh? Very kind of you, seeing that you couldn't have known I was to be here."

Tim absolutely ignored both sneer and speaker. It was to Marcie that he spoke.

"I'll put you into a cab, and take you home," he said, "your mother's anxious about you."

Not a word as to his own disappointment.

Before the girl could reply, Hilton addressed himself to Tim.

"You see her home!" Tim blazed out. "What right have you to see her home?"

Digitized by Google

"Look here, my man!" he said; "we don't recognise your right to interfere in any way with this young lady's affairs."

"No!" Tim hotly answered, "but I tell you, Mr.——"

"Don't trouble yourself to tell me anything," interrupted the other airily; "come along, my dear"—to Marcie—"I'll see you home first, and then I must get to the theatre as quickly as I can."

"You see her home!" Tim blazed out; "what right have you to see her home?"

"Tell him, my dear," said the actor, with a curious smile to Marcie.

"Tim!" she said, almost under her breath, "I'm never going to that home any more."

"Never——"

"No; Jack and I were married at Southend to-day, and I'm going now to his—to my home."

* * * * *

Contrary to Tim's expectation, things went on well for a time with the newly-married couple; until he almost came to believe that in the end things would settle down for Marcie in a happy and satisfactory way.

But in about six months' time rumours reached Tim's ears of something wrong.

It was said that Hilton was not only unkind to his wife, but was downright cruel.

She had been seen with an ugly cut above her eyebrow, while her white face and sadly subdued manner were reasonably convincing proof that poor Marcie was passing through a peculiarly painful experience.

This was the signal for Tim to be up and doing. He had, in quiet, undemonstrative fashion, like some faithful watch-dog, held himself in readiness for the moment when it might be that he should be wanted.

Fortunately for Marcie, the trouble was, in a way, short-lived.

Hilton had of late given way to drink to an extent that not only was a continual source of danger to his wife, but which threatened even his means of livelihood.

For some time the manager of the theatre had seen how things were going with his leading-man, and more than once strongly remonstrated with him.

"Don't presume," he said on one notable occasion, when Hilton could scarcely get through his duties; "don't presume too much upon your popularity with our audiences. A repetition of what has taken place to-night, will, I warn you, result in a cancelling of your engagement. I'm disposed to give you every chance; it rests with yourself to do or not to do. How's your wife? I hear she's been ill."

"What's that to you or to anybody! My wife's my business."

"Of course she is, but you needn't take a kind inquiry in that way, man!"

The other made no reply, but turning shortly on his heel, walked out of the theatre.

A week afterwards came the end.

Crossing the stage one night to get to his dressing-room, he was met by the stage-manager, who at once challenged him with being in an altogether unfit state to do his work.

"Leave the house!—your understudy will play the part to-night—and from this moment your engagement here is cancelled. I will write you to-morrow to that effect."

Hilton raged and stormed, but to no purpose, the manager in the end having to summon assistance to eject the drunkenly infuriated man.

There is not much more to tell, but that little is the keynote of this brief episode in three lives.

From the hour that he left the stage on that night, Jack the Dandy never played again. With every succeeding month he, and, as a consequence, his wife with him, for she would not, in spite of everything, leave him, sank lower and lower in the social scale.

Then it was that Tim—Tim the true-hearted, the unselfish,—devoted himself to keeping these two from the extremity of need.

"For her sake! For her sake!" was his watchword, and Hilton, debased as he was, knew that his own miserable existence depended upon his own good behaviour.

Gratitude to the man who kept life in him he had not, knew not the meaning of it; it was simply a matter of policy with him.

Then, one day, as Tim was on his way to the Hilton's lodging, he saw, while crossing Mile End Road, a drunken man knocked down and run over by a passing brewer's dray.

It was Jack the Dandy.

He could not have lived a minute after it happened, while Tim thought as he accompanied the body to the local mortuary that, even in his death, Jack Hilton was pursued by the thing that had been his curse.

* * * * *

Twelve months afterwards, on a lovely day in early spring, two people, a man and a woman, wandered quietly, and almost silently along the fresh green glades of Epping Forest.

Up towards High Beech they went until the crown of the hill reached, the man turned towards the woman, and asked her a question.

"Must I wait much longer, Marcie?" he said.

Then she caught his hand in hers.

"Tim," she answered him, "you still wish it! After all that's gone by?"

"Yes, dear!" was his reply. "I have nothing else to wish for."

"It isn't for me, Tim, to keep you from having your wish. You needn't wait any longer."

And the rest will be lived—not told.

John Cowley.

FETTERED LIVES, that thrilling romance of the stage, is to be seen on the stage. On February 9th, under the title of SHADOWED LIVES, Mr. Farmer's splendid romance, so long the fascination of Pearson's Weekly readers, is to be produced at the Kennington Theatre, London. A very good cast has been arranged, including many well-known players, and I shall be very much surprised if the drama does not prove a record success in London and the provinces, where the story excited such universal interest.

A Gramophone for a Sentence.

It is not everyone who can afford to buy a piano, or even a musical instrument of any sort, and to such persons a Gramophone—which is another name for a talking and singing machine—would be a much-prized gift.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by making a sentence, the words of which begin with the letters C, L, E, R, G, Y, T, A, R, T, A, N, in the order given.

A Gramophone will be given to each of the ten readers whose sentences the Editor considers best.

Post-cards only must be used, and they should be addressed to the TARTAN EDITOR, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, February 10th.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Story.

Telling of a Loss and Two Gains.

"I am sorry, Miss—er—er" (the editor glanced at the card on his desk) "Miss Ellison, but the story is useless to me. It is not the kind of thing we ever use for The Knapsack. Perhaps you may be more fortunate elsewhere——"

The girl did not speak; her disappointment was so intense that if she had spoken she would have sobbed. There was silence in the room for a moment during which the sleek-looking young man at the desk carefully examined his well-kept finger nails, then she collected herself. "I am sorry too," she said simply; "I hoped it might do for you. I am very much obliged to you for seeing me about it."

The man gave a sigh of relief. The look of disappointment on the girl's face and the catch in her breath during that moment of silence had not been lost on him. He had feared a scene and was beginning to revile the good nature that had induced him to see her himself instead of relegating her to the mercies of his sub-editor, a brisk young man with a wonderful knack of disposing of even the most persistent visitors. To have a pretty girl weeping in one's editorial sanctum was not a desirable thing, and Ralph Hendrie suffered an agony of apprehension in those few seconds.

"The title is good," he added, partly because he really thought so and partly because he felt that her self-possession merited some slight reward, "very good, I may say, a most original one."

The girl gathered together her threads of courage. "Do you think," she said, (hoping that her agitation did not show itself in her voice, for how could this urbane young man know how badly she wanted money and how much depended on the story being accepted?) "would you advise me—do you think, I mean, that if I altered the story a little you might perhaps be able to take it then?"

"I am afraid not," said the man, "you see it is not the style of thing we want, not light enough, not cheerful enough, not—well, it would have to be completely rewritten and even then it might not do, you see?"

This was final. Barbara Ellison bowed her head. "Thank you," she said, "I am very much obliged to you. Good afternoon."

"Good afternoon," said the editor as he held the door open for her to pass out. "If you care to submit anything else I shall be pleased to consider it."

Once safely out of the room and in the crowded Strand where no one noticed her, Barbara let the tears which were smarting in her eyes, overflow. She looked at the long envelope in her hand and a feeling of impotent fury against it, herself, the editor, the whole world, seized her. Why should it be refused? Why should other people get their stories published and why were hers always returned? "I don't believe they even get read," she told herself bitterly; "they see they are by an unknown writer and don't bother about them." Then the gust of fury passed away as she remembered that Mr. Hendrie had at least said that the title was good. It was at any rate original. She remembered how she had found it. Years ago, when she was looking as she often did at the books on a second-hand bookstall, she had happened upon a collection of old rhymes, and one of them had stuck in her memory. She had forgotten the name of the author and the title of the rhyme, but,

Treat the woman tenderly, tenderly,
Out of a broken rib God made her slenderly, slenderly.

had remained with her, and when she and Mollie found themselves parentless and almost penniless, when she had to do something to earn money and the writing fever had seized her, she had taken "Out of a Broken Rib" for the title of the story on which she had lavished infinite time and pains and perseverance, out of which she had hoped to make at least enough to pay the long-owing rent.

Again she looked resentfully at the envelope; was all her trouble worth nothing? Mollie, her sister, worked in a typewriting office and Barbara would gladly have done the same or anything else to increase their slender income, but she was so delicate that she was unable to undertake any regular work. She had tried many ways of making money at home; she had attempted needlework, but it was so poorly paid that it was not worth risking the loss of her eyesight for it; she had tried painting but there was no demand for her wares, and finally she had tried writing.

In the far away easy days when she and Mollie had had nothing to do but enjoy life, without a suspicion of the reverses Fate held in her hand for them, she had often written essays and stories for private magazines, and she believed that she could write if she could only find the right people to take her work. At present Mollie had only regular work for two days a week, the rent for six weeks was owing, winter, when expenses were always greater was approaching. What could she do?

She shivered and suddenly realised that she was still standing outside the Knapsack offices, that it was raining and getting dark. Mollie would be furious with her for going out on such a day. She was cold and tired. That editor had said perhaps some other paper would take her story, but it was too late now to try to-day, the clocks were chiming six. She put the manuscript into her pocket and hurried home.

"Oh, Barbara, darling, how could you go out on such a hateful afternoon?" was Mollie's reproachful greeting. "Your cold will be worse, I am sure. Why did you go? Where have you been? Take off your wet things quickly and I will make some tea. Here, let me take off your boots, see, they are soaking."

Barbara sat passive beneath her sister's reproaches and attentions. She was so tired, so thoroughly exhausted that for the moment nothing mattered but rest and warmth. But when she had had some tea and was rested, she told Mollie where she had been.

"I sent my story to the Knapsack six weeks ago. You know how badly we want money. I thought I would go and see the editor and ask him about it, but he said it was no good to him, not the kind of thing they ever wanted."

"The idiot!" said Mollie scornfully. "I am sure it is ten times cleverer than the silly stories he accepts and publishes. Did he say anything else?"

"He said—he was quite nice about it—that it was useless to him but that perhaps some other paper might take it, only I was so tired and it was too late to try anywhere else to-day. He said it was a very good title, Mollie," she added with an inflection of pride in her voice.

"There was no need for him to tell you that; we know it's a good title," said Molly stoutly, "it's a good story too, it's really a case of casting pearls before swine."

Barbara smiled faintly.

"Be just, Mollie, dear," she said, "the editor of the Knapsack must know better than we can what sort of stories he needs. Because you and I are prejudiced in its favour it does not follow that it is really good, although in my heart I can't help thinking it is a good story and perhaps someone else may think so too. Let us look at it again and see where we can send it to-morrow. Will you get it please, Mollie? It is in my coat pocket."

Digitized by Google

Mollie went into the next room. She was gone for so long that Barbara called to her. "It is in the right pocket, in a plain envelope." Mollie came back with empty hands and a troubled look on her face. "I can't find it," she said.

"Can't find it? Why, I know I put it into my pocket. Let me look."

But Barbara's looking proved as futile as had Mollie's. The story was not there. Where, or how, it had fallen out of the pocket it was impossible to say. After the first feeling of loss Barbara was quite philosophical.

"I don't think it really matters," she said. "I don't suppose I should have had better luck with it than I have had. Mr. Hendrie did not know when he said that perhaps it might do for someone else, that I have already sent it to so many papers, that it tires me to think of them. No, Fate meant that story to be worthless, and Fate has once and for all put an end to any hopes of ours that it might be otherwise."

"Very likely you will get it back," suggested Mollie. "It had your name and address on, so any honest person would bring it here."

"Only my name was on it, and what does 'Barbara Ellison' convey to anyone? I wrote a letter with it, of course, but I tore that up as soon as I got out of the office, and there was nothing on the envelope. No, we shall never see 'Out of a Broken Rib' again. It is no good. You know how hard I have tried, Mollie."

Mollie was more cheerful. "Well, if it is lost it is, I suppose," she remarked, "but you might try to write another story with the same title. Anyhow, it's no good to bother any more about it to-night. Let's go to bed. Something may turn up. Some long-lost uncle of whom we never heard may die in New Zealand and leave us a fortune."

The next day, however, there was no question of Barbara being able to write or do anything else. She had caught a severe chill, which finally developed into pneumonia.

It would be impossible to describe all that Mollie suffered during her sister's illness. Fortunately their landlady was a kind-hearted woman, who said nothing about the long owing rent and looked after the invalid with a certain amount of tenderness and skill. But things were very black for the two girls, and in spite of all Mollie's efforts the cloud of debt around them grew thicker and thicker. At last a day came when the worst of the illness was over, when the doctor said Barbara had nothing to do but get strong again.

She was lying on the sofa one dreary December afternoon, longing for Mollie's return, and wondering whether their particular cloud had any lining except of the blackest hue, when Mollie suddenly dashed into the room, her face wreathed with smiles, her eyes dancing with excitement.

"A most wonderful thing has happened, Barbara," she gasped, breathless with hurry and eagerness. "You could never guess, so I will tell you. Look here! Look! See! Do you know why I bought the Monthly Library, though it cost one shilling, and we have only five shillings in all the world?" And she flourished the purple covers of the well-known magazine in her sister's face.

"I don't know, Mollie. Tell me."

"Why, your story is in it! Your story, 'Out of a Broken Rib,' you know your story you lost before you were ill. Here it is, published, printed, with your name to it, and a note by the editor asking for your address. Why, your fortune is made, Barbara! Fancy having a story in the Monthly Library! You see, I was right when I said that Knapsack man was an idiot!"

She was incoherent with excitement. As for Barbara she could hardly believe her eyes when she saw on the first page of the magazine in which the best-known writers of the day were proud to find their work, her story and her name. Above it were a few lines: "The editor will be greatly obliged if Barbara Ellison will communicate with him at once."

"I must go," she said. "I must go and see him. I am better now, and I must go first thing to-morrow. But tell me Mollie, how did you find out my story was in this?" And she fingered the magazine lovingly.

"Why, it was all luck or chance, or whatever you like to call it," answered Mollie, who was dancing round the room to let off her excitement. "I was having my lunch at that A.B.C. shop near the Adelphi, you know, and two gentlemen were sitting at the same table, and one of them said 'Have you seen that clever story in this month's Library? It's called "Out of a Broken Rib."' Of course I pricked up my ears and then he said, 'I wonder who Barbara Ellison is, never heard of her before, but she knows how to write, if she is a woman, that's to say.' Just fancy, Barbara, thinking you might be a man! And then they went on talking more about it, but I was so excited I just gobbled my lunch and went and bought a copy. Oh, Barbara, how lovely it is! I wonder how much they will pay you for it?"

The next day Barbara, still pale and weak, was taken to the offices of the Monthly Library by Mollie, who waited for her downstairs while she was shown with great deference into the editor's room, and there explanations were given.

"I must apologise, Miss Ellison," said the editor, "for publishing the story without your permission. I can only hope you will forgive me when I explain matters to you. I picked it up in the Strand one evening some weeks ago, and there was no address on it and no clue but the name. Perhaps I was wrong not to have made more searching inquiries. I did advertise the finding of it in one or two newspapers, but I suppose you did not happen to see them. It was exactly the story I wanted for my Christmas number, and had vainly tried to find. So I published it and trusted to chance that you would know I had done so. I hope you will forgive me. I have a cheque, at our usual rate of payment, ready for you now."

He handed her a piece of paper, and Barbara saw through a mist that it was for £10. Never in her most hopeful moments had she expected such payment. She saw the rent paid, their most pressing debts disposed of.

"Oh," she said faintly, "I can't tell you—I can't thank you." She tried to pull herself together, but she was still weak from illness, and where perhaps pride and disappointment might have supported her, gratitude and relief broke down her self-control. The editor was looking at her curiously, and there was something in his face, something in the compassionate expression of his eyes that encouraged her.

Almost before she knew that she was doing so, she was pouring out to him the story of her troubles. She told all, their poverty, her attempts at writing, her rebuffs and disappointments, her visit to the Knapsack, her losing of the story, her illness, and the editor's eyes were not quite so clear as usual when she had finished. He spoke to her words of kindly encouragement, and appreciation, and expressed the hope that he might have the refusal of anything else she wrote. And then an event unprecedented in the history of the office, he took her downstairs himself.

"Bless me, what's up?" remarked one of the errand boys, "here's the boss bringing a lady downstairs. Well, I never. She's not up to much neither, not my style, too pale and puky-looking."

"You shut up," remarked one of his confrères, possessed of keener perceptions, "she must be up to a good deal or the boss wouldn't bother about her."

Once safely in the cab, which Mollie insisted on having, Barbara's feelings completely overcame her. "Oh, Mollie," she cried, "he was so kind and delightful to me, and he wants me to let him have the refusal of everything I write, and see what he has paid me for my story! I never imagined anything so wonderful could happen." And she leant back with a sigh of content, for truly troubles and poverty seemed to be turning away and prosperity and joy were coming out of their hiding-places.

The editor of the Monthly Library finds his most valued contributor and his greatest helper in his wife, and she and the "Barbara Ellison" whose name is famous in the literary world, and whose first short story appeared in his magazine, are one and the same person.

Claudia Ashton.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF. A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

I Make a Compact with Belinda.

You must not imagine that Vera created a scene; we don't do such things in our set except with our intimates. Only the little coterie immediately surrounding the Princess realised anything much was amiss. The rest merely concluded that she felt faint, or had chosen an effective method of showing off her latest victim. David looked quite interesting and behaved wonderfully well. He just picked her up and carried her out of the room as if she were a little girl instead of a splendidly developed woman.

I left him to restore her, and turned my attention to Belinda and the Duke. The former showed no signs of disquietude, but waltzed as gaily and as gracefully as though nothing had occurred out of the ordinary.

Eastacres greeted me with an inscrutable smile.

"Well," said I abruptly, "and what is the meaning of all this? Is Zouloff really dead, or——"

He stopped me with a gesture.

"He was shot through the heart this afternoon in a duel. No, it was not to do with the Princess. A gaming dispute. The Prince held either too many aces or too few—I forget which; in any case his adversary took exception, and as a result"—Eastacres shrugged his shoulders. "I think the Princess makes a charming widow," he said smiling. "And, if I am not mistaken, Mr. Carr is of the same opinion."

"Why did you bring the news?" I asked abruptly.

"I met Litoff of the Russian Embassy—he told me. He added that the Princess would receive an official communication of the fact to-night; but it was not possible to let the poor lady remain in ignorance of her husband's death. It was not in good taste to let her dance in the shadow of so great a grief! Therefore I told her"—he looked at me and smiled in such a malignant, I had said diabolical, fashion, that I felt quite uncomfortable.

"You are most considerate, Duke," I said gravely. "If it is not indiscreet to ask, was it only Vera's feelings you were consulting?"

"The Princess," he said quietly, "and my own."

"You admire Vera?" I hazarded.

"I admire all beautiful women," he answered, "but I desire to marry only one—Belinda."

"And you brought this information to the Princess——"

"In order that she might give some proof of her regard for the man whom you so thoughtfully fetched over from Petersburg—David Carr. It was wonderfully clever of you, Lady Peggy. I always admire talent even if I am not in a position to appreciate it. To bring Belinda's lover under the influence of another woman was a master stroke of policy. A master stroke of which I am going to avail myself." As he spoke he moved towards Belinda and Lord Farringdon.

"Eastacres," I said sharply, "what are you going to do? Be reasonable, I beg of you, and do not run the risk of a rebuff. Belinda will refuse to speak to or acknowledge you."

"I don't intend to give her the opportunity—at present," he said calmly. "I am going to have a little conversation with Farringdon, that is all. He was my fag at Eton, you know, and——"

I cut short his explanation, and linking my arm in his, impelled him towards the door.

"It's no use, my dear Duke," I said smiling, but holding him tightly all the same. "I am famished. You simply must take me to the supper room. I won't let you speak to anyone till you've looked after me."

I made this observation in a voice somewhat above the usual society monotones. It was impossible to refuse such an audible request, and against his will Eastacres had to yield.

"Now," said I, when under my guidance he had piloted me safely to the morning-room, "for the second time I ask you what does all this mean? That you had some motive in coming here other than consideration for the Princess, is perfectly plain, and the question is are you going to explain that motive, or am I to find it out?"

He shrugged his shoulders and sneered in a fashion that roused my indignation.

"I ask you once again, Eastacres," I said firmly, "if you still decline to answer, you will only have yourself to thank for what ensues."

"Oh, have your own way," he said irritably. "I will tell you; but mind this"—and he put his face uncomfortably close to mine—"protest as you will, I shall follow out my plan. I came here to-night because I knew Vera and David Carr would be together. I waited to give my little piece of information about Zouloff until the moment when Belinda was near to the Princess, so near that she could see the look in her lover's eyes as he caught her rival in his arms, so near that she could realise how utterly that rival had displaced her. Belinda knows, as I know, that Carr loves the Princess, and she"—he smiled—"she is a Russian," he added slowly, "and more than a little mad. It is quite possible that she will be mad enough to make this engineer her husband."

Digitized by Google

"Well," I said eagerly, "what then?"

He turned upon me swiftly.

"Then," he said, "I come upon the scene and catch Belinda's heart in the rebound. Oh, I am not mistaken, my dear lady, nor deceived. I know well how you have kept your compact with me, how in my absence you have adroitly edged Farringdon into the part we had agreed that I alone should fill. But she shall not marry Farringdon; I will prevent that. He is in love with her, that is true, and a man so young as he will do much for love. But there is one thing that, in spite of all your cleverness, you have overlooked—his pride. Touch him there, and not even love will move him. A word from me, a hint that Belinda made and kept a midnight rendezvous with me in Paris, and not all her beauty, or her wealth will make him offer her his name."

"You tell him at your own peril," I said excitedly. "Stanley——"

"Bah," he said, snapping his fingers, "what can he do? Farringdon is not likely to mention what I tell him, and otherwise no one will know. No, my dear Peggy, neither you nor Stanley can take a hand in this game. The only rival I had cause to fear with Belinda, was the engineer. Thanks to your cleverness, your all too astute diplomacy, that rival is removed. He will no longer trouble me. Farringdon I shall deal with this evening. And then for Belinda and her millions!"

The man's vanity was colossal. Deep in his heart, despite her rebuffs, insults, defiance, and dislike, was the conviction that Belinda would even yet accept him. If, as he threatened, he spoke to Farringdon, I knew enough of the young lord to feel convinced he would at once give up all notion of making Belinda his wife. As Eastacres said, Farringdon's pride was very great, so great that it became an objection. I must act quickly and decisively; even now he might be proposing to the girl, and she, smarting under David's desertion, would be inclined to listen favourably. At all costs the Duke must be kept from interference—but how?

An inspiration came to me at that very moment.

I went quite close to Eastacres and laid my hand on his arm.

"We had better understand each other," I said calmly. "You threaten to warn Farringdon against Belinda—that in fact is the card by which you hope to win the trick. Play it if you like, but I shall play a better one. Speak to Farringdon, and on the instant I wire to Alphonse Hervé. He is already on the road to recovery—quite well enough, at all events, to take the chance that I shall give him."

"My dear Peggy, you are not clever to-night. How will the presence of Alphonse affect Belinda?"

I laughed contemptuously. "It is you, not I, that are dense, my dear Duke. Do you not understand that it is Alphonse not David that Vera loves? Once let her see the Frenchman, and she will fling David to the winds! Love is so much stronger than jealousy. She is jealous of Belinda, but Alphonse—she loves!"

"And then," he said, "then——"

"David will return to Belinda, and she——" I paused, amused at his look of consternation.

"Are you fooling me?" he said roughly. "Does the Princess really care for that artist fellow?"

"Where were your eyes—your ears these last five years?" I answered. "I speak the truth, Vera is playing with David out of spite to Belinda. I say again it is Alphonse she really loves."

I spoke the words irascibly with an accent of triumph in my voice. The next moment I would have given much to recall them. Belinda, passing down the passage on Lord Farringdon's arm, heard what I said, and, turning, gave me a look at once radiant and reproachful.

Leaving her escort she flew towards me.

"Do you mean it?" she said eagerly. "Oh, Lady Peggy, is it really true?"

There was not a moment in which to think out my answer. I seized at the first excuse that presented itself.

"No," I answered quickly, but softly—"it is not. I said so to keep the Duke quiet. He has declared his intention of punishing David for his open neglect of you. And remembering what you suffered the night of the duel with Alphonse"—I paused and edged her discreetly from the room. "Eastacres positively terrifies me, Belinda; for goodness' sake, my dear child, go quickly away and take Farringdon with you."

Belinda heard me out in silence. Then with a look about her mouth that I had learnt to understand, signified her intention of seeking the Princess and asking for an explanation.

"I won't compromise you, Lady Peggy," said this truly terrible girl. "I won't let her know what I heard you say, but I must ask her once and for all if she cares for—for David?"

"I never heard a more indecent proposition!" I cried indignantly. "Absolutely you have no delicacy. You propose to ask the Princess at the very moment when she has received the news of her husband's death, whether she is in love with another man! Frankly, Belinda, I am ashamed of you."

"She doesn't care," said the girl rebelliously; "at the very instant she heard of his death she turned to—to David. Why should I pay more respect to her feelings than she shows herself?"

"There's no argument in the matter, Belinda. The Princess is judge of her own conduct. Who are you to crititise it? I say you shall not go to her." I gave emphasis to the remark by summoning Lord Farringdon and abruptly asking, almost commanding him to take Belinda down to supper.

In face of this proceeding she had not the wit to devise an excuse, nor the audacity to frame a refusal. I watched them disappear, then catching my breath, reached the entrance hall just in time to intercept the Princess who, duly recovered, was on the way to her carriage. David was in close attendance and seemed much concerned.

"I shall see you to-morrow, dearest," I murmured to Vera. "I cannot tell you how much or how deeply I sympathise with you. You will indeed feel lost without the Prince."

Vera, smiling sweetly, made a suitable reply, whispering as she passed me that "the dear David was becoming troublesome in his devotion."

I contrived to have a word with the young man before he left. I told him I was charmed to see him looking so well, congratulated him upon his prospects—engineering and otherwise—and wound up with a discreet allusion to Belinda's forthcoming engagement to Lord Farringdon.

"I believe he's a very decent fellow," said Carr quietly, "he is at any rate a very lucky one. I should have liked to congratulate Miss North personally, but I fear I shall not have time. I leave for Russia to-morrow morning. You will tell her for me, Lady Carstairs, how much I hope for her happiness? I know how eloquent you can be on another's behalf."

He pressed my hand, and with a smile worthy of Eastacres himself, hurried after Vera.

So far so good, he would depart to-morrow imbued with the belief that Belinda was lost to him for ever. I had but to instil a similar conviction into Belinda's mind to make clear the way for the completion of my plans.

The next morning I kept her with me all the time. My one fear being, that through the malignity of chance, she might catch sight of David, and, at the last moment, arrive at some explanation as to the true state of affairs. I took her down Bond Street, and plunged into a long and intricate discussion with her modiste as to the colours which best suited her for evening. I was replenishing her wardrobe and my own, with a view to Trouville, where we were bound early in July. I had originally intended to present Belinda at the next drawing-room, but at the last moment her father had decided that the ceremony should be deferred until after the marriage.

Digitized by Google

I acquiesced in the arrangement, was indeed rather glad of it. People were already making remarks as to why I chaperoned Belinda, rumours being abroad to the effect that I had lost my money. Had I presented her, the rumour would have been substantiated. My friends knew me too well to think I should go through such a fatiguing thing as a drawing-room without a substantial reason.

We had lunch at Prince's—I simply could not go home to starvation at Brook Street—and then after a drive in the Park, went round to Vera's place in Park Lane. I knew by that time David would have gone, and I wanted to know what had transpired.

I feel I must devote some few lines to the description of the Princess' house. As a general rule one house is much like another in Society. Making allowance for the taste of the owner—or the lack of it—you receive the same impression of ease and luxury wherever you go. In the Zouloff establishment the atmosphere is distinct; it has, so to speak, an individuality. The hall, wide and lofty, is plain, almost to bareness, unrelieved by any attempt at ornamentation, save for a massive group of figures wrought in bronze, magnificently barbaric.

At the end of the hall is a lofty chamber composed of rare and precious woods; panel upon panel of wonderful carving, Oriental in design and execution, lines the walls; the windows of stained glass harmonise with the conception. Low-cushioned seats and divans form the furniture, the floor is parqueterie, polished like glass. A staircase leads from this chamber to a gallery running round the apartment.

The gallery is lined with glass cases filled with exquisite curios. One could spend hours in this wonderland; passing from specimens of Indian jewellery, gorgeous in the extreme, African diamonds and sapphires, delicate ivories, to a miniature fairyland of coral, seaweed, and many-hued fishes arranged in such similitude to life, that for the moment you forget you gaze on the dead treasures of the ocean.

The Zouloff collection is well-known and much appreciated. Possibly some of you that read this have wandered under that carved roof lit by a cluster of lamps hanging like lotus lilies from a stem. The Princess was bitten at one time with a craze to enlighten the minds and educate the taste of the middle-class. She used to hold "At Homes," where weird men and strange women used to congregate, collecting in corners where they stood in frozen silence, or worse, in giggling familiarity. All sorts of "Societies" used to have their yearly meeting at the Zouloffs' house—Archæological, Episcopalian, Nonconformist, Artistic, and Rationalist people used to gather there. At one time I used to help the Princess entertain—I must say you people want a lot of entertaining!

And your manners! Some of you had coffee and tea when you arrived, coffee and tea when you left, and perpetual coffees all the afternoon! Really I used to long to correct you! The girls were the worst—especially those that came with their fiancés. Some of them would take the "young man" aside and whisper comments on the people close at hand, or, worse still, question him as to his doings during the day. Where had he been? Or what had he eaten? With an entire disregard of the fellow-guests that was positively appalling.

In the days when, as a girl, I used to appear at the annual dinner given by my father to the peasants on his estate, I was struck by the self-possession of their manner, the quiet good sense of their conversation, the simplicity of their bearing. They were superior in every way to the middle-class men and women Princess Zouloff used to entertain.

I mentioned some of my conclusions to Belinda, but she did not take kindly to my strictures. She had an intense pride in the class from which she came, and would not tolerate its being found fault with in the least particular.

Vera received us in the oaken chamber I have told you of. It was known in the house as the music-room, being used for concerts and musical receptions.

"It is very good of you to see us, dear Princess," I said effusively.

"Not at all, my dear Peggy. I set out for Russia to-night, to return, I know not when. I should be an ingrate if I denied myself to you and Belinda. Such a pity," she went on softly, "that you were not here a little earlier. Twenty minutes since my friend, of whom I spoke to you, chérie," she turned to Belinda, "came to say farewell! I should so much have liked you to meet him—especially as it seems he is an old acquaintance of yours. He only discovered that he knew you last night, when I so inopportunely fainted. He left this note for you, dear child," she handed Belinda a letter as she spoke, and leaving the girl to read it we went up to the gallery.

"It is all right," said Vera, smiling at my look of anxiety, "the note is very short and I think not altogether sweet. Ah, I thought so! See"—she touched my arm and pointed to Belinda who, unaware that she was overlooked, had thrown herself upon a couch, burying her head among the cushions, and was sobbing bitterly.

Vera leant over the balustrade.

"Chérie," she called softly, "come up here. I want you." Then, before I had time to protest, she whirled me into a little room screened off from the gallery, containing a very old and very ugly statue of Buddha or some other heathen god, and went half way down the stairs to meet Belinda.

The girl had dried her tears and regained her composure of manner—so much I gathered peeping under Buddha's arm. She still looked pale, however, and her attitude towards the Princess was defiant.

"You gave me this note," she said, throwing up her head as though in challenge. "You said also that David told you he knew me. Did he tell you that he loved me, and had hoped to marry me, as I still hope to marry him?"

"Impossible! My dearest child, consider what you say. You do not mean that you, who have openly encouraged Lord Farringdon, have been in reality secretly engaged to David Carr?"

"I am not engaged to David," said Belinda slowly, "but what I say is true none the less. We loved each other, but we agreed to wait for a year, because my father wished me to see and know what I believe is called 'Society.'"

"I have had many offers of marriage," she went on, "but never was I tempted to give a second thought to any. Did you know that David had loved me?" She went close to Vera, staring at her with clear, compelling eyes.

"Is it likely? Do you think men talk to me of their love for other women?"

"Did you know I loved him?"

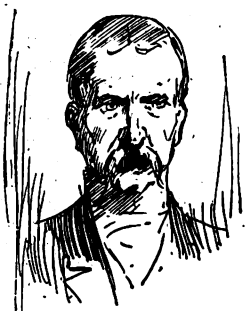
"Not till you told me. Poor child, it is bad to give love for indifference."

"He is not indifferent," flashed the girl. "See, there is a proof of it." She thrust the note into Vera's hands.

"'Farewell—for ever,' read the Princess, 'I wish you all the happiness that you deserve.' A little commonplace in expression, but the sentiment——"

Belinda stopped her abruptly with a motion of her hand.

"I tell you he loves me still," she cried; "you have infatuated, fasci-



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Digitized by Google

nated him, but that is not the same as love. Give him back to me," she stretched out her hands. "You are so much more beautiful than I—I have no chance against you. You do not care for him. You can choose from the world of men. Who is there can withstand you? Leave me David, I ask you, I beg you; leave me the love of this one man, a man you do not care for."

Vera laughed softly, cruelly, touching the bracelets on her wrist the while.

"Suppose I do not care for him? What then? He would go to the other end of the world at my asking. He worships the very ground I walk on. Few men have the capacity for love that David Carr possesses. Why should I give him up to you?"

"Why not?" asked Belinda. "You are a brave woman and a strong and clever one. Women like you don't do mean and petty things unless they have some special reason. I have never wittingly injured you. Tell me"—she caught the Princess' arm—"why are you against me in this matter?"

Vera's eyes flashed, a deep flush tinged the creamy pallor of her skin.

"Because I hate you," she said fiercely. "Because each time I look at you I feel afresh my own humiliation. You, a mere school-girl, succeeded where I failed; you, with your baby face and childish ways, won the heart I could not keep. You are the girl Alphonse Hervé loves; I the woman he has left. Now do you wonder that I hate you, that it gives me exquisite pleasure to hurt you? David Carr is lost to you; you have me to thank for that. What shall I do with him?"—she shrugged her shoulders—"marry him, perhaps."

"No," said Belinda, "you shall not marry him. You will marry Alphonse Hervé. I say so. I pledge my word he shall come back to plead for your forgiveness. I never have broken a promise yet, and that I promise you. I mean it." She gazed at Vera with bright, shining eyes. "And, you must promise something in return. Give me your word you will not write to David for three months. In three months Hervé will have made his peace with you, and I——" She paused, then with a sudden charming gesture raised the Princess' hand, and kissed the slender fingers.

"Promise me," she said softly.

For a moment the Princess hesitated, then with a shrug she acquiesced.

"I promise," she said slowly. "For three months I will not write nor send to David Carr, on the understanding that you will not do so either. In three months time I shall send for him and for you also. And then——" She stopped, and a curious smile twitched at her lips.

"Thank you," said Belinda quietly, almost humbly. "You are very good." Then with a sigh she left the gallery, returning to the music-room.

I emerged from the contemplation of Buddha and with a few hurried words to Vera, joined Belinda. I made no allusion to her compact with the Princess until we reached Brook Street. Then in the privacy of my room I opened fire.

"Vera has told me what you said to her this afternoon, Belinda," I remarked. "What was your object in making this agreement about David Carr?"

"In three months time Alphonse will return to the Princess," she answered, "and David will realise that she was only playing with him all the while. His infatuation over, his affection for me will once more be supreme."

"Suppose for the sake of argument that Vera should choose David instead of Alphonse, what will you do then?"

"I can't say," she answered listlessly, "it seems impossible."

"It is very highly probable," I answered sharply. "Now, listen to me, and see if we can't come to some sort of an understanding. I will give you your own way in this matter. That is to say, I will not interfere in any of your plans—on one condition. That, failing David Carr, you will marry——!"

"Not the Duke," she interrupted passionately, "never the Duke."

"Who then—shall we say Farringdon?"

"Very well," she answered lightly, "let it be Farringdon. You see"—she turned towards me—"I am so sure of David that I feel safe in promising anything.

"Lord Farringdon has already proposed to me," she went on, blushing—"I had a letter from him this morning. Will you tell him for me that he shall have a decided answer in three months."

My way during the next few months was plain. I must so arrange that Belinda should not hold any communication with Alphonse Hervé. So long as the artist stayed away from Vera, so long would she keep David in her toils. I had only to prevent a reconciliation between Hervé and the Princess to insure Belinda's engagement to Farringdon.

I told Eastacres something of the truth—only I substituted his name for Farringdon's. I don't think he believed all I said, but he was convinced of enough to make him realise that, for his own sake, it would be better to keep quiet as to what took place in the Rue Burgoyne. For the present I had no cause to fear him.

Belinda wrote to Hervé the day after her interview with Vera. I intercepted the letter, and quite forgot to post it! Belinda was troubled at not receiving a reply, and formed a project for asking him over to England—the Duchess of Staunton let her have her own way in everything. I nipped the idea in the bud, however, by announcing that we must start for Trouville at an earlier date than I had anticipated.

"We shall have to leave town directly, Belinda," I said abruptly. "They won't keep our rooms at the hotel after this week, and I can't put up with any others. We had better cross to-morrow. Midge and your old admirer, Reggie, are travelling then, we can all go together."

I did not give her time to argue the question, and the next day found us in mid-channel, on our way to that smartest of smart watering places, Trouville.

Belinda took quite kindly to the place and grew more friendly with Farringdon daily. She was a little worried about Hervé, but it was only on occasions that she remembered him; for the most part she was in splendid form, and as usual her admirers grew and multiplied.

Surely she had reason to be bright; there was the charming blue sea beside her; a balmy, fluttering breeze around her; a crowd of the most fashionable sunshades in Europe before her. The yachts came and went, the sands glittered, the music sounded, men and women in bright-coloured stripes took headers into the tide, or pulled themselves about in little canoes; the faces of all the houses were lively with green shutters and cool awnings; people the gayest and best born in Europe, laughed and chattered and made love.

As for the mixed bathing, which I believe vexes your poor souls every autumn, when, in the off season you scrape up enough to run across the channel—that goes on daily and sometimes all day long at Trouville. Belinda turned scarlet at the sight of Midge's bathing-dress—a wonderful affair in gold and purple, and inquired if she were actually going to wear it?

Midge screamed with laughter, and told the story that morning on the beach. All the women and most of the men sneered at the girl as old-fashioned, but Farringdon quite approved of her taste. He had agreed to wait three months for Belinda's decision.

We had been at Trouville about a week, and I was congratulating myself on the way things were going, when something happened that threatened to seriously inconvenience me.

Belinda was going for a sail in Farringdon's yacht, was in fact just going aboard, when I saw her wave a handkerchief at someone on the beach and exhibit signs of strong excitement. She evidently wished Farringdon to put her on shore, but he refused; the tide was going out.

The next moment I felt a hand upon my shoulder, and a low voice murmured a compliment in my ear.

Thank Heaven that Belinda was already out at sea, and that I should have an opportunity of speaking to the newcomer before her return! The man now standing on the beach beside me was—Alphonse!

(How I got out of my difficulty will be told next week.)

Digitized by Google

WHICH WAS THE MAN?

Telling of What Happened When the Lights Went Out.

The ever perplexing question of choosing between two equally desirable suitors had come to Inez Waring.

Neither had yet spoken his heart, for the reason that Inez was always on the alert to prevent such an avowal.

Although the reigning belle of the city and accustomed to the compliments of men, she had retained full possession of a conscience. To prevent the proposal of either man until she was certain of her own feelings was her one wish and aim.

But despite continued deliberation it became daily more difficult for Inez to determine which of the two her heart preferred.

"And wise ones say," she mused, "that when a woman is thus undecided it is proof positive that she does not love either of her suitors."

But the thought was unwelcome. Something within her rejected it at once. Her admiration for both Miles Henshaw and Owen Forbes went very deep. Should she lose the friendship of either her life would feel the loss keenly. Should she lose the companionship of both—ah, but that must not be! One of them she must keep. But which one?

The question pursued her. On the night of Mrs. Crandall's theatre party it clamoured with unusual insistence. Henshaw was at his best that evening. But so was Forbes.

Inez observed them both with a new intentness. Henshaw was decidedly the handsomer, yet Forbes had a fascination of personality which the former could not boast.

The girl herself was radiantly beautiful, as always. The numerous opera glasses levelled at their box from the stalls were focussed chiefly upon her blossom-like perfection.

Mrs. Crandall's daughter, Grace, had her share of attention. Winsome and sparkling, she made up in charm of manner what she lacked in actual beauty. She was considered a fascinating girl. Certainly Seth Harrington must have thought so. His gaze seemed incapable of including anything or anyone but her.

Inez noted this and smiled. "She, too, will have a question to decide," she thought, musingly. "I wonder——" But the curtain went up just then. The question of Seth Harrington and Grace Crandall retired to some remote recess of her mind for later consideration.

The curtain had rung down on the last act and the audience was just rising to its feet when a most unexpected and startling thing happened. All the lights in the place went out, leaving the people in total darkness.

After the first wave of consternation the crowd was reasonable enough to obey the command of a voice from the stage. They remained quiet, the majority reseating themselves at once. Mrs. Crandall's party were already leaving the box and groped helplessly in the gloom.

"Well!" exclaimed the matron, "this is certainly diverting, to say the least." Her good humour was infectious, and the others of the party joined her in laughing over the predicament.

"I've entirely lost my bearings," declared Inez. "I don't believe I can distinguish north from south."

"I wouldn't care about north or south if I could find a seat," said someone else. "How long is this oblivion supposed to last?"

"Perhaps interminably."

"Perish the thought!"

At intervals as they jostled each other one would cry: "Who is this?" and the answer would come: "And who is this?"

Inez put out her hand and touched a man's coat sleeve. "Who is this?" she questioned.

The response came in a swift and eager whisper: "Dear, don't you know?"

She felt her hand seized in a grasp so ardent that her pulse leapt. Was it Forbes or Henshaw?

Before she could decide, "Dearest, you do know—you do!" came softly against her cheek. The unseen one drew her suddenly to his lips. "I love you!" he said.

It was as though a shower of rosy sparks had blossomed out of the darkness. In that moment Inez knew that she loved this man—whoever he was, she loved him.

"Try to love me!" went on the voice. "Promise me you will try. May I hope?"

"Yes," came her gently breathed reply.

Her own answer startled her and she freed her hand, moving hurriedly away from him. Just then the lights flashed up.

Thoroughly bewildered and somewhat blinded by the sudden illumination, Inez could not perceive who it was that stood nearest her. When she did look, with cleared vision, to discover which man it was to whom she had given her promise, she discovered Grace Crandall standing where she had supposed her wooer had been. Seth Harrington was holding the girl's opera cloak.

"I must have been altogether confused as to direction," she concluded, and then, glancing hastily at the faces of Forbes and Henshaw in turn, "Both of them look guilty—or do I fancy it?"

It was Henshaw who went home with her. Inez waited with a beating heart for the first word or sign from him. But although she read the story of love in his eyes, as always, he made no reference to the incident of the box. His manner gave no indication whatever of remembrance. Then it must be Forbes.

Now, as she thought of him, she realised vividly that she had always wished it to be Forbes.

When he called the next day she went in to meet him with a fluttering heart and a consciousness of confusion.

Yes! As she met his eyes there was the same thrill, the same radiance of that memorable evening.

As the two stood gazing at each other there seemed no need, somehow, for any words. Reference to that first time of confession would have been entirely unnecessary. Both understood. That was enough.

Grace Crandall was the first to offer congratulations when the engagement was announced. After her ecstatic rush of comments and declarations, she said shyly: "And now I've something to tell you. Seth Harrington——"

"Oh, I guessed that!"

"You did?" blushing. "But the strange part of it is that he insists I have already accepted him!"

"And haven't you?"

"Not as he says I did. He declares that on the night of mamma's theatre party, when the lights went out, you remember——"

"Yes!" breathed Inez.

"That he spoke to me and kissed my hand, and that I promised to love him!"

Inez stared blankly, her mind in a whirl. The fact that Forbes had really never mentioned that miserable incident occurred to her now with disquieting distinctness.

"How very odd," she murmured at last. "And you have no remembrance of it?"

"Absolutely none."

"Shall you accept him, then?"

Grace dimpled charmingly. "I'm afraid I shall have to do it," she said. "He says I must be true to my promise."

After she had gone Inez pondered a long time. "Oh, it couldn't be!" she cried at length. "I'm sure Owen was the one. He hasn't mentioned it, but——"

Nevertheless, she still wondered.

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

A RIVAL'S REVENGE.

How a Plucky Girl Saved her Lover.

"Good evening, Dolly! You look prettier than ever, while as for your lips, they seem to ask for kisses. When are you going to—er—honour me"—and a sneer crept about the speaker's mouth—"by becoming my wife?"

The insolence in the man's manner was unmistakable.

"Look you!" replied the girl with flashing eyes. "I have endured your continued persecution quite long enough. If you ever dare to speak to me again in this manner, Dan Davy——" And she paused, as if unwilling to proceed with the threat which was in her mind.

"Well?" said the man scornfully. "What then, my beauty?"

"Then," replied the girl, stung into speech by the mockery of his voice, "then I will tell Mr. Trevor of the way you insult and persecute me!"

"Oh, you will, will you?" A sneer of mingled hatred and contempt distorted the man's evil face, which was now livid with rage. It was clear the name of Jack Trevor had but added oil to the fire of his growing anger.

"Yes," responded the girl vehemently. "And he is man enough to protect me, and, if need be, to call you to account for these insults. You want a lesson, Dan Davy, and you shall have it!"

An angry flush deepened the man's face, while a gleam of defiance shone in his dark eyes. His whole frame trembled with suppressed rage, and his hands clenched involuntarily as if he would have struck her. Controlling himself with an effort, however, he took a step forward, thrusting his evil face close to the girl's until she shrank back affrightedly.

"We shall see!" he said, with a derisive laugh. "Jack Trevor may win, but I doubt it—yes, I doubt it!" And he looked meaningly into the girl's dilated eyes.

The threat which these words conveyed to the terrified girl was so full of sinister significance, that she shrank still farther back from the evil face of the man before her, and covered her face with her hands. With a laugh of triumph at the effect his words had produced, Dan Davy turned on his heel and strode rapidly away.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Dolly apprehensively. "What have I done? I am afraid that man meditates some terrible revenge—perhaps not on me, but on Jack. What shall I do? If I tell him, it will make matters worse, for Jack will be very angry. And yet I must warn him, for, if I do not, and anything were to happen to him, I could never forgive myself."

Sorrowfully and in much perplexity the girl went home considering how she could best acquaint her lover with the news of this encounter, and warn him against Dan Davy's possible vindictiveness and treachery.

Jack Trevor and his less successful rival were employed in a large engineering works and iron foundry in the neighbourhood. Davy, who was considered a clever though somewhat idle mechanic, ran the principal boring-machine in the great engineering shop; while Trevor's duty was to drive the huge engine and boiler which set the countless wheels and pulleys of the lathes and other machines which filled the great workshop into motion. Their posts were at some little distance from each other, and, as no good feeling existed between them, they had hitherto, by common consent, studiously avoided one another. The feeling in each man's breast for Dolly Vane had widened the breach between them, and though Jack Trevor felt himself secure in the possession of Dolly's love, he knew the vindictive character of his rival far too well to doubt that he would put into operation any base or contemptible design, which he judged might lead to his own advantage and his rival's discomfiture.

The evening following Dolly's encounter with Dan Davy the girl met her lover.

"Jack," she said, with womanly tact, after they had sat together in silence for some time, "there is something I should like to tell you, but it would make me very unhappy if, by doing so, I became the cause of any act which would lower you in my esteem and make you forget your better self."

"I do not think you need fear that, darling," said Jack, with kindling tenderness in his voice and manner. "Your happiness is ever my first consideration, and all things become subservient to that impulse."

"Then you will promise me, dear Jack," said the girl coaxingly, "that you will not be angry?"

Jack Trevor looked down at the appealing face of the girl at his side and smiled encouragingly into the blue eyes. And so, carefully concealing any personal feeling in the matter and omitting the worst features of the incident altogether, Dolly briefly related her interview with Dan Davy and the fears she entertained that the man premeditated some act of treachery to one or both of them. Jack's honest face flushed with indignation as he listened; but he saw Dolly's face turned to him appealingly, and he restrained any further indication of anger out of sympathy for the girl's evident distress.

"Well, Dolly," he said, after a pause, "the man is a blackguard, and it will be best for you to avoid meeting him as far as possible."

"And you, dear Jack?" inquired the girl, laying her hand appealingly on his.

"I?" responded Trevor. "Well, I shall have a few words to say to Dan Davy to-morrow, but they will be quietly spoken, and you need have no apprehension as to their result. The man is too unmistakably a coward to do aught but snarl."

Dolly felt somewhat relieved by this assurance and earnestly hoped her former misgivings might prove unfounded.

The next day, as the men were crowding out of the great workshop at the close of their day's labour, Jack Trevor put himself in Davy's way.

"I want a word with you," he said briefly.

"You can say it here, then," was the reply.

"It will be better for you, perhaps, if you hear what I have to say where there is a little more privacy," said Trevor significantly.

Digitized by Google

"Do you really think so?" sneered Davy. "Well, I think differently. "If you are too great a coward to speak out here, you had better reserve your eloquence for those who appreciate it."

Jack Trevor smiled. He could see that the man who thus taunted him with cowardice was himself actuated by a similar motive in preferring to remain among his fellows.

"Very good!" he said quietly. "I will speak here and now. You have taken upon yourself to insult and persecute a young lady whose name I need not now mention. As I possess the right—do you hear—the right, to protect this young lady from all such unprincipled annoyances, I give you fair and timely warning. If you choose to disregard it, you will have to reckon with me in a much more summary and forcible way than upon this occasion."

There was an ugly gleam in Dan Davy's eyes as this threat was uttered, while his dark face darkened with concentrated rage.

"You are right!" he hissed through his clenched teeth. "The reckoning shall come between us, Jack Trevor, and, to use your own words, 'in a far more summary and forcible way than upon this occasion.' Beware it does not come sooner than you anticipate!"

With another look of malevolent hatred at the form of his rival, Dan Davy strode through the crowd of his fellow-workmen, who had gathered about the disputants with evident curiosity, and was soon lost to view. Jack Trevor, wishing to avoid further question, also made his way out with as little delay as possible. Had he but realised one-half of the sinister significance in Dan Davy's repetition of his own words, the man's murderous thirst for revenge would have filled him with alarm. But he was as yet all unconscious of the implacable vindictiveness of his rival, as well as of the terrible scheme of revenge which he would ere long put into execution.

The girl sawed at the stout rope with the blade of the knife. Would she do it in time?

It was about a month after the incidents just narrated that it was deemed necessary for the speedy completion of a large and important order that Dan Davy should be asked to work throughout the whole of one night at his boring-machine. Jack Trevor would, of course, be obliged to remain also, in order to drive the main engine and thereby supply the machine with its motive power.

There had been no further collision between the two men, and to an ordinary observer the active enmity of a month ago appeared to have subsided into mere indifference and a mutual disinclination to the further cultivation of each other's society. But, if anyone had closely watched Dan Davy's cruel face whenever Jack Trevor passed him or his voice sounded in his ear, he would have found ample testimony of the bitter and implacable hatred which still burnt, like an unquenchable fire, within his breast.

It was altogether different with Jack Trevor. Dolly Vane had made no further complaint against Davy; indeed, she had not encountered him since, and Jack, inwardly pleased at what he considered a good result of his timely warning, had allowed his resentment to cool, and merely avoided the man from a natural dislike to his society. Better would it have been for him had his knowledge of the man's character rendered him more watchful of his movements and more ready to meet the danger which threatened him.

The great workshop looked very weird and dark when the men had left. A single electric lamp shed a white gleam of light over the revolving wheels of the long low boring-machine at the far end of the shop. All the rest lay in shadow, the dark, uncouth forms of the motionless machines and lathes looming up through the surrounding gloom like huge fantastic monsters of a bygone age. The great engine was rumbling far down at the other end of the long shop, but no glimmering light revealed its mighty outline, and the throb of its pulsating pistons was the only indication of its whereabouts.

The workshop was deserted, save for the solitary figure of Dan Davy, who stood in the circle of white light which flooded the moving wheels of his machine, and accurately set the long, steel tool grinding its way into the cylinder, which he had firmly bolted on the revolving plate of the machine. Then he gauged the bore with his compasses, and, having satisfied himself that all was going on as he desired, he stood upright and listened.

It was a wild wintry night. Outside, the wind swept along in gusts and the driving rain dashed against the dark panes in the glass roof of the great workshop. Beyond the rumbling engine a door led out into the great open space which backed the dark shops, and here the huge boiler which drove the main engine was embedded in its solid foundation of stout masonry.

Jack Trevor stood before the glowing fire and threw fresh coals into the great red maw of the devouring furnace. A thousand sparks crackled and hissed above the glowing fire as the wet coals fell on the red heart of the hot mass beneath, while a crimson glow shone through the open door of the furnace and illumined the darkness for yards ahead. He closed the iron door with a snap, and put down the shovel he had been using, while the fire roared with increasing fury as the imprisoned gas in the black coal broke its fetters and leapt to meet the darting tongues of flame.

Then he made a very thorough examination of both the steam and water gauges. The former stood high, and a faint hiss of escaping steam came from the end of the black arm of the safety-valve. The latter was low, and, as the boiler was not a self-feeder, he turned on the water-cock until he had sufficiently increased its supply. For a few moments the steam pressure abated, but fresh steam was soon generated, and the hand of the steam-gauge began once more to ascend and the steam to hiss more vehemently from its escape.

Digitized by Google

"She's all right," muttered Jack. "It's a comfort to see something warm a night like this. I'm not over fond of rain, but it's better to stand in it out here by the fire than to take shelter in that gloomy old shop." He lit his pipe as he mused with a straw which he lit on the red ashes under the glowing fire.

He did not see a dark form creeping along the side of the masonry in which the boiler was embedded—a form that moved stealthily and carried in its hand a long, black iron bar.

"I wonder where Dolly is," he muttered. "Safe in bed, I hope, for it must be nearing twelve o'clock. Dear little Dolly! I'm glad that villain has kept out of her way lately! Well, Dolly dear," and he straightened himself as he spoke, and took his pipe from his lips, "if things go all right, as I have every reason to believe they will, we'll be married in the spring."

There was a swift, rushing sound, as of something cleaving the air. A sudden shock seemed to strike Jack Trevor, a great darkness came before his eyes, and he sank like a stone upon the iron plate which covered the ground in front of the great boiler.

When he came to himself it was to feel ice-cold water dashing in his face. Vainly he tried to recall all that had taken place before he fell, struck down by that fatal blow; his brain reeled with the effort. He could see someone before him, and instinctively knew it was Dan Davy. What puzzled him was that he was now on his feet, and yet had no power to move. The reason, however, was not far to seek. It was barely half an hour since his enemy had dealt him that terrible blow, but in that half-hour Dan Davy had not been idle.

Close to the front of the huge boiler, a massive square post was embedded in the ground. This post had formerly been surmounted by a bell, which used to ring out the hour for commencing work as well as the meal-hours, of the men in the different workshops of the firm, but latterly a steam-whistle had been attached to the boiler for this purpose, and, though the bell had been removed, the post still stood in its accustomed place.

The very moment that Jack Trevor had fallen senseless to the ground, his villainous assailant had dragged him to this post, and, lifting him upon his feet, he pinioned the inanimate form of his victim to the post by means of a leather machine-belt which he tore from one of the lathes for the purpose. To make him still more secure, he had nailed the coils of the belt to the back of the post, so that no one could possibly have released himself unaided from such all-powerful fetters.

Slowly—very slowly—consciousness returned to the stricken man, and he gazed in a bewildered way about him. Dan Davy stood with his back to the boiler, eyeing his victim with a savage gleam of wild ferocity in his dark eyes. He laughed derisively as he met Jack's bewildered gaze.

"In a more summary and forcible way than upon this occasion," he said, with a gesture of triumph. "Your own words, Jack Trevor, and for once you spoke the truth. Marry her in the spring, will you? Ha, ha! She'll have to collect the pieces first. You have had your innings, my fine fellow, and now I'm having mine, and I reckon," he added, with a demoniacal laugh, "that this is the end of the match. Now you are curious to know what I am going to do next. Well, watch me, and you will see!"

He flung open the iron door of the furnace, and threw shovelful after shovelful of fresh coals upon the glowing fire within till it roared and raged above the strong draught like a thing of life. Then, catching up a rope which lay near him, he threw one end over the long arm of the safety-valve, and, drawing both ends down with a sudden jerk, bound them securely about the big brass cocks on the front of the boiler. The steam was still hissing softly from the escape, but, as the pressure tightened on the arm of the valve, it was driven back and fettered in its steel bonds. Then the swarthy figure of Dan Davy turned, and, folding his arms across his breast, laughed demoniacally at his helpless victim.

"I think you will do now, Jack Trevor," he said, his eyes blazing with fiendish triumph. "Before an hour has gone by the boiler will have shifted from its present position, and you, in all probability, will go with it. Good-bye, my fine fellow! A safe journey to you to the other world!" And, with another ringing laugh, he went down the long lane between the shops and out into the deserted streets.

Still dazed as he was by the blow he had received, Jack Trevor realised in a flash the terrible purpose of his enemy. Indeed, if instinct had not revealed to him the truth, the low warning hum which came from the great boiler within five minutes of Dan Davy's retreat would have told him all too plainly what he had to expect. Without the chance of escape, the fast-increasing volume of steam must, ere long, burst its steel bonds, and hurl both him and the mighty boiler to instant destruction.

Louder and louder in his ears grew the hum in the great mass of metal as the generating steam protested against its enforced imprisonment. Jack Trevor exerted his utmost strength to burst the bonds which held him, until his face grew purple with the terrible tension of nerve and muscle, and the great drops stood upon his forehead, but all his efforts were of no avail. There was no hope, save in a speedy death.

The warning voice of the fettered steam grew. The hum had risen to a deep, sonorous vibration, which swallowed up all other sound. It could not be long now. Deliverance, he knew, was almost impossible, for the workshops stood in a great plot of deserted land at the extreme end of a dark and little-frequented road which had no outlet.

The helpless man awaited his certain end with as much composure as he could summon to his aid. The steam now began to pound against the steel casing of its prison with loud, imperative throbs of pent-up vitality. Jack looked at the steam-gauge, and a groan escaped him as he saw the hand that indicated the pressure had long since passed the figure at which the great boiler had been tested. Now every additional pound meant new and increasing danger for the fettered man.

The wind still blew with great violence, but the rain had ceased to descend. With one last prayer, Jack Trevor resigned himself to the awful doom which awaited him, as his head sank upon his breast in hopeless despair. At that instant a figure darted round the end of the long dark workshop and stood by his side. The man uttered an exclamation of astonishment.

"Dolly!" he gasped.

"What is it?" said the girl breathlessly. "Oh, you are bound to the post! Let me release you. I knew you were in danger!" She went towards him as she spoke for the purpose of removing his bonds.

"Stop!" cried Jack hoarsely. "Go away instantly, or you will be blown to pieces. Never mind me. I have no chance of escape now, for it is too late. But save yourself—quick!"

The girl turned and looked at the great roaring boiler. For the first time she realised the terrible danger which threatened them. Then she turned again to Jack.

"I will not go," she said firmly. "If you will not tell me how to save you, I will die with you!"

The man's face grew white as he read the determination in her eyes.

"Come here, then," he said hoarsely. "Do as I bid you, and may God help us! Take the big clasp knife from my right pocket and try to sever that rope which holds the safety-valve down. Do not lose a moment!"

The girl obeyed, and a moment of terrible suspense followed, during which she sawed at the stout rope with the blade of the knife. Would she do it in time? The man held his breath as he waited. Suddenly a great noise filled the air—a mighty roar that deafened the ears and numbed the brain. At first Jack thought their hour had come, but, while the noise still continued, he still remained unhurt. And then he realised that Dolly had saved him from death, for a great volume of blinding steam was pouring from the escape, and the indicating hand of the pressure-gauge was rapidly travelling back to its accustomed position.

Digitized by Google

"Thank God!" he muttered brokenly. "Dolly, we are saved!"

The girl came up to him where he stood, fettered to the great post, and kissed him rapturously, with the tears in her blue eyes. Then she began to undo the belt which held her lover to the post, drawing out the nails which fastened the belt to the wood by means of a chisel which Jack had directed her to find. When at last he was free, he took her in his arms and asked—

"How was it, Dolly, that you came here?"

A serious look came into the girl's eyes.

"It seems almost miraculous," she said in a low voice. "I had gone to bed and had fallen asleep, but I had such a terrible dream that I awoke with a start. The dream was so horrible and vivid that I could not go to sleep again, so I rose and sat by the window of my little room. I was thinking of you, working all through the long dark night, for one of the men had told me you and Davy were to remain. Presently I saw a man running along the road. When he reached our house he stopped, and, looking up at my window, shook his clenched hands above his head, and laughed so terribly that I shrank back. He could not see me, I knew, but I could plainly discern his features in the light of the gas-lamp which stood near. It was Dan Davy. At first I was bewildered, and then something seemed to tell me you were in danger. I tried to argue the thought down, but it only grew within me, and I made up my mind, helpless woman as I was, to come here and see."

"And you came just in time, dear," said Jack, drawing her towards him in fervent gratitude. "You have saved my life, Dolly, and at the risk of your own."

The girl looked happily into the face of her lover.

"Now let us go home," she said. "I am cold. You must find that terrible man, who, but for the intervention of Providence, would have been your murderer, for he must be punished. Now take me to my home, and come and see me in the morning."

And he did so with a light step and proud heart, since his life was even more than of yore in the hands of his beautiful Dolly. But the man who had planned his murder had already met his punishment, for, in the morning, they found him a raving maniac, wandering about the fields on the outskirts of the town. And thus the frustrated revenge of an unscrupulous rival only served to still further cement the bond of love between Jack Trevor and his fair rescuer, and, as so often happens, even in this world, out of evil came good.

Walter J. Mowbray.

"Cordelia is selling everything to go abroad again." "She is?" "Yes; she offered to sell me her bicycle and her engagement to Mr. Jimp."

"Saw you on a weighing machine this afternoon," said the Funny Man. "Were you thinking of suicide?" "Suicide?" repeated the other man. "Yes; doing a weigh with yourself."

"I've a great story to tell you, chaps," said a man to a group at the club. "I don't think any of you ever heard me tell it before." "Is it a really good one?" asked one of the party doubtfully. "It certainly is." "Then you never told it before," chorused the crowd.

"I thought," said Dawkins, "that you said you didn't think much of Bradbury as a pianist, and here you have taken a box for his recital." "I didn't know," answered Morely, "a better way to show my contempt for him as a musician than by taking a box, and leaving it empty on the evening of his recital."

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

In Addition to £1,000 in Cash.

THE MOST LIBERAL PRIZE EVER OFFERED BY ANY PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is so huge that it is almost impossible for one to realise at first thought what it really means. Therefore the following hints will probably enable you to grasp the full value of such a regular income:

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE means, unless you are extravagant, absolute freedom from money troubles as long as you live.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is an insurance against depression and mental worry.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will enable you to dispense charity with a liberal hand.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy you a bigger house and enable you to live in better style.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will cover the cost of taking a cottage in the country and living there in comfort for the rest of your days.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will pay the expenses of months of foreign travel.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy anything you can possibly want, from a piano to a motor-car.

If you want to set up in business you would soon have enough capital by saving the £5 every week for a time—

In Six Months you would have £130
In Twelve Months you would have £260
In Two Years you would have £520

In fact, there is no limit to the things you can do with £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE.

THE prize will be paid to the person (perhaps you) who correctly solves a number of pictures which appear in PEARSON'S WEEKLY, under the conditions printed in that paper.

Each picture consists of certain objects, the names of which represent the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom. For example, the hull of a ship would mean "Hull." Every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:—

FIRST CONSOLATION GIFT, £100.

2nd Cash Gift	... ...	£50
3rd	,, ...	£50
4th	,, ...	£25
5th	,, ...	£25
6th	,, ...	£25
7th	,, ...	£25
8th to 57th Cash Gifts	... ...	£10 each
58th to 97th	,, ...	£5 each

So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a Week for Life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash gifts.

£5 a Week for Life!

Digitized by Google

Cards Will Soon be Out.

"I FEEL lost here in all this noise and hurry of London." "If 'findings is keepings,' Miss Fairmount, I'll head a search party."

Better Allow It Now.

MISS HOMELY: "Do you think I ought to permit Jack to kiss me before we are married?" Miss Beauty: "Yes, unless you prefer never to be kissed."

A Gentle Hint.

HE (sympathetically): "You have a bad cold?" She (huskily): "I have. I am so hoarse that if you attempted to kiss me I couldn't even scream."

No Change About Him.

"DEAREST," she murmured, "I'm so afraid you'll change." "Darling," he answered, "you'll never find any change about me." Which was painfully true in a double sense.

Not Spent So Much.

"BUT, Bertha, it was only last month that I paid a dressmaker's bill of £12, and here is another this month for £10." "Well, dear Edgar, that shows, you see, that I am beginning to spend less."

Why Not the Lips?

"MY queen," exclaimed her adorer timidly, "may I kiss the royal hand?" "My faithful subject," replied the young woman, with the air of one gently chiding him, "what is the matter with the royal lips?"

His Ideal.

"No," said the fair girl, "it's no use. You don't come up to my ideal." "Perhaps not," he answered. "But I don't care if I can only get anywhere near my own." "Your own?" she answered. "What is your ideal?" "You," he whispered.

Making the Home Club-like.

WIFE: "There, dear, here are all the magazines, here are whisky and soda and a box of your favourite cigars, and the papers. If you want anything else, just ring the bell." Husband: "What on earth is the matter?" "Nothing. I merely wanted to make your home as club-like as possible."

Where They Really Wandered.

"WHY do women so often wander so aimlessly in the murky solicitudes of the dead past, brooding over days for ever gone?" asked a young lady of a marrying widower. "They don't, I think," he said. "Rather they wander, especially at this season, in the drapers' shops of the present, often pricing articles which they have not the remotest intention of buying."

He Was a Campanologist.

"DID you hear of that Manchester man who was engaged to seventeen young ladies at the same time?" asked the small girl. "Yes," replied her cousin—"quite a campanologist, was he not?" "I—er—don't think I quite understand." "Pardon me; I should have said he was quite a ringer of belles."

She Liked Herself Next.

MAY: "Next to a man, what's the jolliest thing you know of?" Ethel: "Myself, if he's nice."

It Might be Risky.

MISS HUGGINS: "My father is very good at reading faces." Mr. Kissam: "Then I had better not print any kisses here."

The Unit of Measurement.

MR. HIBORN: "By what unit of measurement could you properly estimate a man's devotion to you?" Miss Lowe: "The carat."

Poor Bashful Man.

THE BASHFUL LOVER: "Miss Emily, I—er—hem!" She (sweetly): "Do you, Mr. Mammasdear? Now, wouldn't you like to join our sewing class?"

She Could Afford to.

THE HEIRESS: "Am I the only girl in the whole wide world you love?" He: "No, dear; but you are the only girl I know who could afford to marry me."

Hope Isn't Satisfying.

HE: "Then I may live upon hope until next Sunday evening?" She: "Oh, poor fellow, is it as bad as that? Here, I'll lend you enough to buy a meal."

Not Had Time Yet.

"I JUST saw Miss Crœsus go into the conservatory with that Italian nobleman. Are they engaged?" "Oh, I hardly think so as yet. Give her fifteen minutes more."

Nest-Hunting.

"I DEARLY love birds," he gently sighed. And then what did she do but hasten to the open piano and softly begin singing, "I wish I were a bird." They are looking for a nest now.

Looking Ahead.

ALGY: "They want six thousand pounds for the lease, Maria. It runs for eighty-nine years." Maria: "Well, don't buy it, Algy! Only eighty-nine years! Fancy dear baby being turned out of his house at ninety-one, and possibly infirm into the bargain!"

Not His Fault.

SHE: "Do you remember how you said, when you were courting me, that if I would marry you I would have nothing to do all my days but sit about and look pretty? And how different it is now!" He: "Well, it isn't my fault if you can't look pretty any more."

Couldn't Speak for Her.

MISS KISSAM: "You seem depressed to-night, Mr. Dexter." Mr. Dexter: "Yes, I am. I went to a fortune-teller to-day to find out my fate, and was told that the girl I loved would not marry me." Miss Kissam: "But, Mr. Dexter, no fortune-teller is authorised to speak for me."

No Romance Left.

"YES—I gave him up," sighed the young woman. "Did he prove unworthy of your affection?" inquired her sympathetic friend. "He—he became a spelling reformer," replied the other, with a shudder, "and signed his name 'Jorj.' It took all the poetry and romance out of the name, and so we parted."

Learnt a Lesson.

"I SHALL say nothing about this to anybody," said the young woman, attempting to soften the blow, "and I need not add that there is no occasion for you, either, to repeat it." "Repeat it!" echoed the rejected lover bitterly. "No! I shall never propose to another girl because of her pretty doll face as long as I live!"

Had Sent it to Him.

MR. LE JECKS: "Well, Miss Coldcash, I suppose you received a good many birthday cards?" Miss Coldcash (sweetly): "Oh, yes; and there was one particularly dainty and artistic. I am sure it came from you." Mr. Le Jecks (delighted): "What makes you think so?" Miss Coldcash: "Because I sent it to you on your last birthday."

The Hobbies of George Mitchell.

⁂

A Pathetic Story of the Winning of a Woman's Love.

⁂

Little George Mitchell had made his money—piles of it—in tallow; and what was worse, he looked as if he had!

He didn't drop his aitches exactly, and he had on the whole passable manners; he could even manufacture an inoffensive and grammatical after-dinner speech if he was put to it. But nothing—not the best tailor in London, not the biggest mansion in Park Lane—could make anything of him but a respectable tradesman.

It was his appearance that most strongly betrayed the "risen" man. He had a common neck; and a certain droop of his shoulders and the shape of his hands seemed to say "Business! business! business!" almost as if they spoke aloud. His redeeming feature was a pair of great brown eyes, that reminded one of a faithful Newfoundland dog.

The world of fashion laughed at him, but took him up more or less, because—well, because nowadays it can't afford to sneeze at a private yacht and the best hunters in Great Britain.

It happened while he was making his grand tour that he ran across his fate in the person of the Woman. It was in India that they met. She lived with her father at an out-of-the-way little up-country station. She was beautiful, of course, with the cold, disdainful, passionless type of beauty that is to some men so instantaneously fatal.

It didn't take George Mitchell long—slow of perception as he was about some things—to understand the nature of affairs at the La Mothes' bungalow.

The Colonel's hand was a trifle too shaky at breakfast, and his face a trifle too flushed by the evening, to hide the family skeleton for very long from a visitor. In a short time he took to watching his daughter out of the way, and to pouring querulous plaints into George's ear with regard to pecuniary difficulties, of which he seemed to have a vast collection.

George listened stolidly. He listened also to tedious yarns of the Colonel's poor but aristocratic relations who would do nothing for him—of ancient estates heavily encumbered—of a titled but impecunious brother who could only give him good advice; and he turned things over in his mind and came at length to a conclusion. He stayed at the station for three weeks. There was a ruined temple near that he'd come a thousand miles out of his way to see; and before he left he'd taken the most serious step of all commonplace successful life.

He had laid his stubby hand reverently and timidly upon the fragile fingers of the Colonel's daughter, and he had said very simply and very diffidently:

"You're not happy here, Miss La Mothe. This life jars on you; and you are, if you will forgive me for saying so, so dreadfully poor. Will you let me try to make up to you for it all in the future? Will you be my wife?"

Zoe La Mothe wasn't surprised. She had seen something of the kind looming for days, and she had awaited it with a sort of numb contempt.

"I don't love you," she said slowly; not, however, removing her hand—"but you know that, of course. You have been awfully kind to us, and your offer is a great temptation. I've always longed to be rich, and—and as you have seen, there is nothing to attract me to my present life. If you are really content to take me on my own terms, I will do my best to be—dutiful."

"You—you care for no one else?" he asked quickly.

Miss La Mothe shrugged her shapely shoulders. "I have such a large selection to choose from here," she said bitterly. "A few raw subalterns, a decrepit major, and a doctor who is to be married next month. No, there is no one else."

"Then," said the man of tallow; "I am satisfied."

A year later the shaky Colonel got three months leave, and brought his daughter to England; and by an effort scraped together hard cash to get her a respectable trousseau, and left her thankfully in the hands of the tallow-maker. In return, the tallow-maker paid his father-in-law's debts, gave him some rugged homely advice as to the cause of his shakiness, and left him with a bundle of banknotes in his pocket-book and the tears of the habitual inebriate in his eyes.

Zoe Mitchell did her best to be a dutiful wife at first, but she and her husband had not a single thing in common. His looks provoked her, his ways irritated her; and to see "Mitchell's Superfine Candles" on London hoardings invariably sent her back to Park Lane with a headache.

Gradually she began to go her way, and slowly he crept back to his. She was a cultured woman, and she collected about her a cultured set. The tallow-maker was not cultured; indeed, he had much ado not to appear absolutely illiterate. And so it came to pass that she grew more and more ashamed of him, and consequently they saw very little of one another. "The beautiful Mrs. Mitchell with the impossible husband" friends—her friends—called her. To do her bare justice she really believed that George Mitchell was happy enough in his own way. He never complained. He'd lots of hobbies—queer, plebeian hobbies—that she vaguely imagined quite filled his life; and when at intervals they did meet, he was always perfectly cheerful.

She didn't know that "The beautiful Mrs. Mitchell with the impossible husband" was as familiar a term to him as to her. No, she did not know, because "the impossible husband" was a man who did not easily show his feelings.

But suddenly, one evening, quite by accident, she came across a very different phase of his impossibility—a sinister phase—and it aroused her to something even more than interest in him—to red-hot, shaking indignation.

They were down at their seat in Brackonshire—together, for a wonder—and the valet, who, like all the servants, was fond, in a patronising way, of little George Mitchell—approached Mrs. Mitchell deferentially as she was sweeping in to dinner.

"My master doesn't feel well, ma'am. He's gone to bed. These are his keys. He begs you will look in the third drawer of his desk after dinner, and bring him a packet of private papers tied with red tape, and marked on the outside with a red ink cross."

Mrs. Mitchell slightly raised her pencilled eyebrows as she took the keys. "Tell your master I will do as he wishes," she said carelessly and passed on.

It was a rare chance, indeed, that took her into George's private study. Trade journals were to be found there that disagreed with her, and neat piles of methodically filed bills that spoke of the banality of the counting house. And, worst of all, standing on the mantelshelf, was a photograph of George's late mother. Even the well-trained servants giggled over that. She was a fat, vulgar-looking old woman with an improbable cap, and a broad, homely smile; George thought her beautiful!

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Mitchell dawdled over dinner, and pondered somewhat. She had not asked anyone in to share the meal—she didn't as a rule when George was at home. As it turned out, she might have done so, for now he was poorly, it seemed. She had never known him poorly before. She hoped to goodness he wasn't going to be ill; illness in a house is a great nuisance, she reflected irritably; but probably after all it was only a bad cold.

She finished her last grape slowly, and rose with a rather impatient sigh.

Instead of going to her own boudoir or to the drawing-room, she proceeded to the study, and, still wrapped in thought, she found the third drawer of the desk, fitted the key, and opened it. It was full of business papers duly docketed and tied with variously coloured tape. She selected her packet, and was about to close the drawer, when she noticed, thrust back into a corner, a bundle of private letters. The envelopes were small and softly tinted, and they were bound together with a piece of white satin ribbon. What particularly attracted Mrs. Mitchell's eye was the newness of the paper—the letters looked as if they had only just been put there. One usually associates ribbon-bound correspondence with envelopes yellow with age and fragrant with musk and memories; these were aggressively fresh.

Half mechanically she took them out and turned them over in her hands. They were in a woman's writing—writing not unlike her own. The dates on the post-marks were recent.

Mrs. Mitchell, despite her aristocratic lineage, was particularly correct in her ideas. She went her own way, it is true, but it was a spotless and respectable way.

What were another woman's letters doing in the desk of the man she had married? Her heart began to beat uncomfortably; instinctively her white fingers twitched at the ribbon. After all, she had a right to know George Mitchell's secrets, if anyone had. Was it possible that this man—this little commoner, whom she called husband—had been capable of some vulgar intrigue? She had fancied till now that she knew the worst of him; she had thought of him hitherto as a simple, good-natured little plebeian, but was he also a knave? She flushed scarlet with indignation and wounded pride. Rapidly and angrily, without giving herself time for reflection, she undid the ribbon and opened the letter at the top of the little pile.

There was no address on the sheet. "My own Darling," it began, as if the writer had been too anxious to pour out her soul to trouble about such mundane things as addresses. It ran on for four pages, and was full of tenderness that somehow made the reader intangibly envious. There was nothing in it that could betray the writer's identity—it was just a fond, foolish letter, and it was merely signed "Your own little girl."

With a deeper flush dyeing her cheek, and her white teeth pressed hard on to her lower lip, she tossed it down and took up another. This spoke of devotion, even greater than the first; and again she turned it over eagerly, hoping to see some signature that would, at least, give her a clue.

"Your loving wife," was what she read.

A horrible fear darted into Mrs. Mitchell's heart.

His wife! George Mitchell's wife! What did it mean? What could it mean? Had the tallow-maker saved her drunken father from bankruptcy and given her luxury and wealth under false pretences? Was she only his tool and dupe? His wife in name, perhaps, when—the idea was too appalling! She dropped breathlessly into a chair, gathered all the letters up, and set herself to read them through from beginning to end.

They were all much in the same strain—breathing of the passionate, tender love of a woman for a man, carrying Zoe Mitchell into an atmosphere she could not understand or appreciate; and they ended abruptly, except for some scribbled pet-name. They weren't written by a lady; there were little tricks of speech which betrayed them; but it was obvious throughout that she who had penned them loved George Mitchell to distraction, and believed herself to be his lawful wife—which was worse.

It was obvious, too, that she knew of no rival in the field.

There were little pathetic touches about being his first and last love, and of the happy times they had spent together, and were still to spend.

Zoe Mitchell didn't attempt to understand or to analyse; only a sudden contemptuous pity took possession of her—pity for the unknown woman, who, like herself, had been fooled by an illiterate hypocrite of a man.

She finished the last of the packet, and her breast heaved with the intensity of her wrath and mortification.

Acting on impulse, she picked up the stray sheets, and walked rapidly out of the study and upstairs to her husband's bedroom.

Without waiting to knock, she pushed open the door and passed straight to his side.

George Mitchell was sitting up in bed supported by pillows; his face was a strange livid hue—his breath was coming harshly; but she noticed none of these signs.

"I want an explanation," she began in the low, concentrated tone of intense and bitter anger. "I ought to have asked for it before, it seems."

His eyes which had lighted a little at her entrance, grew dull again.

He raised one hand feebly in protest.

"Can't explanations — wait?" he whispered. "I wanted you; I have some important work to do—I am not well."

"Well or ill," she cried harshly; "I intend to know the meaning of these"—she held out the letters to him. "Who is this creature?" she asked rapidly. "Why does she call herself your wife?"

He did not answer; only he looked at her beseechingly.

"Who wrote them?" she persisted with increasing rage; "I insist on knowing."

He stretched out his hand and took the bundle of notes from her and laid them on the bed, turning them over and over with fond, feeble fingers. There was a half smile on his face as he did so.

"Do you mean to answer me?" she demanded icily. "Are you afraid?"

The taunt in her last words roused him.

"No," he said, looking up at her suddenly; "no, I am not afraid. I have nothing to be afraid of, because—because I wrote them myself!"

She shrank back a step, as if she thought he had taken leave of his senses.

"You?—what do you mean? Is this some senseless subterfuge? If so——"

"No, it isn't," he interrupted gently, and his pale cheeks flushed a little; "I did write them—I did indeed, Zoe. It doesn't matter now what you know. You see, I loved you so—so tremendously, and I did so long for a bit of love in return. I'm not blaming you, my dear—don't think so. I knew it couldn't be, of course. You were straight with me from the first, and you never pretended it could. But I've always been a queer, fanciful sort of fellow, though I don't look it—I used to think and ponder over just what I'd like you to say, supposing—supposing you could have cared, you know; and then I took to writing it down, and I tried to copy your hand, just to fancy how loving words would have looked in it;

Digitized by Google

I know how foolish all this must sound." He glanced at her apologetically.

"Go on," she said in a dry, strangled voice; "go on."

"I got more and more silly," he proceeded nervously; "and I used to write letters and post them to myself, and try to imagine—especially when you were away, as you generally were—that they came from you. You'd be surprised how getting them used to hearten me up. I've known my pulses leap and jump when I've seen one of those envelopes on the breakfast table, and for a bit I'd half believe that it really did come from you. Of course, it was ridiculous and childish, but I took to keeping them, and——"

"Stop," she cried, and it was an exceeding bitter cry. "Oh, stop."

She sank down on her knees, and took one of the rugged hands in both her own, bending her hot face over it in an agony of remorse and shame.

"What must you think of me? Oh, what must you think of me?" she whispered.

The little tallow-maker was terribly distressed.

"Don't, dear," he repeated again and again; "don't! What do I think of you, do you say? Why, exactly what I always have thought—that next to my mother you are the most beautiful and wonderful woman on this earth—and the best. I'm not blaming you for anything, Zoe; don't think for a moment that I am. You have nothing to reproach yourself with."

He tried to raise her head, but the effort made him pant.

"George," she breathed, looking up at him all at once with swimming, startled eyes, and for the moment forgetting herself; "you're very ill. What's the matter with you? What can I do?"

"Don't you trouble, dear," he said huskily. "It's a chill of some sort, I think. I've sent Benson for the lawyer, for somehow I feel as if I wasn't coming out of it, and I want to make everything right for you afterwards. I ought to have done it at the time of our marriage, but I kept putting it off."

"But a doctor?" she demanded in sharp, horrified surprise; "haven't you sent for a doctor?"

"I didn't think it was much use," he said meekly. "I've been feeling queer for a long time now, off and on, and I think this must be the finish."

She read his face with penetrating, anguished eyes.

"You don't care to live?" she said in a stricken tone; "you think I don't want you?"

He did not answer, but instead, he fidgeted evasively with the bedclothes.

"George," she cried passionately, standing up beside his bed, very tall and white and determined; "you shall not die. Do you hear me? You shall not."

It was a terrible struggle—so terrible that three great specialists shooks their head more than once. On an already weakened constitution double pneumonia with complications is apt to be a desperately serious matter.

"But with a nurse like that wife of his," they said, "his friends will, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that no single stone has been left unturned."

And gradually—very gradually—there dawned in George Mitchell's darkened room the first will-o-the-wisp ray of hope. And in due course—only it was a long and weary business—he did creep back to life; but it was a very frail ghost of him that leant for the first time on his wife's arm after months of desperate suffering.

* * * * *

And once again "the beautiful Mrs. Mitchell with the impossible husband" became the topic of comment in Society, just as they had been in the first days of their married life.

"She's posing as positively fond of that little horror, if you please!" said Lady Ponsonby de Darrell to her particular friend. "I know all the La Mothes well, and I always said, my dear, that they were a little mad. Why, Enid, tells me that when Zoe ran down for the inside of a week to Elva Fletcher's wedding, she absolutely wrote to her chandler every day! Can you imagine anything more absurd?"

Chris Sewell.

Your Editor Chats.

OUR NEW SERIES.

Last week I promised to tell you something about a new series of articles which will shortly start in this paper. The circumstances under which it was written equal in interest those under which "The Confessions of Cynthia" and "How I Chaperoned Belinda" were put into manuscript. This series, however, is quite different from the previous ones, inasmuch as the chief character in the story is the person who writes the series.

Everyone has heard of the "self-made man," but few people have heard of the "self-made girl." This series deals with "The Confessions of a Self-Made Girl." It is really the story of a girl living in a country village who is filled with a desire to make a name for herself in the world, and therefore comes to London, practically penniless, and by her beauty and brains builds up for herself a great name.

The series will be a short one, and will be followed by another series absolutely different from anything which has already appeared. Society and its doings will be left for a time, and fresh ground broken. "The Confessions of a Self-Made Girl" begin in Short Stories for March 7th.

OUR NEW SERIAL.

Our new serial has been specially written for us by Mr. R. Norman Silver, whose previous tales—"The Golden Dwarf," "Tales Told Off Duty," and other stories—are well known to the readers of this paper.

The opening instalment, which will be a very big one, crammed with striking situations, will appear in Short Stories for March 7th.

OUR NEW COMPETITION.

The preparations for starting this competition are now practically complete, and I am sure, when you see it, that it will strike you as being one of the most delightful and profitable forms of recreation yet devised. The prize will be a cash one, and the time occupied in doing the competition will not interfere with the time you may presently occupy in other competitions. This competition will start in Short Stories for March 7th.

So you see altogether that Short Stories for March 7th will be a bumper number, and that it will be crammed from cover to cover with startling prizes and splendid fiction.

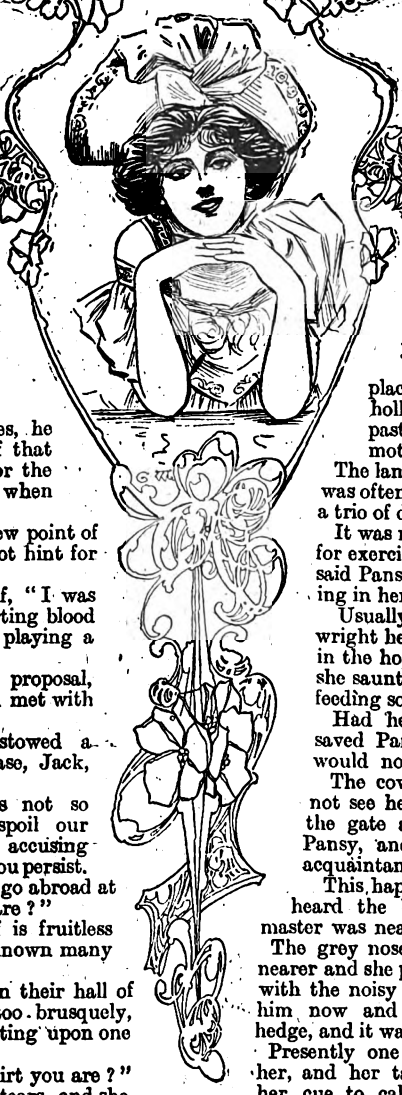
There will be a very great rush on that issue, and it will be advisable for you as the time draws near just to give your newsagent a hint that he must keep your copy for you, otherwise he might be inclined to sell it to anyone who may rush in before you have time to get round.

Your Editor.

The winner of the £10 offered in the third "Dayton" Competition is Mr. J. Willcock, 72 Kirglake Street, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

Love's Last Laugh.



The Tale of a Country Courtship.

It was only a question of weeks, possibly months. You will guess, if you read a little way, and the details of the matter are of small concern to the world.

Still, Tom Morleigh was far from thinking that Pansy was as good as his, although he had reached her heart, as he thought a long way.

Like most of his gender in such cases, he revelled for a while in the placid belief that when the time came she would be his for the asking. The shock of disillusion came when he offered his hand.

Her prompt rejection gave him a new point of view in regard to women, but it did not hint for a moment that the cause was lost.

"It's the old story," he told himself, "I was too sure." The incident stirred his sporting blood and made him resolve to win her by playing a stronger game.

In due season there came a second proposal, and a third came in quick order. Each met with a definite negative.

Upon the second sally Pansy bestowed a charitable smile, and remarked: "Please, Jack, don't be silly."

The next time he tried it she was not so patient. "You seem determined to spoil our Summer," she said, as though she were accusing him of a black conspiracy. "Really, if you persist, there is nothing for mamma and I but to go abroad at once. Have you any idea how rude you are?"

One of the tasks a man soon tires of is fruitless proposing. Romance and reality have known many noble exceptions.

Morleigh was not cut out for a seat in their hall of fame. He answered her last question too brusquely, of course, but love and hate are ever waiting upon one another.

"Have you any idea what a heartless flirt you are?" were his words. It was Pansy's cue for tears, and she took it copiously, making the while a hurried exit, or rather an entrance through the French window.

Morleigh remained standing on the verandah a moment, and, thanks to his changing point of view, took new heart. He began to pat himself for his keen penetration.

"Those tears are all right," he said, gleefully. "I'll have another go."

The day came, and he looked in at "Elmwood," but the maid, with blighting alacrity, announced that Miss Arkwright was not in.

As she said it, a man's laugh that he knew well and detested plagued his ear. It came loudly, aggressively, it seemed to him, from the dining-room.

"Even that silly ape would not sit and guffaw to himself," he reasoned. "Of course she's with him."

Despite the new eyes with which he had begun to survey womankind, the outlook seemed serious, even hopeless. He climbed into his trap and drove down the avenue of elms, convinced that he was cast for the role of one who had loved and lost.

"And that bounder wins! By Jove! It isn't right at all! What in thunder does she see in him?" and more of this tenor until he drove into his own stable-yard and threw the reins to his man.

A fine grove of firs at the east end of his place was bordered by a lane high hedged with holly. On its other side stretched the level pasture lands that belonged to Pansy's mother.

The lane wound its way to the sea shore, and Jack was often seen there in the days that followed with a trio of dogs frolicking about him.

It was remarkable how often he took those dogs for exercise and a bath since the day that the maid said Pansy was not in and he heard the ape laughing in her drawing-room.

Usually he kept an eye cocked over the Arkwright hedge—one had to be pretty tall for that—in the hopes of seeing her, for it was in that field she sauntered now and then, when the cows were feeding somewhere else.

Had he looked to-day as usual he would have saved Pansy a big fright, but their engagement would not have been announced so soon.

The cowman was the primary cause. He did not see her in that field, of course, when he opened the gate and let in the cattle; but the cows saw Pansy, and straightway approached to make her acquaintance.

This happened at about the moment that Pansy heard the bark of Jack's dogs, and knew that the master was near at hand.

The grey noses and swishing tails came nearer and nearer and she pressed closer to the hedge, moving along with the noisy dogs on the other side. She could see him now and again through a narrow opening in the hedge, and it was good to know that he was there.

Presently one of the bold Jerseys was walking beside her, and her tail almost brushed her back. This was her cue to call for help, even upon a man who had bored her with silly proposals.

"Jack," she cried.

He started and caught a glimpse of her blue skirts between the hedge rifts.

"Jack!" came her voice again. "I am—I am at home to-day. Won't you look in—jump in—over the hedge—quick—I've something to tell you."

It was an impossible leap, but there are more things than locksmiths that love laughs at. One is a holly hedge when the man is determined and is not afraid of torn clothes and a scratched face.

The dogs managed to dash through with him, pell-mell, and had a fine chase after the Jersey, who took to her heels at this rude interruption of her friendly tête-à-tête with the maid.

Somehow, their engagement was understood from that moment, and he did not have to bore her by proposing. So you were right in guessing from the way Pansy carried on at the outset that it was only a matter of time—and golden opportunity.

Henry W. Thomas.

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

The Release.

"Now, who talks first?" Brett cried, once the door was fairly closed behind them.

"I do," burst forth Fairholme. "My story will not take long to tell, and if I do not get it off my chest, I shall simply explode."

"We must not have any more tragedies," said Brett, "so proceed."

"Well, thanks to your foresight, I found the two servants and your ex-policeman waiting for me on the platform at Charing Cross. As I only carried a handbag I had no trouble with the Customs, and we walked straight out of the station. In less than five minutes we were standing outside the building which contained the invalid lady's flat. Your agent told me that, so far as he knew, there were no other persons in the place except the tenant and her two servants, an elderly French or Italian married couple. Our collective wits could not devise a plausible pretext for gaining access to the lady, so I determined to settle the business in the brutal British fashion. We marched quietly up the stairs to the second storey, and your assistant pointed out the right door. There were only two flats on that landing, and the other one was apparently empty. Your man had made a somewhat important discovery since he wrote to you. This empty flat had been taken by the agent who acted for the parties opposite, and although the place was not tenanted, the landlord was, of course, satisfied, as the rent had been paid in advance. This seemed to indicate that the place was left vacant simply to prevent the others from being overlooked."

Brett marked his appreciation of Fairholme's sagacity by a nod, and the earl continued:

"I rang the bell and promptly put my ear to the keyhole. It seemed to me that a couple of doors were hastily closed, and then someone slowly approached. The outer door was opened and a man's head appeared. I could only see his face and a portion of his left shoulder, because the chain was on the door, and the opening was not more than eight or ten inches. Speaking in broken English he said—

"'Vat you vant?' His accent showed that he was a Frenchman.

"I answered in my best French, 'I wish to see madame, your mistress, at once.'

"'It is impossible,' he said in the same language, and simultaneously he tried to shut the door in my face. I shoved my foot against the jamb and prevented him. At the same instant my own servant and I—as, if there was to be trouble, I thought it best to keep the others out of it—applied our utmost force to the door and succeeded in snapping the chain. It might have been a tough job, as you know that to force a way through anything that yields slightly and yet holds fast is much more difficult than to smash a lock or a couple of bolts. Luckily the flats were jerry built, so the chain broke, and so suddenly that the Frenchman was pitched violently backwards. We nearly fell after him. The ex-policeman was a splendid chap. His first idea was to jump towards the switch of the electric lights and turn on every lamp in the place.

"I shouted, 'Talbot, are you there? It is I, Fairholme.'

"I got no answer, but a woman darted out of a room which proved to be the kitchen, screamed something which I could not catch, and handed a revolver to the Frenchman, who was just struggling to his feet. That was where my prize-fighting butler came in useful. Before you could say 'Wink' he gave the man an upper cut that settled him effectually for the next minute. Almost with the same movement he caught the woman a slap over the ear that upset her nerves considerably. She had a revolver in her hand too. It fell to the floor, and Smith, your servant, seized both weapons.

"The ex-policeman called out:

"'I do not think we are making any mistake, sir. They would not act after this manner if they were on the square.'

"I must say it seemed to me that so far it was we who had been acting in an extraordinary way, but there was no time to discuss the ethics of the case then. Whilst my butler and Smith took care of the couple, your assistant and I hastily examined three rooms. They were empty, save for a small quantity of furniture. The fourth door resisted our efforts, so, of course, we burst it open. And the first thing that met our eyes was poor old Jack lying on his back on the bed, and glaring at us in a way that made me think at first he was mad."

"I should think so," interrupted Talbot. "I would like to see your face if you were trussed up as I was—not able to speak a word—and a fiendish row going on in the passage outside."

"You were gagged," questioned Brett, "and your wrists and ankles were secured to the four corners of the bed, your limbs being distended in the form of an X?"

Fairholme glanced round admiringly. "Of course," he cried delightedly, "I knew you would guess it. That is the pleasant way these Turks have of securing their prisoners."

"It is an awfully uncomfortable one," said Talbot. "My joints are still stiff at the mere recollection of it. I have lain in that way, Mr. Brett, for countless hours. Occasionally the brutes would allow me to change my posture, but the moment anyone came to the door I was strapped up in an instant and a gag slipped into my mouth. What used to make me so furious was the knowledge that if only I got the chance of a second I could have broken that Frenchman's neck, and escaped, but he and his wife always took such precautions that I never had the liberty to do more than reach with some difficulty the food that they gave me. However, I must not interrupt."

"I really have not much more to say," went on Fairholme.

Digitized by Google

"You may be sure it did not take me long to release Talbot, and what do you think his first words were when he slowly sat up in bed and tried if his legs would bend?"

"I cannot guess," said Brett.

"He said: 'Have they got the diamonds?'

"I answered 'Yes.'

"'But it was impossible,' he said. 'They could not have mastered all those policemen.'

"'But they did,' I replied and then and there, before he would budge an inch, he made me tell him the whole story. Just as I had ended we heard a scuffle in the passage. We went out, though Jack was hardly able to walk at first. It was Smith wrestling with the woman, who was a regular wild cat, and who would, even then, have done us any mischief in her power. There was nothing for it but to tie her hands behind her back, and then fasten her securely in a chair. After this was done we took council as to our next movements."

"Wait a little," said Brett. "How many rooms were there in the flat? You have accounted for four."

"I forgot," said Fairholme. "The place had six rooms. The small apartment in which Jack was confined was a sort of dressing room, and the bedroom beyond looked out into the well of the block of flats. They had carefully nailed the blinds of this dressing-room, so that not even a chance puff of wind could blow it aside and reveal its secret to anyone in the flats on the opposite storey or higher. The remaining room was empty. Your friend the policeman subsequently searched the place from top to toe, but he found nothing. The only document of any importance was an address on a card which he discovered in the Frenchman's pocket."

"Ah," said Brett, "what was that address?"

"Here it is."

The earl produced a small piece of pasteboard on which was scribbled, "Monsieur Jean Beaujolais, chez Monsieur Henri de Lisle, 41 Rue Bonnerie, Paris."

"That is important," said the barrister. "Why did you not wire it to me last night?"

"I had a reason," said the earl eagerly, "but that comes in with Jack's part of the story." And he turned towards Talbot, who, thus summoned on to the stage, began to explain matters.

Jack Talbot's Story.

"I UNDERSTAND, Mr. Brett," he said, "that you are accurately acquainted with all that transpired until the moment when I entered the Albert Gate mansion on that remarkable night?"

"That is so," said Brett.

"Well, when Inspector Sharpe met me at the door on my arrival he told me that his Excellency Mehemet Ali, with three strange gentlemen and the junior members of the commission, awaited me in the dining-room. I went in and was surprised to find the three visitors, for during the preceding month not a single stranger had entered the house save a member of the Government and one or two important officials of the Foreign Office, who came with me out of sheer curiosity to see a collection of remarkable diamonds.

"The strangers bowed politely when I was introduced. Two of them spoke neither French nor English, but the third man spoke French fluently. He had, by the way, a somewhat peculiar accent, different from that to which I was accustomed in the Turks. It was softer, more sibilant, and impressed me as that of a man who was accustomed to speak Italian. He was a good-looking chap, about my height and build, and, were it not for his brown skin, one would not have regarded him as a Turk. One side of his face was deeply scarred with a sword-cut, but, if anything, this did not detract from his appearance, and it gave a manly aspect to an otherwise effeminate face."

Brett could not help smiling involuntarily.

"Are you sure it was a sword-cut?"

"It certainly looked like one."

"And his skin was very brown?"

"Oh, quite. Indeed it was a shade deeper than that of most Turks. I have seen very many of them. Although dark-featured they are often pallid enough in reality, and their deep-hued complexion is due more to their black hair and eyebrows and dark eyes than to the mere colour of the skin."

Brett smiled again.

"I think," he said, "I will show you the same gentleman in a somewhat different aspect. But proceed."

"The explanation given to me by Mehemet Ali was both extraordinary and disconcerting, especially at such a late hour. He told me that the three gentlemen to whom I had been introduced—I am sorry, by the way, that I cannot remember their names, as they were all Mohammeds, or Rasuls, or Ibrahims, and the dramatic events of the night subsequently drove them from my mind—had been sent post haste from Constantinople on a special mission. They had indeed only reached London that night, and they bore with them a special mandate signed by the Sultan himself, directing Mehemet Ali to hand over the diamonds to their charge, and to at once return with his assistants to Yildiz Kiosk.

"There could be no questioning the authenticity of the Sultan's instructions. The document was in his own handwriting, was indorsed with his private seal, and conveyed other distinguishing marks which rendered his Excellency assured on this important point. He told me that he was compelled to obey implicitly, and were it possible he would have started from London that night. This, however, was out of the question, but he had not lost a moment in sending for me, and acquainting me with his Majesty's wishes.

"You will readily perceive that the affair placed me in an awkward predicament. I was, so to speak, representing the British Government in the matter, and the Foreign Office had pledged itself, through our Ambassador at Constantinople, to undertake all the precautions for safeguarding the diamonds with which you are acquainted. It seemed to me that, notwithstanding the urgency of the Sultan's order, I should not be doing my duty to permit the transfer to be made in such an irregular manner. So I said quite plainly that the matter could not be settled that night. They must all wait until the morning, when I would have an opportunity of consulting my department, and Mehemet Ali, together with his aides, could leave for Constantinople by the evening train, after my superiors had been acquainted with the Sultan's wishes.

"Turks are difficult people to understand. It seemed to me that my decision gave some satisfaction to Mehemet Ali, who was undoubtedly very much upset by the queer manner in which he had been deposed from his important trust. At once an animated discussion took place."

"In French?" interrupted Brett.

"No; in Turkish."

"Did the gentleman with the sabre-cut on his face take any part therein?"

"Not in the least. He sat and smoked cigarettes in the most unconscious manner possible, leaving his two associates to carry on the conversation."

Digitized by Google

As the barrister appeared to have no further question to ask at the moment Talbot continued :

"Several times Mehemet Ali appealed to me to change my mind and formally ratify the transfer at once. I was quite firm in my refusal, and did not hesitate to describe the Sultan's demands as ridiculous. I was rendered more determined, if anything, in this attitude by a growing certainty in my mind that his Excellency himself approved of my attitude. Ultimately, it seems, they hit upon a compromise. The whole party would remain together all night in a sort of dual control, and then the change of guardianship would take place next day in accordance with my views as to what was right and proper. I must admit I was intensely relieved when this decision was arrived at. Looking back now over the events of the night, I can perceive that from that moment the gang who effected the murders and the robbery had me in their power, for they had completely succeeded in allaying my suspicions, and I can only plead in extenuation of my short-sightedness that Mehemet Ali himself, and the other gentlemen with whom I had been acquainted during the past month, were willing accessories to the arrangement."

"I do not see," said Brett, "that you have the slightest cause to reproach yourself. You acted quite properly throughout, and I am sure that when all the facts are known your status at the Foreign Office will be improved rather than diminished by this incident."

The other man's face flushed with pleasure as he heard these words.

"Thank you," he replied simply. "I certainly took every precaution that suggested itself to me. Subsequently I was the victim of circumstances. The French-speaking Turk, as I have told you, took no part whatever in the negotiations, and when he became aware of the modus operandi determined upon——"

"By the way," said Brett, "how did he become aware of it?"

"Oh, Mehemet Ali told him in French."

"Didn't that strike you as curious?"

"Most certainly it did. But the scoundrel explained it afterwards by telling me that, although a Turkish subject, he had lived in Algiers and France since he was a child, and had quite forgotten his mother tongue. But he was employed in a confidential position in the Turkish Embassy at Paris, owing not only to family influence, but to his intimate acquaintance with the French language."

"Ah," said Brett, "Monsieur Henri Dubois has a ready wit."

The Surprise.

"What!" cried Edith, who naturally enough, was following each word with the utmost keenness, "do you already know his name?"

"Not only his name," replied Brett, "but his identity, Miss Talbot. You shall see him in another skin and without the sword-cut. It is possible, however, that before we meet, this distinguishing mark may be replaced by a fractured skull or a bullet wound."

Fairholme suddenly clenched his right fist and examined his knuckles, his unconscious action causing the others to laugh.

"Is he a Frenchman, then?" said Talbot.

"Unquestionably—a most modern product."

"And his name is Dubois?"

"Yes."

"All right. In future I will allude to him by his proper title. Well, Monsieur Dubois came over to me with the easy confidence of a man who was sure of himself.

"'This affair bores me,' he said. 'I see no reason why I, who am in no way concerned with the Sultan's collection of precious stones, should sit up all night keeping guard over them with these very earnest gentlemen here. I am going to my hotel. I have sent my portmanteau to the Carlton. Will you honour me by driving there and telling me something about your wonderful London as we go?'

"The man looked at me with a meaning in his eyes that conveyed quite plainly the intimation :

INDIGESTION

MRS. MARIA JANE WALLIS, 14 Suffolk Road, Ipswich, writes: "For 16 years I suffered from Indigestion and Bad Breath. I could not sleep at night. Food which I ate gave me severe pain; I also had very bad headaches. I went to several hospitals, and was attended by more than one doctor. I heard of Bile Beans, and obtained some. After the first few doses I began to feel some benefit. I persevered with the Beans, and am pleased to say that I am now completely cured."

Bile Beans for Biliousness cure Headache, Influenza, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Rheumatism, Colds, Liver Chills, Indigestion, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Chemists or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per box.

ONE BEAN ONE DOSE.

BILE BEANS for BILIOUSNESS

Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia. Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

The Editor of the "Family Doctor," the People's Medical Paper, IN ONE OF HIS COMMENTS, SAYS:

"After a careful examination of Kaputine, and learning its component parts, we should certainly recommend it as a Safe and Reliable Remedy for Headache."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-, of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield, for 12 stamps.

Digitized by Google

"'We can talk quietly in the cab, and I can explain much to you that is at present hidden.' Unfortunately I fell in with his suggestions.

"We crossed the dining-room together. We were searched by the police in the hall, much to his apparent surprise, and then we drove off through St. George's Place.

"He at once aroused my curiosity by telling me of a wide-spread plot to dethrone the Sultan. An essential part of the conspiracy was to obtain possession of the diamonds before they had been cut, as they were an heirloom from the Prophet, and it would be a terrible thing in the eyes of the more fanatical section of the Mohammedans if they were tampered with in any way.

"This sounded reasonable enough, as the same story had been dinned in my ears for several weeks.

"He made out that for reasons of State the Sultan had decided to change the Minister Plenipotentiary charged with the secret Mission to London.

"Altogether he talked so candidly, and with such an air of treating the whole business as the bugbear of a timid monarch, that I readily believed him."

"At last we reached the Carlton. We got out and he paid the cabman, who drove off round the corner; then my new acquaintance explained to me that he placed no greater trust in his fellow-countrymen than did their ruler. Therefore he had led them to believe he was staying at that hotel, whereas he had in reality taken up his abode in the flat of a French family with whom he was acquainted. If I would come with him for a moment he promised to place me in possession of certain documents which would render easy my explanations to the Foreign Office next morning.

"I accompanied him without hesitation, secure in the knowledge that a strong force of police were guarding my charge at Albert Gate, both inside and outside the house. We went to the mansions where he said he lived. The place had a perfectly respectable exterior, and is situated, as you know, in a reputable thoroughfare. We ascended to the second floor, entered the flat, and were ushered by a middle-aged French-woman into a sort of sitting-room.

"Dubois turned to a writing-desk and unlocked a drawer.

"'Here are the documents I promised you, Mr. Talbot,' he said; but, to my amazement, he whipped out a revolver and held it within two feet of my breast.

"'If you move, or attempt to cry out, you are a dead man!' he cried.

"At the same instant a door behind me opened and some three or four persons entered. I was so furious at the trick that had been played upon me that I disregarded his threat and sprang at him, but he did not fire. Flinging the revolver behind him on the writing-table he closed with me. Before I well knew what had happened I was tied hand and foot, gagged, and placed helpless in a chair. A few minutes later, after a muttered consultation between my captors, I was taken to the room in which Fairholme found me, and I never left the place until nearly nine o'clock last night.

"It was a most ghastly experience. I would sooner die than go through it again.

"If ever I get within measurable distance of Monsieur Henri Dubois I promise you that I will repay him with interest some of the agony which he inflicted upon me. I never thought I should hate a man as I hate that Frenchman. I do not want to kill him. I want to torture him!"

This was the first sign that Talbot had given of the anger which filled his soul. For a moment no one spoke. Edith stifled a sob, and Sir Hubert Fitzjames broke the tension by swearing as vehemently as ever did the Army in Flanders.

"You have suffered," said Brett quietly, "but not in vain. It is only by the manner in which these blackguards treated you that we have obtained so much knowledge. Your capture was a necessary part of their scheme. I only wonder now that after you had served their purpose they did not kill you. It was not out of pity, believe me. The fact that you were spared confirms me in the opinion that the Albert Gate murders were a gigantic blunder, never contemplated by the expert criminals who planned the theft. But continue. What happened afterwards?"

Talbot almost summoned up a smile as he said:

"Really, the next thing was so grotesque that were not the whole business so serious you would be compelled to laugh at it."

Talbot's Double.

"Looking back now to those first ghastly hours when I laid on the bed tied hand and foot, I find it difficult to recall any definite impressions. It would be absurd to say that I suffered, either mentally or physically. I was sunk in a sort of stupor of rage, and my bonds did not hurt me so long as I kept still. Curiously enough, my thoughts were somewhat altruistic. Instead of speculating upon my own fate I rather wondered what would be the outcome of the whole mysterious business. I could not bring myself to believe that, cleverly as the rogues had outwitted me, they would be able to similarly 'dupe' a strong body of Metropolitan police, not to mention Mehemet Ali and his assistants.

"At last I fell asleep, dozing fitfully at first, but finally giving way to the deep slumber of exhaustion.

"I was awakened by someone shaking me, though not roughly. It took me some time to recover my scattered senses, and at first I was almost unable to move, owing to the constrained position of my limbs. As well as I could judge it was not yet daylight, for the electric lamps were turned on, and I subsequently found that such rays of natural light as penetrated into my room during the day did not arrive for a considerable time.

"Thenceforth, of course, my sole method of judging the progress of time was by the alternation of meals and the difference of light between day and night.

"Someone assisted me to assume a sitting posture, the cords attached to my wrists were relaxed, and I was firmly held by two men—one a Turk whom I had not seen before, the other the Frenchman whom you found in the flat.

"At the foot of the bed were standing Dubois and a closely-veiled female—a young woman, as well as I could judge, and a person of tall and elegant stature, who, it would appear, spoke only French.

"Dubois addressed me calmly. 'I hope,' he said, 'you are in a better temper, my dear Talbot?'

"'It does not appear to me that the state of my temper is of any material significance,' I answered.

"'No,' he replied nonchalantly. 'The game is in my hands, and will probably remain there for a considerable period. But I do not wish to be unkind. You have, I am given to understand, a highly respectable uncle and a very charming sister, who will no doubt suffer much perturbation owing to your mysterious disappearance. Now, you may not think it, but I am a very humane sort of fellow. Consequently, I am quite agreeable that you should write them a brief note, omitting, of course, all superfluous information such as dates, addresses, and other embarrassing facts, but simply telling them that you are well. I will guarantee its safe delivery.'

"Naturally, I jumped at the offer. The veiled lady supplied

(Continued on page 190.)

Digitized by Google

The Cure of Deafness After Specialists Fail.

In the December "Supplement" to the "Journal for the Deaf," the Editor notes a case of deafness of many years' duration, pronounced incurable by one Aurist, and discharged uncured by a celebrated London Hospital after an operation and eight months' treatment had failed. In face of such a failure it is surprising to find a perfect cure by the Drouet Method, vouched for as follows by the patient, Mr. T. De Courcey Rayner, of 128 High Street, West Norwood, London, S.E.:—"I am grateful to be able to say that my hearing seems to be all right now, as I can hear my watch quite distinctly from the other side of the room." Those who wish to read the full details of this case, as well as a large number of similar instances, can obtain a free copy of the "Supplement" and of "The Journal for the Deaf" by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The "Journal" also contains a Special Report Form by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to the treatment of Deafness, and Ear, Nose and Throat diseases. The Editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination during the Consultation hours, weekday mornings, 10 to 12, afternoons, 2 to 4. For personal consultations a fee of 5s is charged.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED); absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

SEND A POST-CARD NOW
By return of post, you will receive
H. SAMUEL'S BIG FREE ALBUM.
A Magnificently Illustrated Guide, showing how by discarding shopkeeper's profits and going straight to the Factory
YOU SAVE POUNDS UPON POUNDS, getting goods of the highest value and
POCKETING MIDDLE PROFITS YOURSELF!
Contains nearly 200 Pages, over 3,000 Engravings of Astounding Bargains. Ladi s' Gold Watches, 20/-; Gent's Silver Watches from 8/6; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Cutlery, Clocks, and all Household requirements at LOWEST FACTORY PRICES.
A GRAND SERIES OF FREE PRIZES.
MAKE YOUR SELECTION WHEN ORDERING.
Send Post-card Now! We Send Next Mail.
H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET ST., MANCHESTER.

To CURE Drunkards

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

STAMP COLLECTORS.
Send for our new 64-page list of Foreign Stamps, Albums, &c. Over 250 illustrations. Best value anywhere.
ERNEST WOOD & Co.,
Chorlton-cum-Hardy, MANCHESTER

RUBBER STAMPS.
Self-inking Pen & Pencil
RUBBER STAMP WITH YOUR NAME, in this style:-
Cecil A. Lawrence.
4½D. POST FREE.
ERNEST WOOD & Co.,
Chorlton-cum-Hardy, MANCHESTER.

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles
10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas } Or from a Guinea per month.
The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.
TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.
45, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE
"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE
KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS
Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc.
For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

Order
E. & T.
PINK's JAM
Undoubtedly the Best.
PURE.
No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

Digitized by Google

me with a sheet of note-paper and an envelope, and I scribbled the unfortunate letter which was subsequently posted in Paris and caused such a sensation. I had only one hand at liberty, so Dubois politely offered to seal the envelope for me, first, however, reading carefully what I had written.

"'That is quite correct,' he said; 'it will relieve their feelings and prove at the same time highly serviceable to me, as the letter will be posted in Paris and not in London. You see, my dear Talbot, how readily you fall in with my plans. You are as putty in my hands. Now, I suppose, being a brave Englishman, you would sooner have died than written this letter if you had guessed it would prove of material assistance to me?'

"I fear I used some very bad language to Dubois, notwithstanding the presence of the lady, but he paid little heed to me, and the pair at once undertook the most curious proceedings I have ever witnessed.

"They had before them a table set out with all sorts of paint, paste, and powders, such as one might expect to find in an actor's dressing-room.

"Seating himself astride a chair so that the light fell full upon his face, Dubois submitted himself to the skilful hands of the woman, who forthwith began to make him up in an exact resemblance to me. The right side of his face was towards me, but when, in obedience to her requirements, he turned somewhat, I noticed to my astonishment that the scar which I have mentioned had completely disappeared, and then it dawned upon me that his Turkish complexion had also vanished, leaving him a particularly white-skinned Frenchman, with a high colour.

"Ah," said Brett, leaning back in his chair and attentively surveying the ceiling.

"You must remember," went on Talbot, "that my wits were somewhat confused by the extraordinary circumstances of the hour. Having been so suddenly awakened from a sound sleep, and subsequently annoyed by the incident of the letter, it took me some moments to recognise these discrepancies in his appearance. At first, so to speak, I knew him immediately as Dubois, but the more I looked at him the less confident I would have been were it not that his voice and manner supplied unerring indications of his identity.

"The lady proceeded with her work in the most business-like fashion, and to my intense amazement he quickly assumed a marked resemblance to myself. Not such, perhaps, as would bear close scrutiny, but rather the effect attained by a skilful artist in a rapid sketch, or caught by a fleeting glance whilst passing a mirror.

"'What is the game now?' I cried, when the true nature of their purpose dawned upon me.

"'Oh, just the same,' replied Dubois, grinning, 'I merely wish to puzzle the thick-headed brains of you Englishmen a little more. That is all.'

"'Halloa!' I cried, 'you understand English?'

"'Yes,' he answered coolly. 'It is frequently necessary in my business.'

"'Well,' I said, 'there can be no doubt that you are an accomplished villain. What you intend to achieve by masquerading in this fashion I utterly fail to understand. You can never be such a fool as to think that you will be able to gain admittance to Albert Gate by impersonating me. Were you even to succeed you would still be as far off as ever from securing your booty, which, I suppose, is the Imperial diamond and its companions.'

"'Really,' he said, with a sneer, 'I thought that you, Mr. Talbot, were endowed with a little more intelligence than the average. Pardon, Mignon, for a moment.'

"He rose from his chair, unfastened a case which he took from the breast-pocket of his overcoat, and showed me the diamonds which had been the object of so much care and solicitude on my part during many weeks.

"'You see,' he continued, seating himself again, whilst the lady resumed her task without a word, 'the business has been satisfactorily accomplished, Mr. Talbot. The diamonds are here; so are you. Unfortunately his Excellency and the secretaries are with the Prophet. You will, I am sure, express my regrets to the police, to the Foreign Office, and to all concerned, that the Sultan's commissionaires should have been so unceremoniously dispatched to Paradise. It was not my fault, believe me, nor was it altogether necessary. I am in no way responsible for the bungling measures adopted by my Turkish assistants. You see, in Constantinople they are accustomed to these drastic means of settling disputes.'

"He rattled on so pleasantly that I hardly grasped the true significance of his words, so I replied with almost equal flippancy:

"'I will be most pleased to convey your regrets to the proper authorities. May I ask when I shall be at liberty to do so?'

"'Ah,' he said, 'there you puzzle even my intelligence. It will certainly be days, it may be weeks, before you can communicate with your friends.'"

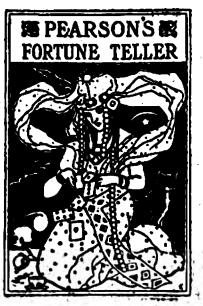
(Another instalment next week.)

She: "Anything that is worth winning is worth working for." He: "Yes, but the question is, will your father thaw or will I have to keep on working for you after I've won you?"

He: "You have only to command me. I will do anything you say." She: "Anything?" He: "Yes, I'll drive over that precipice into the river if you bid me." She: "Then stop, please, and let me get out."

"That professor says that Shakespeare's women are not intellectual." "Of course not. Look at Ophelia, going out in the woods and picking flowers when she might have made Hamlet buy them for her."

"Gertrude, I've brought you home two bushels of artificial violets." "Two bushels! Have you lost your mind?" "No, but I heard you say you wished you had as many on your hat as that girl next door."



PEARSON'S FORTUNE-TELLER.

By Professor P. R. S. Foli.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the subjects in this interesting book are:

Augury by Birds—What Birds Foretell—Astrology—Gipsy Fortune-tellers—Antiquity of Card Reading—Charms—Christmas Customs—Facts About and Instances of Clairvoyance—Crystal Gazing—The Crystal Globe—Three Kinds of Vision—Magnetic Precious Stones—Divination by a Wedding Ring, by Dominoes, by Palmistry, by Rods, Teacups, and by the Wheel of Fortune—The Divining Rod—Odds and Ends of Omens—Advice and Hints for Beginners in Fortune-telling—Gipsies—Hallowe'en Charms—Lucky Stars—Mesmerism Supersedes Witchcraft—Lines on the Hand in Palmistry—Precious Stones and their Meanings—The Koh-i-noor—Psychometry—Rings and Bridecake—The Voice of Rings—Wedding Rings—Teacup Fortune-telling—When to Expect a Visitor—Picking up Horseshoes—Good and Bad Luck—Quaint Ceremonies—Snap-dragon, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of Pearson's Fortune Teller" for which I inclose the sum of one shilling and twopence.

Name.....

Address.....

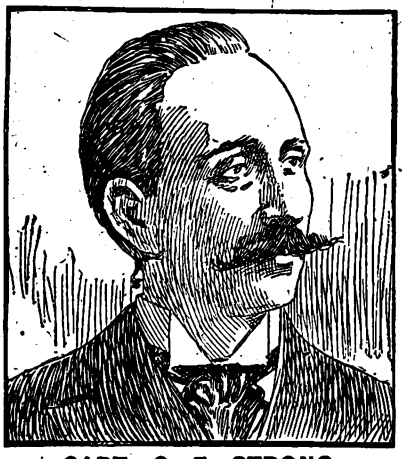
Digitized by Google

INSTANTANEOUS HYPNOTISM.

Remarkable Experiments of Captain C. F. Strong, of Dryden, N. Y., Discloses the Tremendous Power of Hypnotic Influence.

How to Control the Minds of Others Without Their Knowledge.

"I can produce hypnosis instantaneously by the mere passing of my hand and a single word," says Capt. C. F. Strong, of Dryden, New York. "So far I have been able to control every one whom I have tried to influence. I am now treating a case of paralysis with remarkable success, and will effect a permanent cure. My own success with the new science has been most phenomenal, and I believe that every man that wishes to get the most out of life should understand the science of hypnotism and personal magnetism. It is a subject that can be easily mastered by any person of ordinary intelligence. Some time ago I wrote the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia for a copy of their free book on hypnotic influence. To my delight and surprise I found that this wonderful power largely depended upon the mastery of a few secrets which were fully and completely explained to me."



CAPT. C. F. STRONG.

"After studying the instructions for a few evenings, I selected three young men as subjects and found that I could control them perfectly. Money could not purchase the knowledge which I have already gained. Hypnotism develops within one a power and a force of character which cannot be acquired in any other way. I believe it is far more valuable than medicine in the treatment of most diseases and bad habits. It cures where medicine fails."

Five thousand copies of the handsomely illustrated work to which Capt. Strong refers are to be given away by the American College of Sciences absolutely free for the purpose of acquainting the public with the practical uses and marvellous benefits to be derived from a study of the sciences of hypnotism, personal magnetism, magnetic healing, etc. The book explains how people have been secretly influenced without their knowledge; how hypnotism may be used to develop a wonderfully magnetic personality. It treats on new processes for developing will power; how to influence people at a distance; how to make others carry out your ideas and think they are carrying out their own. How people have achieved success and grown wealthy through the practical use of hypnotic power.

The work is handsomely illustrated by half-tone engravings, and is by far the most remarkable publication of its kind ever issued. Every page is brimful of intensely interesting and practical information. It is a book that should be in every home; it is enthusiastically endorsed by the most prominent ministers of the Gospel, lawyers, doctors and business men of this country. Remember that it costs you absolutely nothing. If you want a copy write to-day. Address American College of Sciences, Dept. W L 10, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

FREE BOXES TO ALL

5,000 Test Boxes to be Given to all Who Apply—John A. Smith and His Remarkable Cure for Rheumatism and Gout.

If you are a sufferer from Rheumatism or Gout, send your name to John A. Smith, 1007, Montague House, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., and he will send you a box of Gloria Tonic; also the most elaborately-illustrated book, "Rheumatism: its Causes and Cure," and 300 recent cures. This book contains many illustrations from actual life, and will tell you all about your case. Never before has a remedy been so highly endorsed as Gloria Tonic.

Deformity of the hands in general Chronic Articular Rheumatism. Type No. 1.

If it is properly used, it should cure Rheumatism, no matter if of one or fifty years' standing. Remember, this remedy has cured thousands whom hospitals and doctors failed to cure. It has cured hundreds who were enslaved to crutches, and who never expected to walk again. Decrepit persons of 70 years and over, among them some who were even unable to clothe or feed themselves, were completely cured through this wonderful remedy. This is not mere idle talk nor deception, but a fact which I can prove by references from 5,000 persons. It recently cured a gentleman of 74 who had been a sufferer for 30 years, and whom seven physicians failed to cure.

Deformity of the hands in general Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Type No. 2

Gloria Tonic contains no poisons such as Opiates, Salycilate, Calomel, nor any other preparation of Mercury or Narcotics, and will not harm your stomach, heart or liver. Send your name to-day, for I am anxious that everybody should have a test box of this wonderful remedy. Send no stamps nor money.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Taking His Arm.

"Ought a girl to take her lover's arm without waiting for him to initiate the process?" asks "Dora," who has been walking out with a young man for six months, but he has never once taken her arm. Would it be forward if she took his arm without waiting for an overture from him?

* * * *

I think a man who has been walking with a girl on terms of intimacy for six months and has never offered her his arm must be either very lukewarm or very shy. "Dora" knows which defect it is in his case. If I were "Dora" I should certainly take his arm, and teach him in whatever other way she may like, the lesser arts of love-making, which are not to be neglected.

A Girl Above Him.

"Charlie" paid attentions while on his holidays to a lady much his superior in position. Despairing of ever being able to offer her marriage, he has discontinued the attentions. But all the time he believes she is very fond of him and wonders why he has turned cool.

* * * *

It is quite right of "Charlie" not to pursue an attachment which cannot have a satisfactory result to both parties. But he should not allow the girl to suspect him of infidelity. It would be better to tell her the whole circumstances, and leave it to her to instruct him in his conduct. If she is in a good position, perhaps she will have some means of helping "Charlie" to improve his own, and thereby pave the way for a union some time or another.

Cure For Shyness.

"Lena" tells me she suffers very much from shyness and self-consciousness towards other people. This means that she does not get the attention she would like from the opposite sex. What is the best cure for this?

* * * *

No doubt it is a form of disease, brought about by a disordered nervous state. A chat with your doctor might put you in the way of getting over the habit, perhaps, better than my advice. Probably shyness and self-consciousness arise because you are in the habit of thinking too much about yourself. Try to forget your personality. This you can do by interesting yourself in other things.

* * * *

Talk to people with a view of gaining their confidence. Become a good listener to other people's conversation. Read as many books as you can, and think over them. Take up some hobby, whether it be cooking, singing, playing the piano, or sketching, to keep your mind occupied. Then you will find that self-consciousness of yours gradually disappearing, because you will realise after all what an unimportant thing self is beside the really great and interesting matters of life.

The Worried Husband.

"My husband worries a good deal over business," writes "Martha." "But often I want his advice on home matters. Ought I to tell him of the little troubles that take place in the house or should I keep them to myself?"

* * * *

If your husband is worried over business, certainly he does not want on returning home to begin again over less important matters. If you can keep your own counsel in domestic matters, by all means do so. Spare him as much small trouble as you can, or his health will break down, which would perhaps be unfortunate for you.

Chance Acquaintances.

"Effie" met a young man while out for a walk. They got into conversation, and he asked if he might call on her and take her out again. She did not know anything about the man. Do I advise her to communicate with him?

* * * *

I suppose, "Effie," you were able to judge from the man's manner and appearance whether or not he seemed genuine. Of course only too many of these chance meetings turn out to be the reverse. I should not advise you to communicate with him until he gives you satisfactory proofs of his position and hints as to his intentions.

"How D' You Do?"

"When any one says 'How d' you do?' to me at a party, how is it correct to answer," asks "Arthur," who is only seventeen, and therefore inexperienced in social customs. "Should I say 'Very well, thank you,' or reply with another 'How d' you do??"

* * * *

Do anything except appear formal. If the person who greets you is much older, reply "Quite well, thank you," taking the greeting as extended to you in the light of a favour. If it is merely a chance acquaintance, of about your own age, answer the inquiry as you like. But boys usually have an instinctive way of getting through such little complications, and that way is generally the best liked socially.

Cousins and Kissing.

"W. J." writes me a pathetic letter. He is eighteen, and is blessed with an over-supply of female cousins and aunts. At one house he visits he has no fewer than six of the former, whose ages range from six to twenty-seven. "Ought I," he asks, "to kiss these?"

* * * *

Poor "W. J.!" Really, I think I should draw the line at all except those between seventeen and thirty. A young fellow cannot really be expected even by cousins to kiss on such a large scale. There is no rule compelling you to kiss your cousins. Most men observe the practice or otherwise, just according to the nature of the cousins. I advise you to do the same.

A Tea-Shop Problem.

"Ettie" meets a young man friend at a tea shop several nights a week. He usually comes over and joins her. When they go out he insists on paying for her refreshment. Ought she to allow him to do so?

* * * *

No, certainly not. It is neither fair to him nor to yourself. If he asks you to have tea with him, of course, he must pay, but when your meeting is quite casual, it is no affair of his. Next time he offers to, stand on your dignity, and say that you will be so very annoyed if he insists on paying your bill. That will at once put the matter right.

Cynthia

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

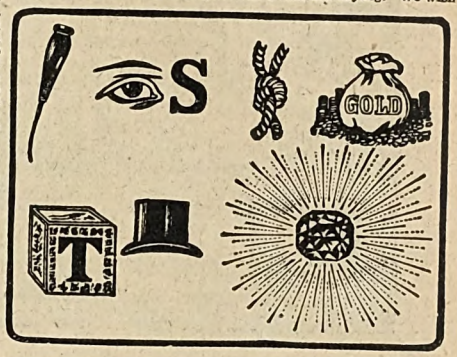
Digitized by Google

£400 TO BE GIVEN AWAY

During the past two years we have arranged several great contests for advertising our business in which the cash and other prizes have amounted to over £10,000. These contests were instructive, amusing, and profitable to all concerned. Some of the public when we first advertised these contests believed they were all humbug, but when they found that the cash and other prizes were paid they were sorry they did not compete. Of course, we did not blame them, for almost everybody has been so duped in contests that when they see one, they immediately jump to conclusions. In arranging our contests we have met with immense favour, and can show 10,000 testimonials, which speak for themselves. We assume that if you enter one of our contests, though you may not win a prize, you are satisfied if you know that it has been conducted fairly, that you have had the same opportunity as the winners, and that the money has been actually paid. This we will prove by making known the full names and addresses of winners.

Now, sometimes our contests seem very simple, and perhaps the one below may appear so, but on this point we wish to put you on your guard. Don't say "What a fool that man is. Does he take his readers for children?" No, we do not, but still you are apt to make a mistake and "jump at conclusions." What we want you to do is to solve this rebus correctly; take your time about it, even consult authorities, or consult your friends, and then if you think you are right post your answer. Probably very few will send in the right solution. Remember there is only one correct answer—the original quotation, but the prizes are worth the effort. Find the words and arrange them correctly, and remember that some of the most brilliant men of letters living have on examining this rebus given an incorrect answer

We shall give £75 in Cash for the correct reading of this rebus which represents a learned saying. We wish you to understand that there is no trick or catch about this puzzle for it is a veritable quotation from a famous author who died in the second decade of the 17th Century, and one that has been often repeated. If you cannot find and arrange the six words in this rebus correctly, but only find five, you will participate in a Second Prize of £50. Now here are £125 being given in two prizes alone, and someone is going to win the money. Is it not worth a trial? There is only one easy condition, which by the way does not involve your selling anything or putting your hand in your pocket for a penny. About this we will write you on receiving your solution.



An envelope containing the correct answer has been sealed and deposited with our bankers, and will not be opened until after the close of the contest. In the event of more than one correct solution, we shall appoint a committee of three from among the contestants to award the cash pro rata. The expenses of the committee will be paid to London, and £1 per day allowed to each while away from home. You may be asked but not compelled to act as one of the committee.

In connection with this contest we are going to give away other Cash prizes, namely Ten Prizes of £10, Twenty of £5, and Seventy-five Prizes of £1, the conditions with regard to which will be duly sent. You have the opportunity to secure any of the above-mentioned cash prizes without cost to yourself, and we shall send you when you answer this, the names of winners in past contests, a list too long for publication here! Every promise in this advertisement will be scrupulously carried out, and all will be treated with even-handed justice. Send your answer at once, with two stamps for postage, copy of one of our publications, testimonials, etc. If you are not satisfied with the contest you can demand and will receive the return of even this 2d., as well as the postage spent in answering this advertisement, for it is well known that we always follow the most straightforward methods. If you wish you can send 6d., when, besides the journal, conditions, etc., we will forward a charming gift that is the rage of London, and will surprise and please you. Do not delay, as the day of closing will soon be announced. Address:

NOVELTY PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 81, 8 Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

The Most Nutritious.

EPPS'S

Grateful—Comforting.

COCOA

Breakfast—Supper.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-: Colonies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

DAILY EXPRESS

ONE HALFPENNY.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

GIVEN AWAY

With this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 473)

A PAPER PATTERN

of this

CHILD'S PETTICOAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

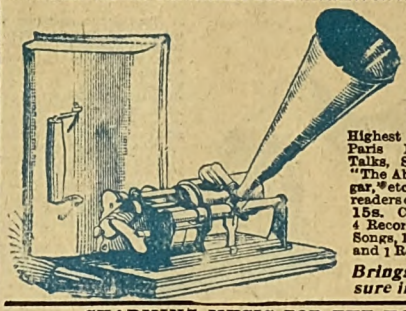
MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Crosfield's STAR
Pure Cane BRAND
GOLDEN SYRUP
ENTIRELY FREE FROM GLUCOSE OR ANY INJURIOUS ADMIXTURE

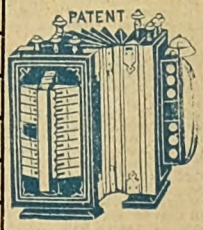
"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."
CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.
A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.
CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories
Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6
Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount
Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—
CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.
Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

"MATCHLESS"

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES
which as a rule set up ACID and are of a very "STICKY" nature, thus causing more labour in polishing.
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH
is wholly made in England. It spreads evenly over the surface of the Metal, can be easily removed, and produces QUICKLY a LASTING brilliancy.
Guaranteed free from Acid, Poison, or Grit.

METAL POLISH

Manufacturers THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co Ltd LIVERPOOL

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 737.] Week ending February 14, 1903. [Price One Penny.

The name she wrote was not the familiar Nita Lestrange, but the unknown Benita Bennet! Where had he heard that name before?

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Case of Benita Bennet." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

HYPNOTISM

Its Increasing Use in Daily Life, by English People.

No Longer a Secret Art, But Now In the Hands of Thousands.

A London Publishing House Distributing Free Books on Hypnotism.

Some Strange Secrets of Personal Influence Laid Bare.

The London office of a well-known publishing house is creating a deal of surprised interest here in the subject of hypnotism and allied science by the novel method of giving away books absolutely free. By merely writing to the Psychic Research Publishing Company, Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C., you can, according to their advertisement, receive by return post a most remarkable, fascinating, and instructive illustrated book called "The Power Within." This book and accompanying literature contain some most startling information, setting forth not only how to set about it to learn hypnotism at your own home, but revealing the fact that this mysterious art is now actually being used to advantage by English people in daily life.

According to the publishers, the aim of this startling little free book is to answer such questions as occur to all interested in the mysterious relation between mind and matter.

Such questions as these, for instance:—Can I learn how to hypnotise? Why is the art not more widely known? Just how should I set about it to learn at home, and practise it? Is instantaneous hypnotism possible? What is "personal magnetism," and how is it acquired? What is the mysterious secret of the wonderful success and influence of certain people who seem most ordinary in other ways? Is there really a scientific mode of life or thought which attracts health, success, and happiness? Is it possible to thus radically change one's whole life in a few days, as many claim to have done? Is it true that humanity in general is, in a sense, hypnotised by conventionality and thus blinded to splendid opportunities for success and happiness which lie on every hand? What can I do to arouse myself from this "hypnosis of custom," and rise to the attainments which my natural ability would warrant? What must I do to become a hypnotist? To develop a magnetic, attractive, forceful character? To acquire courage, ambition, cheerfulness? To kill fear and worry? To make myself a source of happiness and inspiration to my friends?

The reader will readily see that a book, especially a free book, dealing with such vitally interesting subjects as these is arousing a lively demand, and the edition provided by the Company is being rapidly exhausted. To obtain this book, which is entitled "The Power Within," it is only necessary to send your plainly written name and address, enclosing a penny stamp for return postage, to the Psychic Research Company (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

As the nature of the contents of this book is of such vital interest and importance to many, it is requested that no one write out of mere curiosity. It is desired to supply the book only to those having a genuine wish to be informed on these subjects.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Costumes

THE WINTER 'ELEGANT' PARCEL.

Lady's .... Complete Outfit. 36/-

CONTAINS:

Pretty Flannelette Blouse with Velvet Collar and Cuffs, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of cording, Pair Model Corsets, very Durable Coloured Moreen Underskirt, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf, and Black Silk Shaped Belt with Clasp.

TERMS.

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED, return the goods, and your deposit will be refunded.

Important. When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over Dress.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 5 CATALOGUE of Drapery, Costumes, Capes, Jackets, Mantles, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. Sent to your address Free on receipt of Post Card.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. ... Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia. Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

C. E. POPPLESTON, Esq., B.A., Mus. Doc., writing from Exeter College, Oxford, says:

"I have suffered continually from severe Headache. A medical friend advised me to try Kaputine. I did so, and in a few minutes my Headache had left me. It is a splendid remedy."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-, of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield, for 12 stamps.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 737.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending February 14th, 1903.

The Case of Benita Bennet.

The Story of the Righting of a Wrong.

Containing the Incident depicted on the Cover.

"You certainly don't look much like a blushing bride, Nita." And Peggy Carpenter looked discontentedly at the lovely, but marble-white girl who stood gazing at the wedding-dress outspread on the bed. "You don't appear very joyous, either. If I were going to be married to-morrow, I should be nearly off my head with joy."

"Things are different with me," replied Nita Lestrange. "Ronald's people are so opposed to our marriage that I can't feel very happy about it."

"Ronald's people," repeated Peggy, very scornfully. "His ill-tempered old grandmother, who wants him to marry an American heiress, and his twin-brother, who has never forgiven him for coming into the world ten minutes ahead, and who doesn't want Ronald to marry at all."

"You can't wonder they don't want him to marry me," remarked Nita, turning away from the bed, "a penniless girl, who earned her living as a paid companion."

"And who was so good, faithful, and devoted, that her employer left her a thousand pounds. I'm so glad auntie left you that, dearie. The two thousand she left me makes it possible for me to marry as soon as I'm out of mourning for the dear old lady. Can you fancy me a curate's wife, Nita?"

Nita shook her head as she looked at the sparkling little face full of mischief and glee.

"It seems too commonplace a marriage for such a little gay fairy," she said.

"Oh, I'm a very common-place person. For romance apply to Miss Nita Lestrange. How romantic was your meeting with auntie, for instance. You picked her up when she slipped on some orange-peel, and she was looking for a nurse-companion, and you were just the person for such a post. So you took to each other on the spot. Wasn't that romantic? Why, she might have been some wicked old wretch or you a bold adventuress for all either of you knew, for neither of you went in for anything so common-place as references."

Nita's pallor had changed to a vivid scarlet, and without replying, she urged her friend to come downstairs now that they had inspected the wedding finery.

All rights reserved.

"And your meeting with Lord Loughton," went on Peggy, as they descended the stairs. "What could be more romantic? Two damsels on a lonely road assailed by a sturdy beggar; the gallant knight on his—well, not steed exactly, for it was his motor-car—to the rescue. Naturally he fell in love with——"

"Oh, do be quiet, Peggy," interrupted Nita. "Come with me to your father. I want to thank him for letting me stay with you till my marriage and for all his kindness."

The Carpenters had been indeed Nita's sheet-anchor, for after her employer's sudden death she had no home to receive her until her marriage. But the kind old rector, the brother-in-law of Nita's late employer and father of her staunch little friend, Peggy, had offered her a home and the protection of a father so long as she required them.

Lord Loughton's family were bitterly opposed to his marriage with an obscure and fortuneless girl, but he was his own master, and brooked no interference.

Lovely as a dream looked Nita as she moved up the aisle in her snowy robes, followed by Peggy as bridesmaid. The wedding-party consisted only of the bride and bridegroom, the two Carpenters and Harry Searle, Peggy's fiancé; for Ronald's grandmother and brother absolutely declined to be present, and he would have no other guests.

The ceremony concluded, the party adjourned to the vestry to sign the register. Lord Loughton, his fair, sensitive face aglow with pride and happiness, bent forward to watch Nita sign her maiden name for the last time.

How he loved that firm, large writing of hers, the clear writing that seemed indicative of a true, sincere nature. But—what did this mean? Under his watching eyes was formed a name he did not know; not the familiar Nita Lestrange, but the unknown Benita Bennet. In startled alarm he repeated the name aloud. She turned and faced him.

"This is my name," she said firmly.

He had turned very white, but he said nothing.

The name, Benita Bennet, seemed familiar to him, but at the moment he could not remember where he had heard it.

Digitized by Google

After they had left the church it suddenly flashed across Loughton's memory that Benita Bennet was the name of a girl who had been the principal in a notorious Society scandal some years before.

The coachman had orders to drive the bride and bridegroom direct to Lord Loughton's town house, where his grandmother, the Dowager Lady Loughton, and his brother, Gerald, were staying. On arrival there the bride was introduced, and shortly afterwards Loughton brought up the name of Benita Bennet. At mention of this his newly-made wife turned very white.

"Benita Bennet," said his brother. "I've heard that name before. Oh, yes! I remember the name—and the case—perfectly well."

"Dear me, yes," chimed in the Dowager, "I remember the case distinctly, but why mention it now?"

"Because that is the name my wife—whom I knew as Nita Lestrange—signed in the register when we were married just a short hour ago."

"You don't mean to say that's the girl," said the Dowager, and she examined Nita curiously through her lorgnettes.

The girl looked like a hunted creature at bay. Her great, dark eyes went from one hard, cruel face to the other in a kind of terrified and hopeless appeal.

"The case of Benita Bennet. Surely it was a Society scandal some years ago," said Gerald; "about five, I think. You were abroad at the time, Ronald, I remember, and would probably have only heard the name. Miss Bennet was then a very young girl, not yet introduced, I believe, but staying with a relative at a country-house, where she distinguished herself by stealing some jewellery from a fellow-guest, called—let me see—ah, Harcourt—Mrs. Harcourt.

"The case made a great sensation; the thief was so young, well-born, and rarely beautiful. The defence was kleptomania, of course, but it failed, and the prisoner was sentenced to a term of imprisonment, eighteen months, wasn't it?" turning insolently to Nita, who sat staring with great, miserable eyes at him as he recounted her disgrace. "Anyhow, she served her time, Ronald," he went on. "And that's the woman you've married."

Lord Loughton's fair, boyish face, looked ghastly, drawn and grey with horror and despair. Nita flung herself on her knees before him, and raised her lovely face in frantic appeal to his.

"Ronald, Ronald, I am innocent. No one believed me then—not even the counsel who defended me—and I was helpless—so young—only a child, just seventeen. Ronald, believe me; oh, believe me; I am innocent, Ronald—I——"

Her voice failed her, but the pleading, anguished eyes spoke eloquently.

Into the tense silence fell Gerald's cool, deliberate accents.

"That is a rather large order, Ronald, isn't it? It would be awkward for your wife to meet in Society the judge who condemned her, the counsel who defended or prosecuted her, or any of that house-party of five years ago."

Ronald started up.

"I can bear no more," he said, in a stifled voice. "Gerald, I leave you to arrange matters. She—my wife—must be liberally provided for, but I will never look on her face again."

As the door closed behind him, Nita rose to her feet, and faced Gerald, very pale, but calm and dignified.

"I will accept no allowance," she said quietly, "and I will never cross my husband's path again. Let a cab be called for me and some wrap brought to cover this mockery," glancing down for a moment at her wedding-dress, "and I will go out of your lives for ever."

Gerald Hilton had not a particularly grateful disposition, but at this moment he felt inclined to fervently thank "whatever Powers there be" for this most unexpected turn in his brother's affairs.

He had always hoped that Ronald would remain unmarried. Knowing his twin's sensitive, ultra-refined nature, he calculated that it would be almost impossible to find a Society woman of to-day who would not jar on it, and Ronald being as delicate in health and organisation as Gerald was robust, the latter had always reckoned on succeeding to the title and estates enjoyed by his senior by ten minutes.

When Ronald, at barely twenty-six, found his ideal woman, Gerald's hopes had fled, but now his prospects seemed brighter than ever. Ronald was married, certainly, but to an impossible woman, from whom he had separated almost literally at the church-door. Yet he was not in a position to get a separation, and could not marry anyone else.

The one fear was that he might forgive the woman whose sin had not been against him, except in her concealment of it, who was so beautiful and whom he loved. Therefore, Gerald's work must be to keep the two apart. This proved an easy matter. From Nita came neither word nor sign, and Ronald never mentioned her name.

* * * * *

"Where are those picture-books for the little one who was burnt at Smithers'? I'm going there now," said the Reverend Harry Searle, bustling into the pretty, cosy little room where Peggy sat at needlework, with her son and heir in the high chair at her side. She looked up with just the old, bright smile.

"Benita took them to her this morning with some fruit and jelly," she answered. "Auntie Nita never forgets the children, does she, Boykins?" And Boykins nodded a golden head in corroboration.

Three years had passed since that terrible wedding-day. Nita had sought refuge with her friends, the Carpenters, and told them the whole miserable story.

She had been but a child of seventeen when, staying with a married sister, she had been accused of the theft of Mrs. Harcourt's jewellery, and a bracelet belonging to that lady was found among Nita's own trinkets.

She had borrowed the key of Mrs. Harcourt's box where the jewel-case was kept on the pretext that the lock of her own Saratoga was hampered, and she wanted to try if Mrs. Harcourt's would open it.

When accused, she only cried piteously, and protested her innocence. Found guilty, and condemned to a term of imprisonment, she was disowned by her family—she had no mother, poor child—and thrown on the world with a capital of fifty pounds sent her in a cruel letter by her father. Before this sum was exhausted, a sudden turn of fortune's wheel threw her into Mrs. Carpenter's hands, and from that time the world had gone well with her.

Peggy had married Harry Searle a few weeks after Nita's marriage, and Nita went with the young couple to the large East-end parish where there was work enough for all who cared to help others. There Nita found balm to heal her wounded heart, or at least to still its aching, and the poor people grew to love and trust her, and to look on her almost as an angel. Sister Benita she was called, for she found it wise to wear the uniform of a sisterhood working in the neighbourhood.

"Yes, Nita has gone to see after that poor baby," went on Peggy, "so do sit down and rest a little. You need not go out again till after lunch, need you? You and Nita are terrible people—not a bit of repose in either of you."

Digitized by Google

Her husband laughed, as he dropped into a seat, and began to help the baby to build a brick castle.

"Well, I can spare an hour or so, if Nita's gone to Smithers', By-the-by, Loughton's back from South Africa."

"I know, and without a wound or hurt of any kind. Nita's mind must be more at ease now the war is over."

"You think she loves him still?" asked Harry.

"Oh, yes, and always will. I wish he could have believed in her innocence as we do."

"She ought to have told him her story before she accepted him," said Harry, very soberly, and he rose and began to pace the room. "The finding out that she had gone by a false name in the way he did was a great shock. I don't think we can blame him."

"Don't you think things will ever come right then?" asked his little wife wistfully.

"Yes, I believe they will, but we must wait. If Nita could ever be proved innocent, he would forgive her concealment of her past, no doubt, but I'm afraid that will never be."

They were both silent for a time.

"Well, I must go and see that poor woman I told you of last night," said Harry, rousing himself at last.

"What woman?"

"Julia Bazaroff. She has led a terrible life, and is dying of cancer. She has been a thief all her life, she tells me, and belonged to a gang of foreign criminals such as are the pest of the East-end of London. She used to get a place as lady's-maid by means of references supplied by these scoundrels, and then rob her employers. I promised to bring you to see her. Will you come now?"

Peggy was soon ready, and the husband and wife went off together. Julia Barazoff was a mere skeleton of a woman, and terribly near death. Her former friends had all deserted her, and she was grateful to Peggy for her visit.

It was so lonely, she said, and she was nervous alone, and had so much on her conscience. She was eager to confess her misdeeds to the sympathetic little woman who had no word of reproach for her.

These misdeeds were all much alike; stories of thefts, places obtained by fraud, burglars admitted to the promises; deeds which sometimes resulted in prison, but more often not, for she had been very expert and skilful, contriving frequently to implicate, or at least cast suspicion, on innocent fellow servants. She was very penitent, she said, and felt deep remorse.

"But the worst thing I ever did, and the thing I'm sorriest for," she began again, after a pause, "is this. I once got a girl, quite young, and a lady, sent to prison for a theft I had committed. She was such a pretty young thing, too.

"My mistress was a careless woman, who used to leave her keys about, and was so easy to rob that it wasn't any credit to do it. She took me with her on a visit to a country house, and there I robbed her of her jewellery.

"I managed to put the blame on the sister of the lady of the house, a bit of a half-grown thing, as unsuspicious and confiding as a baby. I put a lock of hers wrong, and advised her to borrow a key of my mistress to try, and when it wouldn't do, and she went to put back the key, I got her lock all right and slipped in a bracelet. Poor child, her eyes still haunt me!"

"Good Heavens! Are you talking of Benita Bennet?" burst in Harry, jumping up in excitement.

"That was her name. Do you know her?"

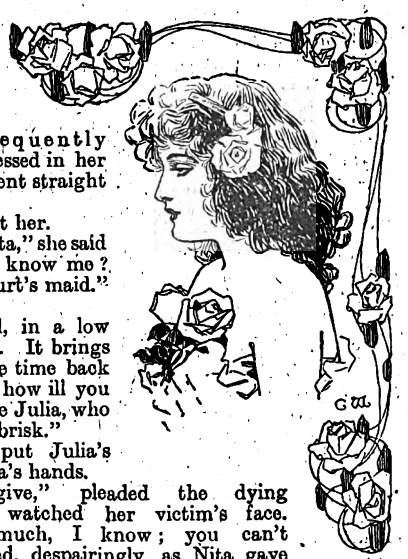
"Indeed, I do, Julia; if you are really penitent you will repeat your statement to the husband of that unfortunate lady. He discovered that she had been in prison for theft, and discarded her."

"Yes, I'll do that," answered the sick woman, wearily. "No punishment could be worse than the pain I'm suffering now, and I shall soon be gone anyhow."

Her eyes were glazed with pain and the approaching end, and Harry thought it prudent to write out her confession at once, and get her to sign it before two witnesses fetched from another room. Then he turned to his wife.

"Loughton's in town now," he said, "so I'll wire to him to come here at once, and I'll leave a message at home for Nita to come on to you as soon as she gets back."

Nita arrived before Harry returned, and thinking Peggy wanted someone to nurse a dying woman, as frequently happened, came dressed in her sister's garb, and went straight up to the bed.



Julia stared up at her.

"Little Miss Benita," she said feebly, "don't you know me? Julia; Mrs. Harcourt's maid."

Nita shuddered.

"Yes," she said, in a low tone, "I remember. It brings that awful, horrible time back to me. Poor soul, how ill you look! And you are Julia, who was so strong and brisk."

Peggy silently put Julia's confession into Nita's hands.

"Forgive, forgive," pleaded the dying woman, as she watched her victim's face. "Oh, it's too much, I know; you can't forgive," she added, despairingly, as Nita gave the paper back. But the injured girl bent over the woman who had blighted her young life, and answered softly, "I forgive, Julia; I forgive as I hope to be forgiven."

Harry was a long time absent. Instead of wiring to Lord Loughton he had decided on going for him, and asking him to come and hear the dying confession of a woman who knew something of his wife. Ronald's whole heart was yearning for the wife he had cast aside, and he gladly accompanied Harry in the vague hope that some good news might await him. He entered with his guide to find a dead woman on a bed, and a sister of mercy kneeling by the pillow. His old friend Peggy came to meet him, and handed him the dying confession of Julia Bazaroff. He cast his eyes over it, and uttered a cry of exceeding anguish.

"Oh, my wife, my innocent, martyred Nita!" he cried. "Oh, how shall I find her, how shall I gain her forgiveness? She can never forgive me; I can never hope she will."

The sister of mercy rose from her knees and came forward.

"Ronald," was all she said.

"Nita, Nita, be more generous to me than I was to you. Grant me your forgiveness."

And with a sweet, grave smile she put her hands in his.

"We will not talk of forgiveness. There is nothing that I could not forgive you, for I love you, Ronald."

Vera Serkoff.

OUR NEW SERIAL which will start in a few weeks' time, is a tale of intense dramatic and love interest. The plot is entirely new, and will be dealt with by Mr. R. Norman Silver in his usual powerful way. The element of love enters very strongly into the story. No lover of fiction should fail to read this tale, which will start in the issue of Short Stories dated March 7th. Readers will remember that, among other things, Mr. Silver contributed "The Golden Dwarf," "Tales Told Off Duty," and "The Brains of the Force" to Short Stories. It will be well for you to place your orders early for the March 7th. Short Stories, as besides the Serial there will be other new and attractive features which are sure to occasion a great run on the paper.

Digitized by Google

PIETRO'S DREAM OF LOVE.

The Story of a Brave Little Italian Boy.

His name was Pietro Antonini. You could see it on his little fruit cart, painted in beautiful, big, yellow letters, "Pietro Antonini, Fruiterer."

Pietro was very proud of that handsome cart with his own name on it. On fine, bright mornings he stood behind it with the conscious air of a man of property, feeling that the world was a very pleasant place.

But there was one great sorrow in Pietro's life. His left leg was twisted and shrunken and short, and when he walked, at every step he gave a sudden plunge downwards to the left, very much as if he had stooped to pick up something and then thought better of it.

Many times, as a child, he had wondered why his father seemed to dislike him, until one day he heard him answer gruffly to somebody's question, "No, I have no children; only a cripple." Then he understood, and the iron entered his childish soul, and the scar remained through all his life.

With the advent of the cart the bitterness of being useless departed. It is no wonder that he loved the cart. Still he felt keenly that he was different from other people. Oh! the anguish of isolation in "being different!"

Pietro had established his cart on Vere Street and College Street, and the children from Vere Street school patronised him daily. At first they had laughed at his grotesque gait and called him "Jumping-Jack." One day a lady, who was one of the teachers in the Vere Street school, found him in tears, and her tender sympathy drew out the cause of his trouble.

"Do not cry, Pietro," she said. "You are handsomer than any of them. You have beautiful soft dark eyes like a woman's, and you have black, silken curls that anyone might envy. And you have something that is more than all these things, you have a beautiful soul."

Pietro listened and was glad to know this; but what were silken curls and a beautiful soul compared with strong, straight legs? And he put his head down on the edge of the cart. That was two years ago, when he was only fourteen. He never cried now. He only folded his lips very tight, and if the tears sometimes filled his dark eyes they never fell, and one would not call that crying, would one?

In June, when school closed, Pietro moved his cart to a new corner. On the second morning two young girls on their way to work stopped beside his cart while a waggon passed, and one said to the other, "They say you will marry that Ross, Ninette."

Ninette tossed her head and laughed.

"They are mistaken. Why, he has a club foot. I would never marry a cripple!"

Pietro turned with a sudden pain in his heart and looked at her and thought he had never seen such a merry face, and such white, flashing teeth.

"Besides," added Ninette, with a saucy glance at Pietro "I do not like blondes. I like dark eyes and black curly hair."

Pietro was glad that his box cart hid his shrunken leg so completely, and he smiled back at the girl whose gaiety was so infectious.

Her words lingered with him all day, and in the evening, when she passed on her way home, he stood up very straight on his sound leg, holding the other bent under him, and returned her nod and smile.

The next morning he took his place earlier than usual and polished up his apples, turning their reddest sides outward, and arranged his oranges in a neat heap. He patted the bananas with a loving hand, smiled at the cheerful red apples, and hoped Ninette would notice how nice the cart looked.

She came tripping on alone. "Good morning—Pietro," she added brightly, seeing the name on the cart.

"Good morning, Ninette!" answered Pietro, whereat the girl laughed and nodded her head at him roguishly.

"You are very pretty," said Pietro boldly.

"And you are very impudent," she retorted, smiling, however, as if she liked such impudence.

Pietro felt his heart thrill as he looked into her bright, dark eyes, and he leant over the cart and held out one of his finest oranges. "Will you please, please to take it!" he cried eagerly.

Ninette's face lit up with pleasure, and she took the orange and hurried on her way, turning to press it mischievously to her lips. Pietro was delighted. He did not know that Ninette was a born coquette, and that in spite of her brief years she was an adept in these captivating little arts and graces. His lonely heart went out to this bright-eyed, sparkling, vivacious creature, and every day he watched for her, morning and evening, and stood up very straight until she had passed.

Seven o'clock in the morning and six o'clock in the evening now became the hours for which Pietro lived. All the intervening time was spent waiting, waiting for those "Heavenly hours," as he called them, that brought Ninette.

How the world changed! He no longer noticed the sad faces, the shabby figures that passed him; he found so many happy faces to watch, they seemed in sympathy with him in his joy, just as the sorrowful ones had drawn him in his loneliness.

Even the rainy days that had once been so insupportably dreary became occasions to be looked forward to and rejoiced in, for then he spread a tarpaulin tent-wise over the cart and Ninette came close under its shelter and leant over the cart very near him.

It was under the tent on a rainy day, when Ninette's laughing face was upturned within a foot of his, that Pietro suddenly leant over and kissed her.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Ninette, I love you, I love you so! You are the whole world to me! Can you love me a little? Oh, say that you will, and then we'll be married, and I will take care of you always. Ninette, darling, will you?"

Had Ninette been able she would have coyly eluded Pietro and made him wait several days in tantalising suspense for his answer, but he held her hands tightly in his and his grave, dark eyes searched her face in their earnestness, so she said soberly, "Yes, Pietro, I will."

Pietro did not sleep that night. From heights of ecstatic happiness he plunged into depths of despair, for had not Ninette said that she would never marry a cripple, and he, weak, miserable coward that he was, had with infinite care concealed from her his deformity. He had seen her only on week days behind his cart and she had never guessed.

Ah, merciful saints, how could he tell her now and see her turn from him in horror! He remembered how as a little fellow he had prayed the Blessed Virgin every night for a month to heal his crippled leg, and every morning had slowly drawn it forth from under the coverlet with breathless expectancy, ready to look with awe upon the miracle, and each time overwhelmed with the keenest disappointment; until at last his faith had wavered, and in his passionate despair he had smashed his little statue of the Virgin, and then spent many hours in bitter repentance for his sin.

He knelt now and prayed with fervour. He did not expect a miracle, but who knew what might happen?

The days passed and still he could not bring himself to tell Ninette. A few more days of happiness, he said, just one more day.

How he hated himself! Yet how could he bear to give up Ninette? He did not dare to hope that she would love him after the disclosure.

One rainy evening they stood together under the tent, the light from the electric globe on the corner falling upon the gleaming wet pavements and trying in vain to pierce the fog that was silently enveloping the city.

Drops of mist like little pearls clung to Ninette's black hair and the red scarf she had pushed back from her forehead. Pietro's heart swelled painfully.

"Oh, Ninette!" he cried. "How beautiful you are! Your eyes are like the stars. I don't deserve you, I don't deserve you!"

"You say that so often, Pietro," Ninette answered. "I am sure I don't know why. The girls at the shop think you are the handsomest boy they have ever seen. They are, oh, so jealous and envious. And, Pietro, to-morrow is Sunday and you must come and see me. I have told my mother all about you and she wants to see you. Don't say that you don't deserve me! I am not so good as you, Pietro."

The words went to Pietro's heart like a stab and his lips whitened.

"Ninette, oh, Ninette! We can't be married. I have deceived you. Oh, Ninette, it was because I loved you so, I could not bear to tell you. You could not love a cripple, and—I am only a cripple. Look!"

He came out from behind the cart and hobbled rapidly up and down the wet pavement, his grotesque figure and jerky plunging gait looming curiously through the foggy twilight. He did not spare himself now, in a feverish eagerness of self-abasement he exhibited his deformity in all its ugliness.

"That is why I always stayed behind the cart. That is why I never saw you on Sunday evenings! See how I hobble! Oh, I am a wretch!" His words died away in a cry. "Oh, Ninette, don't hate me for it!"

Ninette looked on in horror and amazement. Could this wretched little, jerking cripple be her Pietro, the Pietro who always stood up so straight behind his cart and looked so tall and handsome that the girls envied her? Ah, what would the girls say? A cripple! She put up her hand and hid her face to shut out the dreadful sight.

Pietro's outstretched arms dropped to his side, the pleading look died out of his beautiful eyes; if deep in his heart he had retained a little hope that Ninette might still love him, it was gone now.

"Ninette," he said quietly, "I give your promise back to you. I know you are not for me." His voice quivered a little. "But don't be unhappy about me. You can go away and never see me again. You must go, Ninette."

"Yes, I will go away," said Ninette drearily. "It is not your fault, Pietro, and I don't hate you for it; but I can't stay—now. Oh, no, no. I could not! Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!"

Pietro stood and watched her slim figure disappear in the the grey mist, the light falling upon his white face and clasped hands, and upon his tented cart, and the slippery, glistening wet pavements, and the shadowy figures moving through the foggy night.

Darkness had likewise descended upon his heart and upon his bright dream of happiness. After a time he moved back to his cart and began putting away his wares.

Then something happened. A wild scream pierced the air, a noise of flying hoofs and tearing wheels filled the street, and people scurried hither and thither as a carriage drawn by two terrified horses came swinging along at a frightful pace.

One instant Pietro shrank back against his cart, the next he had sprung at the horses' heads and was clinging to the bridle.

His light figure swayed to and fro, the hot breath of the horses fanning his face, their loud snorting filling his ears like a roar. A few more plunges, then a crash and a pause, and Pietro lay white and still beneath the horses' feet.

A dozen hands grasped the heads of the trembling animals and lifted the poor little bruised form from the ground. A spark of life still flickered fitfully, and they bore him to the great hospital near by. Brave they said he was, but it was only reckless bravery.

He opened his eyes after his leg had been set and his head and arm bandaged, but suffered silently and uncomplainingly. That was a strong proof of bravery.

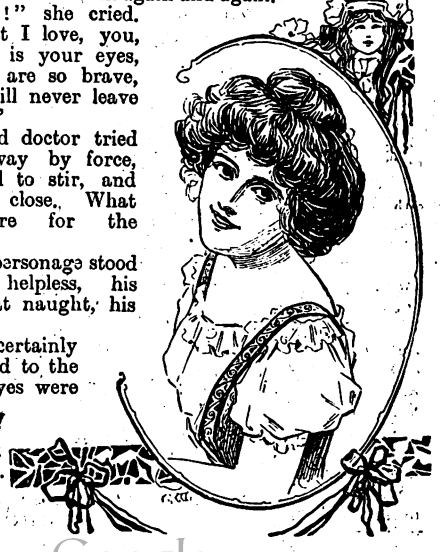
Two days he lay, white and listless, sinking slowly, and the doctor said quietly to the nurse, "There is no hope."

Pietro knew, but he smiled faintly and looked up with wide, wistful dark eyes. He was not afraid to die.

On the third day came a little black-haired Italian girl, with a red scarf wound about her head, and demanded to see Pietro.

The doctor warned her not to excite the patient, and she walked quietly by his side to the bed, then she threw herself on her knees and flung her arms around Pietro's neck and kissed him again and again.

"Oh, Pietro!" she cried. "It is you that I love, you, you. It is your eyes, yourself! You are so brave, so good! I will never leave you any more!"



The astonished doctor tried to drag her away by force, but she refused to stir, and Pietro held her close. What did they care for the doctor?

The august personage stood alarmed and helpless, his authority set at naught, his anger defied.

"It will certainly kill him," he said to the nurse, whose eyes were wet with tears.

But the doctor was wrong. Pietro recovered.

Venita Seibert.

Digitized by Google

= A = Daughter's Devotion.

The Tale of a Sacrifice of Love and Ambition.

"Why, father is going off to Hambleton!" thought Jean Southwell in surprise, as she looked across the yard of the old farm and saw her father getting into the dog-cart. "He didn't tell me he was going, and he told me that I should go with him if he went before market day!" she murmured disappointedly.

She tripped from the room into the open and across the grass towards the yard in order to interrogate her father, but she slackened her steps as she became aware of the fact that Mr. Spilling, the solicitor from the nearest village and an old friend of her father, was climbing into the conveyance. She was mystified, but the feeling of vexation that her father should have forgotten his promise mastered all other sentiments and she hurried on again.

She reached the gate just as the dog-cart passed. Mr. Spilling raised his hat gallantly; Mr. Southwell glanced at his daughter as if he were not quite conscious of her presence, and the trap went past her and down the somewhat rough lane that led to the high road.

Jean could hardly credit her senses. Her father was so fond of her that it was past belief that he could treat her so unkindly. Disappointment gave place to sadness at her father's off-hand manner and, with tears welling to her eyes, she returned to the house to seek her mother.

"What is the matter with you, Jean?" asked Mrs. Southwell, with assumed cheerfulness hardly in accord with the girl's distress.

The cheerfulness was so apparently unreal that it increased Jean's trouble.

"What is the matter with father—and you, mother?" inquired the girl anxiously. "Father has gone off to Hambleton with Mr. Spilling, and you know that he promised to take me; but he scarcely noticed me as he passed and now you—Oh, mother, dear, what is it?"

Mrs. Southwell would have liked to keep up the attempted deception, but she saw that it would be useless to pacify Jean by evasive replies. The best course was to break the news to the girl as gently as possible.

"Jean," she said earnestly, folding her only child in her arms, "you must not be vexed with your father for passing you. He is in great trouble, dear, great trouble, and he has gone with the lawyer to see——"

"Trouble, mother?" Jean returned, wonderingly. "What is it?"

So far as Jean had ever known, things had gone very smoothly at the farm; her childhood had been a sunny one, farming had been remunerative—at least, she had not been aware of any scarcity of money, she had had all she wanted in moderation and the Southwells were regarded as prosperous. What was the trouble? The presence of the lawyer suggested that money had something to do with it, yet the last year's crops had been good and had sold well.

Mrs. Southwell hesitated and her lips quivered; it was so hard to see this fresh young face, surmounted with the wealth of dark brown hair, clouded with sorrow.

"Your father has been unlucky in various ways, Jean, and misfortunes never come singly. A long time ago he became security for a debt incurred by his brother, who died soon afterwards, and to meet his obligations he had to mortgage the farm and the implements. Lately, other troubles have befallen us, and now the crisis had come. He must raise £200 within the next week or——" Mrs. Southwell's voice faltered and she could not continue; she could only stroke the mass of hair and try to prevent her own tears from falling too fast.

"Two hundred pounds!" echoed Jean. "That is a lot, but surely there are people who would lend him that money! I have heard people talk of their credit being good for such or such an amount, and surely father's good name is sufficient!"

"You do not know the world, my dear!" sighed her mother. "And your head was not intended for business—not yet, at any rate! A man's credit is good when he has something to offer as security, or when people think he has; but your father would not borrow on false pretences, even if he could, and he has nothing to offer as security. Everything is mortgaged, even the furniture! He has gone to see if he can, by any chance, find someone who will help him on the strength of his character as a hard-working, scrupulously honest man; if not——"

"What?" demanded Jean, looking up in fear.

"We shall be sold up and have to leave the farm!" replied Mrs. Southwell. But the next instant she cried: "No, no! Let us hope that it will not be so bad as that! I cannot bear to think of it!"

Mrs. Southwell gave way and wept silently. They had tried to hide this coming sorrow from Jean, striving to keep bright in front of her and hoping to ward off the threatened blow; but it had come at last. It was Jean's turn, after a few seconds of silent weeping, to make an attempt to play the part of comforter.

"Perhaps father will get the money, or someone will guarantee it!" she cried, kissing her mother tenderly. "It must be so!"

Mrs. Southwell dried her eyes and set to work resolutely on her daily duties, bidding Jean take heart and forget all till her father returned.

"Perhaps it will be as you say, Jean dear! Surely we shall be spared the sorrow of leaving the old home!"

Jean went to her own little room, seated herself in a plain, but cosy armchair and became absorbed in thought. If this thing happened, then it meant more to her than appeared on the surface, more than her parents suspected. Nay, the blow had already fallen!

She shuddered as she remembered. Percy Morton's father would never let him marry the daughter of a man in such low water as Robert Southwell; if Percy insisted, then his tyrannical father would cut him off and Jean would never permit her lover to make such a sacrifice! Morton had already intimated that he was not pleased with his son's attention to Jean, because he wanted the young fellow to marry someone in a much better position; he had said that in order to nip in the bud any growing affection that might be springing up between the two, but neither he nor the Southwells knew the exact circumstances. Jean was so happy that she scarcely knew for herself. She experienced a strange thrill when Percy approached, and, understanding old Morton's intention to see that his son married a woman in good circumstances, she had formulated plans in a vague manner. And now it all came home to her with cruel clearness.

She loved Percy; this sorrow seemed to have awakened her to the full consciousness of the fact. And Percy loved her, she was sure of it! Yesterday evening he had spoken so tenderly, so lovingly to her, and she half-feared that he was about to seal a lover's compact by bestowing upon her the first kiss, but the gamekeeper coming round the bend in the lane had caused them both to assume a very demure aspect.

Digitized by Google

Jean felt her face reddening as she lived those few seconds over again. Jean Southwell, the only child of a fairly well-to-do farmer was not really good enough for old Morton, but Jean Southwell, the daughter of a bankrupt, was an impossibility!

And the plans she had thought of—ah, they would fall to the ground if her father could not raise the money! She stared into space, and the darkness came on and enveloped her, but she knew it not.

She aroused herself to find her limbs stiff and cold, as she heard the sound of the dog-cart. She crept downstairs and waited for her father to enter the cosy parlour. The fire was burning brightly, the lamp was alight, and the tea was ready. How happy they would all be over this evening meal if he had succeeded! How she would work to help him to clear off this incubus! And if he had failed? She tried to banish the thought, but her heart sank like lead when he entered, for the sight of his face was sufficient. He sat down in his chair, refusing the cup of tea which his loving wife offered him—sat with his face hard set and stared at the opposite wall. Jean watched him, the tea was forgotten and the hours went by in silence.

The grandfather clock struck ten, the strokes echoing all through the house. Mrs. Southwell touched Jean on the shoulder and motioned her to retire for the night. Jean arose, walked to her father and threw herself upon him clasping her arms round his neck and kissing him again and again.

"Dear, dear father! Let me help you to bear this sorrow! I am no longer little Jean; I am a woman and can aid you in your trouble!"

"Heaven sent you to comfort us, little Jean!" he cried brokenly, as he pressed her to him and returned her caresses. "We are wrong to take this trouble so badly, Jean; your mother and I ought to feel some gratitude for the love of a daughter like our sweet darling! I am a poor man to-night, little one, but I would not exchange your love for all the gold they could bring me. Mother," he added, turning to his wife, his face lighting up with great joy for the time, "come and share the love which is poured out to us from the heart of our daughter!"

Jean slept little that night; her brain was on fire and she cried again and again as she saw the sweet visions of other days fading away, but by the time that the tardy sun shot its rays into the bedroom she had settled upon the course to be pursued and was firm in her intention to adopt it.

The breakfast was a silent meal, and when it was over the members of the Southwell family went their several ways, to perform their daily duties. An hour later, Jean harnessed her own pony to a light cart and started ostensibly for the village of Felsham; she not infrequently made this journey, and on this occasion her mother was too much absorbed to ask questions.

Once on the road, however, Jean followed the direction that led to Tanwich, a medium-sized town about eleven miles away. Smut, the pony, was a spirited creature, and the envy of many a farmer in the district; Jean knew how to manage her, and the many predictions that the girl would come to grief through driving Smut seemed to be as far from realisation as ever. In rather more than an hour Smut was pulled up outside a small, well-situated house on the farther side of the town, and Jean alighted.

Her knock at the door was answered by a trim maid, who showed Jean into a well-furnished, but very stiff-looking reception-room, while she informed her mistress of Jean's visit. Jean was then conducted upstairs to another room where a thin, stern-visaged woman sat writing a letter.

"Take a seat, Jean," said the lady of the house, in a voice that had no expression, no inflection, but was as cold and hard as her face. She did not look up while speaking, but continued the writing of the letter on which she was engaged. "I am busy."

Jean was about to apologise for intruding when the other cut her short.

"Now, what is it?" demanded the lady of the house in the same hard voice when she had finished the letter. "Why have you come to me? I am not usually troubled, so I suppose you want something."

"Yes, Aunt Jane," replied the girl, flushing painfully. "You were good enough to send me a letter on my birthday last week, promising to give me a good piano and to pay for lessons in music and singing, to finish my musical education and bring out the talent I possess, so you said."

Aunt Jane nodded. Not a muscle of the set face moved; it was like stone, and appeared to have lost the power of changing its expression. Emotion of any kind seemed not to affect Aunt Jane, and her features remained fixed like those of a mask. She was the maiden sister of Jean's father, and brother and sister had quarrelled soon after Jean's birth; no one knew the cause of the quarrel exactly, but they had never met, except by accident, since that time and they had never exchanged a word since then.

Jane Southwell had been godmother to her niece, and that was how the girl's name came to be Jean. Miss Southwell had suggested her own name, Jane, but the suggestion was not entirely approved, and a compromise was arranged by transposing the letters to make "Jean."

"How much did you intend to pay for the piano, Aunt Jane?" asked the girl hesitatingly.

"Fifty pounds," replied Miss Southwell, after a long pause, during which Jean's heart beat very quickly.

"And how much did you think of expending on lessons?" was Jean's next inquiry.

There was another pause, and Miss Southwell replied: "Possibly one hundred pounds."

Jean clasped her hands in mingled joy and fear.

"Aunt Jane," she said earnestly, "would you give me the money—now—instead of the piano and the lessons?"

"Explain yourself!" was the cold rejoinder.

"Father is in difficulties, and unless he raises two hundred pounds within the next few days, we shall be sold up, and have to leave the farm. He cannot raise the money. I have thought it all out, and I am trying to raise it myself."

"And give up all the prospects that stretch out before you? You have the talent that will make a celebrated singer and musician. You have no right to spoil your future for the sake of anyone," declared Miss Southwell.

"I will give up anything and everything for my father and my mother!" asserted Jean stoutly, although the thought of giving up the cherished ambition almost caused her to falter. Oh, it was hard! "I have thought it all out."

"You have thought that I would do this, instead of what I offered to do?" continued Aunt Jane. "And I suppose you have also included in your calculations a vague notion that I would, a little later, give you a piano and pay for lessons all the same, so you would get the money for your father and get the benefits for yourself in addition?"

It was a cruel speech, such as could come only from a man or woman soured by time and loneliness. Jean sprang to her feet with a cry of protest.

"I would not accept the benefits from you afterwards if you offered them on your bended knees, Aunt Jane!" she cried hotly. "I would not accept even the promised gifts, after that speech, but for the sake of my parents!"

"Bravo!" exclaimed a voice near the door. "Well, said, Jean!"

Both women turned and beheld Percy Morton, who had entered unobserved, and had heard the latter portion of the conversation. He crossed to Jean and took her in his arms, despite her struggles.

"Miss Southwell," he said, respectfully but firmly, "you have no right to speak to her like that!"

"And you have no right to interfere!" snapped Miss Southwell. "And no right to enter till you had a reply to your knock. Leave me to settle my family matters as I think fit."

"Yes, yes, go!" said Jean hurriedly, as the manly young fellow was about to reply. "Please go, do!"

Percy Morton left the room and went downstairs to wait till Miss Southwell was disengaged and could attend to the particular business that he had to deal with. He had not heard enough to understand Jean's trouble, but he could easily tell that she was in deep trouble and he was anxious.

Digitized by Google

Miss Southwell bent a scrutinising glance on Jean, who had dropped into a chair and buried her face in her hands. There was just the faintest indication of a change in the stony countenance for a moment, but it quickly vanished. She took a cheque-book from a drawer and wrote out a cheque for £150. Then she spoke.

"Here is the money!" she said, when she had finished. "Take it!" as Jean held out her hand and began to pour out her thanks. "And remember, as you cash this, that you are giving away the natural gifts with which you have been endowed."

Poor Jean did not need to be reminded of the fact, but she accepted the cheque with deep thankfulness. Aunt Jane would not listen to her expression of gratitude; but, just as Jean was about to close the door behind her, the elder woman recalled her niece.

"Jean," asked Miss Southwell softly, as the girl stood wonderingly in front of her, "do you think you could kiss me?"

Jean hesitated for a second through sheer amazement, then stooped and kissed the thin lips willingly.

Scarcely comprehending what she was about, Jean ran down the stairs towards the front door, but a detaining hand was placed on her shoulder.

"What is it, Jean?" asked Percy Morton. "Why are you running away without telling me?"

"Oh, Percy," cried the girl, the bitterness of the sacrifice coming home to her again. "I cannot tell you. I must go!"

The maid came up to say that Miss Southwell would see him, and Jean darted away. She was in the trap and off at a gallop.

Smut's sides were all of a lather when she reached the lane leading to the farm, and she was making for the entrance when Jean pulled the rein and sent her onward along the road. In three minutes they had reached the Kiln Farm, where she asked for Mr. Ince.

"Hallo, Miss Jean!" said Ince heartly. "What is it now?"

"How much will you give for this pony?" asked Jean slowly. "You have often said you wanted it."

"Now, now," said Ince deprecatingly. "How many more times are you going to tease me like that?"

"This is a genuine offer, Mr. Ince," returned the girl quietly. "The mare belongs to me, and I want some money badly. How much will you give?"

"If it's a deal, then I'll give you £30!" said Ince promptly. "It's a good price, but she's a good animal, and my gal has set her heart on one like it."

"Give me the money and she's yours! You can send for her this afternoon."

"Done!" said Ince. Then, as an uneasy thought came to him, he added: "You aren't going to do nothing wrong—I mean, you aren't—I say, Miss Jean, honour bright, you aren't going to elope or run away from home and be silly with the money, eh?"

Jean laughed so merrily, in momentary amusement, that the farmer was reassured, and departed somewhat shamefacedly to write out the cheque. That was rather a laborious task for him, but he accomplished it in five minutes and brought it to her.

"I haven't got it in gold, Miss Jean, but that's as good if it's got my name at the bottom, which it has! I expect you can't give me a receipt for it?"

"I'll send one with the mare, when you have her fetched away!" said Jean. "Good morning, Mr. Ince."

The farmer looked after her doubtfully; he was still doubtful whether it was a merry trick of Jean, but he comforted himself with the reflection that the afternoon would soon arrive and the matter be settled. As she had accepted the money, he could probably enforce the completion of the transaction.

Jean reached home and unharnessed Smut. She threw her arms round the creature's neck and laid her head against Smut's, crying bitterly.

"Oh, Smut, Smut, I have sold you! Can you ever forgive me? But it was for their sake!"

She entered the house and went straight to her mother.

"Mother, dear, when father comes in to dinner give him these—from me!"

She handed to her mother the envelope in which Ince had placed his cheque; it now contained the two cheques which she had received that morning, and four £5 notes of her own money. The envelope was sealed, but Mrs. Southwell guessed that it contained the wherewithal to save them. Jean hurried away before her mother could make inquiry, and she waited for her father to come in from the fields. Waiting she fell into a reverie; she realised now the extent of her sacrifice. On the walls of her bedroom were portraits of Patti, Jenny Lind, and other great singers, with counterfeit presentments of great musicians. She almost worshipped music, those who could produce it and those who could give expression to it. She herself was gifted, and now her chance of developing the talent was gone! And her lover was lost to her also; the path that had opened itself before her, but was now closed by her own act, would have secured the consent of old Morton, to whom celebrity would have been like strong wine.

"Jean!"

It was her father's voice; but not as she had expected to hear it. Stern, harsh, it was; not affectionate and grateful. She went down, and found him with his hat on.

"Jean, where, why did you borrow this money? You have gone to my sister, who will glory in my misfortune; you have gone to my neighbours. They have all lent the money, because they thought me solvent or in order to degrade me. I will not borrow of those people, and you should not have lowered me in this way. I will return it myself. Tell me where you got the notes, so that I may return those also!"

"Father, it is not borrowed!" said Jean, gently. "It is all my own money. Let me tell you!"

She told him. Robert Southwell folded his daughter in his arms, and, when the lump in his throat had decreased sufficiently to permit speech, he said:

"Bless you, Jean! You make me proud of my offspring!"

That very afternoon Mr. Southwell went off to Hambleton to pay his debt and gain a further respite. There was time now for him to pick up and meet other liabilities as they became due, and he might ultimately free himself. But he did not stop at Hambleton, and it was late at night when he returned.

Jean's efforts had weakened her, and she was ill for a week, but the loving care of her mother hastened the recovery. When she descended to the parlour for the first time she saw a splendid piano there, and on the lid was a note addressed to her. Opening it, she saw that it was in the handwriting of Aunt Jane; it read—

"Please accept this from one whose exterior is of stone, but who has discovered that she has a heart, owing to a great act of self-sacrifice made by another! Accept this from one who offers it on her bended knees!"

"Poor aunt! Dear aunt!" murmured Jean brokenly. Then her ears caught a sound that made her start. "Smut!" she gasped.

"Yes, Jean, the mare is outside, ready to be stroked by her mistress," said her father joyfully. "Aunt Jane said I was to buy her back at any cost, and old Ince parted with it because it was for you."

Jean walked slowly to the pony, which showed its delight at being near its mistress once more.

"Your aunt is a good woman under her stony surface, Jean," said Mr. Southwell gravely. "And that hardness is due partly to me and partly to the cruelty of Fate, which deprived her of her lover by death. I ought not to have been so easily offended, and I ought never to have left her to pass so many years in loneliness! She has softened now, and has heaped coals of fire on my head by setting me up again, paying off the mortgage and otherwise assisting me. And it is all through your actions. They all know what you did, and even old Morton said I had a daughter to be proud of. Fancy that! Why, here he comes, and Percy with him! I declare, mother, Jean is blushing!"

D. Merriam.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

SHEILA KENWYN. Forbes' cousin, whom Eastacres has wronged.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF. A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

We Stay at Trouville.

I DIDN'T show Hervé what I felt, but greeted him with an easy smile.

"Where are you staying?" I asked. "And who would have expected such an apostle of the Romantic to come to a place so worldly as Trouville?"

"I am with the Baron at his château—you know it, Lady Peggy, the most charming place in France. Rolla will be delighted to hear you are so near; he will insist on your coming to his place at once."

"The Baron is always charming," I said effusively. "Tell me, Alphonse, what are you doing to-day? Can you spare me a few hours? I want a talk with you."

"I am at your service," he said gallantly. "Where shall we go?"

He glanced along the sea front, with its mob of great ladies and adventuresses, princes and blacklegs, reigning sovereigns and famous actresses, and gave a shrug at the mass of varicoloured, noisy life.

"Come to the hotel," I said. "We can speak there in peace."

I had a long and somewhat trying interview with the artist. It was my object, of course, to forestall Belinda's appeal to him on Vera's—or rather her own—behalf. I knew Hervé very well; as I have said before, I had had opportunities of studying his character in the days before Fame had discovered him. His was not a temperament that required diplomacy. It was better to come to terms with him at once. I plunged into the subject, and asked him straight out if he still cared for Belinda.

He smiled whimsically, and talked in an airy fashion of the sea and the sun, comparing the girl, I suppose, to them.

"Whether you love her or not, Alphonse," I said abruptly, "I am sure of one thing. You would not let your feeling interfere with your regard or respect for another woman?"

He gave a gesture of protest.

"The thought is impossible," he said.

I smiled. Then, in a few brief words, I told him how matters stood.

"The Princess is so foolish as to care for this engineer—this David Carr, and he reciprocates her attachment. Belinda is confident that it is merely a passing aberration on Vera's part, and thinks that if you would use your influence, and reason with the Princess, she would——"

He interrupted me passionately.

"No," he cried, "a thousand times no. The suggestion is intolerable. I could not offer such an insult to the woman. I—forgive me," he said gravely. "I spoke with heat. Explain to Miss North, if you will have the goodness, that I should not dare to approach the Princess on such an errand."

I nodded acquiescence, and, shortly after, he departed, bearing all sorts of friendly greetings to the Baron.

That evening I received an invitation for myself and Belinda to Rolla's château, La Caprice. I mentioned it to Belinda, telling her at the same time that Alphonse Hervé was there.

"He asked me to tell you," I said quietly, "that he should not dare to approach the Princess on such an errand as you mentioned in your letter."

She flushed and bit her lip.

"I did not write as carefully as I should," she said. "It is difficult to express one's exact meaning on paper sometimes. He will understand better when I speak to him."

"I should not advise you to mention the topic," I replied.

Belinda was unshaken in her determination, however, but, as I could with safety leave the result of her appeal with Hervé, I did not continue the dispute.

Early next morning we started for La Caprice. For beauty and loveliness the château has no equal, even among the many summer holiday houses up and down the green coast. This year it was very gay and very charming. The Baron and his sister were keeping open house, and it was full of people. White-sailed yachts anchored in the bay, riding parties and driving parties made its avenues bright with colour and movement; groups of exquisitely-dressed women wandered in its gardens; life went like a song.

As for our amusements, they were many and varied. There was a troupe of actors from Paris for its theatre, concerts at which artistes world-famous, violinists, prime donne, tenors, performed for our delight.

Every evening at nine o'clock a stately dinner, like a royal banquet, was served to the accompaniment of music, which was worthy of more attention than we gave it. Then there were moonlight water parties, fishing parties, and later on shooting parties, not serious and engrossing, as in England, but animated and picturesque.

Digitized by Google

Then there were card parties, held for the most part in our own rooms, at which we lost and gained fortunes with a shrill laugh and a shrug of the shoulders, with champagne as an accompaniment. Mrs. Dawtrey, the latest thing in English beauties, and her rival, Sarah Givins—a girl from Yankeeland, gave one or two vastly amusing receptions.

Sarah, known as "Toffy," because her father made his pile in molasses, on one occasion performed a skirt dance, clad in a risqué costume of gossamer; Mrs. Dawtrey, a truly wonderful woman, who, having passed her fortieth birthday, contrived to look like twenty, following with an exhibition of her skill with a pocket-pistol. Tilting her chair on two legs, she leant back, a cigarette in her mouth, and took shots at the crystal drops on the chandelier.

Each drop as it fell, and shivered in atoms on the floor, was greeted by shrieks of applause. She certainly was a wonderful shot, and when, having exhausted the chandelier, she turned her attention to the pictures on the walls, and neatly sent a bullet through a masterpiece of Corot, why, as Toffy said, it was good for trade.

After all, the great thing to avoid in life is boredom, and Mrs. Dawtrey, with her pretty, foolish, painted face, her false curls in a sunny circlet above her kohl-washed eyes, with her heart set on a cotillion, and her name in the mouths of the clubs, never bored one.

As for her manners, well, you middle-class people might pronounce her vulgar, we say she was chic. It is not what you do in Society, but the way you do it, and when she and Toffy chased Reggie, the Baron, and half a dozen other men down the corridors at three in the morning, with knotted towels, shrieking and screaming at the top of their voices, we applauded to the echo.

It was a gay life at La Caprice, but a wearing one. Even my nerves felt the strain, and I was obliged to have recourse to ether. It has a wonderful effect; as the ether moves in your veins your eyes grow brighter, your brain grows clearer, you feel light-hearted, bright as a girl in her teens. One evening I had to take a more than usually large dose.

Then, with the spirit giving me new life, I hastened down to mix in the gay crowd that never pauses, never thinks in its pursuit of pleasure.

I found Belinda talking to Alphonse. She was looking very exquisite, with a proud tilt of her head, and a haughty curve of her lips that well became her. She did not get on at all well with the women at La Caprice. I told her that among the guests were some of the greatest ladies of Europe. Her reply was characteristic—

"They paint their faces," she said scornfully, "black their eyebrows, and dye their hair. They talk loudly, and talk scandal, and gossip in a shrill voice. I think they're horrid!"

Alphonse seemed to share her thoughts, judging by the glance he cast at Toffy, who, with her feet on an ottoman—showing a liberal allowance of ankle, her hands behind her head, was chaffing a group of men. Toffy was a very lovely young person of transparent colouring, with very small features, and very slight form, with artistically coloured red-gold hair, and a wonderful impertinence. Very few girls would have the courage to adopt such an attitude as hers in a drawing-room, fewer still possess the ankles.

Up to the present Alphonse, with my assistance, had steered clear of a prolonged tête-à-tête with Belinda. While still admiring her, his feelings for Belinda had undergone a change. She was no longer a goddess, merely a beautiful young girl. Had she left well alone, and contented herself with various tactful allusions to the Princess, Alphonse might have swung back to his allegiance to Vera, and so have cleared the way for Belinda's reunion with David. As it was, however, with the painful directness of her character, she plunged into the middle of her subject.

"Alphonse," she said gravely, "have you written to Princess Zouloff of late?"

The artist flushed, and his fine brows met, frowning in quick resentment.

"No, mademoiselle," he said sharply.

"Are you not going to write? Ah," as he showed signs of wishing to end the conversation, "you must hear me out. You think I am wrong in speaking so openly? Believe me, I have no desire to give you pain, or to treat her name with any discourtesy. But," she turned and faced him, a flush tinging the whiteness of her skin, "but, even before you or her I must think of the man I love.

"He is the whole world to me, there is nothing, nothing I would not do for the sake of my love. Won't you help me?" She bent towards the artist with a pleading gesture; "you are brave, and clever, and kind, and I am so young, so helpless in my ignorance, my inexperience.

"David has not changed in his regard for me; do not believe it, whoever tells you to the contrary. He was hurt, I think, at a letter I wrote him, a foolish letter, telling him that if he chose he could consider himself free. He never answered, but," her voice choked, "but the next time I saw him he was—with the Princess."

"And you still believe in him, still believe he cares for you?"

"Yes"—she spoke proudly—"yes, and shall do until he tells me himself that it is all over."

"You have great faith, mademoiselle."

"And you, monsieur—have you not faith also where you love?"

He shrugged.

"Not like yours," he muttered. "I—I— Listen"—he drew near the girl. "I loved a woman for years, loved her with the passion of an artist, the fervour of a devotee. She deceived me; at least"—he paused—"I had not such faith as you," he said, with a half mocking smile; "and in the face of what I heard and saw, I judged her inconstant and light-minded. Since then, I have not loved until three months ago I met a fair-haired girl with wonderful blue eyes." He gazed at her with meaning and she coloured at his look.

"You didn't really love the girl," she said after a pause. "Even if you did, you have got over it. Yes, oh yes," she laughed, and laid her fingers on his arm; "you are quite restored now. See, you do not even change colour when I look at you," and half mockingly the shameless girl bent her gaze on him—Belinda was undoubtedly progressing.

"Sooner or later your heart will go back to that other woman whom you so dearly loved. How do I know?" She nodded sagely. "I speak from experience. However angry and hurt you feel, sooner or later the love will come back. I have felt indignant with David. I thought he had deceived and trifled with me. But that is all over. I doubt him no longer. I am content to wait. And you——"

"I wait also," said Alphonse.

She sighed, and let her hand fall listlessly at her side.

"How rarely a man loves as we women understand it," she said slowly. "With us it is his happiness that makes ours; if he is hurt we suffer, and immediately desire forgiveness for a fault we oftentimes have not committed.

"With men it seems far otherwise. It is their own feelings not ours they study. If their pride is in arms, in arms it will stay until the woman who loves them pleads for pardon. Not an inch of the way will they go to meet her; they will not even say in what manner she has offended.

"Why do you not go and ask the woman you say you loved to give you an explanation? No, you shake your head. You are too proud—too mean. You will not run the chance of a rebuff, whereas the women——" She paused, and in a low voice murmured:

"She cares for you and your absence hurts her cruelly." Then, with a slight inclination of her head, she rose and joined Farringdon, who was, as usual, hovering near her.

Digitized by Google

Much discomposed at the turn her conversation with Alphonse had taken, I followed. Somehow or other the artist must be got away from La Caprice, away from Belinda's influence.

Chance helped me to accomplish this. Mrs. Dawtrey on the strength of a flirtation with Alphonse, commenced and ended one winter in Rome, laughingly claimed him as her property. Hervé, the hero of a hundred intrigues, fell into the jest. He became her most devoted slave, and fetched and carried in the most approved fashion.

Belinda, disgusted at his conduct—she never would understand the customs of Society—pointedly avoided him, and spent most of her time with Farringdon.

Baron Rolla, much to my surprise, had not renewed his attentions to Belinda. It was not that she had ceased to attract him, that was quite plain, but for some reason that for the moment baffled me. An interview I overheard gave me the necessary clue.

It was late one evening, after dinner. The actors in the little playhouse in the grounds were performing a French comedy, which was highly improper without being witty—sufficient reasons for my own and Belinda's absence.

I saw her off with Farringdon and set out for a stroll by myself, thinking to come across the Baron—Rolla was a good-natured man and in odd moments could be persuaded to give a Stock Exchange tip likely to be of substantial service.

I discovered him with Celia Dawtrey. They were sitting in one of the pavilions for which the grounds of La Caprice are famous. The place was shaded by thick trees, and as I lingered in the moonlight their voices literally forced themselves upon my ears.

"I can't do it, Celia," said the Baron in his deep voice. "I've lent you hundreds and thousands of francs already. You are insatiable, like a brigand, you want to pillage everybody."

Celia's pretty painted face turned old for a second in the moonlight.

"I must have the money, Victor," she said, her teeth chattering with agitation. "I——"

He stopped her with a gesture.

"Very well, you shall have it, but on one condition. You must leave here—and very shortly."

"Leave La Caprice! Leave you, Victor!" She clasped her hands about his arms, lowering her lids, so that the vindictive gleam in her light eyes should not be seen.

"Oh, you will console yourself for my absence. I do not wish you to be here—you——"

"I understand," she said with a mocking laugh. "You fear I shall interfere with your plans in regard to that girl. You are afraid I shall tell tales and spoil your chance. Why," she laughed mockingly in her shrill treble, waking the echoes of the night; "why she won't look at you. She thinks you are old, ugly and——" Celia grew hysterical with mirth—"fat!"

"All the same, you'll go," he said between his teeth, "if you want me to lend you the money."

"And what if I refuse the money and decide to stay?"

"You won't, Celia. When did you ever refuse anything? Come, my dear, be reasonable, and decide to start for the Austrian Tyrol within the week."

"So that is it," said Celia, with a little stamp. "I have wondered at the change in you, and—and——"

The Baron lost patience and stopped her roughly. It was evident to me that the little Dawtrey's reign with him was over. She was a clever little creature and deserved well of Society, because she never created scandal. Her intrigues were known and at the same time were not known. She lived three months of the year with her husband in their house in Chesham Place, and they were generally spoken of as a devoted couple!

Mr. Dawtrey was always stingy and like a bear, but he knew how to behave. He was mostly absorbed in foreign speculations which took him to out-of-the-way spots. He was large, ugly and solemn, but he did well in his place like the great Japanese bronze that sat cross-legged in the hall. Above everything else he never questioned his wife—so long as she was not talked about outside her set, it was plainly his duty to keep silence.

The Baron evidently made the required loan, for Celia appeared at the card table some hours later with a substantial roll of notes. As usual, she played wildly and recklessly, plunging for all she was worth. Whatever she had originally intended to do with the money she borrowed from Rolla, her present intention was evident, she meant to risk it at play.

Note after note slipped from the roll. We were playing in Toffy's rooms, and the Yankee made it a rule that all debts should be settled at the time. She had quietly but firmly refused to allow a very great lady indeed to postpone payment, pointing out that cards were for profit as well as for pleasure!

Celia was playing against Rolla, who, with a bland smile, was winning back all the money he had lent her a few hours ago. When the money was exhausted she rushed from the room with a strange look on her face. Belinda followed her. Not knowing what the misguided girl was about to do I thought it better to overhear their conversation.

Belinda had drawn Celia into a small room some short distance down the corridor.

"I've had your note," she said, "but I don't understand it. What do you mean by saying I have driven you from this house?"

"It's true, quite true," flamed the other. "Rolla has told me to leave, to leave La Caprice, for fear I should prejudice you against him. He wants to make you his wife, to buy you as he buys his pictures, his statues, his houses. Your indifference merely increases his determination."

"He is prepared to play the saint to win you, and because I know that he is something very different he wishes me gone. And I"—she threw out her hands with an impassioned gesture—"I am poor," she said, "and I have had to borrow money from the Baron. I have had to beg him to lend me some this very night.

"Do you know why?" She came close to Belinda, gazing at her with a pathetic earnestness, that would have made her fortune at the Porte St. Martin—"it is because my boy, my dear boy, is in trouble. He is at Sandhurst, his father is strict, he has lost money, he——" Celia broke down in a torrent of tears.

"You poor thing," said Belinda, as quick to console her as she had been to champion Midge long ago, "I am so sorry for you. Of course you must help your boy, and as for Rolla—I shall tell him what I think of his conduct. I used to like him, but now——" She gave an expressive gesture.

"Yes, but look here," said Celia, "I've lost nearly all the money he lent me. I had hoped to double it at cards to-night, but luck was dead against me. I can't pay the Baron back. I shall have to go."

"I'll pay the Baron," said Belinda impressively. "At least I'll let you have the money to pay him."

"You dear," purred Celia. "You dear, sweet thing. I always declared you were too good for words."

Belinda shook herself free from Celia's ardent embrace, and somewhat gravely produced a small porte monnaie, from which she abstracted a packet of notes—her month's allowance of pocketmoney. Celia caught at them greedily.

"It's not nearly enough to pay Rolla," she said glibly, "but it will help to turn my luck to-night. If one can hold out long enough you know the luck always changes—always."

Clutching the money she turned back to the card-table. I linked my arm in Belinda's, and read her a lecture on her folly.

"You've embroiled yourself to no purpose," I said angrily. "Celia will make mischief all round. You're a very silly girl."

Digitized by Google

"She was in distress about her boy," said Belinda. "No one could help being sorry for her."

"Her boy!" I echoed, with a laugh, "why she doesn't see him from one year's end to another. The poor image hardly knows what his mother is like. Celia's much too occupied with herself to think of seeing her son."

Belinda looked grave but made no answer. She returned to Toffy's boudoir and, against her usual practice, seated herself at the card-table, with the intention of taking a hand.

Celia took the chair next to her. The notes lent by Belinda went the way of those furnished by the Baron. Luck was persistently against the little woman, as it was in favour of Sarah Givins, who simply raked in money all the time. There was a feeling of suppressed excitement in the air. Celia's face turned a ghastly pallor underneath the rouge, and her eyes looked hollow in the electric light. Alphonse, who had regarded Belinda's presence at the table with evident discomfort, leant forward and in a low tone urged me to send the girl to bed.

"She shouldn't be here," he said, "the atmosphere is too feverish. Look"—he glanced round the table, and the contrast between the girl with her pure, sweet face, and the women about her with their painted cheeks, their blackened eyebrows, and the air of rapacity which gleamed from their eyes, struck one sharply.

"Surely," said Alphonse, "we have played enough. See the day is already dawning." He rose, walked to the window, and flung up the sash. The rosy light of dawn quivered over land and sea. The leaves were shivering in the morning breeze.

From the alleys dusky with citron and lemon-trees came the scent of the roses; and the wash of the waves upon the shore made music. In the soft touch of the early morning light the women at the table looked strange and haggard, like creatures of another world.

I caught sight of my face in the glass, and for a moment I had a strange contraction at my heart. I felt old, horribly old; a fear of the future darkened my sight; my nerve, my will were all I had to help me from slipping from my place in society.

Once fall out of the ranks and you never regain your place in the gay procession. It sweeps by you, treading you underfoot, with a careless, high-pitched laugh from the women and a shrug from the men.

The thought quickened my resolve to earn, by whatever means, the £20,000 promised by Hardy North when I should have married Belinda.

Toffy's high voice roused me.

"I guess we won't play any after now," she said, "I'm getting sleepy."

The rest agreed—all except Celia.

"Nonsense," she cried, "it's absurd to end now. Come, I insist," and she eagerly gathered up the cards.

The Yankee took up the challenge and the pair commenced to play écarté, the others standing round to watch. The luck was still with Toffy, Celia had lost all but a few notes. At last, with whitened lips and a catching of the breath, she laid a card upon the table.

"My ace beats your king, and——"

"Stop." Toffy leant eagerly across the table. "You have a card concealed," she said. "Look!" And she motioned towards the other's flimsy handkerchief.

"Lift up that handkerchief, one of you," she cried. "I swear there's a card underneath."

It was a critical moment. The women stared resentfully at Toffy and malignantly at Celia. They resented the accusation even more than the crime. Such things are not altogether unknown in our set—but we contrive to hush them up. Toffy, of course, was an outsider.

Rolla, in response to the Yankee's words, stepped forward to lift the handkerchief, when, like a flash, Belinda interposed.

"There is no card here," she said, raising the flimsy piece of lace—"no card at all."

Even as she spoke Toffy, with a mocking laugh, pointed to her frock! There in the folds of her bodice—Belinda's bodice—was the missing card!

(Another exciting instalment will appear next Tuesday.)

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE!

In Addition to £1,000 in Cash,

Offered by THE BIG BUDGET.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is so huge that it is almost impossible for one to realise at first thought what it really means. Therefore the following hints will probably enable you to grasp the full value of such a regular income:

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE means, unless you are extravagant, absolute freedom from money troubles as long as you live.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE is an insurance against depression and mental worry.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will enable you to dispense charity with a liberal hand.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy you a bigger house and enable you to live in better style.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will cover the cost of taking a cottage in the country and living there in comfort for the rest of your days.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will pay the expenses of months of foreign travel.

£5 A WEEK FOR LIFE will buy anything you can possibly want, from a piano to a motor-car.

In fact, there is no limit to the things you can do with £5 A WEEK FOR LIFE.

THE prize will be paid to the person (perhaps you), who correctly solves a number of pictures which appear in THE BIG BUDGET, under the conditions printed in that paper.

Each picture consists of certain objects, the names of which represent the name of a railway station in the United Kingdom. For example, the hull of a ship would mean "Hull." Every name will be found in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.

A further sum of £1,000 in cash will be distributed as consolation gifts amongst those who come next to the first winner in the following manner:—

FIRST CONSOLATION GIFT, £100.

2nd and 3rd Cash Gifts	...	...	...	£50	each.
4th to 7th	,, ...	...	...	£25	,,
8th to 57th	,, ...	...	...	£10	,,
58th to 97th	,, ...	...	...	£5	,,

So you see, even if you do not succeed in securing the first prize of £5 a Week for Life (which will be paid under any circumstances), you have a good opportunity of securing one of the cash gifts.

A GRAMOPHONE FOR A REQUEST.

It is not everyone who can afford to buy a piano, or even a musical instrument of any sort, and to such persons a Gramophone—which is another name for a talking and singing machine—would be a much-prized gift.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by just asking for it.

A Gramophone will be given to each of the ten readers whose requests the Editor considers best. No request must contain more than twenty words.

Post-cards only must be used, and they should be addressed to the Request Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta St., W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, Feb. 17.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Digitized by Google

A BRAVE COWARD.

Telling of How a Man Showed His Courage.

When Jack Stanley and Eva Coleman went spinning along the street behind his beautiful grey trotters, everybody envied him and the handsome girl who was soon to become his wife. How happy they looked, laughing and chatting gaily, as the trotters glided swiftly, almost noiselessly, by!

As they drove out of Grayson Place, where their new home was building, and turned again into the street, the inspiring strains of martial music fell upon their ears, and the next moment a company of soldiers swept round the corner, marching towards them with military precision.

Jack was compelled to give his entire attention to the spirited team, which seemed determined to reach the next street by taking a short cut through a garden, the gate of which was open, but his affianced looked with great admiration at the stalwart forms and sunbrowned faces of the soldiers. After they had passed she exclaimed:

"What a grand sight! How nice men look in uniforms! Oh, I love soldiers!"

"Yes, that was a fine-looking body of men. We have a splendid lot of fellows in our Army."

"Especially since the war, when so many men enlisted," said the girl. Then, without waiting for any reply, she asked abruptly, "Why didn't you volunteer, Jack?"

"Oh, I don't know, Eva," he said. "I did not think it altogether necessary; there were enough fellows without me."

"If I were a man," was the rejoinder, "and my country needed me, I would certainly respond, for I think it the duty of every able-bodied young man to fight for his flag. To me it shows a lack of proper spirit when he does not."

The blood surged hotly into Jack's face at Eva's remark, for he thought of the hard battle he had fought when he unwillingly remained still while his friends and schoolfellows were enlisting. When at last they went away without him, it was one of the bitterest trials of his young life.

But how could he do otherwise? His father, who seemed failing rapidly, needed his help—needed the strong arm of his only son to lean upon. And when his gentle mother added her tears and intreaties to Jack not to leave them, he gave up all thoughts of enlisting, and plunged more deeply into the management of his father's business. They were left alone some months later, and Jack was thankful that he had remained at home to support and comfort his sorrowing mother.

And now Eva, his promised wife, had intimated that it was lack of courage which had kept him back—that he was a coward! The words were like a knife thrust in his heart.

The drive ended; the "good-night" at the gate was spoken abruptly, leaving them both very unhappy over their first quarrel.

Just at this time the large bodies of unemployed were causing a great deal of uneasiness. Their disturbances were not felt very keenly in the West End, the riots and hostile demonstrations being confined chiefly to other parts of the city.

So it was without thought of danger that Eva Coleman boarded a 'bus to go on an errand, little realising that she was going directly into one of the districts where many of the unemployed lived, and with whom most of the residents sympathised.

When she alighted from the 'bus she was almost immediately surrounded by a crowd of hooting men and boys, who shouted vile epithets at her, and followed up their words with a volley of sticks and mud.

The thoroughly frightened girl started to run away, the mob following closely. In her terror she sought refuge in the nearest open door, which proved to be that of a public-house but from which she was roughly pushed back into the street again by the cowardly proprietor of the place.

At that moment a man knocked off Eva's hat. For a brief moment the mob turned its attention to the stylish piece of head-gear, placing it upon a stick and raising it above their heads, where it was immediately pelted with mud.

At that instant a woman, who had seen from her window the beginning of the disgraceful affair, ran into the street, pleading with the mob to desist and not attack the girl, but in vain, and both she and Eva were struck by flying missiles as the crowd closed in round them, hooting and jeering and yelling:

"Down with the aristocrats!"

Then came a lull in the attack, followed by a sudden confusion in the mob of howling wretches, as a man rushed frantically among them, scattering them in every direction by furious blows about him, and cutting a wide path as he went to the rescue of the helpless women.

Eva's heart beat wildly with gratitude to this brave stranger, who had with such magnificent courage rushed single-handed into the fray, with only a stick, picked up as he ran, for a weapon.

As she looked, a prayer of thankfulness upon her lips, she saw the man reel from the effects of a blow upon the head, and sink to the ground. For an instant she had seen his face, white and ghastly, and a cry of horror escaped her; it was Jack, her Jack, whom she had but the evening before called a coward.

Some one in the crowd yelled, "The cops are coming!" And the ruffians fled into side streets and alleys, disappearing quickly, as a posse of policemen, who had responded to a riot call, came round the corner.

In a moment the wounded man was lifted tenderly into an ambulance and hurried away to the hospital. Eva, dishevelled and tearful, was filled with dreadful misgivings concerning his welfare, and wanted to follow him and ascertain for herself his condition; but the brave woman who had come to her rescue opposed this, and succeeded in prevailing upon the anxious girl to wait until a conveyance could be had.

When the carriage came, Eva gave instructions to the driver to call at the hospital and wait until the result of Jack's injuries could be learnt.

She experienced a feeling of intense relief and happiness when told that he had received but a slight wound.

"He was only knocked senseless," explained the hospital surgeon, noting the look of anxiety on the girl's face. Then he added reassuringly, "He's come round all right, and as soon as they get the cut on his head fixed up, he'll be able to go home."

Eva did not wait for Jack, nor did she leave her name, so when he was told of her call he could only surmise that it was she, but was not a little puzzled to know how she could have heard of the affair so soon.

That evening a note was handed to the young man, who sprang to his feet with a fierce look in his eyes, and an exclamation that would have shocked Eva, if she could have heard it, when he learnt that his sweetheart, the girl who was soon to be his wife, was the victim of that cowardly assault, and to whose rescue he had hastened.

He strode up and down the room with clenched fist, vowing dire vengeance upon the mob and particularly against the brute whom he had seen push the girl back into the very face of that awful crowd.

Then, regardless of the strips of court plaster upon his forehead, he seized his hat and rushed away to Eva's home.

It was a very tearful and penitent face that was upturned to receive his kiss, and a sobbing girl clung to him brokenly imploring his forgiveness for her cruel words of the evening before.

"You are right," she said after a while. "It requires courage to be a soldier, but sometimes it requires higher courage not to be one. If I——"

He stopped her with a kiss.

Laura Ellen Beale.

Digitized by Google

The Wrong Mr. Miller.

The Story of a Correspondence and a Love Affair.

"My dear Mr. Miller,—I promised you once—it was quite a while ago, to be sure, but then it was a promise—that some day I would write a letter to you. To-day seems a good time to do it. I am in very low spirits, and decidedly irritated against life in general. The thermometer is below freezing-point, and the street is filled with racing clouds of dust.

"Here, in Ilkley, when the wind blows, everybody quarrels with life, and I am no exception. And as you used to be a very bracing person to quarrel with, the idea of writing to you seems a happy one, even after four years.

"I take for granted that you are still in London. London is so unlike Ilkley! People live in London—they spend whole existences there, and are buried there when they die. Here, in Ilkley, people visit; they don't live.

"In four years everything changes; one's whole visiting list fades away like a dream, and changes like a kaleidoscope, into an entirely new set of acquaintances and intimates.

"I have had thirteen intimate friends in four years, and all lost to me now forever!—is not that a striking reminder of the transitoriness of life? One is in Mexico, one in Rome, one in a convent at Paris, two in New York, one in India, one in Scotland, one in Egypt, two in Ireland, and three have died.

"Everybody who does not die here goes away, before long, to the ends of the earth, as you see. In comparison, London must be a place of solid and enduring social relations. I am in the mood to-day to envy the rooted security of a Londoner!

"Do you remember how you used to laugh at my father's investments in mining stocks four years ago? Well, they have turned out a stroke of financial genius, after all, and made our fortune.

"It is rather exciting being rich—and rather dull, too. And now, having kept my promise most generously, to the extent of six pages, it is time to stop. I hear you echo the sentiment—but I am, notwithstanding,—Sincerely yours,

"ISABEL BROWN."

The young man smiled as he laid down the letter on his desk, amid the business papers that crowded it.

"She was a clever girl!" he said to himself, "but I never thought she would write that sort of letter. Too impersonal, somehow. She writes a very pretty hand, though."

Perhaps it was the four years perspective into which the attractive acquaintance of a summer at Llandudno had receded, that gave this effect to his mind.

At any rate, he remembered her as she was that last afternoon, when they stood on the cliffs looking over at the breakers below. They had not been impersonal at all that day, but very much the opposite—and he had realised since, more than at the time, how very near he had been to being in love with her, and how much one week more of intimacy might have meant to them both.

How he had hoped that she would write—though she had only smiled at his request, and promised that some day she might. He had not forgotten, and he had really never liked any other woman so well. And now she had written. Why? Was it just one of those little inconsistent impulses of hers that he had found so charming four years ago—or did it mean more? The only answer to that question, manifestly, was to answer the letter at once.

And though the business correspondence was attended to promptly that day, yet a summer afternoon, and a speaking pair of dark eyes, were more in the writer's thoughts than was at all necessary.

It was surprising after the answer was sent, and the correspondence begun thus tentatively, how soon it grew and throve, and increased.

Miss Mabel Brown's postman, hastening along the Ilkley roads, brought at shorter and shorter intervals, longer and longer letters from London; while Mr. George W. Miller's desk in the large city offices of that wealthy firm of which he was junior partner, was never long without a specimen of Miss Brown's handwriting.

It was a revelation at both ends of the line, how much one could put on paper for a sympathetic reader, and how intimate a knowledge one gains of a special correspondent from week to week.

Mr. Miller soon learnt that he had never really known a girl before—that is, never understood one—and that Miss Brown's opinions, Miss Brown's tastes, Miss Brown's individuality exactly and continually satisfied and delighted him; while Miss Brown felt that she could never have believed that George Miller could develop such attractive traits and such a thoroughly congenial set of ideas and aspirations.

They were a revelation to each other—first a monthly then a weekly, then almost a daily revelation. It matters not how often such a discovery is made, in each new case it is equally astonishing and suggestive, and leads inevitably to the further discovery that letter-writing has its limits, and needs the supplement of personal intercourse to perfect its delights.

The end of it was that, six months after Miss Brown's letter to him, Mr. George Miller himself arrived at Ilkley, one September morning, with three of Isabel's last letters in his inside coat-pocket, and a pre-occupation so great that he paid no attention to anything that happened on the journey.

Isabel, on her side, was not in the least surprised when he was announced at her home, for his last letter—well, she was quite ready to welcome him, and prepared to descend the stairs without any symptoms of astonishment, except that her heart was beating with most inconvenient quickness, and her cheeks were as red as the heart of a June rose.

This being the state of the young people's feelings it is somewhat strange to be obliged to chronicle that when Miss Brown entered the drawing-room, and Mr. Miller rose eagerly at her approach, they should have stood looking at each other as if turned to stone.

For fully two minutes not a word was interchanged; then the lady, with a gasp, sank down into the nearest chair and covered her face with her hands, while the young man, bending over her, murmured awkwardly:

"I beg your pardon, Miss Brown—is it Miss Brown?"

"Yes, it is!" returned the girl, sitting up defiantly, her blue eyes ablaze and her slender figure full of angry grace.

Digitized by Google

"What right have you, sir, to ask me such a question, when you are masquerading under somebody else's name yourself?"

"I was christened George Wharton Miller," returned the young man, with equal bitterness, "and my parents are, therefore, responsible for the 'masquerading.'"

"Wharton!" cried Miss Brown. "I never heard of you before! I never wrote to George Wharton Miller—the right name is George William Miller!"

Mr. Miller sat gravely down in the nearest chair—she was certainly distractingly pretty—and regarded her with a return to his Londinian calmness of manner.

"Your letter was addressed to George W. Miller," he said slowly, "and the postman made a natural mistake, since our firm is the most important of the name. Probably there are ten George William Millers in London. But that doesn't explain how Miss Isabel Brown, of Ilkley——"

"Oh—why, of course—I never thought!" cried the girl, embarrassment succeeding anger—"that is, of course, I thought your answer was to me; but my cousin, Isabel Brown, used to live in Ilkley, until two years ago, when she—she married, you know, and went to live in Liverpool. I never thought, of course, oh, isn't it dreadful! And where is George William Miller—he ought to be in London, somewhere!"

"I dare say he is, at this moment," replied George Wharton Miller, with increasing mastery of the situation. "And I don't see anything to do but to leave him there, and leave Miss Isabella Brown, that was, in Liverpool, and think no more about them. Our correspondence has been with each other, after all, you see, and not with them."

"Oh!" said Isabel. "But—but I've known George Miller really, for years—it was easy to write to him."

"I don't believe," said the other George Miller, judicially, "that you know him half so well as you know me."

Miss Brown blushed. She did not look angry at all, and was, decidedly, prettier than ever—much prettier than Isabella had ever been. Had he really known Isabella at all? No, certainly not; Isabella had never corresponded with him.

"I am sure," he went on, rather stumbling this time, "that I know you better than I do any other woman in the world. Haven't I told you—well, just everything, in my letters? And you really cared, you know—you said so. It's the personality, the—the soul, that goes into a letter. We know each other, and I—why, I can't let you go, just because I'm not acquainted with you! Don't you see—don't you feel——"

"Yes," said Isabel faintly. "But—but—you're such a perfect stranger, you know!"

And then suddenly a mirthful twinkle sparkled in her blue eyes, a distracting dimple hovered in her cheek, and she began to laugh—an irresistible, contagious, musical laugh—which swept the young man along in its merry current till he finally joined in heartily.

They laughed until the tears came to their eyes; they could not stop; the inexhaustible perfection of the joke opened before them in new waves of merriment.

It was a laugh of deep and sympathetic comradeship; and when they ceased, exhausted with mirth, and looked into each other's eyes, it was as if they had known each other for years.

"But wasn't it queer," said Isabel, an hour or so later, "that Isabella should have met you at Llandudno, and I should have been there later that season, with your namesake in the party?

"Do you know, I always wondered why you referred with such earnestness to Llandudno, because—I actually snubbed him, most unkindly, that summer. My letter was really a kind of tardy apology to him—and he never got it."

"Do you wish he had?" said George.

"When I am better acquainted with you, perhaps I can tell," said Isabel, with a demure smile.

And George knew, then and there, that the letter had come to the right address—for him.

Priscilla Leonard.

Your Editor Chats.

In three weeks' time we shall publish the first instalment of Mr. Norman Silver's New Story. In this number also will appear particulars of a brand new competition which will create an enormous amount of interest, and for which everyone will be eligible. And, finally, the third attraction will be the new series of article stories dealing with "The Confessions of a Self-made Girl."

Altogether, the number dated March 7 will be a splendid one in every respect, and there will unquestionably be a very large rush for it. Therefore, it will be well for you to mention to your newsagent the fact that you want a copy reserved for you.

A correspondent signing himself "Ginger" asks why the heroines in Short Stories never seem to have red hair. Red hair, he maintains, is the most beautiful hair, and people with red hair are always strong and good.

It has certainly never struck me before that the chief characters in our stories have been devoid of hair of so charming a hue. However, I will see what can be done in the matter, and no doubt you will shortly find a story in which the hair of one of the chief characters is of the colour you require.

I have received a very interesting letter from a Manchester correspondent, who, after saying quite a number of kind things about the paper, goes on to say:

"Now, dear Editor, can you tell me why Short Stories is like a bicycle? No? Give it up? Because in the short complete stories one may discern the frame of the machine from which its whole build and material may be judged. Then the serials can be likened to the wheels, ever revolving and whirling on into new and stirring scenes. The Editor's Chat forms the handle bars, by means of which the machine may be governed and rightly directed. The storyettes, jokes, anecdotes, etc., are the different bearings which fit in and strengthen the whole structure, and, well oiled by the splendid prize competitions offered weekly, make it run very easily and without any hitch."

A Middle-class Mother writes: "In this week's instalment of 'How I Chaperoned Belinda' I see that Lady Peggy Carstairs has made a most envenomed attack on middle-class wives. I am a middle-class wife, and I do not consider Lady Peggy an authority upon the matter—how could she be? It is very easy for a woman in her ladyship's position to talk and write upon a matter she cannot possibly know anything about, unless she has at some time been a district visitor, and I should hardly imagine that was in her line. Middle-class wives, I would like Lady Peggy to know, are very much happier and their husbands are much more content than the wives and husbands in Lady Peggy's own sphere, where divorces and scandals are commonplace occurrences. Perhaps middle-class wives are not so well groomed as their aristocratic sisters, but then they have to work. All the thousand and one petty cares of a struggling household are theirs, and out of the riches of their love they have to eke out the wretched pittance that their husbands win. They must stint themselves that he can keep up appearances. They must go on scanty commons that their children appear well dressed. Small wonder that they are not always smiling, but at least their smiles are genuine, and are not bought or sold."—I shall be interested to receive opinions on this subject from other readers.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Story of a Cruel Ordeal.

"It is all a mistake!" declared Harcourt Dorrington half audibly. "Maggie engaged to John Allinson! Yes, there it is, plain enough!"

He stared at the announcement in the newspaper, unwilling to believe what he saw there. He was in love with Maggie Rosslyn himself; she knew that he was in love with her, for he had told her so when he last saw her, a month previously, but she had stopped his declaration with a frightened gesture, and he had desisted because he thought that he had been too abrupt; and now he discovered that the prize had been taken from him by John Allinson.

What did her frightened gesture signify? Was it that she was prepared to accept Allinson and Harcourt's outburst had come as a surprise to her? Perhaps she had wished to spare him, but had not had the courage to tell him that she loved someone else?

"No!" said Harcourt Dorrington decisively. "She has been forced into an engagement with him. I cannot believe that a bright nature like hers would ally itself willingly with a quiet, scientifically-minded man such as Allinson. What inducement can there be? He has a good position with the mining company as scientific adviser, but my position as manager is equally good. If he had been a man from outside the county, one who could take her to live amid gaiety, there might be some reason for the choice, but she must live near here. Moreover, I do not believe that she wishes to leave the dear old Cornish spot where she has lived all her girlhood."

As Dorrington speculated on the reasons which had led Maggie to give her hand to Allinson, the feeling of disappointment grew stronger and stronger till it engendered a sentiment of jealousy and revenge.

"Why should he have her?" he muttered angrily. "I'll see her and find out the truth; if she has been cajoled and forced into it, I'll upset it." Then another thought crossed his mind. Suppose that it was really her own choice? A nervous tremour passed through his whole frame; he shut out that thought, as an ostrich tries to avoid seeing the true state of things by burying its head in the sand.

He was aroused from the preoccupation which absorbed him by hearing a loud knock at his office door. In answer to his "Come in!" the door opened to admit John Allinson.

"I thought you were not here, Dorrington," observed the visitor with a smile "I knocked three times! Busy, I suppose!"

He was a man of strong build, handsome face and quick, kindly eyes. He resembled an athlete more than a student, yet there was a modesty about him that denoted the retiring habits of a man of books and scientific experiments rather than the man of sport. At times, John Allinson was positively shy.

"I was thinking, Allinson," replied Dorrington, just a little awkwardly. He tossed the newspaper aside, hoping that his visitor had not noticed the page at which it had lain open. "What's the trouble? Anything I can do for you?"

"Yes. It seems that Miss Rosslyn wishes to explore the old Pengrave Mine. I have—she has learnt something of the geological formation of the mine, and she would like to go through one or two of the passages. It's very interesting, you know. Of course, these tin mines are very ancient; the Pengrave Mine was probably worked in the time of——"

"Yes, yes, I know!" interrupted Dorrington. Allinson's presence and the mention of Maggie had irritated him. "I am not sure that we can give her the desired opportunity. It is not unattended with danger, Allinson, and the Directors are rather strict about it."

"I know, but I do not think there is the slightest danger in the part we propose to explore." Dorrington noticed the pronoun we. "The mine must be entered from the Treherne Mine, through the long, narrow passage that connects them; it would not be possible to descend through the sloping boring half a mile away; the earth is too loose there now."

"That opening is probably blocked by earth, which would prevent the improvised door at the end from being opened," remarked Dorrington. "You can go through the Mole Run, from Treherne to Pengrave, if that isn't blocked. When do you propose to go?"

"This afternoon," replied Allinson. "We had better have somebody to accompany us, and I thought you could tell a man off for that duty."

Several thoughts chased themselves through the mind of Harcourt Dorrington, and when he replied his voice was not quite steady.

"I think I had better come with you myself, Allinson. There may be a little scrambling over heaps, and Miss Rosslyn would, I suppose, prefer to have a gentleman to assist her, with you, if assistance is required. Besides, I may take the liberty of saying that there are points which I may be able to explain also."

"Precisely!" admitted Allinson slowly. The suggestion was not pleasant, but he could say nothing. "Then it is fixed for this afternoon. At what time?"

They soon settled that and other details, and Dorrington was left alone to meditate on the chances of the afternoon visit to the old mine.

Dorrington, returning from a tour of inspection, reached the mouth of the narrow passage, termed the Mole Run, at the appointed time to a minute, and found Maggie Rosslyn and her betrothed husband waiting for him.

Digitized by Google

"You are very bold, Miss Rosslyn, to venture upon this journey," said Dorrington, with a pleasant smile. "I hope you have come prepared for getting a fair amount of earth and dirt on your clothes!"

"Oh!" laughed Maggie. "I have nothing on that will spoil!"

She was immensely relieved to find him so frank and friendly. She had been shy at meeting him, remembering what had passed, and she was thankful that he had accepted the situation.

Dorrington's heart had leapt on beholding once more the girl he loved so passionately. The clear-cut features, the graceful figure, the mass of beautiful hair arranged so elegantly formed a picture which burnt itself upon his brain. As he passed by her to take the lead, he brushed lightly against her dress, and the contact almost unnerved him. He had to make a great effort to conquer the almost irresistible impulse to take her in his arms and kiss her.

He entered the Mole Run, followed by Maggie Rosslyn, with John Allinson bringing up the rear. Although he had spoken of earth and dirt to Maggie, and of scrambling to Allinson, he did not expect any difficulty or that the path would be encumbered to such an extent as to make their clothes unclean. The last subsidence had taken place more than a quarter of a century since, and the paths had been cleared by successive exploring parties.

The Mole Run, at the point of connection with the Pengrave Mine, was very small—so narrow, in fact, that the members of the little party had to stoop very low in order to get through.

As he helped Maggie out into the wider cutting, Dorrington again felt the impulse and again conquered it; but he was not so strong this time, and he could not prevent himself from giving a slight pressure of his hands upon hers, a pressure that lasted longer than it need have done.

Maggie shivered and turned to Allinson, who had just emerged from the Mole Run.

"I really do not think this is going to be so enjoyable as I imagined!" she began. She was going to add that she would rather go back, but the look of disappointment in Allinson's face, seen by the light of the lanterns held by all three, caused her to alter her tone. "I suppose I shall get accustomed to the darkness and the uncanniness of the place in a minute or two!" she concluded.

"Of course, you will!" agreed Allinson, with a look of loving anxiety. "Now, you must begin to take note, Maggie. Here, for instance, is a specimen of a geological stratum which presents peculiar features."

Science took possession of him, and he explained this and that, never doubting that his companions were listening. Dorrington contrived to hinder Maggie's progress, so that Allinson got in front and gradually left them some yards behind.

Under pretence of assisting her, Dorrington held her hand.

"Round here is a short cutting, rather circuitous, which I remember," called out Allinson. "It's worth seeing! Come along!"

"Suppose you go first and see if all is clear!" cried Dorrington before Maggie could answer, and detaining her as she was about to hurry forward. "It might not be safe!"

Allinson disappeared in the cutting, and Harcourt held his lantern aloft in order that the light might fall full on her face.

"Who forces you to marry him?" he demanded abruptly. "You do not love him; you cannot! He does not love you as I do!"

"Mr. Dorrington!" cried Maggie, drawing herself up to her full height. "Your conduct is——"

"My conduct is that of a man who is consumed by the flame of a great love!" he said in a low voice, terrible in its intensity. "I loved you—I love you! You knew it, you know it now! Why did you spurn my love and give yourself to him? You owe me an explanation, and I demand it!"

"You have no right to demand it!" declared Maggie boldly, although she experienced a sensation of fear. "I have nothing to say, and I hope that you will not forget that you are a gentleman. Do not importune me further! Here is Mr. Allinson!"

John Allinson had re-appeared at that moment; Maggie went towards him and Dorrington drew his breath hard. It might end in a quarrel between the two men and——

The demon of jealousy and revenge was warping Harcourt Dorrington's nature, and the probable result of such a quarrel filled him for the time with exultation. Would Maggie tell her lover what had passed?

"I think we might go along this cutting, dear," said Allinson as Maggie approached him. "It runs close to the river at one point, and there is a part of it which is well worth examination from a scientific point of view. At one time there was gold about here I should say."

"If you think so, we will go," responded Maggie with feigned interest. "Let me keep close to you, that you may explain."

Dorrington breathed more freely. After all, it was well not to quarrel down there. They walked along the cutting sometimes stooping to avoid

"Who forces you to marry him?" Harcourt Dorrington asked, holding his lantern aloft.

Digitized by Google

knocking their heads, and at others stepping over heaps of fallen earth. Dorrington, tripping against a mound which he had been too deep in meditation to observe, fell against the wall; he did not hurt himself, but he noticed that there was a good deal of moisture on the surface.

"Is this safe, Allinson?" he asked almost mechanically. "Looks to me as if the river was doing its work here."

"Stay here, while I go forward!" said Allinson quickly. "I mustn't take you into danger, Maggie."

Before Maggie could object, he was hastening onward. He had proceeded only a few yards when there was a strange sound—a sound which they could compare to nothing else — and the earth tumbled about them.

"The river has broken a part of the wall," cried Dorrington, dismayed for the time by the disaster. "Heavens! The water will pour in and drown us!"

Maggie's face blanched, but she made no cry. It was an awful moment, as they felt the damp earth tumbling near and against them, felt the water as it oozed in and wondered how soon it would be before they were buried by a great fall of soil from above. Maggie's thoughts flew to Allinson; had he been overwhelmed?

They waited for the death that seemed to be threatening them, and the suspense of those terrible seconds was almost intolerable.

Then they found that the falling and crumbling had stopped, although the water was still flowing in and steadily rising.

"We are entombed," declared Dorrington. In the face of danger, and after the first shock, he was calm and collected. "The soil has fallen and has blocked the cutting on each side of us. It is lucky, so far, that it has not crushed us."

"Can we get out? I wonder if Mr. Allinson has——?" Maggie could not trust herself to say more.

"He may be entombed as we are. I do not think he has been overwhelmed by the falling earth," replied Dorrington, speaking quite candidly. "I think that the weak spot was here, and in going forward he got beyond it. He is more likely to get out than we are."

"You think, then, that we shall die here?" Maggie asked the question steadily, crushing down all the agony which the vision of such a death caused her.

Dorrington examined the prison in which they had been entombed; he looked above, at the sides, and lastly at the water that was slowly rising—it was over their ankles—and replied:

Suddenly Allinson's head appeared through a hole in the roof.

"I fear so. We are caught in a trap!"

He looked again, and saw a block of earth on which she could stand, thus keeping out of the water for a time.

"Let me lift you to this block of earth, Maggie. It will keep you dry for a while; it is two feet high. That's it!"

He had lifted her tenderly to the new position. Holding up his lantern so that he could see her face, he gazed at her with eyes that were filled with intense longing.

"I called you 'Maggie.' You are mine!" he cried. "We shall die here together. Why should you not belong to me? Tell me that you love me?"

He seized her hand with his right hand, while he held the lantern with the left. He drew nearer to her; his breath came hot and fast as he raised himself and tried to make her bend, that he might kiss her.

"You are mine! Kiss me!" he cried hoarsely. "We die together; the past is nothing. Let us live for each other during the last few minutes!"

Maggie tried to release herself, affrighted at his vehemence. He was mad—mad with the longing to possess her.

"Mr. Dorrington, I love one man, and I love him with all my soul! I may never see him again, but I shall love him till I die!"

The words were uttered with simple dignity, and they extracted a cry of mingled rage and anguish from Dorrington.

"You must love me! You shall!" he cried fiercely. "I will ask you again in a few minutes; when we are nearer death, you will come to me."

The water was rising somewhat more rapidly. He clambered up the sloping side of the cutting and secured a rough seat. The water rose to the height of the mound on which Maggie stood, and rose over her feet. She glanced about in vain for a way of escape, but she could see none. The cutting had altered in shape; one of the walls was sloping, and seemed more lofty than before. That was due to the sliding of the earth, no doubt, but it offered no escape. The services of a party of men with spades and pickaxes would be required, and it was unlikely that rescue would come before the water rose.

"Will you give yourself up to me?" asked Dorrington again.

The water was up to her waist. He was hanging on to a precarious position, but he was scraping away the soil in order to make a seat for both.

"Never!" she said decisively.

"Are you there, Maggie?" said a voice faintly.

It was that of Allinson, and Maggie uttered a cry of joy.

Digitized by Google

Where was he? She soon discovered that he was making his way through to them, scraping, tearing away the earth near the roof; it was loose just there, and the head and breast of Allinson soon showed through.

"Thank Heaven! You are both safe!" he gasped. "You must try to climb to this hole and crawl through; we can all get out through a small opening which the subsidence has produced. It is awfully risky, but we can try it."

Dorrington was between the girl and her lover; he looked from one to the other.

"Allinson," he said solemnly, "you have stolen my love from me. I will give her up to no man! She must choose between being my bride or the bride of death! Let her choose. If she and you agree that she shall marry me, she goes from here and lives. If she and you refuse, she and I remain here till death overtakes us. It is useless for you to attempt to reach her," he added, as Allinson made a movement with that object. "I can prevent that easily."

Allinson recognised the truth of this assertion and groaned. Maggie shot an appealing glance at John Allinson, but it was lost in the gloom; then she remembered that she would only be torturing him by any appeal for help and she refrained.

"Maggie," said Harcourt Dorrington passionately, "you know that I love you as madly as any man can love. I cannot live without you! I would sooner have you die with me than see you the wife of another man. You must choose between life with me and death with me; which shall it be?"

There was an awe-inspiring pause, followed by one word, spoken deliberately.

"Death!"

Dorrington was near enough to see the marble pallor and rigidity of the girl's face. There was a determination about it which struck him like a sudden chill. He turned to Allinson.

"Do you wish her to die? Then tell her to live!"

There was a great inward struggle in the next half minute, but Allinson did not have the opportunity of telling the result of that struggle. Maggie spoke.

"If I cannot live with my betrothed husband by my side, I will die. It is useless to speak, John!"

Yet it was so hard to die! Dorrington, had he not been so tormented by his own emotions, might have observed a relaxation of those set features; but he noticed nothing. He spoke pleasingly, to shake her determination.

"Maggie, would it be so hard to live with me by your side? I would watch over you, cherish you, try to realise your every wish. I would be your slave; my whole life would be devoted to making you happy. Think, try to imagine how I would strive for your happiness! Is it so very hard to love one who loves you so much?"

Maggie was touched by this appeal, although it could not alter her decision. Allinson, a prey to the greatest mental anguish, waited for her reply.

"It cannot be as you wish," she said gently. "I have made my choice. I am sorry, so sorry, that your own wishes cannot be realised, but is it fair to punish me for what I cannot help? You cannot help loving me and you consider that you are free to do so. I cannot help loving my betrothed husband better than anyone else, and surely I may claim freedom also? If you really love me as you say," she added, clasping her hands, her voice trembling with the intensity of her feelings, "then you will save me from this cruel death and let me live to be as happy as you desire me to be. I remind you of your latest words. Give me the chance of being happy!"

The water was rising and enveloping her; it reached to her breast. Harcourt Dorrington stared at her, but his thoughts were far away. Her words had awakened something within him. He wished her to be happy, and she could not be happy with him—alas! Yet, why should he deprive her of the joy of living and loving? He passed his hand across his brow, like one awakening from a disagreeable dream.

"Quick!" he cried in an altered tone. "Give me your hand. Try to climb here. Hurrah! Steady! That's it!"

Maggie felt his hands grasping hers, and heard the lantern drop into the water. It was dark, but she understood. Dorrington's hands drew her up the sloping side, slipping and nearly falling, but she gained a kind of ledge. He helped her to move along in a sitting position, and after five minutes' dangerous work she knew that Allinson had grasped her and was aiding her to scramble through the hole to comparative safety.

"Safe, my darling!" whispered Allinson, kissing her rapturously.

"Now, Dorrington, I can help you through!" he cried to the manager.

"I stay here!" replied Dorrington calmly.

"No, no!" cried Allinson and Maggie Rosslyn in a breath. And the girl added: "You must come, to share our happiness, for your own sake and ours!"

Dorrington listened to the appeal, strangely moved. If he died, it would be a sad remembrance for them, and he must not cloud their lives. But could they forgive him? He asked them this question.

"We ask you to come with us and live to be useful to us and to all your fellow men," said Maggie simply, reverently.

He climbed along and through the hole to their side. Silently they made for the opening and widened it with their hands until they could force their way to liberty.

Allinson and Maggie were married two months later, but Dorrington could not wait for that. He went off suddenly about a fortnight previously, and he is now in West Australia.

George Day.

He: "Do you believe in woman taking man's place?" She: "Yes; in a crowded railway carriage."

Effie: "Jack, papa said we must not see each other any more." Jack: "Indeed! Then I will turn the gas out."

George: "Do you embrace Miss Sweetthing when you call on her?" Tom: "Not now. Her father has established a press censorship."

Husband: "For whom are you knitting those socks?" Wife: "For a benevolent society." Husband: "Do you know, you might send them my address. Perhaps they would send me a pair."

"Mr. Jones, you said you were connected with the fine arts. Do you mean by that that you are a sculptor?" "No, sir, I don't sculp myself, but I furnish the stone to the man that does."

The dear girl had been baiting him again. "Do you believe in love at first sight?" she asked. "Of course," answered the bachelor. "Do you suppose, if a man had the gift of second sight, he would fall in love?"

Family Friend: "I congratulate you, my dear sir, on the marriage of your daughter. I see you are gradually getting all the girls off your hands." Old Goldbranch: "Off my hands—yes; but the worst of it is I have to keep all their husbands on their feet."

"I presume," said the talkative man to his meek-looking neighbour in the train, "from your manner and conversation, that you have family ties." "Yes," replied the other, "I suppose you might as well call 'em that. I buy 'em for myself, but my wife and the girls wear 'em whenever they feel like it."

Customer: "I thought I told you to paint me sitting on the verandah of my house. You've painted the verandah all right, but there's nobody on it." Artist: "Of course not. The painting represents an afternoon view. The sun would then be on the front of the house, and of course you wouldn't be sitting in the sun. The picture is true to art and to nature. You are supposed to be sitting in the back garden."

Digitized by Google

An Unsuitable Part;

Or, Bringing Him to the Point.

"My dear Daisy," expostulated her married sister, seating herself with considerable emphasis in a chair opposite Daisy, "you must bring him to the point. At present, it seems to me, he is playing with you!"

"Oh, no!" declared Daisy Braidwood energetically—that is, energetically for her, for she was a gentle, unassuming creature by disposition and almost the very opposite of her sister. "I can't think that!"

"It looks very much like it!" asserted the elder daughter of Mr. Braidwood. "He visits here and has created the impression that he has 'intentions,' as our respected aunt Mary would say, and everybody thinks that an engagement is about to be announced every day, and yet——"

"Don't you think you have put in enough 'ands'?" asked Daisy, laughing in order to hide her vexation. "People always know more about your business than you do yourself, so they expect announcements which should not be expected—or which they have no right to think about!"

Mrs. Maud Hallfax shrugged her shoulders impatiently.

"Either the man wants you or he doesn't!" she said decisively. "And if I were in your place I would soon find out and make him declare himself or go away!"

"By flirting with someone else?" inquired Daisy with pretended innocence, having a lively recollection of her sister's methods before marriage.

Maud laughed at the arch manner in which Daisy asked the question.

"That character would not suit you, my dear," she cried. "You are too quiet for flirting, and, moreover, that kind of plan is a wee bit threadbare. No, I can suggest a better idea and I advise you to adopt it, unless you wish me to set John to work by telling your backward swain, confidentially, something or other that will quicken his wooing!"

"If you do that!" began Daisy, springing up with fear. "I should die of shame!"

Maud laughed heartily as she crossed to the couch and took a seat beside her sister. She unfolded her idea in a low tone; it did not commend itself at first to Daisy, who shrank from doing anything that might by any manner of means be regarded as "forward."

"There's nothing in it, and many people would say it was no plan at all; but that's just why I propose it. It is so easy. A real plot wouldn't suit you and it isn't required, unless I misjudge the man. He is in love with you, and you have to make him say so."

When Maud was gone, Daisy retired to her own room to reflect.

"I love him, love him dearly!" she murmured. She felt the colour mounting to her cheeks and she involuntarily cast a glance at the mirror, where she saw a vision of loveliness which ought to have extracted a declaration of love from most men who appreciate the type of beauty which consists of a comely figure below the medium height—"plump" it would be colloquially termed, with a face that attracted you in spite of yourself, dark hair and equally dark eyes, with swiftly changing expression, and a healthy glow on the cheeks.

"Does he love me?" Daisy asked herself next, and the face became more thoughtful. "I really do not know; sometimes I think he does, whilst at others I fancy that he only finds in me an agreeable person with whom to chat. Perhaps Maud is right when she says that he is one of those rather absent-minded men who, although deeply in love, think that the object of their affections understands the fact as a matter of course, and that it is not necessary to show it in any special way. They forget that women like attention, that they like to receive demonstrations of affections, and if they are told about it they say: "Dear me! Of course, I love you! Didn't you know that?" That is how Maud puts it, but Maud is so terribly matter-of-fact and worldly! I would never be surprised to hear that she did the wooing!"

Another thoughtful glance in the mirror.

"It is a very simple thing to do, yet I do not care to do it! But I cannot let it go on vaguely, and if I don't take some action, Maud will carry out her threat of forcing her dear hubby to speak to Laurence, and I should never have the courage to face him after that! I'll do it!"

So the next time Mr. Laurence Alleyne called he detected a difference in the reception accorded to him by Miss Daisy Braidwood; she was not quite so diffident, she met his somewhat cool and "take-it-for-granted" attentions boldly and as if she attached no importance to them. He did not stay long on that occasion, and the slight uneasiness which had taken possession of him soon disappeared. Two evenings later he was to be at Mr. Braidwood's princely residence once more, to be a member of a small party.

He was again struck by the manner of Daisy Braidwood.

"What's the matter with the girl?" he mused, casting furtive glances at her, unconscious of the fact that Daisy was watching him. "She seems altered."

Laurence seized the first opportunity of a tête-à-tête with Daisy; she helped him to gain the opportunity and then the campaign began.

"Do you know, Mr. Alleyne," she began in the most business-like style, "I have wanted to talk with you on a subject which rather fascinates me, and to learn your views. You are a man of learning, you have studied a great deal, as you must do for your profession. What do you think of Platonic friendship?"

She looked at him coolly, with the air of a woman whom no masculine blandishments can touch, although inwardly she was quaking and telling herself that he would consider her very forward. Laurence started and gazed at her in perplexity.

"You mean friendship between man and woman without love, just as man becomes a firm friend to another man, and woman towards woman," he replied slowly. "I have never speculated on that subject, Miss Braidwood, so I am at a loss how to reply."

His tone betrayed anxiety, but Daisy was too occupied with her task to observe it. It was not so simple as she had anticipated, to talk to the man you love about Platonic friendships for the sole purpose of inducing him to declare himself.

"I half wish I hadn't begun!" she thought. Aloud she said: "I know that some great thinkers believe it to be an impossibility, but I see no reason for regarding it as impossible. Now, take two people, young people—er—like you and—and, well, me."

Daisy stopped; her throat was dry and she was getting into difficulties at the very start. She recognised that her break-off had rather spoilt the look of the thing, so she bravely continued the argument, although she felt the colour rising.

"Now, we two, we like each other's society and enjoy a chat together, and we have certain favourite subjects. We can talk and discuss, without—can't we?"

"Y-e-s, I suppose we can," assented Laurence dubiously. "Really, Miss Braidwood, I haven't studied the subject at all, so I expect I cut a sorry figure in this argument and I fear that you will think me very dense!"

"Oh, dear!" thought Daisy in despair. "I don't think it will work. He doesn't take the discussion in the way I want him to do, and in the end he will go away and think me just horrid; and if he really loves me, he won't say so!"

"I am waiting to hear more about it, Miss Braidwood."

"Oh, yes!" gasped Daisy, recalled from her not too pleasant reflections by this remark. "Let me see, I was saying—yes! We could talk and laugh and—generally be excellent friends and be helpful to one another, and all that, without falling in love, without expecting that we should ever be nearer relations. Take yourself, for instance." Daisy had to pause here and make a great effort. "You have already shown that friendship is possible without love, for you have never attempted to show affection. I don't suppose I have made myself very clear, Mr. Alleyne, because I am not a debater, but that's what I mean."

Daisy was very hot when she had finished this rather incoherent speech; she looked hot, too, although she pretended to be very cool, and she looked very pretty in her confusion. Alleyne gazed at her, his fingers twitching nervously; then he grew calm and spoke steadily.

"Oh, it is quite clear! It is possible for you to be the best of friends to me without being so foolish as to fall in love with me. Most people would say that we were on a very awkward subject, and one that might well lead to the destruction of the theory of Platonic friendship by our doing the very thing which, as you say, we are not likely to do. But you are too level-headed to do anything so absurd!"

If Daisy had been more composed, she would have understood that he was non-committal and had, in fact, said nothing, but she was too much worri d.

"It's a failure!" she murmured. "I wish I hadn't tried it. It must be that he doesn't love me. Well, it is better that I should know it!"

The thought that Laurence Alleyne did not love her, that her affection had gone out to him unbidden, filled her with dismay. A lump came into her throat, her heart beat painfully fast, she felt faint and, notwithstanding all her efforts, her eyes became moist with tears. She arose and turned towards an open window.

"I must go into the garden to get a little air," she said in a low voice. "It is too warm here!"

She passed hurriedly through the window, leaving him in the room, and sped towards a secluded spot in order to relieve her feelings with a good cry. She was cross with Maud, with herself, with Laurence; she sat down on a seat in the darkness and buried her face in her pocket handkerchief.

A hand touched her shoulder, causing her to start up with a cry of surprise and dismay.

"Does the idea of Platonic friendship make you cry, Daisy?" asked a voice which she recognised as Laurence's. "Does the idea of pleasant companionship, without love, seem less attractive now? Let me tell you my opinion, dearest, before you reply; I have formed it since the beginning of the argument. I think it is impossible in one instance, at least! Now tell me what you think, truly!"

He gently pushed aside the handkerchief, took her in his arms and pressed her close to his heart, the better to hear her reply. That answer evidently satisfied him that she was not wholly pledged to the theory of Platonic friendship, for he kissed her again and again, and she made no objection.

"I thought you were in earnest at first, and it gave me a shock!" admitted Laurence. "I saw how easily a man may lose a woman, and deservedly lose her, by becoming so wrapped up in his studies or business as to forget that attention and acts indicative of his love for her are so much waste of time. It is neglect, nothing else, and a man has no right to neglect his loved one. He thrusts his love too far down, and not until the object of his love is lost to him, does he realise what he has done. I am luckier than some men, for I discovered my error before it was too late, thanks to your views on——"

"Please don't!" she exclaimed, ashamed. "I wonder how I could have been led away by Maud to such an extent. I feel so horribly mean!"

"I guessed, before you were half-way through, that your sister had been egging you on. It was not your disposition to act in that manner, and Mrs. Halifax is more—up-to-date! Still, I am thankful to her for causing the little comedy to be played. Supposing that I had not lost you altogether by my neglect, I might have brought much unhappiness upon you and myself after marriage by that neglect. Now it will be different, thanks to——"

She looked at him reproachfully; he could see the expression on her face in the light that streamed through the window which they were now approaching.

"Thanks to Maud!" he said with a laugh, as he led her from the stream of light and kissed her passionately. "We will show our gratitude to her by giving her a volume of essays on the subject, written by someone who knows nothing about it."

Ada Exford.

The Most Successful Novel of Modern Times.

EVERYBODY SHOULD READ

DAVID HARUM

DAVID HARUM

By Edward Noyes Westcott.

The Sales of this book in the expensive edition have exceeded the phenomenal number of 700,000.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN says:

"I have read 'David Harum' with great appreciation."

NOW READY. CHEAP EDITION.

Price 6d. Post Free 8d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "David Harum," for which I inclose Eightpence.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

Why They Were There.

"WHAT a lot of those dear, charming hospital nurses one sees about just now." "Yes, football season's on again."

Before or After Taking?

HE: "Here is a picture of my wife." She: "Before or after taking?" He: "What do you mean? Before or after taking what?" She: "You."

He Earned the Right.

HE: "Tell me, confidentially, how much did that bonnet cost you?" She: "George, there is but one way in which you can obtain the right to inspect my millinery bills." He popped.

By Moonlight.

SHE (waxing sentimental): "What a beautiful thing is the soul, Algernon." He (unromantic): "By Jove, yes; and if we're having soles for supper let us hurry in to them, for it's chilly out here in the blessed moonlight."

Broken off the Habit.

MISS LAFIN: "What has become of our friend, Mr. Clay?" Mr. Rand: "He has taken employment in a powder mill for six months." Miss Lafin: "How strange!" Mr. Rand: "Not at all. He wished to break himself of smoking."

Always Kissing.

SHE (sentimentally): "In the spring all nature smiles, the birds woo, lovers kiss; but ah! now comes winter." He: "I know more things that kiss all the year round, and never change." She: "Impossible! What?" He (calmly): "Billiard balls."

Wanted a Different Light.

MISS COYGIRL: "Jack Softleigh told me last night that I ought to accept him because he was willing to prove his love for me." Her Friend: "What did you say?" Miss Coygirl: "I said I couldn't see it in that light." Her Friend: "Then what did he say?" Miss Coygirl: "Nothing. He just turned the light out."

The Worm Didn't Murmur.

TENDER-HEARTED DAMSEL: "I think fishing is cruel. The idea of putting a worm to the torture of having a hook run through him is awful to me." Witherby: "It doesn't hurt the worm." Tender-hearted damsel: "How do you know?" Witherby: "How? Why I've put worms on hooks dozens of times and never heard a murmur from them."

Easy to Order More.

"I'M almost afraid, Miss Squeers," said the impecunious young man who had taken her to an after-theatre supper for which he had been hoarding money for months, "I'm almost afraid to ask you to eat such a meal as this just before going to bed." "Oh, never mind," replied Miss Squeers, smiling pleasantly. "If it doesn't answer we can easily order some more, you know."

The Rejected's Revenge.

MISS ELDERLY: "I am sorry to say no. I should think you could read my refusal in my face." The Rejected: "I am not very expert at reading between the lines."

The Flask Would Do.

SHORT-SIGHTED SHE: "There, we've trudged up here on purpose to admire the beauties of Nature. I've forgotten to bring a glass with me." Unpoetical He: "Never mind, we can drink out of the flask."

Getting Her Promise.

"YOU say she refused you a number of times?" "Yes." "Well, how did you finally get her consent?" "I have kept a diary for a number of years, and I promised to let her read it after we were married."

A Yacht Would Have Been Different.

HE: "Won't you be my wife? I have paddled my own canoe for years, and feel sure that I can support you." She: "Canoe! Nonsense! If you had said you had sailed your own yacht for years I might have considered your proposal."

A Last Wish.

HE (trembling): "I have one last wi—wish to ask you be—before we part in an—anger for ever." She (sobbing): "Wha—what is it, Geo—George?" He: "Wi—will you—meet me next Th—Thursday as u—usual?" She: "I wi—will, George!"

One Walk they Wouldn't Take.

MARIE: "Women are fast leaving their own walks of life, aren't they?" Billson: "Yes; but there is one walk which they will always leave to man." Marie: "What's that?" Billson: "Up and down the bedroom half the night with a restless baby."

Too Soon to Begin.

"MR. STAYLATE," she murmured, "do you remember when, in 1902, we sat up to see the new year in?" "Yes," he replied rapturously. "Well—don't you—don't you——" "Don't I what?" "Don't you think we are beginning rather early this year?"

She'd Had Experience.

"I KNOW what I'll do," said the girl whose bashful lover would not propose. "I'll go out as a trained nurse." "But that is a profession. You know nothing about it," he rejoined. "Haven't I had six months' experience sitting up at nights with you?"

Appealed to a Higher Court.

"WASN'T that young Mr. Tiff who left the house as I came in?" asked the judge of his eldest daughter. "Yes, papa." "Did I not issue an injunction against his coming here any more?" "Yes, papa; but he appealed to a higher court, and mamma said 'yes.'"

Attractive Anyhow.

"YOU say," murmured Genevieve sweetly, "that you were led to love me when you first saw me in rational dress." "Yes," said Algernon, as he pressed her to his bosom. "I knew that if you didn't look very much of a fright in knickerbockers you must be very beautiful!"

Oscillating or Osculating.

"MABEL," said the girl's mother, "that young man writes very nice letters. But I wish that his chirography were a little less obscure." "Why, mamma?" "I can't quite make out whether he says he looks forward to the time when he will be oscillating in a hammock or osculating in a hammock.'"

Coat Had to Last.

"MY darling," she murmured, "you know that I love you. Is this not enough for the present? Be assured that I will fix a day for our wedding as soon as it is possible." "That's right, Miranda," doggedly replied the young man, "but I hope you will remember that I've got to be married in this black coat, and it won't last for ever."

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

The Under-Secretary's Instructions.

"A SUDDEN frenzy seized me at those words, and I endeavoured to smash the heads of my two gaolers together by throwing them off their balance outwards, and then rapidly contracting my arms. Thereupon I made another discovery. A cord lying loosely round my neck was suddenly tightened, and I was thrown back choking upon the bed as a fourth man, of whose presence I was unconscious, was stationed behind me and held the noose in his hand.

"It was some time before I recovered my breath or my speech.

"At last I was allowed to rise again, and Dubois said with a quiet smile which was intensely irritating:

"'By this time, Mr. Talbot, you should have realised that you have not fallen into the hands of children. We do not wish to do you a mischief. Indeed, it would not suit our purpose. It is far from our desire to quarrel with the British Government or to take the life of one of its rising young diplomatists. This dispute in which you are unfortunately involved is between a certain section of the Sultan's subjects and that potentate himself. But really you must recognise the absolute helplessness of your position. You have just received a stern reminder. Let it be the last, for if you give us any more trouble we may end a difficult situation by effectively cutting your throat. Such an operation would be distasteful to us and most distressing for you. So please do not compel us to perform it.'

"I glared at him viciously. Speak I could not, but he paid no further attention to me, and his make-up was now pronounced to be perfect by his critical companion.

"'You make a very handsome Englishman, mon vieux,' she cried, coquettishly setting her head on one side and glancing first at him and then at me."

"The cat," cried Edith. "She evidently thought you good-looking, Jack."

Talbot blushed and laughed at the involuntary slip.

"I am not responsible for her opinions," he said. "I am simply telling you what happened.

"Dubois left the room," he continued, "and returned in a few moments, dressed in an English tweed suit, with a large ulster and a deer-stalker cap. Upon my honour he was so like me that, notwithstanding my rage, I was compelled to smile at him. He caught my transient mood for an instant.

"'Ah,' he cried in French, 'that is better. The surgical operation is beginning to take effect. You see the joke?'

"'It is a somewhat bitter species of humour,' I replied. 'Perhaps in the future it may have a sequel.'

"'Life is made up of sequels,' was the airy answer. 'Events generally turn out to be so completely opposite to that which I anticipated that I no longer give them a thought. I live only for the present, and at this moment I am victorious But now, Mr. Talbot, I purpose taking a little trip to the Continent on your account. I hope, therefore, for your sake, that the Channel will be smooth.'

"With a mock bow of much politeness he took his leave, carrying with him the overcoat containing the case of diamonds. I have never seen him since. Last night in the Foreign Office I met Captain Gaultier, who told me of the incident on the steamer. I readily forgave him for the mistake he had made with reference to my appearance, but it was too bad that he should imagine I would bolt to Paris with a lady of theatrical appearance in broad daylight."

"Yes," cried Fairholme, "if it had been the night steamer——"

"Bobby!" exclaimed Edith.

"Oh, I meant, of course," stammered Fairholme, "that by night Gaultier might have been more easily mistaken."

"Well, and what happened at the Foreign Office?"

Brett's question recalled the younger people to the gravity of the conclave.

"First of all," said Talbot, "Fairholme drove me straight home, where it was necessary to give some slight preliminary explanation before I made a too sudden appearance, so I remained in the cab outside whilst Fairholme went in and found Edith."

"Ah!" said Brett, still surveying the ceiling; but there was so much meaning in his voice that this time it was the turn of the young couple to blush.

"We did not take long to explain matters," continued Talbot. "I sent off messengers post-haste to the Under-Secretary and others suggesting that if possible we should meet at the Foreign Office. Within an hour my chiefs were good enough to fall in with my views, and therefore I had an opportunity to tell them my story exactly as I have repeated it to you. The result is that I carry with me a letter from the Under-Secretary in which he explains his views. I am already acquainted with his reasons, but I have no doubt that he puts them before you quite clearly."

He handed a letter to Brett. Its contents were laconic, but unmistakable:

"The inquiry upon which you are engaged," it read, "must be conducted with the utmost secrecy and discretion. The gravest political importance is attached to its outcome. No trouble or expense should be allowed to interfere with the restoration of the diamonds to their rightful owner. The British Government will regard this as a most valuable service to the State, and Mr. Talbot is commissioned to place at your disposal the full resources of the Foreign Office. You will also find that his Majesty's Ministers throughout Europe have been advised to give you every assistance, whilst there is little reason to doubt that the various European Governments will be ready to offer you all possible support. The first consideration is the restoration of the gems intact to the Sultan; the second, absolute secrecy as to the whole of the circumstances."

Digitized by Google

"Whew!" whistled Brett. "Read between the lines this communication shows the serious nature of our quest. If those diamonds are not recovered, a revolution in Turkey is the almost certain outcome, and Heaven alone knows what that means to the European Powers most concerned."

"If you succeed," said Sir Hubert Fitzjames, "the Government will make you a baronet."

"If you succeed," growled Talbot, "I will get even with that Frenchman."

"And when you succeed," said Fairholme, in a matter-of-fact tone, that indicated the wild improbability of any other outcome, "Edith and I will get married!"

"All Goes Well."

Brett now deemed it advisable to take the commissary of police fully into his confidence. When that worthy personage had recovered from the surprise evoked by the barrister's communication, he promptly suggested that every personage in Paris connected even remotely with the mystery—Grosjean, the Turks, the waiter at the Café Noir, and even the little thief "Le Ver"—should be arrested and subjected to a cross-examination.

But Brett would not hear of this proceeding.

He quite firmly reminded the commissary that the wishes of the British Government must be respected in this matter, and the proposed wholesale arrests of persons, some of whom were in no way cognisant of the crime, would assuredly lead to publicity and the appearance of sensational statements in the Press.

"But, monsieur," cried the excitable Frenchman, "something must be done. Even you, I presume, intend to lay hands upon the principal men. While they are wandering about the country, each hour makes it easier for them to secrete the diamonds so effectually that no matter what may be the result the Sultan will never recover his property."

"Calm yourself," I beg, said the barrister, with difficulty compelling himself to reason with this excitable policeman. "You speak as though we had in our hands every jot of evidence to secure the conviction of Dubois and his associates before a judge."

"But is it not so?" screamed the other.

"No; it is very far from being so. Let us look at the facts. In the first place the Turks will not speak. They are political fanatics. The moment a policeman lays hands upon them they become dumb. Torture would bring nothing from them but lies. Then we have the two people who acted as Mr. Talbot's gaolers. What charge can we prefer against them? Merely one of illegal detention, whilst they would probably defend themselves by saying that Talbot was represented to them as a lunatic whose restraint was necessary for family reasons. Then we come to Dubois himself and the fair Mlle. Beaucaire. In the first place, you may be certain that they have provided a strong alibi to prove that they were in Paris on the days when we were certain they were in London. Who can identify them?

The lady we must rule out of court at once. The only persons who saw her were Mr. Talbot, and Captain Gaultier, the latter of whom has already placed on record the statement that he would not recognise her again. Talbot's evidence is stronger, but I would not like to hear him subjected to the merciless cross-examination of an able counsel. As for Dubois, there are two inspectors of police and a dozen intelligent Metropolitan constables who would be forced to swear that he was not the man who entered Albert Gate on the night of the murder in company with the other Turks. I tell you candidly, monsieur, that in my opinion the case would not only break down very badly, but Mr. Talbot would leave the court under grave suspicion, whilst I would be regarded by the public as a meddlesome idiot."

"Then what are we to do?" said the commissary, piteously throwing out his hands and shrugging his shoulders with the eloquent French gesture that betokens utter bewilderment.

"Difficult though it may be, we must first accomplish the main part of our work. In other words, we must secure the diamonds before we collar the murderers."

The Frenchman was silent for a moment. At last he said submissively:

"In what way can I help?"

"By procuring for me from the chief of your department an authorisation to call in the aid of the police when and where I may desire their assistance. This, of course, will render necessary on his part some inquiry before I am intrusted with such an important document. The British Embassy in Paris and your own Foreign Office will quickly supply you with the reasons why this power should be given to me."

"But what of the house in the Rue Bonbonnerie?"

"You anticipated my next request. Whilst you are looking to that letter you must place at my disposal two of your most trusty agents. In their company Lord Fairholme and I purpose visiting the house to-night."

They were conversing in the commissary's office at a late hour after Brett had quitted his friends in the Grand Hotel.

Within a few minutes the two Englishmen and their French companions were standing outside No. 41, Rue Bonbonnerie, and they found that Monsieur de Lisle kept a small shop, whose only significant feature was a placard announcing that letters might be addressed there.

"Oh," said Brett, when he noticed this legend, "this is simple. We need not waste much time here."

The four men walked inside, crowding the narrow space before a diminutive counter. The proprietor was supping in style, as they could perceive through the glass top of the door which communicated with the sitting-room at the back. His feast consisted of a tankard of thin wine, half a loaf of black bread, and two herrings.

The man seemed vastly surprised at the sudden incursion of customers. He came out looking puzzled and alarmed.

"Have you any letters here for Monsieur Jean Beaujolais?" said Brett.

"No, monsieur."

"Have you received any letters for a person of that name?"

"No, monsieur."

"I suppose you never heard the name of Jean Beaujolais before in your life?"

"I think not, monsieur."

"Then," exclaimed Brett, turning quietly away, "I fear you must be arrested. These two gentlemen"—and he nodded towards the detectives—"will take you to the prefecture, where perhaps your memory may improve."

The man blanched visibly. His teeth chattered, and his hands shook as if with an ague, whilst he nervously arranged some small objects on the counter.

"I cry your pardon, monsieur," he stammered, "but you will understand that I receive letters at my shop for a small fee, and I cannot remember the names of all my customers. I will search with pleasure among those now in my possession to see if there are any for M. Beaujolais."

"You are simply incriminating yourself," said Brett sternly. "If your excuse were a genuine one you would first have looked among your letters before answering so glibly that the name of Beaujolais was unfamiliar."

"I beg of you to listen," cried the dismayed shopkeeper. "I had no idea you were from the prefecture, otherwise I would have answered you in the first instance. There have been letters here for Monsieur Beaujolais. They came from

"One of the finest stories ever written," is the verdict of those who have read advance proofs of our new serial by R. Norman Silver.

Digitized by Google

London. He called for them three or perhaps four times. The last letter arrived yesterday morning. It is here now. I have not seen Monsieur Beaujolais since the previous evening."

He took from a drawer a packet of letters tied together with string, and the handwriting betrayed the contents of most of them. They evidently dealt with that species of the tender passion which find its outlet in the agony column or in fictitious addresses.

One of the detectives did not trust to Monsieur de Lisle's examination, but seized the bundle and went through its contents carefully, but this time Monsieur de Lisle was speaking the truth.

There was but one letter addressed to Beaujolais, and this was the only one which bore a foreign postmark. Brett tore it open. It contained a single sheet of note-paper, without a date or address, or any words save these, scrawled across the centre—

"Tout va bien." (All goes well.)

He placed the document and its envelope in his pocket-book, and then fixed his keen eyes upon the shopkeeper's pallid face.

"What sort of person is Monsieur Beaujolais?"

The man was still so nervous that he could hardly speak.

"I am not good at descriptions," he began.

So Brett helped.

"Was he a Frenchman, about my height, elegant in appearance, well built, with long, thin hands, and straight, tapering fingers, with very fair skin and high colour, dark hair and large eyes set deeply beneath well-marked eyebrows?"

"That is he to the life," cried the shopkeeper. "Monsieur must know him well. I recall him now exactly, but I could not for a hundred francs have described him so accurately."

"How long have you known him?" broke in Brett.

"Let me think," mused the man, who had now somewhat recovered from his alarm. "He came here one day last week—I think it was Thursday, because that day my daughter Marie—no matter what Marie did, I remember the date quite well now. He came in and asked me if I did not receive letters for a fee. I said 'Yes,' and told him that I charged ten centimes per letter. He gave me his name, and thereafter called regularly to obtain the inclosure from London. He always handed me half a franc and would never take any change."

"Was he alone?"

"Invariably, monsieur."

"Thank you. You will not be arrested to-night. I think you have told the truth."

On the Cannebière.

The shopkeeper's protestations that he had given every assistance in his power followed them into the street.

Brett dismissed the two detectives and returned to the hotel, where he and Fairholme found Edith and her brother sitting up for them. When Talbot heard the contents of the letter he remarked: "I suppose that 'All goes well,' means that I am still a prisoner?"

"Undoubtedly," said the barrister. "The letter was posted in the Haymarket. It came from your French host. I wonder what he will write now? By the way, where is he? Did you lose sight of the couple after your escape?"

"I did," laughed Talbot. "But Inspector Winter did not. By some mysterious means he learnt all about Fairholme's action in smashing in the door, whilst I was at the Foreign Office that night, and he promptly arrested both the man and the woman."

"Winter is a perfect terror," said Brett. "He dreams of handcuffs and penal servitude. I hope this couple will not be brought to trial though, or at any rate, that your name will not be mixed up in it."

"Oh, no. As soon as I heard the Under-Secretary's wishes, I promptly communicated with Scotland Yard. The Frenchman and his wife will be remanded on a mysterious charge of felony, and held in durance vile until their testimony is wanted, should we ever capture Dubois."

At Brett's request, detectives were hunting through Paris all that night and next day for a sign of Hussein ul Mulk and

BOVRIL

REPELS

INFLUENZA

Another
Bovril War Picture.

Owing to the great success of their celebrated war picture, "The Relief of Ladysmith," BOVRIL LIMITED have arranged to present another splendid gravure—measuring 28 in. by 18½ in., and printed on fine plate paper 40 in. by 30 in. It is entitled, "Lord Kitchener's Home-Coming," and is from a painting by William Hatherell, R.I.

A coupon, and a leaflet giving full particulars, will be found wrapped with each bottle (1 oz. to 16 oz.) of BOVRIL.

Digitized by Google

his Turkish friends. But these gentlemen had vanished as completely as if the earth had swallowed them up.

This was a strange thing. Although Paris is a cosmopolitan city, a party of Turks, only one of whom could speak French, should be discovered with tolerable rapidity in view of the fact that the French police maintain such a watch upon the inhabitants.

It was not until Brett and his four companions quitted the train at Marseilles late at night and the barrister received a telegram from the commissary announcing that the search made by the police had yielded no results, that he suddenly recalled the existence of a doorless and windowless room in the Café Noir.

Curiously enough he had omitted to make any mention of this strange apartment in his recital to the official. He would not trust to the discretion of the Telegraph Department, so on reaching the Hotel du Louvre et de la Paix he succeeded with some difficulty in ringing up the commissary on the long-distance telephone.

Having acquainted the police officer with the exact position of the hidden apartment, he ended by saying :

"Continue inquiries throughout Paris during the whole of to-morrow. Do not visit the Cabaret Noir for the purpose of police inspection until a late hour—long after midnight—when the café is empty and the boulevard comparatively deserted. It is only a mere guess on my part. The Turks may not be there. If they are, they should be set at liberty and not questioned. Tell them they owe their escape to me. If you do not find them you may make other discoveries of general interest to the police. But, above all things, I do not wish you to interfere with Grosjean or his house until the next twenty-fours hours have elapsed."

The commissary assured him that his desires would be respected, and soon afterwards Brett went upstairs with the full determination to secure a long and uninterrupted night's sleep, of which he stood much in need.

He had reached the sitting room reserved for the use of the party when Talbot and Lord Fairholme burst in upon him excitedly.

"We have seen her!" gasped the earl.

"Seen whom?" demanded the barrister.

"Mademoiselle Beaucaire," cried Talbot; "the woman who accompanied Dubois in his flight from London. I recognised her instantly. I could pick her out among a million as the same person who so coolly made up Dubois to represent me, whilst I was lying tied on the bed in that flat."

In their eagerness the two men had forgotten to close the door. Brett ran to it, and looked out into the passage to learn if their words had perchance been overheard. No one was in sight. He closed the door behind him when he re-entered the room, and said quietly :

"How did you happen to meet her?"

"Whilst you were wrestling with the telephone," said Fairholme, "Edith and Jack and I went to the door of the hotel to have a look at the people passing in the Cannebière. None of us have ever been in Marseilles before, you know. We were gazing at the crowd, when suddenly Jack gripped my arm and said : 'There she is! Look at the woman, quick!' He pointed to a tall, well-dressed female, wrapped up in a fur cloak, and wearing a large feather hat. Luckily her veil was up, and the electric light fell fair upon her as she passed. She was undoubtedly La Belle Chasseuse, and I bet you anything you like she had just come away from the music-hall where she is performing."

"Did she see you?" demanded Brett excitedly.

"Not a bit; she was too busy gazing at the tram-cars that were passing. She was evidently on the look-out for some particular line."

"What happened next?" demanded the barrister. "Where is Miss Talbot?"

"Edith has gone after her," said Fairholme.

"What!" cried Brett, more startled than he cared to own.

"Yes," broke in Talbot eagerly. "She heard my words and instantly decided to follow her. She said that the woman knew both of us, and might easily detect us, but she, Edith, was unknown to her, and would never be suspected. She simply forced us to come and tell you, and then darted off like a greyhound before we could stop her."

Brett forced himself to say calmly—

"I always knew that Miss Talbot had brains, but still I wish she had not taken this risk. Nevertheless, your chance discovery and her prompt action may be invaluable to us."

"But what must we do?" exclaimed the impetuous Fairholme. "We cannot allow Edith to go wandering off around Marseilles by herself at this hour of the night. I have always heard that this town is a perfectly awful place. What a fool I was not to follow her at once."

"Miss Talbot has acted quite rightly," said Brett decisively. "We must simply remain here until she returns. There is not the slightest ground for alarm. A woman who could act with such ready judgment is well able to take care of herself. Unless I am much mistaken, we shall see her within the hour."

It was well for the peace of mind of the younger men that Sir Hubert Fitzjames had gone to his room soon after the party reached the hotel. Had the irascible baronet known of his niece's mission, no power on earth could have restrained him from setting every policeman in Marseilles on her track forthwith.

And so they kept their vigil, striving to talk unconcernedly, but watching the clock with feverish impatience until Edith should appear.

"Marie."

Marseilles is one of the most picturesque cities in the world. Its streets cluster round an ancient harbour, famous before history was writ, or climb the sides of the steep hills that surround a land-locked bay.

In the suburbs Marseilles is modern enough, but the chief thoroughfare, known to all who read, the famous and ever busy Cannebière, plunges rapidly downhill until it empties itself on the crowded quays that surround the old port.

With the newer Marseilles of the Joliette—well found in wharfs and warehouses, steam cranes and railway lines—the town beloved of the Phœnicians has no concern. There is a touch of modern ugliness in the tiny maritime refuge which is barely half the size of the Serpentine. Lofty, old-fashioned, half-ruined houses throng close to its rugged quays.

At night this quarter of the turbulent city wears an air of intense mystery. The side streets are narrow and tortuous. Dark courts and alleys twist in every conceivable direction, whilst the brightness of the many wine shops that face each other across the tideless harbour only serves to enhance the squalid gloom that forms the most marked characteristic of the buildings clustered behind them.

Edith Talbot, intent upon the pursuit of a woman so dramatically bound up with the mystery affecting her brother, paid heed to no consideration save the paramount one, that the hurrying figure in front must be kept in sight.

Contrary to the opinions expressed by the two men, Mlle. Beaucaire did not board a passing tramcar. To Edith's eyes she seemed to be eagerly watching for some person who might pass in one of the small open carriages which in Marseilles take the place of the London hansom. Even as she rapidly walked down the crowded street mademoiselle closely scrutinised each vehicle that overtook her, and once, at a busy crossing, she deliberately stopped so as to render the task easier. Edith, of course, slackened her pace, and it was not until that moment that she became aware how incongruous was her appearance at such an hour in such a thoroughfare.

Much taller than the average Frenchwoman, neatly dressed in an English tailor-made costume, with her smart straw hat and well-gloved hands, Miss Talbot naturally attracted the curious gaze of the passers by.

Instantly it occurred to her that some disguise was absolutely necessary if she would not court attention which might be fatal to her enterprise. It chanced that where she stood for a moment a fruit-seller occupied a tiny shop, squeezed tightly between a church and a restaurant. The interior was dark enough, for a couple of flaring naphtha lamps were so disposed as to cast their flickering brilliancy over the baskets of fruit and vegetables, displayed in the window or crowded together on the pavement.

Digitized by Google

The woman inside had a kindly and contented face, cherry ripe in cheek and lips, and from a pair of deep-set dark eyes she looked out quizzically upon the hurrying crowd.

Assuring herself with one fleeting glance that La Belle Chasseuse still remained motionless and intent at the crossing, Edith darted inside the shop. She produced a sovereign.

"I have not much French money," she said hurriedly, "but this is worth twenty-five francs. Can you let me have a large dark shawl? I do not care whether or not it is old or worn. It is necessary that I should remain out for some few minutes longer, and I do not wish to court observation."

Even as she spoke she removed her straw hat and eagerly tore off her gloves. The Frenchwoman saw that one of her own sex, English, and consequently mad, desired to screen her appearance from too inquisitive eyes.

It was sufficient for her that there should be a spice of romance in the request. With one hand she closed upon the sovereign; with the other she dived into a recess beneath the counter and produced the very article Edith wanted.

"But certainly, mademoiselle," she cried. "See. It will cover you to the waist."

Edith advanced another pace into the darkest corner of the shop, quickly arranged the shawl over her head and shoulders and then, hastily murmuring her thanks, rushed forth into the street again, leaving her hat and gloves behind her in her haste.

The fruit-seller was far too wise a woman to call after the other and apprise her of her loss.

"It must be serious, this adventure," she mused. "And yet the novelists say that the English are so cold! For me, now, I think that women are very much alike all over the world."

And with this bit of Provençal philosophy she picked up the discarded articles and discovered, to her joy, that they must be worth at least ten francs.

"Thirty-five francs for an old shawl is a good night's work," she murmured. "Who could dream of such fortune at this hour? To-morrow I will buy a candle and place it in front of the statue of Notre Dame de le Garde."

Meanwhile Edith was just in time to see Mlle. Beaucaire either abandon her search or alter her method in some way, for the lady in question once more resumed her progress towards the old harbour, in whose placid bosom could now be seen the reflections of numberless lights from the small promontory beyond, crowned with the Fort St. Nicholas and the Château du Pharo.

Looking neither right nor left, but hastening onwards with rapid strides, mademoiselle crossed the rough pavement of the Quai de la Fraternité, bearing away diagonally towards the left.

But if the Frenchwoman was a good walker, Edith Talbot was a better one, and now that she no longer feared notice—for she draped the large shawl as elegantly about her shoulders as any woman in Marseilles—she decided to adopt a little strategy. Instead of keeping directly behind mademoiselle she broke into a run under the shadow of the houses. By thus making up ground she approached the narrow street towards which the Frenchwoman was heading almost simultaneously with her quarry, but apparently from an opposite direction. The aspect of the thoroughfare through which the two women now sped was forbidding in the extreme. The houses were many storeys in height, of disreputable appearance and so close together on both sides that were other conditions equal an active man might easily spring from one room into another across the street.

The walls appeared to be honeycombed with doors and windows, while an indescribable number of shutters, balconies, projecting poles and clothes-lines created such a medley in the darkness, which was only made visible by a solitary bracket lamp, that Edith felt some anxiety as to whether or not she would be able to recognise the house into which Grew Old in a Trance.

In America, quite recently, a girl, aged nineteen, fell into a trance, which lasted twenty days. During that time her hair turned grey, wrinkles formed about her features, and she gradually assumed the appearance of an old woman. On coming out of her stupor she only lived for a few days. Another singular case of a woman growing prematurely old, but which, fortunately, ended in a happier way, was that of Miss May Musson, of Breach Road, Marlpool, her peculiar condition having been brought about by indigestion and anæmia, of which, luckily, Chas. Forde's bile beans completely cured her. "I went to look more like an old woman at the end of my days than a woman of twenty-two years," she said, "for indigestion and anæmia completely changed my appearance. I became so ill that I could not eat a morsel of food, and ofttimes I was so weak that I could not walk even a short distance without feeling exhausted. No matter what king of food I took I could never enjoy it, because pain invariably attacked me after eating. I had a severe pain in my left side, which hurt me whenever I moved, and I was told that I had an enlarged liver. Whatever it was which occasioned the pain I suffered, it seemed as if nothing I took would do me any good. Anæmia set in, and I was almost in despair when I saw Chas. Forde's bile beans advertised in the newspapers, and made up my mind to give them a trial. When I had finished the first box I felt better and got more. Each box of beans made me better and better, until the neighbours began to notice how vastly I was improving. First one and then another would say, 'You do look different.' Whatever I look, I know I feel different. Never in all my life have I felt so well as I do at the present moment. I am sure I owe my life to Chas. Forde's bile beans. I shall do all I can to let others know of them, and I have already recommended them to several friends." It is by effecting such cures as the above that Chas. Forde's bile beans for biliousness have made their world-wide reputation. They are without doubt superior to all other known medicines for indigestion, anæmia, dizziness, pains in the side, chest and back, palpitation, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, piles, headache, debility, nervousness, and female ailments. All chemists stock them, or you may obtain post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., by sending prices—one and three halfpence or two and nine.

GIVEN AWAY
WITH THIS WEEK'S HOME NOTES
(No 474),
A PAPER PATTERN
of this
CHEMISE
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

mademoiselle disappeared, should her destination be close at hand.

There were, of course, many other people in the street besides themselves, else Edith's self-imposed piece of espionage would have been rendered difficult, if not impossible.

Men, women, and children lounged about the doorways and kept up a constant cackle of conversation in a mysterious patois which Miss Talbot, though an excellent French scholar, could make nothing of. The presence of these people naturally shielded her from the direct observation of La Belle Chasseuse, but, nevertheless, threatened a slight danger should it be necessary for her to loiter on the way, for she well understood that in such a locality each person was known to the other, and the advent of a stranger could not fail to arouse curiosity.

Soon after passing beneath the lamp mademoiselle vanished into a doorway.

Edith perceived to her joy that at this point there was no group of loungers. Indeed, for a few yards the street was empty.

Keeping her eyes sedulously fixed upon the exact spot where the Frenchwoman disappeared, she reached the door, and, after a moment's hesitation, stepped lightly into the interior darkness.

The narrow entrance was at once lessened to half its width by a staircase. She listened intently, and could hear the other woman ascending the second flight of stairs.

At the next landing mademoiselle paused and knocked three times.

Presumably in reply to a question within, she murmured something which Edith could not catch and was at once admitted. The shooting of a rusty bolt supplied further evidence that the door was locked behind her.

M.R. 107.

Edith's next task was to identify the house. She stepped out into the street again and crossed to the opposite pavement. She looked up to the second storey, but, owing to the short distance—barely fourteen feet—that separated her from the house, she could discern nothing, save that the windows on that floor were closely shuttered.

She rapidly noted that the door was the third removed from the lamp. Whilst wondering what to do next, a couple of girls approached her. They were young and of course inquisitive. Without any dissimulation, they stood right in front of her and scrutinised her face, wondering, no doubt, who this tall and graceful new-comer could be.

"What is your name?" said one. "Where do you live? Have you just come here? Are you staying with old Mother Peter?"

With difficulty Edith caught the drift of their questions. But she answered smilingly:

"No, I do not live here, and I do not know Mother Peter. But I want you to tell me who lives in the house opposite?"

Her Parisian French greatly surprised the two girls, who giggled at each other, and one of them cried:

"Oh, here's a lark."

But they scented an intrigue, and were quite ready to give all the information in their power.

"A lot of people live there," said the elder one, trying with the ready tact of her nation to accommodate her words to the understanding of the stranger. "It all depends whom you want to know about. On the ground floor is Josef the barber, and his wife, with three little ones. It cannot be them, I am sure, and it cannot be Monsieur Ducrot, who is their lodger, for he is seventy years old and a sacristan in the Church of the Sacred Heart. Then, on the first floor there are three men, not a woman amongst them. One is a bill-sticker, another a fisherman, and the third a waiter in the Café du Midi. I do not know their proper names. We call the bill-sticker 'Paste pot,' and the fisherman 'Crab,' The waiter is called 'Thomas' in the café, but when a letter comes for him it is in another name. Then, on the second floor—by the way, Marie, who is it that lives on the second floor?"

Edith with difficulty restrained her excitement. She felt that if only these youngsters rattled on a little longer she might gain some valuable information.

Marie, thus appealed to, was evidently of a more cautious temperament than her companion.

"If the young lady will tell us why she wants to know, we may be able to help her?" she stipulated.

"Certainly," cried Edith, instantly resolving to pursue the tactics of the penny novelette. "I have been deserted. My lover has been taken away from me by another woman—at least, that is what I am informed. I do not wish to make any trouble about it. There are plenty as good men as he left in the world; but, on the other hand, I must not act unjustly. I have been told that he lives in this house—that he is living with her here at this moment, in fact. If I can make sure of it, I will go away and never set eyes upon him again unless by chance, and then you may be sure I will take no notice of him. I am not one of those silly girls who break their hearts over a faithless sweetheart."

Marie was reassured.

"I should think not," she said, with a sympathetic and defiant sniff. "I had the very same experience last Sunday, when Phillippe—the grocer's boy at the corner, you know—walked along the Corniche Road with a chit of a girl out of a shop. She thinks herself better than we are because she stands behind a counter, and I am sure she made eyes at Phillippe one day when his master sent him there on an errand."

"Phillippe must have bad taste," broke in Edith. "But I am sorry I must hasten away. If you girls will tell me quickly all the other people that live in that house I will give you two francs each. That is all the money I have got."

She produced the coins, which she easily distinguished from the gold in her pocket by their size, and she knew that to appear too well supplied with money in that neighbourhood was to court danger, if not disaster, to her undertaking.

Both girls eagerly seized the 40-sous pieces.

"Oh, on the second floor," said Marie, "I am afraid you will find your young man. They are a funny couple that live there. They only came here on Monday. When did your young man leave you?"

"I saw him on Saturday."

"Where?"

This was a poser, but Miss Talbot answered desperately:

"At Lyon."

"What is he like?"

Another haphazard shot.

"He is tall and dark, and, oh, so good-looking, with a beautifully white skin and a pink complexion."

"That is he!" cried both girls together.

"The scoundrel! But tell me," went on Edith, whose excitement was readily construed as the pangs of jealousy, "who is the creature that lives with him?"

"We think she is a music-hall artiste," replied Marie. "At least, that is what the people say. I have not heard yet what hall she appears in. They say she is very pretty. Are you going to throw vitriol over her?"

"Not I," said Edith. "Do they live there alone?"

"Yes, quite alone. They rent the place from Père Didon. He owns most of the houses in this street, you know, and is a regular skin-flint. He won't let anyone get behind with their rent for an hour. He is old, so old, that you would not think that he could live another week, yet he is that keen after his francs you would imagine he was a young man anxious to get money for a gay life. You ought to

(Continued on page 223.)

Look out for R. NORMAN SILVER'S new serial, which is coming along on March 7th.

Digitized by Google

Cure of Deafness in Advanced Age.

The Editor of the "Journal for the Deaf" points out the great mistake made by deaf people, past the prime of life, in thinking that, because of advancing years, they must not expect a restoration of hearing. Against this common opinion he puts numerous cases of persons (with names and addresses), 60, 70, and even 80 years old, cured by the Drouet Method of external application. In one case, a man 64 years old, the deafness was of the worst chronic form—so bad, indeed, a watch could not be heard ticking even when pressed close to the ear on either side. The restoration of hearing is described by the patient, Mr. H. Holt, 17 Fenton Road, Blackpool, as follows:—"I may say I am completely cured and shall be pleased to give my testimony to anyone, as I think the Drouet Treatment cannot be too widely known." Anyone interested in the treatment of any form of Deafness or Ear, Nose, or Throat ailment can obtain a free copy of the "Journal for the Deaf," by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The "Journal" also contains a Special Report Form by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to treatment. The Editor, however, advises patients whenever possible, to attend the Institute for personal examination.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

HYPNOTISM

Develops Personal Magnetism, will-power, nerve force, vital energy. It gives you a magic influence over others. It enables you to banish all diseases and bad habits without drugs or medicines. You need it in your life just as much as you need food and drink. If you wish to rise higher in your accepted business or calling; if you would make more money; win fame or renown; master the wonderful science of Hypnotism and gratify your highest ambitions. In hundreds of instance it has proved the turning point in lives which seemed doomed to poverty and despair.

LEARN AT HOME.

You can learn the inner secrets of personal magnetism and hypnotism at your own home. The New York Institute of Science has recently issued an elegantly illustrated free book which tells all about this mysterious and marvelous power. It tells how to learn to hypnotize people instantly by a mere wave of the hand or a glance of the eye. It opens up the pathway to health, happiness and wealth; it is full of startling disclosures, and practical hypnotic possibilities never dreamed of by the ordinary person. Any one can learn. We guarantee you success or forfeit One Thousand Dollars in gold. Write for a copy of this wonderful book to-day. Remember it is absolutely free. Address penny postcard:—

New York Institute of Science,

Dept. VA33, Rochester, N.Y. U.S.A.

SPECIAL BARGAINS.

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d $

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK-CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished, elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6; approval before payment.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval before payment.

REAL DIAMOND and EMERALD doublet HALF-HOOP RING; large, lustrous stones, massive solid gold setting (hall-marked); weight 2½ dwts.; sacrifice, 21/-; approval willingly.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (meta bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

DARK RUSSIAN FUR MUFF & NECKLET to match, with large, bushy tails; never worn; sacrifice, 12/6 together: also another set of extra fine quality very handsome muff and necklet, accept 16/6, worth 3 guineas; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

BROOCH; very handsome, 18-carat rolled gold; 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls, in velvet case; accept 6/9; approval before payment.

NECKLET WITH HEART PENDANT, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern, heart set with pearls and turquoise; accept 9/6; approval.

LADY'S 6-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, PAWNBROKER & JEWELLER,
284 BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance,

SHILLING BOTTLES.

TEST BOXES FREE TO ALL.

Any sufferer sending name and address to JOHN A. SMITH, 1007 Montague House, Stonecutter St., London, E.C., will be sent a Test Box of his marvellous Cure, Gloria Tonic, for all Uric Acid Ailments, including Gout, Sciatica, and RHEUMATISM. 300 Recent Cures.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

To CURE Drunkards

Mrs. Geo. Fuller, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Digitized by Google

have heard the row there was here last Saturday when he turned the people out from these rooms where your lover now lives with his mistress. It was terrible. There was a poor woman with two sick children."

How much further the revelations as to Père Didon's iniquity might have gone, Miss Talbot could not say, but at that moment there came an interruption.

From the opposite doorway appeared the figure of Mlle. Beaucaire, carrying a small bag.

She was followed by a man, tall, slight, and closely muffled up, who shouldered a larger portmanteau.

Edith grabbed both the girls, and pulled them close to her against the closed door behind them.

"It is he!" she whispered tragically. "Silence! Let us watch them!"

The man darted a suspicious glance up and down the street. There was no one whom even the clever Henri Dubois could construe as an enemy—no one save some chattering Marseillais loitering around their doorsteps, and three girls huddled together in close conclave directly opposite.

Thus reassured, he strode after La Belle Chasseuse, who cried out impatiently:

"Come quick, Henri; what are you waiting for?"

"Is his name Henri?" whispered the awe-stricken Marie.

"Yes. Isn't he a villain? I wonder where they are going now!"

"Let us follow them and see," suggested Marie.

"Yes, let us follow them and see," chimed in the other one, who delighted in this nocturnal romance. It was a veritable page out of one of Paul de Kock's novels.

The programme suited Miss Talbot exceedingly well.

They strolled off down the street, nestling together, Edith in the centre, and keeping the shrouded couple in front well in sight.

This time, when Mademoiselle Beaucaire and her companion reached the point where the street emerged on to the harbour, they did not cross over towards the broad and brilliantly-lighted Cannebière, but hurried on through the darkness in the direction of a cluster of fishing smacks that lay alongside the Quai de Rive Neuva.

"My faith, Eugenie!" cried Marie, "they must be going on board one of the vessels."

"What a lark!" was the answer. "I suppose they fear you," she added, turning her sharp eyes on Edith. "What is your name?"

"Lucille," came the answer on the spur of the moment.

"Lucille what?"

"Lucille Beauharnais."

"My gracious!" cried Eugenie, "what a swell name!"

"Oh, let us hurry," interrupted Miss Talbot desperately. "You girls know everybody. You must know all the vessels. If they are going on a boat and you find out the name and number for me I will give each of you a whole louis. I will give them to you now—I mean, that is, if you will walk with me afterwards to my lodgings."

For even amidst the exciting circumstances that surrounded her, Edith recognised the absolute necessity there was to maintain the credibility of her previous narrative.

Unquestionably Dubois and the lady intended to embark on one of the fishing boats.

They hastened to the further end of the harbour, through whose tiny entrance Edith could now see the dark waters of the bay beyond, for the night was beautifully clear and fine, and the bright stars of the south lent some radiance to the scene, when the girls quitted the deep shadow of the houses.

A solitary boat, a decked fishing-smack of some forty tons, was lying by the side of the quay, apart from the others. Edith, who knew something about yachting, recognised that her gearing was not fastened in the trim manner suggestive of a craft laid by for the night.

At the same instant, too, she caught sight of a third form—that of a man who had been seated on a fixed capstan, and who now strode forward to peer at the new comers.

Some few words passed between the three, but it was impossible for the girls to hear a syllable.

Instantly the sailor assisted Dubois and Mademoiselle Beaucaire to step down from the quay on board the smack. He followed them, and three other men who appeared out of the chaos of sails and ropes, commenced to labour with a large pole in order to shove the sturdy vessel out into the harbour.

"Quick!" murmured Edith, in an agony lest the opportunity should slip. "Tell me what vessel it is."

"I think," said Marie, "it is the Belles Sœurs. Anyhow, we can easily make certain. All we have to do is to go back around the top of the harbour, walk down the Quai de Port, and watch her as she passes under the lighthouse of the Fort St. Jean. They will hoist her sail then and we will see her number."

"Oh, come," cried Edith, "let us run!"

"We can run if you like," replied Marie coolly, "but there is no need. They have to get out by using the sweeps, and we will be underneath the lighthouse at least a minute or two before they pass, even if we walk slowly."

Whilst they were talking the three girls put their words into practice, and Edith found herself battling with a logical dilemma.

Dubois was evidently escaping from France—making out from Marseilles at this late hour on a small vessel which was nevertheless, as she well knew, capable of sailing to almost any point of the Mediterranean.

What could she do? Was it possible to invoke the aid of a policeman and get some authority to hail the craft and order her to return, or was there time to take a cab in the Cannebière and drive furiously to the hotel, where Brett, Fairholme, and her brother must be anxiously awaiting her return?

Rapidly as these alternatives suggested themselves, she dismissed them. It was best to fall in with Marie's suggestion and ascertain beyond doubt the identity of the fishing smack. Then at any rate Brett would have a tangible and definite clue.

So she hastened with her companions along the three sides of the now almost deserted quay, and, in accordance with the prediction of her youthful guides, she reached the promenade beyond the small lighthouse of the inner port before the vessel had quitted the harbour, for to move a forty-ton boat with oars is a slow matter at the best.

As the craft came creeping steadily through the narrow channel Edith saw, to her great relief, that two of the men drew in their sweeps, and commenced to haul upon ropes whilst the clanking and groaning of pulleys heralded the slow rising of the mainsail.

She thought the sail would never climb up in time, but as it began to yield to the steady pull of the men it mounted more and more radidly, and at last, feeling the influence of a gentle breeze blowing off the land, it shook out its cumbrous folds and the number stood clearly revealed in huge white letters on the dark brown canvas.

At first, in her eagerness, she could hardly discern it, save a big "M" and an "R."

"There!" cried Eugenie, bubbling over with excitement. "There it is! 'M.R. 107, Marseilles. No. 107, you know. Why, isn't that Jacques Le Bon's boat?" she demanded of her companion.

"Yes, it is," said Marie; "and there is Jacques himself standing by the tiller."

Edith's eyes were now becoming accustomed to the light.

"Where are the others?" she said. "I cannot see them. There is no one standing on the deck but the sailors."

"Oh, they have gone below, I expect," said the practical Marie. "They will be in the way of the sails, you know. There is not much room for people that don't work on the deck of a small ship like that. Besides, they don't want to be seen. If a Customs officer or a harbour official were to notice the boat now he would think that Le Bon was going out fishing for the night, but he would be sure to wonder what was happening if he caught sight of a woman on board. Funny, isn't it," she rattled on, "that Jacques should be called 'Le Bon,' for he is the worst man in Marseilles? They say that his ugly grin when he draws a knife would frighten anybody!"

(Another instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ?? is it generally thought that there is no cure for

ASTHMA,

CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints.

BECAUSE !! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive, post free Free of Charge, particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. BUCKINGHAM ROAD, BRIGHTON.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by this Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE. No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following Testimonials, two out of thousands received:

SEVERE BRONCHIAL ASTHMA CURED, AND BLOOD SPITTING.

MR. S. J. HAILES.
(From a photo.)

(When Mr. S. J. Hailes applied for the Treatment, he said the doctor described his complaint as Asthma, and he could do him no more good, and he would always be subject to the spasms. During the complaint the patient had lost strength and about 28lb. in weight. He suffered generally with cold hands. He could not sleep well. He could not go upstairs to bed, and had to be propped up downstairs at night before a large fire. He suffered from wheezing and a cough. He perspired freely when the attacks came on. The shortness of breath came on in paroxysms in the mornings.)

After a course of the treatment he writes: "Dear Sir,—It is with feelings of deepest gratitude that I testify to the marvellous effect your cure has had on me. I could very seldom lie down; if I did, only to wake up nearly suffocated and gasping for breath, the attacks lasting three or four hours, until I was completely worn out, not able to walk or do anything, with much spitting of blood. My friends all gave me up, and I thought myself it was all over. Seeing your advertisement, I resolved to give the Treatment a trial, and, thanks to the Cure, I am now able to eat, sleep, walk, or do anything as well as ever. Trusting many who are suffering from such dreadful complaints will give you a trial as it is in reach of everybody, I shall be pleased to answer any inquiries as regards my cure. Again thanking you for your kind attention and interest you have taken in my case, I remain, very gratefully yours, S. J. HAILES." Nuneaton.

(Full address on application.)

CONSUMPTION AND HÆMORRHAGE OF THE LUNGS CURED.

"I suffered for several years with Consumption, and the doctors gave me up, and told me the only cure would be to go abroad. I lost a half-pint of blood a day. I could only walk across the room with difficulty. Also, I suffered with a dry cough and night sweats, and whenever I attempted to do anything I had a fearful pain in my left side. In September, 1897, I was given up. I didn't know what it was to enjoy a good meal. My food did not seem to do me any good. I made up my mind to try your cure, just at the time I was at my worst. After trying your treatment I began to improve; my cough ceased, and I did not suffer from the night sweats, and have not had a return of the bleeding of the lungs for over 12 months. Now I can walk a considerable distance without feeling the least fatigue. I don't think I can thank you enough for your marvellous treatment, to which I owe my entire cure.

MRS. ARNOLD, Polegate."

(Full address on application.)

MRS. ARNOLD.
(From a photo.)

The DIRECTOR is prepared to pay

£1,000

to any Charitable Institution if the above are not genuine extracts from the patient's own letters. The originals may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide inquirers.

CURABLE

BORAX
Starch Glaze.

While the iron's hot.

is the time to get the Borax Starch Glaze finish. There's a "just right" about the heat that means quickness in the work.

The women who talk of the bother of ironing are they who try to get good results with starch alone. The starch isn't made that will give a satisfactory finish by itself, be the ironer ever so clever. It's the pinch of Borax Starch Glaze in it that makes any woman a proficient laundress.

A penny packet sufficient for several ironings can be obtained from Grocers and Stores everywhere.

Facsimile Packet.

FREE SAMPLE PACKET AND SOME NOVELTIES
if you name this paper and your grocer.

For the finest results it should be used with Borax "Beauty" Starch.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Distinction in Dress
AT LITTLE COST

Is the enjoyment of all who shop by post during

NOBLE'S MONEY-SAVING SALE

Write to-day for Noble's

SALE CATALOGUE

of Bargains, sent post free.

MODEL 1586.

This very Neat Design consists of plain Tailor-cut Skirt, and smart Blouse Bodice, tastefully trimmed corded satinette strappings, yoke and sleeves lined. In the J.N. Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating, 10/6. Carriage, 6d. Sizes larger than 38 ins. bust measure cost 2/6 extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d. This Costume is also made to measure in the New Black and White Flake Tweed at 21/-

John Noble Ld. 148 BROOK ST. MILLS, MANCHESTER

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Neglected Girl.

"TWENTY-FOUR" is much concerned about her age. She has reached that number of summers, but as yet has never received attentions from the opposite sex, except the barest formalities. Do I think her case exceptional, and likely to mean that she will be an old maid? "TWENTY-FOUR" tells me she is quite attractive in appearance.

* * * * *

"TWENTY-FOUR" had better not worry herself. Women do not marry so young nowadays as they used to. Many women of thirty are regarded as just at the most attractive age. It is often, too, that certain women do not attract as girls, while as mature women they possess unusual attractiveness for men. Perhaps "TWENTY-FOUR" is one of these. Let me add that there is one very sure way of becoming an old maid, and that is to worry over possibilities. More women grow possée out of their own foolish despairings than from the hand of Time.

Calling.

"R. B." asks: "On paying an afternoon call, should one, when leaving, say 'Good-bye' or 'Good afternoon?' Also, should one take one's umbrella into the room or leave it in the hall?"

* * * * *

Never say "Good afternoon" to a friend on whom you are calling. It is formal, and not at all polite. Always say "Good-bye," and on meeting "How do you do?" As to your umbrella, certainly leave it in the hall, but, of course, take you hat with you if it is only a short social call.

Boy and Girl Love.

I AM glad you have summoned up courage to write to me, "APOLLO." You are sixteen, and in love with a girl of your own age, whom, you say, you met last year, and think rather likes you. You have corresponded regularly, but not as yet exchanged any word of love. Of course, you cannot offer marriage, but at the same time would wish to convey to her your feelings.

* * * * *

Well, I see no reason why you should not hint to her when next you write that you are affectionately disposed towards her. At your age neither of you could sensibly become engaged, or even think of marriage; but there is no reason why you should not have an understanding that if your relations continue the same when a few years are past, you will enter into a serious bond.

* * * * *

Of course, though I don't doubt your sincerity or hers in the matter, many things happen between sixteen and twenty-one, and it would be wrong to set too much store now by your feelings. Still, there is no reason why you should not let the girl know how you are disposed towards her.

A Very Faint Heart.

"N. E. R." wishes to make the acquaintance of a girl in his town. He knows a lady friend of hers through whom he could get an introduction, but has not the courage to ask her for it. Can I advise him as to the best method of procedure?"

* * * * *

If "N. E. R." has not the courage to ask for such an ordinary privilege as an introduction, I fear he has that "faint heart" spoken of by the proverb. He has an excellent opportunity to know the girl in the shape of a lady friend. If he is afraid to take this chance, I don't think he would have much success with any other courses I might recommend him.

A Speculative Lover.

"JOHANNESBURG" unfolds to me a story in which love is very closely mixed up with finance. The gentleman who has proposed to her, and been accepted, goes in for speculation on the Stock Exchange. Recently he has lost £2,000 through the sharpness of a broker. He hopes to get this back when affairs in South Africa change for the better. Until this happens, he is reluctant to buy my correspondent her engagement ring. Do I think this is right, seeing that many girls have their rings before the lover can even support himself.

* * * * *

I do not think you need quarrel with your lover because he does not buy you a ring at once. Surely you can wait until he can afford to do so. True love does not need the fetter of an engagement ring to make it binding. If your engagement has been made public, and you do not care about being teased by your friends for not having a ring, get your lover to buy you just a plain gold chain ring. These rings look very neat and nice, are not expensive, and would answer the purpose admirably until your lover is able to get you what he would, had he the money now. A word of warning, however, "JOHANNESBURG," you may take in good part. Men who depend for their living on speculations, and who are apparently so careless in disposing of thousands as your lover, do not make promising husbands, even if successful.

* * * * *

A man who juggles with £2,000 will do the same later on with £20,000 or £200,000 (if he gets them), and amongst speculators the gulf between a millionaire and a pauper is not a very wide one. So it is for you also to consider whether an engagement between you is desirable so long as your lover can only depend on speculations for his future career.

A Curious Question.

"GEORGE," who, I suppose, is a young lady from the question asked, has met a "fellow" to whom she has taken a great liking. He is about her own age, and she wants him for a friend. Should she ask him to become so, or how should she act?

If you are to be friends, it will be a mutual understanding between you, which should not require any formality. Friends attract each other instinctively, and there is no proposal or acceptance. If he likes you, he will cultivate your society, and you should cultivate his. There is no harm, however, in telling a person that you like him. Reserve in those matters often leads to misunderstanding.

Kissing In Public.

"WHEN my young man and myself are parting at a railway station," writes "VIOLET," "ought we to kiss each other in view of other people?" Certainly, if you do not do it too ostentatiously. It would be foolish to make a huge display of your relationships with each other. A parting kiss, under such circumstances, should be snatched. It is sweeter, too, that way.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Breom's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PHONOGRAPHS FREE

A Practical Up-to-date Sound Reproducing Instrument, which will take any Standard Record and bring forth the Words, Music or other Sounds in a Perfect Manner.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE GIFT

This is a Genuine Offer. It comes to you from the well-known establishment of Symonds' London Stores. We are the largest Phonograph suppliers directly to the public of any firm in the United Kingdom. When we make a promise we keep it. We now tell you that we mean to give away a limited number of the celebrated Symonds' Premier Phonographs. You can verify our assertion by answering this advertisement. But do not wait and be too late.

THE REASON FOR OUR FREE OFFER

We have set aside a quantity of our Symonds' Premier Phonographs to be distributed for advertising purposes. We offer to give you one of these Phonographs provided that whenever friends ask where you obtained it you will mention that it came from Symonds' London Stores, and also provided that you keep at least half-a-dozen of our Records according to the Award which we will send you (playing selections of band music, songs, &c.), so that your friends may know their quality. You will not be required to pay a penny for the complete Phonograph. We will send the Phonograph, carefully packed, and by the directions you can learn to operate it quickly and easily. We can supply comic songs, sentimental songs, religious selections, or band music. What kind do you prefer? Our catalogue will help your choice.

Bear in mind you are not to send us any money for the Phonograph, but merely write a letter, mentioning having seen this offer in this paper. Give us your full address, being particular to also mention the nearest railway station. Enclose stamp.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

(The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 55 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

VARICOSE VEINS,

BAD LEGS, ETC., ARE COMPLETELY CURED WITH INEXPENSIVE HOME TREATMENT.

Mr. E. Gooch, Maldon, Essex, writes:

Sept. 4th, 1902.

"Dear Sir,—My wife had two boxes of your remedy for Varicose Veins two years ago, and they entirely cured her. They acted like magic, for before using them she could not walk about without support."

Full address, with particulars of remedy, on receipt of two stamps.

S. S. ROBERTS,
15 Playfair Road, Southsea.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

The Most Nutritious.

EPPS'S

Grateful—Comforting.

COCOA

Breakfast—Supper.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-: Countries, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

REMOVE THAT BILIOUS FEELING.

You know how it interferes with your daily work, your pleasures, and recreations—it is a sure indication that your system is not working right, and that you need a little assistance—take and you will be well, look well, and feel well. You will eat well, sleep well, and you will work well. You not only need the laxative, but the tonic effects of Beecham's Pills to put your entire system in good working order. Beecham's Pills come as a boon and a blessing, for they correct the evils of an over-worked digestive system, and lay a solid foundation of health and strength.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

TRIED AND TRUSTED FRIENDS BEECHAM'S PILLS will prove every point claimed.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOXES.

Price 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills), & 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Short Stories.

No. 738.] Week ending February 21, 1903. [Price One Penny.

She paused with the glass in one hand and the phial in the other, for suddenly upon the opposite wall she saw the shadow of a man!

(A Dramatic Incident from our Story, "The Wickedness of a Woman." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures In TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is composed of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

"Health," the well-known Medical Journal. Edited by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., says of Kaputine:

"There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ this remedy, and popular experience of its use fully warrants the recommendations with which it is offered."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-,

of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield,

for 12 stamps.

'Let's Talk of Graves' Drapery

.. THE .. 'ECONOMIC' BALE

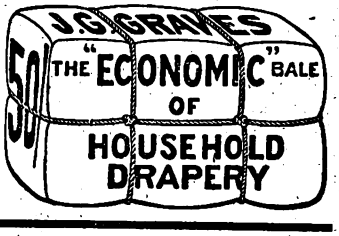
OF HOUSEHOLD DRAPERY,

£2 10s.

CONTAINS: Pair very Best Quality Twilled Sheets, Pair Heavy Blankets with white whipped edges (full size), Superior Quality Red and White or Blue and White Alhambra Quilt (large size), Pair Fine Quality Pillow Slips, 1 Bolster Case, Set of 5 Handsomely Embroidered Toilet Mats, 2 Turkish Towels, Best Quality Glass Cloth, Scouring Cloth, 6 Netted Dusters, Pair Special Design Lace Curtains, 1 Woven Turkey Table Cloth, 1 Embroidered Table Cover 80 in. square, and 1 Full Size White Table Cloth of Fine Quality.

TERMS.

Send only 5/-, the Bale will then be sent to your address (carriage paid), and, if you are satisfied, complete the purchase in six more monthly payments of 7s. each. If not satisfied, return the parcel, and your deposit will be refunded in full.



Send for No. 5 Catalogue of Drapery, Costumes, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. No Risk. Good Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Order E. & T. PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

SPECIAL BARGAINS.

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK-CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished, elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6; approval before payment.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval before payment.

REAL DIAMOND and EMERALD doublet HALF-HOOP RING; large, lustrous stones, massive solid gold setting (hall-marked); weight 2½ dwts.; sacrifice, 21/-; approval willingly.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 13-fold bellows (meta bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

DARK RUSSIAN FUR MUFF & NECKLET to match, with large, bushy tails; never worn; sacrifice, 12/6 together; also another set of extra fine quality very handsome muff and necklet, accept 16/6, worth 3 guineas; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

BROOCH; very handsome, 18-carat rolled gold; 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls, in velvet case; accept 6/9; approval before payment.

NECKLET WITH HEART PENDANT, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise; accept 9/6; approval.

LADY'S 4-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, PAWNBROKER & JEWELLER,

284 BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL STARTS THE WEEK AFTER NEXT

Short Stories

No. 738.] [ONE PENNY.

Week Ending February 21st, 1903.

The Wickedness of a Woman.

THE STORY OF AN ADVENTURESS.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"THE señora has decided to go?"

"Yes; I have decided to go."

"The señora is wise—with the wisdom of the serpent. The señora will be a great lady in the land to which she goes."

"It will not be my fault if I am not," and a short laugh, half amused, half scornful, wholly musical, accompanied the words.

The two speakers stood in the tiny living-room of a wretched hovel whose windows looked upon a miserable back street in Valparaiso. No greater contrast could have been conceived than was presented by the women who faced one another in that miserable den. One of them—evidently the mistress of the dwelling—was dressed in the meanest rags, and her dark, evil face bore the stamp of poverty and wickedness.

Her companion obviously belonged to a far higher rank of society, and her face possessed that extraordinary and surpassing beauty, given now and again, though rarely indeed, to one of the daughters of men.

No living being could have looked unmoved upon that exquisite face, with its warm southern colouring, its deep, dark eyes, its lips that could only be compared to pomegranate flowers; its dusky, glorious hair!

Her mien and bearing were those of a queen; her very presence in the den in which she stood seemed incongruous, unnatural. That she should even have a passing acquaintance with the repulsive old hag by her side gave one a sense of repugnance.

The old woman leered up into the beautiful face with her bleared red eyes, and said softly and fawningly:

"The señora must conquer the world. So fair a face should win even a kingdom."

"It will win me all I need," was the short response. "I shall leave this vile land to-morrow."

"To revile the land that gave you birth is——"

"Oh! no moralising please, Marietta," the younger woman broke in impatiently. "I shall revile whom I please, and what I please. This land has been an evil place to me; to-morrow I shake off its dust from my feet for ever!"

"And Gonsalez?" The old woman spoke the words softly but very significantly, and the other started as though a snake had stung her.

"Gonsalez?" she said haughtily, but in spite of herself her voice shook. "I shall never see Gonsalez again. He knows neither where I am going, nor the name under which I go."

Marietta's eyes narrowed into little evil sparks of light, a curious intent look stole over her face.

"The señora goes then under another name? Yet Gonsalez is her——"

"Gonsalez is nothing to me—nothing, nothing!" the other woman cried passionately. "Do not ever remind me that I was a fool to—— But it is all over," she ended, with an abrupt change of tone. "From the moment the ship in which I sail leaves the harbour my past is wiped out; I shall no longer be Elena Huerta, but——"

"But?" the old woman questioned softly, her head eagerly craned forward to catch the reply. But instead of a reply, a low, triumphant laugh came from the younger woman's lovely lips.

"No, no, Marietta!" she cried; "the past you know, the future I shall keep hidden from you. In silence is wisdom, and I can be silent as well as wise."

Disappointed malice looked out of the old woman's eyes, but she said smoothly:

"The señora is right—wisdom and silence go hand in hand. And what can poor old Marietta do for the señora to-day?"

"To-day I am rich; to-morrow I may be poor," the other answered vaguely. "I must have always by me that which can cut the knot of life quickly. You can sell me——"

She hesitated, Marietta's eyes gleamed. She moved across the room to a tumble-down cupboard, from which she drew two tiny bottles. A grim smile overspread her face as she hobbled back to her visitor's side.

"Either of these will suit the purpose of the señora," she said. "With one comes a painless end; with the other——" she shrugged her shoulders with deadly significance. "With both nothing is traceable afterwards!"

"Give me—the painless one," the woman calling herself Elena answered coldly. "I will pay you well."

Ten minutes later there emerged from the low doorway of Marietta's dwelling a tall woman, whose lace mantilla, closely drawn over her face, entirely hindered all recognition of her features. She walked swiftly down the street and entered a carriage that awaited her at a distant corner.

But Marietta, standing alone in her little room, shook her

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

fist at the retreating figure, and muttered under her breath:

"Be not so sure that vengeance will not come, my fine señora; a past may be buried, but sometimes it will rise from the dead, as you may find, oh, lady with the soul of a fiend and the face of an angel."

* * *

"My dear fellow, you are not going to marry her!"

"I am going to marry her."

"But, Graham, dear old chap, I—well, of course it's no business of mine; I ought not to interfere, but—are you wise to do this without knowing more about—about——"

"Look here, Desmond, I don't want to quarrel with you, but this discussion must end if we are still to be friends. I cannot allow my betrothed to be discussed by anyone, not even by you. Isabella is to me the embodiment of all that is pure and good, as well as beautiful. She——"

"My dear fellow, don't be vexed, but think of the name you will put into her keeping if you marry her; the honoured name that has meant so much to Britain for centuries."

The man called Graham laughed lightly.

"I would trust my honour and my name to her if I were a king!" he answered. "No one could look into her face for a moment, and think evil of her! You are prejudiced against all foreigners, Desmond, that is the plain and simple truth. Don't let us argue the matter any more; you and I are too old friends to quarrel over my marriage," and Lord Graham thrust his arm through Desmond's, and drew him to a table on which rested a large photograph in a silver frame.

"Look at her face and be ashamed of your doubts," he said, half in jest, and half in earnest, and for a moment both men gazed silently at the exquisite features of the portrait. Then Desmond said slowly:

"I grant her loveliness, old man, I never saw a more beautiful woman, but——"

"No more 'buts,'" Graham said lightly; "the wedding is fixed for June 12th." And at that Desmond was silent.

Society is apt, in these days, to fall at the feet of every new divinity that rises above the horizon, but seldom has such a furore been created as was brought about by the introduction to the London world of the famous Spanish beauty, Isabella Guarnera. She took the world by storm. Her marvellous beauty, her grace, her charm, won homage for her wherever she went, and she had not been in London three months before offers of marriage more than she could count, were showered upon her.

But gracious and charming as she was to all who approached her, no one man could flatter himself that he was singled out for her special favour. No one man, that is to say, until Douglas, Earl Graham, that most fastidious of beings, succumbed to her fascinations, and then Isabella melted as no one in her new surroundings had ever seen her melt before.

It was soon perfectly plain that he was singled out for the beautiful woman's favour, and that his persistent wooing was likely to meet with its reward. Perhaps no one was exactly surprised at his infatuation, though plenty of people—his own relations, and his old friend, Hugh Desmond, amongst them—implored him to stop and consider before taking so irrevocable a step as marrying a woman of whom so little was known.

The above conversation was but a sample of many like it. Douglas Graham—hitherto impervious to every woman's charm—Douglas, the most particular, the most refined, as well as one of the noblest of men, was as wildly in love as any schoolboy with the beautiful Spaniard of whose antecedents he knew absolutely nothing but what she herself chose to tell him.

And, needless to say, he placed implicit belief in every word that fell from her lovely lips.

"Tell me, my darling," he said to her one evening, about a week before June 12th, the day fixed for their wedding; "tell me truly—have you never before loved anyone? Am I truly and really the first?"

"Truly and really," she answered, in her deep, musical tones, looking full into his eyes with her own dark ones; "you are the first man I have ever loved—as you will be the last—and only one." And she laid a soft, caressing hand on his.

"But many men must have loved you," he said wistfully.

"If they did," she looked at him with her innocent, angelic smile; "I knew little of it. I gave them no encouragement. I have never cared for men, or for men's society—until now."

And lifting her lovely eyes to his again—the subtle flattery in their depths almost intoxicated him when he saw it, she laid her head upon his breast. The act seemed to him one of beautiful, childlike surrender; his love became something akin to reverent worship, and he said low and humbly:

"God made me worthy of you, my sweet."

* * * * *

Lady Graham—"the beautiful Lady Graham" as she was soon called, was undoubtedly a success. Everyone said so, and of course everyone must be right. Douglas' family forgot their original objection to the marriage, and welcomed her with open arms. Douglas' household adored her; his friends could not speak loudly enough of her many merits.

With one exception. Hugh Desmond, Lord Graham's greatest and oldest friend, never cordially approved of the match or liked his friend's lovely wife.

"That woman is a cat," he said confidentially to his favourite sister when they were discussing the marriage, "don't ask me why I say so, or why I think so, but I know it. She is a cat—a beautiful one, I grant it, but there are claws under that velvet paw—I would swear to that!"

Certainly no claws were visible, and Isabella Graham went on her triumphant way, beloved and admired on all sides.

She made an ideal mistress of her husband's great country house—Dangerfield Hall. She was a Lady Bountiful to the whole village, and the villagers were loud in her praises, and in the admiration of her angelic face.

"Ah! his lordship is a lucky man to 'a' found such a wife as that," they would say. "She be more like to an angel than a woman—so she be!"

Lord and Lady Graham had been married nearly three months, when one fine October afternoon they were returning from paying a visit to a neighbouring Squire. They had dismissed their carriage, and agreed to walk across the Park by Douglas' suggestion.

Isabella never failed to fall in with every suggestion of her husband; it would almost seem as though she could never do enough to please him, and from this fact the generality of people deduced her overwhelming love for Douglas.

Hugh Desmond thought differently. To that safe confidante of his—his sister, he said: "Lady Graham is playing a deep game. She means to yield to Douglas in everything, and play the part of a model wife. That woman is a cat."

* * * * *

No one could have looked less cat-like than did Isabella, as she and her husband strolled across the Park. Her lovely face was alight with animation; she acquiesced with enthusiasm in Douglas' schemes for new cottages, for improved conditions of his tenants, for various philanthropic efforts, and showed such interest in his plans and wishes, that, as they emerged upon the drive, he exclaimed fervently: "No man ever had such a wife as I!"

Digitized by Google

She smiled her adorable smile, and they passed on in silence, until, just as they reached their own front door, Douglas exclaimed :

"Good Heavens, there is a man lying on the step ! What on earth is he doing there ?"

Husband and wife hurried forward to find, as Douglas had stated, that a man was lying huddled upon the steps, his ghastly face and closed eyes speaking of serious illness. He was quite unconscious ; only when Lord Graham stooped and touched him gently, he moaned, and cried out wildly in Spanish :

"Elena—I have come—Elena !"

"Poor fellow," Douglas said kindly, "he seems to be a fellow countryman of yours, sweetheart."

He was still bending over the fallen man, otherwise he could not have failed to notice the awful pallor that had overspread his wife's face, the light of deadly hatred that shone out of her flashing eyes, the changed expression of her features, that turned them from those of an angel to those of a demon.

Not the fraction of a second had passed, however, before the expression vanished, and she was her usual sweet self again, saying softly :

"Oh ! poor, poor man, let us have him taken in, Douglas, and do what we can for him."

Graham turned to his wife, passionate adoration written all over his speaking countenance.

"It is like your goodness to have suggested such a thing," he said, "Perhaps the poor fellow had heard of you and of your helpfulness to all who suffer, and came here to ask for succour. Perhaps he has even seen you in your own land ?"

"Perhaps," she said, very gently, "but I do not know his face at all." And she looked down calmly at the unconscious man, who suddenly lifted his arms in a wild gesture, and cried again :

"Elena—Elena, I have come !"

It was a matter of a few moments only before the stranger was carried into the house and put to bed in one of the bedrooms, and whilst Lord Graham dispatched messengers to summon a doctor and a nurse, his wife watched beside the sick man.

He lay very still, and evidently quite unaware of all his surroundings, least of all of the woman who sat watching him, with lips close set in hard, determined lines, and eyes in which that look of hatred burnt afresh.

Her first action, when left alone with him, was to search every pocket of the clothes which had been taken from him but the search was apparently a futile one, for she went to her place by the bedside with a look of relief in her face, and the whisper dropped from her lips :

"Old scores can be settled now !"

* * * * *

Midnight boomed slowly out from the clock over the stables of Dangerfield Hall.

The house was wrapped in profound stillness, and in total darkness, save in the room where the sick stranger lay.

There a shaded lamp cast strange shadows on walls and ceiling, yet giving sufficient illumination to allow the nurse to see the face of the patient.

Consciousness had not returned to him. Beyond the perpetual cry of : "Elena, Elena," he had spoken no word, but lay wrapped in a deadly lethargy, from which he was only roused for his food and medicine.

The doctor had declared that the man was merely suffering from hunger and exhaustion, and that in a few days he would be quite well, and able to give an account of himself, and to this report Lady Graham had listened with a face of grave pleasure, and a few words of suitable satisfaction.

And now, just as midnight boomed from the stable clock, her form might have been seen stealing softly, softly along the corridor between her room and that of the patient. She was fully dressed, for her husband was dining out, and she had said she would sit up for him, although he declared he could not possibly be home till nearly two in the morning.

"I shall like to go now and then to our patient's room, Douglas," she said, "just to assure myself that all is well."

Yet surely it was strange that she should move along the passage with such stealthy feet, and without a light ! Strange that she should start at every sound, and pause with quickly beating heart when the wood of the furniture creaked loudly.

She reached the sick room at last, and opened the door with the extremity of caution and quietness. All within was very silent.

Lady Graham smiled—an evil smile—as her glance fell on the form of the nurse, sleeping soundly in an arm-chair.

"Coffee is a good narcotic sometimes," she murmured, then she crossed the room with swift, yet noiseless tread, and stood looking down at the sick man.

His face was upturned towards her, in the dim light it looked very pathetic and helpless ; the lines of want and suffering were carved deeply upon it.

"Elena," he moaned, stirring restlessly. "I—loved—you !"

No pity, no soft emotion, stirred the face of the woman above him ; she did not even wince, but turned towards the table on which stood a bottle of medicine and a glass.

Then with a sudden quick motion she drew from her bosom a small blue phial, and held it up to the light.

A smile of unspeakable wickedness flashed over the angelic beauty of her face as she murmured :

"Painless and untraceable ! You thought you could baffle me—Elena Huerta ! Poor fool, poor fool, but you were always that, Gonsalez."

As she said the words she turned a little more to the light, and lifting the glass from the table, poured into it the sick man's medicine, then with the utmost deliberation she was preparing to empty into this the contents of the blue phial, when, with a gesture of horror and profound terror, she let the latter slip from her hands.

For her startled glance had seen upon the opposite wall the plain and distinct shadow of a man—a man who must have entered the room unheard, unperceived, and who——

A cry broke from her lips, she stooped, and with hurried, trembling hands, searched the floor for the blue phial, when a hand was laid upon her shoulder, and her husband's voice, stern and changed beyond all recognition, said slowly :

"What is in that phial ? And who is Gonsalez ?"

Was it the sound of the voices ? Was it the natural ending of his strange lethargy ? Who can say ? But at that moment the sick man opened his eyes, and, looking full at Lady Graham whispered passionately :

"Elena ! My wife !"

* * * * *

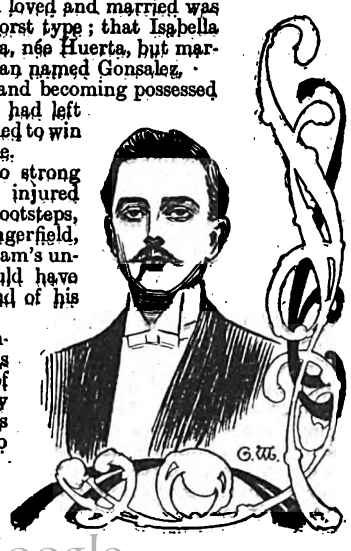
Douglas Graham has never got over the awful discovery that the woman he had loved and married was an adventuress of the worst type ; that Isabella Guarnera was truly Elena, nee Huerta, but married years before to a man named Gonsalez.

Having tired of him, and becoming possessed of a small fortune, Elena had left her native land, determined to win for herself rank and fame.

But Fate had been too strong for her. Gonsalez, her injured husband, had dogged her footsteps, tracing her at last to Dangerfield, where, but for Lord Graham's unexpected return, he would have met his death by the hand of his faithless and evil wife.

Douglas was broken-hearted, but his friends aver that he is well quit of a woman who so terribly fulfilled the wise man's saying : "There is no wickedness like the wickedness of a woman."

L. G. Moberly.



Digitized by Google

The Romance of an Unpaid Bill.

BEING THE HISTORY OF A QUARREL.

THE barometer stood at "Cloudy" in the pretty little breakfast room at Laburnum Villa, somewhere in Kensington. Furthermore the barometer would have worked round to "Stormy" had it been in any way influenced by the faces of the occupants of the room who were seated at the breakfast table; to wit Gerald Sinclair and Ethel, his wife.

Mrs. Sinclair was a pretty girl of medium height, with violet eyes, a pretty little nose, slightly inclined to Heaven perhaps, a pair of full red lips which seemed made for the express purpose of kissing, a low forehead surmounted by masses of dark brown hair which fell down behind a couple of little coral ears. With all these advantages, still the barometer stood at "cloudy."

Gerald glared at Ethel; Ethel glared back; Gerald glared at the centre of the table, which proceeding was immediately imitated by Ethel.

The object of their resentment lay in the centre of the table, blissfully unconscious of the state of affairs; it was one of those small pieces of paper which tradespeople are in the habit of sending out when money is due to them.

Messrs. Branford and Flower, Ltd., fashionable West End milliners and dressmakers, were responsible for this bill, which amounted to £84 10s., including the remark that a cheque would oblige.

At length Gerald broke the silence.

"We've been married now nearly six months and during that time how you have managed to run up a bill for £84 is beyond my comprehension. You must have been wilfully and needlessly extravagant." This last sentence seemed to please Mr. Sinclair for he repeated "Yes, needlessly extravagant."

"Oh, Gerald," Mrs. Sinclair cried, "I am sure I never had all those things."

"That's just like women; no head for business whatever; do you think a firm like Branford and Flower would make a mistake in an account of that size; as I said before, you have been very extravagant, and the sooner you alter the better."

By this time Gerald was wishing he had not allowed his momentary anger to run away with him and was racking his brains for some means of conciliating Ethel without appearing to be himself in the wrong.

"Needlessly extravagant," he once more repeated. "But—"

"Gerald, how dare you. You—you—unkind"—and here Ethel broke into a flood of tears. "I wish I'd never married you."

Then Gerald got up, threw the morning paper across the room, knocked over a cup of coffee in his haste, and in a cool dignified voice said: "Kindly address all letters to me at the Grand Hotel; I shall not come home until you are in a better frame of mind." Ethel made no answer, simply turned a sullen tear-stained face away from him.

Presently the door slammed and Ethel rising, timidly pulled the curtain on one side and watched her husband stalk down the road looking neither to the right nor left. Womanlike, as soon as it was too late, she endeavoured to recall him by shrieking "Gerald" to the window pane.

Unfortunately for Ethel, window panes are not made of a substance which will transmit sounds, consequently, the only person who heard her cry out, was the advance guard of a German band, who was just coming up the path, doubtless with the idea of obtaining money.

Whether the word "Gerald" resembles any bad language in German, I cannot say, but the representative of the Fatherland hurriedly retreated.

Ethel's repentance was decidedly short-lived, perhaps it was the sight of the German which again upset her, for she seized a cushion, banged the nearest chair in a most brutal manner, looked at Gerald's photograph and said "Beast." Tried to kick the cat out of the way, and failing, once more seized the cushion, aimed it at the cat, and consequently knocked a cup off the table which was situated in an entirely different direction. The cat resented this sudden frontal attack, and by an admirably executed flank movement, gained the open door, and departed.

Her sudden passion having been satisfied by these proceedings, Ethel sat down and thought out a plan of campaign which was briefly this—she would never, never, recall Gerald, she would go to the theatre each night, and thoroughly enjoy herself, in fact, the longer Gerald stayed away, the better she would like it.

As for Mr. Sinclair he reached the office with a murderous glint in his eyes, and one of the juniors remarked to another as Gerald stalked through their public office, "Guess we'd better look out for squalls. Reckon Mrs. S. made him go through the mill this morning."

* * * * *

Now Mr. Gerald Sinclair left the office about four o'clock in a decidedly happier frame of mind. He visited the florist's and bought a huge bouquet, then he invested in two dress circle tickets for the Lyceum; for he had decided to go home to Ethel, go home and tell her how sorry he was for the words he had used.

So it was with a light heart and a latch-key that he opened the door of Laburnum Villa, but the house seemed strangely silent. There was no smiling Ethel to kiss him as he came in.

Going into the dining-room, he threw the flowers and tickets on the table and rang for a maid. "Tell your mistress I am home," he said.

"Please sir Mrs. Sinclair went out about three o'clock and said she was going to the theatre and didn't know what time she would be home."

"All right, Mary, that will do."

The servant withdrew and Gerald was left alone with the flowers, the tickets, and his thoughts, which were not so pleasant as they had sometimes been.

Digitized by Google

He got up and paced the room, then he used a truly English word, jammed his hat on and rushed out of the house, fully determined to stay at the Grand Hotel till Ethel sent for him.

When Mrs. Sinclair came down next morning, she observed the flowers and the tickets which Gerald had left behind, then she questioned the servant who informed her that "master came home about five o'clock and when he found you were not at home, he seemed very much put out." This information seemed to please Ethel for she smiled and murmured "Serve him right."

Now Mrs. Sinclair showed a very undecided manner in carrying out her plan of campaign which was, as the reader will doubtless remember, to go to the theatre every night, yet now it was only the second night and she had decided not to go.

About half-past four, tea was tastefully laid for two in the drawing-room. There were those special crumpets Gerald was so fond of, hot and crisp before the fire, and Ethel looking bewitching in her prettiest dress, sat waiting for her lord and master; but five o'clock struck and no Gerald came, the crumpets were getting heavy and the tea cold; six o'clock came, but still no Gerald; evidently he intended carrying out his threat of not coming home, and once more Ethel sought relief by indulging in a good cry. Then once more she visited Gerald's photo and yet again murmured "Beast." What was he doing now she wondered, probably at some music hall with some of those club friends of his, without one thought for his poor little wife, and again she sought relief by going to a theatre.

But all this time what of Gerald? There were no music halls for Gerald that night. He sat and thought before the fire in his private room at the Grand and smoked innumerable pipes.

* * * * *

At the respected firm of Branford and Flower, Ltd., the counting-house clerks were sleeping peacefully when the ting-a-ling of the governor's bell made them all sit up and endeavour to convince each other that they were getting through an enormous amount of work, whilst the small fat office boy fell off his stool in his frantic haste, and tore madly into the governor's room.

Presently he returned with some letters in his hand with instructions to stamp and post them. Complacently he arranged himself on his stool once more and proceeded with his task, but he was sleepy and sleepiness made him perform his work in a half-hearted manner, so that when he stuck a stamp on a letter addressed to Mrs. Gerald Sinclair, Laburnum Villa, Kensington, W., in such a manner that the stamp was obviously out of the perpendicular, he did not trouble to unstick and replace it properly, but simply gazed at it in a sleepy, dejected manner which ought to have had the effect of shifting the stamp, but it didn't, which for reasons that will be seen later, was decidedly for the best.

Now in due course, the letter arrived at Laburnum Villa, Ethel pounced on it, and as is the custom with the female sex, instead of opening it, she fully explored the outside, then turned her attention to the writing and immediately a little scream emitted from her mouth.

"Gerald's writing, what does he mean by it, if he wants to have anything more to do with me let him come here and not write and—Good gracious! the beast has actually dared to stick the stamp on to mean a kiss, how dare he?" And for a third time she addressed Gerald's photograph with the word "Beast." But the photo received this third insult with grave equanimity.

Having thus relieved her feelings, Ethel once more turned her attention to the unfortunate letter which had been the unwilling cause of this outburst.

"I'll not answer it, I'll not take the slightest notice of it, the brute." Whether "the brute" meant the letter or Mr. Sinclair will remain one of those unsolved problems which fade into oblivion.

"I'd rather die than answer it, if he wants to see me, he'd better come and er—er—see me." which latter remark certainly displayed Mrs. Sinclair's profound knowledge of logic; suddenly a happy inspiration struck her as she gazed at the still unopened letter. "I'll send it back without opening it, that will show him I am not the sort of wife to allow herself to be insulted with impunity."

Mrs. Sinclair seemed rather muddled, and whether the insult referred to was receiving the letter, or the quarrel of the previous day, will remain another of those unsolved problems.

Without giving any further thought to her plan of action, she acted immediately and placed the letter in a larger envelope, stuck the stamp on most rigorously perpendicularly, and addressed it to Gerald Sinclair, Esq., Grand Hotel, Nelson Sq., W. Not satisfied with this, she put on her hat and posted the letter herself in the nearest pillar box.

Directly she saw it slide in and heard the rattle as the envelope struck the tin, Ethel wished she could get it back, and even had serious thoughts of waiting and trying to bribe the postman to return it to her, but as her knowledge of the British law consisted of a hazy, dim notion that letters once posted cannot be recovered, she decided not to wait.

Mrs. Sinclair's knowledge of law, in common with most ladies, was extremely large, as she was also aware that dogs mustn't wear muzzles unless they have a collar or must not wear collars in the dog days, something to do with dogs anyway. At any rate, she returned home with a decided wish to cry and once more went and looked at Gerald's photograph, but this time she did not call it "Beast" but kissed it.

Thus we will leave Ethel after her third repentance and follow the letter to Gerald at the Grand Hotel.

* * * * *

Gerald had not felt like work on that day and as junior partners are not always necessary everyday at business places, he had decided not to go to the office.

After a stroll round St. James' Park, he had stood on the suspension bridge and wondered whether Ethel would care if he jumped in and drowned himself. Truly a morbid state of mind, but where is the young man in love who does not have these morbid fits. At any rate Gerald deemed discretion the better part of valour, and so editors were robbed of another horrible tragedy with which to decorate the headlines of their newspapers, which was no doubt very inconsiderate of Gerald.

At any rate, when the porter handed Gerald a letter, on his return to the hotel, in Ethel's handwriting, his low spirits vanished like "Brother Boer," and he could hardly wait till he reached his room to open the letter; when he did so, he was greatly surprised to find, as the reader already knows, another letter inclosed; he took out the second letter and imitated Mrs. Sinclair's actions by looking it over and over. At length he opened it and his wonder was considerably increased by finding a letter addressed to his wife which ran as follows:

London, W.
—, 1900.

Mrs. Gerald Sinclair,
Laburnum Villa,
Kensington, W.

Dear Madam,—With reference to your account for which we sent bill on Tuesday, we wish to point out that an error has been made, and instead of £84 10s., you should only be charged £34 10s. We very much regret this unfortunate mistake, and trusting to receive the favour of your future orders, we are, madam, yours respectfully,

Digitized by Google

Branford & Flower, Ltd.

Bill inclosed.

Gerald read this letter through and read it again, but was more puzzled than ever at the second reading. Why ever should Ethel send him a letter that was addressed to herself and evidently without opening or reading it herself. The more he thought, the less he could make of it.

"Whatever did she mean, surely she did not, but why not? Eureka, I've got it," he cried. Then with the true detective instinct, he commenced to get the facts of the case together.

Firstly, he had quarrelled with Ethel because she had been so extravagant.

Secondly, she had stated she had not had all the goods for which she had been charged.

Thirdly, they had parted in anger.

The deductions from these facts were:

Firstly, that Ethel must have repented (she had, several times).

Secondly, that Ethel, recognising the writing of Branford & Flower's letter, had sent it to him as an overture to repentance (she thought she had recognised the writing certainly).

Thirdly, that by so doing, she wished him to come back to her.

Truly Gerald would not have made a Sherlock Holmes, but then how was he to know that Ethel had mistaken Branford & Flower's writing for his. There was certainly a slight similarity which had caused Ethel to immediately jump to the conclusion that it was Gerald's writing, but the similarity was very slight, and therefore such an idea did not enter Gerald's head. His solution was one which 999 out of 1,000 husbands would arrive at, especially if the 999 were husbands of six months' experience only.

Then Gerald arose, put on his hat and coat, paid his bill, and tore out into the street, hailed a cab, which, however, failed to start. Standing up he looked at the cabby's face over the top of the cab, which face wore a look of blank astonishment mingled with unrestrained amusement. "'Scuse me, sir, would you mind telling me where Ethel lives?"

"Go to blazes!" ejaculated Gerald.

"Very well, sir," answered the cabman, "but not in this cab."

"Drive me to Laburnum Villa, Drayton Road, Kensington."

"Right, sir," and once more ensconcing himself in the cab Gerald had the satisfaction of feeling the vehicle move only to be pulled up in a minute by a huge policeman who was directing the traffic. Gerald sat and thought of fearful calamities which he hoped would overtake that policeman, but presently, to his relief, the stream of traffic was allowed to proceed.

He then suddenly thought it would be better if he drove to Branford and Flower's and paid the bill before he saw Ethel, accordingly he did so, and with the receipt safely in his pocket he soon reached the familiar Laburnum Villa.

Throwing the man half a sovereign, Gerald rushed up to the door, fumbled for his latch key, but ere he could get at the key, the door opened, a pair of arms incircled him and gravely threatened the immaculate stiffness of his collar. Not only were there a pair of arms round him, but a pair of lips were kissing him whilst a girlish form clung closely to him. And there they stayed, secure from prying eyes, behaving in a manner peculiar to young people very much in love. Later on when they occupied one chair in front of the fire, the following conversation took place:

"What made you come back—Gerald, darling?"

"Why, sweetheart, because you sent me the bill to pay."

"What bill?" said Ethel.

Then Gerald explained, and Ethel explained, then there was a moment's silence broken by Ethel saying:

"Gerald, women haven't any head for business, Branford & Flower's couldn't make a mistake, could they?"

E. Newton Bungey.

MR. HARKINS' CIGARS.

How a Lover's Advent was Discovered.

The old gentleman looked rather solemn when his beautiful daughter entered the reception-room in response to his summons.

"Rosalind," he said, with the air of a man who has made a disagreeable discovery, "you and young Mr. Harkins were in this room last evening, I believe?"

"Yes, papa," she answered with downcast eyes, "George—that is Mr. Harkins—called last evening, and I received him here."

"He calls about three times a week, according to my count," said the old gentleman, "and I suppose you put in the time discussing literature and art, and all that sort of thing."

"We are both very fond of good literature," ventured the beautiful daughter.

"Of course you are," replied the old gentleman sarcastically. "It takes three sittings a week for you to keep up with the times. Oh, I know all about that, and I am willing to make certain concessions in view of your literary tendencies, but I don't exactly understand this."

The old gentleman pointed to four cigars that were lying on the mantelpiece. The blood instantly mounted to the face of the beautiful daughter, but she did not lose her presence of mind.

"Oh, dear, how stupid of me!" she cried. "George—that is, Mr. Harkins—left those for you last night, and I forgot to give them to you."

"Left them for me?"

"Yes. You see, they're a new brand that he thinks particularly good, and he wants you to try them and see what you think of them. He has great confidence in your judgment, and he——"

She stopped, for the old gentleman had critically examined one of the cigars, and then smelt it, and he was now looking at her over the top of his glasses in a very disconcerting way.

"That's the same cigar he has smoked for six months, to my certain knowledge," he said.

"Oh, then he must have made a mistake——"

"Rosalind," interrupted the old gentleman, "why will you insist upon forgetting that your mother and I went all through this, and know all about it? Mr. Harkins is in the habit of carrying his cigars in his upper left hand vest pocket."

"Ye-es."

"And being a wise young man of considerable forethought, he removed the cigars from what he considered a dangerous locality last evening, and he was so elated when he left that he forgot them. Am I correct?"

"Ye-es, papa."

"And when may I expect him to call upon me?"

"He said he was going to see you this afternoon."

"Very good. He's a careful and painstaking young man, and I am ready to accept him as a son-in-law, but I don't want any daughter of mine to think she can pull the wool over the eyes of an old man who has been through it all."

O. P. W.

Mrs. Woodbury: "And yet you once called me the salt of the earth." Mr. Woodbury: "Nor am I the only man who has found he had the pepper when he thought he had the salt."

Digitized by Google

A Ring, a Girl, and a Man.

The Story of a Reunion.

Outside the wind blew shrilly, sending flakes of yesterday's snow with biting fierceness into the faces of pedestrians. Inside, the cold winter air was not felt by the tired girls behind the counters of one of the large shops. Rather did the crowd of changing, thronging shoppers cause a heated atmosphere that gave a throbbing headache to more than one of the tired shop girls.

At last came the lull of early afternoon. The girls, in scattered groups, were making the best of an opportunity for a chat when the street door was flung open to admit a gentleman, who at once attracted their attention.

He was a man of middle age, in full health and vigour; tall, well-formed, with a slight sprinkling of white in his brown hair and moustache; clear-cut features and kindly dark-blue eyes. He bore the marks of a man of wealth and refinement.

He halted at the glove counter, unfastened his great coat, took his hat in hand, and then glanced up pleasantly into the face of the assistant—a young, slender girl, with a tired look in her eyes and a feverish flush on her cheek.

He had opened his lips to speak, but suddenly he checked himself and his dark eyes dilated. Then, recovering his self-possession, he asked for ladies' gloves for evening wear.

"I do not know the number, but—but I judge about the size you wear. If you will be so good as to show me them, perhaps I can judge," he said, gazing first at the pretty, flushed face and then at the slim, white hand, unadorned save for one strange little ring.

That face—that hand—that ring! Was he dreaming, and would it vanish presently, as something of the same vision had so often done during these long years since one so very like this girl had stood beside him in the happy days of youth?

The gloves were brought, a spotless pair of white; but, instead of taking them up, the man continued to gaze into the face of the girl, who flushed deeply. He was about to speak, when another young girl came up and addressed the first.

The gloves fell. Margaret! It was the same sweet name! He felt that he could not leave without some further information as to this girl's identity. This girl must be the child of that other Margaret. But would her child be here? Were they so reduced?

Would that proud, stately woman of his youth have voluntarily returned to her native town, and allow her child to be thus employed? Perhaps she was a widow, poor and struggling, while he—the fires of the old love were kindling anew, and, half dreaming and with an excited flush on his face, he retained his seat.

"Will you take the gloves, sir?" a gentle voice asked. And again he started, with sudden shame at his odd manner.

"Yes, yes!" he answered quickly, "and a pair of the same number for street wear, please. Any colour the ladies like best. They are for a little niece who caught me dozing and consequently I must pay the penalty," he added smiling. The girl gave a responsive smile, wondering who the lucky girl was.

The gloves were wrapped up and handed to him. He could decently remain no longer.

What could he do? When calmly entering the shop a short time ago, he little thought to find himself in such a state of unrest.

"Thank you," he murmured absently, and buttoning up the great coat and replacing his hat he reluctantly left.

At the door a daring thought struck him.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said to the shopwalker. "I should like to know the young lady at the glove counter where I just made a purchase."

"I presume you have good reason for your inquiry?" was the reply. "Such questions are rather unusual. Her name is Margaret Russell—her address I cannot give you."

The listener's face became pallid. He took a card from his pocket and handed it to the man.

"This, sir, is my name," he said. "I think the young lady's mother was a dear friend of mine. There is a striking resemblance. Will you kindly hand her the card and tell her that if (his voice trembled slightly)—if her mother is living, I should like to meet her again? Ask her to take the card home and explain the incident. I shall come in to-morrow," and with a bow he departed.

Mr. Jones, the shopwalker, gazed upon the piece of cardboard and read engraved thereon, "Mr. Philip J. Hunter." The address guaranteed wealth, and the name was one of which he had frequently heard in connection with philanthropic deeds and much that was good, so, to the vast amusement and universal interest of all the girls near by, he fulfilled the odd request.

* * * * *

It was a pleasant little dining-room, bright and cosy, with a small table laid with a pretty white cloth, and places for two.

By a little side table, on which was a small lamp, sat a woman, no longer young, but still pleasing to look upon, save that the cheeks were a trifle hollow and the face pale. She was busily at work upon some fine embroidery. Other finished pieces lying about spoke of the work she did to assist the income brought in by her child.

A step sounded outside the door, and a moment later the young girl of the glove counter episode entered. The woman looked up with a sweet smile, and rose, laying aside the work and greeting the girl with a caress.

When her hat and coat had been removed, Margaret, with a mischievous look on her face, drew the card from her purse, and, stopping her mother as she placed the teapot upon the table, held it before her eyes. "Did you know this person, mamma? Have you ever seen that name before?" she asked her, half playfully, half seriously.

Digitized by Google

"Philip!" the mother exclaimed, with a catch in the breath almost painful. "Why—why, Margaret, child, where did you get that card?" and, nervously putting out her hand for it, the mother suddenly sat down.

Then, in a few words, the girl told all she knew of the incident, and described in glowing terms the handsome gentleman's appearance.

"And so, dear mamma, you do know him. Please tell me something about him—and if to-morrow when he comes I may permit him to call to see you, as he wishes?"

"Yes! No! I hardly know what to say, darling. I do not know if it were better or not that we meet again. It is a very commonplace story, dear, but I will tell you.

"We were once devoted to one another. Both were jealous and very proud. He said some unkind words which I resented and refused to forgive. Later I left for the North. There I met your father, whom I respected very much, and who soon persuaded me to marry him. Then, of course, I dared not think of my earlier love, and soon rumours reached me of his marriage.

"After carrying out your father's dying request and burying him in his native city, I could not spare the little means I had to go back to the North. In Margaret Russell only a few dear friends recognised and sought the Margaret Young of earlier days.

"I knew Philip had grown to wealth and position in his own town, but did not expect to meet him in our humble sphere. I know, too, that he never married. What do you say, darling, should we be ashamed of our humble home, a simple flat, with a room which serves as dining-room, sitting-room, and drawing-room?" she concluded, glancing about her and contentedly smiling.

Margaret was silent. She had been so much to her mother and she to her, and if he came—only too well Margaret foresaw the inevitable.

She recalled the emotion of the man, and now saw a new light in her mother's soft brown eyes.

Could she be so unselfish as to say one word to prevent the meeting? And if—well—her dear mother would be relieved of all further cares and trials and be restored to her former position. It was characteristic of her sweet, unselfish little heart that she saw no future benefit just then for herself.

"Let him come, mamma, dearest. I am sure it will be best," she said, striving to keep down a sigh that would come. Little supper was eaten that night, and the talk was all of Mr. Hunter.

So, when the tall, handsome man sought the glove counter on the morrow, Margaret gracefully offered him her hand and told him how well her mother remembered her old friend, and that she would be pleased to see him again at their home.

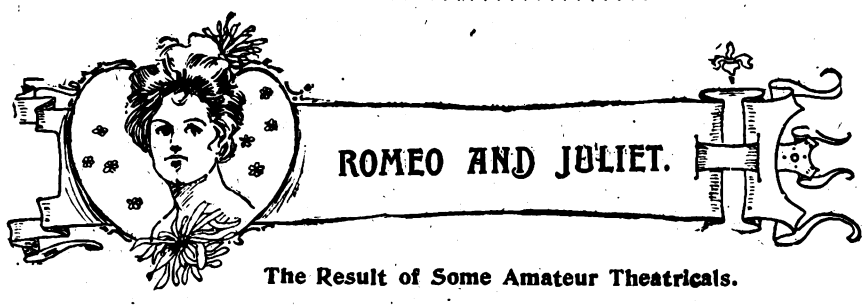
He responded with a look of intense satisfaction and a warm clasp, saying simply, "I will be there to-night."

Margaret was dreadfully upset all day, and undecided as to her part in this pretty romance. Should she go home from the shop, or go to a friend's first to leave them uninterrupted?

After much pondering and some little heartache and stealthy tears, too, she decided to let her mother think it was she entering, when it would actually be her old friend and lover! It would, perhaps, make it easier for both, and later Margaret's friend could see her home, when matters had been adjusted.

As she planned, so indeed, it was, and upon entering the cosy room, now bearing no resemblance to a dining-room, she found two happy faces, looking years younger and handsomer in the blessings of being reunited.

Agatha Alston.



The Result of Some Amateur Theatricals.

Juliet sat on a clothes'-horse, shivering in her burial robes under a muff and tippet.

To-night's rehearsal had been the worst of all. Nobody seemed to take any interest or to enter into the spirit of it; the thing had dragged so long the enthusiasm was all dissipated, the players went through their parts like marionettes, and the twenty-fourth was only three days off. It looked as though the whole affair would be a failure.

It was out of the question to give it up now, however, for the members of the club had pledged themselves for fifty pounds towards the fund, so there was nothing to do but see the miserable thing through to the bitter end and then give up the East-End Amateur Dramatic Club forever. Yes, indeed, forever and ever!

When nobody else felt any responsibility or tried to take himself seriously, why should she? This decision cost her more than anyone guessed, for it meant the death blow to the hope she had secretly cherished of treading the professional boards.

As the president of the club, she had selected the play, unselfishly reserving for herself the star rôle, given the use of her music room for the rehearsals, and worked very hard to keep the other members satisfied with their rôles; and now, three days before the performance, the company was no nearer perfection than it was a month ago. It did seem hard after all she had done.

The nurse, who was just beginning to get a little meaning in her lines, catches the influenza, the stupid carpenter sends up a balcony so high that Juliet must needs stoop to keep her head from being lost in the clouds, and Jack, the perfidious, has had the impudence to tell her that her Juliet would be a good Galatea.

Although she did not know it, this was the sole reason for her dejection. The balcony and the influenza were not irremedial, but her quarrel with Jack, in the light of her overwrought nerves, certainly was. If he had been decently civil and apologised afterwards, she would not have cared, but he had laughed—laughed outright in her face—and before the whole company, as if he had thought it a good joke.

And she had been saying such nice things about his Romeo. She had even confided to Tybalt that Jack's Romeo was at times really inspiring, but, of course, that was all a mistake, for Jack's acting could never have been anything but abominable.

The energy with which she came to this decision brought the clothes'-horse and the hysterical leading lady to the floor with a crash. Friar Laurence and Lady Capulet, who had been dancing in the hall, came running in to see what was the matter, and the sneezing nurse, still full of her rôle, ran to Juliet with something that sounded like:

"What ho, Lady-bird! Dow what's the batter with you?" While the perfidious Romeo sauntered in and coolly picked Juliet up, and deposited her on top of an improvised tomb.

Digitized by Google

"Will you please just l—leave me al—lone, Mr. Davis!" sobbed the offended Juliet to her astonished rescuer.

"Why, what have I done?" exclaimed Romeo. "You didn't think I meant what I said about Galatea, did you? Well, any way, I take it all back. You'd be a better Niobe now."

And Jack, lost to every spark of decency, seemed to think he was witty, and he laughed again.

When at last the troupe had dispersed, and the heartless Jack had called back from the door as if nothing had happened, "Good night, little Niobe; hope you'll feel better to-morrow," she dragged her bruised knees, that still bore the impress of the clothes'-horse, upstairs, and crept into her little bed where, alone in the dark, the tragedy, the tomb, and the family losses of the real Juliet seemed as nothing compared with the sorrows she, Amy Harper, had to bear.

The following day Miss Amy was kept a prisoner in her room and threatened with a rest cure when her "absurd theatricals" were over if she did not take things more calmly; and the violets Jack sent up as a peace offering were promptly bestowed on the housemaid, who was down with the measles.

That night a very red-eyed, reproachful Juliet listened to Romeo's intreaty to "Speak again, bright angel!" But the bright angel's voice was shaken with anger when, after having electrified her audience of chairs with the lines that led up to—"I'll frown and be perverse and say——" the incorrigible Jack had muttered so loud everyone in the wings could hear, "Lord, no! Don't be any more perverse than you naturally are."

The night of the twenty-fourth the company assembled or the first time promptly at the appointed hour. The stage carpenter, costumier, property man and dresser, were all fuming and squabbling over belated details, but the players themselves were preternaturally calm, nerved by a grim determination to do or die, owing, perhaps, to a dose of bromide Mrs. Harper had administered to the actors as they entered the door.

Amy's fears that something might go wrong, that someone might forget his lines or be seized with stage-fright, were somewhat allayed when she saw how the crucial test affected her.

She was perfectly composed, knew every line forwards and backwards, and felt serenely confident she was going to acquit herself as the president of the East-End Amateur Dramatic Club should.

She had, in fact, so far recovered from the despair of a few minutes before that she had asked an out-of-town manager to be present with a view to trying her fortune on the stage.

The nervousness and anxiety of the past few weeks had told somewhat on her looks, but when she saw the reflection of Juliet in her ball gown she began to feel there was after all, some sweetness and satisfaction to be had out of life, although she was not on speaking terms with Jack.

The nurse was sufficiently recovered to go through with her part, and she certainly did do it creditably, and, as for Romeo, a week ago she would have said he was superb.

The house filled early, for the association had conscientiously sold twice as many tickets as there were chairs. As the play progressed, and the house grew more enthusiastic, the players responded to the encouragement of a sympathetic audience and did better than they had ever done at the rehearsal.

To be sure, Mercutio's sword, made of Chinese coins, fell to pieces with the challenge, "Come, sir, your passado!" but he had slipped it into his pocket so deftly that the mishap had not been generally noticed; and the moon, which was a lantern supported on the step-ladder by Tom Harper, wobbled whenever Tom started giggling, but these were mere trifles.

On the whole the play was going well and the players were outdoing themselves. So far there had not been a hitch either with the scenery or the actors, every line was spoken so glibly that the prompter's voice was completely drowned.

Amy was breathing long, deep breaths of relief, for she had maintained that if everything did not go off smoothly she should die of mortification, and when at last Mercutio was safely laid she felt safe, for she had been more anxious about him than in regard to any of them.

Under the stress of excitement Amy lost herself when she was on the stage, in the passion of Juliet. Her eyes shone verily like "two of the fairest stars," and when, in her earnestness, she leant near and looked into Romeo's eyes with a radiance that glowed even through the grease paint, assuring him, "My bounty is as boundless as the sea, my love as deep," he swore to himself that Amy was adorable.

Every time the curtain rang down the house resounded with applause, and the actors consequently felt pleased with themselves and all the world.

Romeo and Paris did their duel scene valiantly, and after Romeo, having quaffed his poison, lay dying comfortably—and he managed to fall on a cushion—Juliet glided across the stage with her, "I will kiss thy lips. Haply some poison yet doth hang on them——"

As she bent low over the prostrate Romeo to suit the action to the words, the page, young Tom Harper, and Friar Laurence saw the dead man make a sudden movement, and Juliet found herself held in a very substantial grasp.

She had not counted on the revivifying effect her kiss might have on the stark Montague, and she reached for his dagger to utter the lines she had been eager to reach throughout the evening.

The house had rung for weeks past with her last agonies of grief, she had become so imbued with her rôle that her lightest tones and most commonplace remarks were thrilled with a tragic tremor; she had worn herself almost ill practising for the death-scene, and she felt, with a pardonable pride, that this was her crowning piece of work.

And now Romeo, incorrigible beyond all belief, who had done his own death scene splendidly and won his applause, detained her. The watch within began to get uneasy, the prompter's voice rang out in impatient tones, and there was a slight stir in the audience; finally the watch, out of all patience, commanded:

"Lead boy—which way?"

But young Tom stood still, shaking with laughter and pointing to Romeo. The situation was becoming strained, but the dead Montague insisted:

"Promise me, now."

Tears of anger and mortification welled up in Juliet's eyes, her hand was held in a vice, she could not reach the dagger, there was an unrestrained rustle of apprehension in the audience and a murmured:

"She has forgotten her lines, what a pity!" reached her ears. The prompter's voice shrilled across the stage, "Then I'll be bri—e—f," and Romeo closed his eyes on her agony, prepared to hold on all night if need be. It was no longer the dead Romeo but John Davis, cool and determined as she had never seen him, who tightened his grasp and urged, "Say 'yes,' and I'll let you go!"

Juliet deliberated as long as she dared, then at the last moment, when the strain could be endured no longer, and the audience was beginning to wonder where the "hitch" might be, she flashed out in a happy voice with not a trace of the tragic thrill she had so prided herself upon:

"Yes, Jack! Then I'll be brief—Oh, happy dagger! This is thy sheath; there rust and let me die."

And forgetting to stab herself she fell into his arms.

Vernon Owen.

Only Two More Weeks,

and then Mr. R. Norman Silver's great new serial will start in Short Stories. March 7th is the date of the paper, and it will be on sale on March 3rd. Many good serials have been published in Short Stories, but this new one will beat them all in power, dramatic situations, love, interest, and other points which go to make up a good story. Don't omit to place your order early; by so doing you will prevent disappointment. Remember that good things always go quickly, and that the date of the issue of Short Stories you want particularly is March 7th.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF. A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman, and friend of Lady Peggy.

Belinda Plays the Heroine.

I SHALL always remember it in Toffy's favour that she immediately grasped the significance of the discovery; only for a moment did she show doubt as to how the card came into Belinda's possession.

Then, with a quick movement, she crossed to where the girl stood, and lightly drew the card from its hiding-place.

"You're real smart," she said; "and as good as gold. To think you should have dropped on this"—she held the card at arm's length—"for the sake of a woman like Celia Dawtrey. I know it was under the handkerchief. Oh!" as Celia rapped out a shrill denial; "I don't mind how much you deny, I know better. You had the card under your handkerchief. You're as much a cheat as any card-sharper or blackleg.

"It's not a bit of use for you people to make a noise and try to stop me," continued Toffy, lapsing into the vernacular of her earlier days. "It's the fashion to cover things up in smart Society, I know, but there are some things that I won't cover up, and cheating at cards"—she called it 'kyards'—"is one. I've seen a man shot at sight for what this woman's done. I tell you she's not fit for decent folk to live with. It's not the first time she's done it, I know."

Heaven alone can tell what awful disclosures the Yankee was about to make! We had all endeavoured to repress her, but in vain. Her high treble had defeated all our efforts; clear above the murmurs of women fearful lest they should be the next victim of Toffy's candour, her shrill pipe had sounded. Rolla himself had vainly tried to stem the torrent. It was Belinda who closed the incident.

"Look," she said sharply; "the poor thing's ill. It's cowardly of you not to leave her alone. You've said enough already. I won't listen to another word. Alphonse"—she turned appealingly to the artist—"take her away." And she pointed to the dejected Celia, who sat huddled in a chair.

The artist rose to the occasion and half led, half carried, the childish figure with the painted face out of the room.

Those that remained looked blankly at each other. Toffy had made it impossible for us to pass over the occurrence. Once a woman is openly accused of a Society crime—cheating at cards—indeed, any sort of sharp practice with one's friends comes under that heading—she is doomed. That women—great ladies some of them—do cheat, we know, that they suffer from kleptomania we know also, as do some of the biggest shop-keepers in London and Paris, but we keep the knowledge to ourselves.

The proprietor of a magasin in the Louvre has a book in which there are confessions of theft, signed with some of the greatest names in British and foreign Society. He is a tactful person, and never openly accuses anyone; as madame, the kleptomaniac, turns to leave the shop, however, she is politely asked to step into the managerial sanctum, there she is told that she must sign a confession, and pay so much to a charity or face a public exposure! The former is invariably her choice; the manager is discreet, she goes upon her way, free to pick up unconsidered trifles elsewhere, but never more is she permitted to enter his shop.

I knew for a fact that Celia's name was amongst the list, but I never mentioned it. I assumed ignorance of that and other things like the rest of the world. Toffy had made that ignorance impossible. She had spoken out.

Celia knew the fate in store for her as well as anyone. She left La Caprice the next morning. Gradually, and by slow degrees, she dropped out of our set. When last I heard of her she was living in a third-rate Continental gaming resort—where her pretty painted face still brings her admiration. Mr. Dawtrey makes her an allowance but declines to live with her. He has no use for a wife "out of Society."

Things were somewhat strained in the château after that evening. People looked even more askance at Belinda for championing Celia than at Toffy for unmasking her. Rolla renewed his matrimonial overtures to my charge, but was quietly and firmly rejected.

I had had a letter from Vera while at La Caprice. She spoke of leaving Petersburg as soon as possible, and journeying through Italy.

"I shall be at Florence in September," she wrote, "when I shall expect ma chère Belinda!"

At Florence, as she had foretold, they met; but the fashion of their meeting was far otherwise than she expected. There in the City of Flowers was to be played the last scene in a stormy life, the final chapter of the beautiful Russian's love-story would be told.

Meanwhile Belinda and I said farewell to Trouville, and Alphonse—fully restored to health—returned to Paris. He was still a staunch friend to Belinda, but—I noted it with much annoyance—his passion for her was over.

If he should journey to Florence and meet Vera—I saw my castle topple to the ground!

Farringdon, good-humoured as ever, was accompanying us. Belinda had had charming letters from his mother and sisters and seemed much pleased with them. They were quiet, old-fashioned sort of people, who disliked "bridge" and discounted anything within a mile of being "smart." That, I suppose, was the reason of their regard for Belinda!

Digitized by Google

Among the crowd of pleasure-seekers at Trouville, I had met a certain Archduke of my acquaintance. He was a fascinating man and in his time had been a handsome one. He was old now, but he still retained his appreciation of a pretty woman, and, struck by Belinda's face and figure, he begged that we would stay at his châlet, a delightful little place, tucked away among the Austrian mountains.

The Archduke was of the old school. That is to say, he was polished in manner and in speech, and had a horror of women like Toffy and Celia Dawtrey. We met some old acquaintances at the châlet, amongst them Lady Saxby and Paul de Sonnaz.

It caused our host intense amusement to see Belinda and her ladyship together, the one tall and straight, with calm, untroubled eyes, devoid of any fripperies of dress or conversation. The other all gesture and grimace, in a wonderful toilette of red and black, scarlet shoes with silver heels, and a tall ebony cane.

"What a beautiful creature she is," said the old diplomatist as Belinda passed him.

"Beautiful as a statue," I answered; "but oh, how dull."

He laughed and shook his head.

"She is not of our world," he said; "so much the worse for us," and he sauntered down the path that led to the waterside, where waited a very pretty awning-shaded, flower-decked barge, with breakfast spread under the soft grey sky above the green water.

Life at the châlet was an idyll to those given over to open-air delights; there were the mountains, wild, beautiful, where eagles made their nests, and where the chamois flashed from peak to peak; great tracks of woodland where the trees are giants, moss-grown with age, set in a wilderness of ferns and flowers, and the distant hills gleam half light, half gloom among the branches. The place is full of birds and all wild woodland creatures. Where any wood has been cleared there are tracks of lilac, heather and of broom. A wonderful place, more exquisite than I can tell you.

Perhaps the scene might not appeal to some of you. I don't want to be offensive, but really you women of the middle class have not much sense of the beautiful. I saw a British matron over at Venice; she stood in the very shadow of St. Mark's—one of the wonders of the world—and in the face of that exquisite jewel of architecture she munched a ham sandwich, and bitterly lamented that it lacked the proper quantity of mustard!

Now a Society woman may do much that she ought not to do, but she certainly wouldn't munch ham in front of St. Mark's.

Those of us who were sated with the beautiful Austrian scenery drove into the quaint old town near the châlet, and lolled away a morning in a swinging chair in the river balconies smoking Turkish cigarettes and drinking hock.

To spend August in the uplands of Austria is to taste the best of the summer. There no tourist comes; the Society butterfly sips enjoyment in undisturbed serenity.

Year after year some of the best born, and the most beautiful women in Europe are to be found here. Life goes softly, smoothly, like a laugh on a summer' day.

It was while we were staying at the châlet that Belinda did me an injury. Up to that time I had not regarded the girl with any marked dislike. I had been vexed with her, angry and annoyed at her obstinacy, vexed at her opposition to my will. But inasmuch as she had never directly injured me I was tolerant, and for the most part amiably disposed towards her. That which now occurred brought about a radical alteration to my feelings.

I have mentioned somewhere in this series that the foolish but kind-hearted Crawley had suggested I should find a husband for myself rather than Belinda. It was to this end he arrived one day at the Archduke's in company with a certain little Jew, of pronounced features, large income, and little or no manners.

The Archduke knew Crawley well, and allowed him considerable latitude, otherwise Klinski, as the little financier was called, would not have been welcome.

"He's not much to look at, I know, Peggy," said Crawley deprecatingly, "and his manners are worse than none; but he's simply rolling in money. He could pave Rotten Row with nuggets and never turn a hair."

"As a husband, he's impossible, Crawley."

"He need not be seen. You could keep him well out of the way."

I shook my head. "Impossible! He's not the sort of man to give anything for nothing. He'll pay for all he has, and pay well, but he'll get his money's worth. Come, Crawley, how much did he advance you on the chance of the Archduke's invitation?"

Crawley blushed and blinked in a shame-faced sort of way.

"I'm rather short myself just now," I went on. "If——"

"I can let you have a couple of hundred if that's any good, Peggy," he said hastily.

I accepted the offer, and decided that my friend had made every penny of £2,000 out of the Jew.

I daresay you wonder how I managed for money all this time. My answer is the same as my exchequer was—Hardy North. He was ready to pour out cheques on the least necessity. His joy at the news that Belinda was the guest of an Archduke was childlike; he sent me a present of a turquoise necklace and a diamond brooch as well.

All the same, I had no money to spare; there are so many and such heavy expenses in Society. You must not wear the same dress more than three times at the most, and you change your jewellery with your gown.

The little Jew financier should, I decided, help me to form a nest egg, which with Belinda's £20,000, would keep me from poverty, if not in luxury. Klinski had all the quickness of his race, and soon learnt to conceal his objectionable self-confidence. He readily understood that if a man cannot distinguish, he must extinguish himself in Society.

It was not necessary for me to reject his matrimonial proposals, he had sufficient good sense not to make them.

I approved the man's insight, and rewarded him by a little friendly counsel. He responded gratefully to my teaching, and one evening after a long and somewhat tedious dinner, I drew him into conversation in a room opening on to the terrace,

To make a long story short, I told him that Belinda was a profitable speculation in which he might, if he paid high enough for the privilege, take shares.

"She is engaged to Lord Farringdon," I said nonchalantly. "On her marriage her father will make over some £300,000 to the bridegroom. Meantime Lord Farringdon has, like most other young men, expensive tastes, all of which his income will not supply. A matter of £10,000 would, I think, be very useful to him just now. You understand," I stared straight in Klinski's eyes, "that I should not mention this to you if I were not sure of your discretion. A word of what I have mentioned and——"

"Your Ladyship may rely upon my utter and complete secrecy."

"That is hardly the word, Mr. Klinski. A tactful silence is what you want—if you wish to get on."

He bit his lip and bowed profoundly.

"His Lordship would like perhaps——"

"His Lordship does not wish to appear upon the scene," I said sharply. "You are a man of the world, Mr. Klinski, and will understand how matters lie when I tell you that there is a certain person who considers she has claims on Lord Farringdon. Miss North must not hear of her existence; but to remain unknown the person requires £10,000. I, as Miss North's guardian, and the dear and intimate friend of old Lady Farringdon, am willing, I may say desirous, of settling the matter. I shall pay the money on Farringdon's behalf, and will give you my own note of hand for the amount."

Digitized by Google

"Which Lord Farringdon will redeem on his wedding day?" said the odious little wretch.

"So long as it is redeemed, I don't suppose you will mind who pays the money," I said coldly.

Once let me get Belinda married and I felt sure I could squeeze an extra ten thousand out of North. If not, if all my schemes went wrong, well, Klinski could only enforce his bond on Farringdon's marriage with the girl. Anyway, I stood to win.

For a moment the Jew studied me with his small, keen eyes. Then, bending forwards, he said softly,

"I may rely on your social patronage—if this is arranged—Miladi?"

I nodded lightly, and gave him a few words of encouragement.

"Then," he said with an expansive smile, "I agree. I advance you £10,000 on behalf of his Lordship—which will be repaid with interest on the day that he marries Miss North.

Before I could reply, before indeed I could take breath, an indignant young voice cried outside the open window from the terrace:

"I shall never marry Lord Farringdon—never after what I have heard," and with flaming cheeks Belinda entered and confronted us. "Besides," she flung up her head, "there is not even a definite engagement between us. I agreed to consider his proposal for three months. That time has not yet elapsed. To think," she turned on Klinski with a fine scorn, "to think that I should have to make these explanations, to render an account of my proceedings to you," and she flashed a look of such contempt and scorn that the Jew flinched.

Then turning to me she cried:

"How could you, Lady Peggy, how could you try to persuade me to marry such a mean, base man as, you say, Lord Farringdon is?"

For a moment I hesitated what to answer. Then a quick feeling of resentment stirred within me.

"It is not Farringdon who is mean," I cried. "It is you, who condescends to such an underhand proceeding as to listen outside doors and windows, to overhear other people's conversation. You shall come with me at once and repeat what you have just said to Farringdon himself. You have cruelly misjudged him."

I took her by the arm and led her from the room. Needless to say she did not confront his Lordship—at her earnest appeal I waived that part of the proceeding, and succeeded to a certain degree in softening her opinion of his character.

But as I have said before, the events of that evening brought about a revolution in my attitude to the girl. But for her Klinski would have advanced me £10,000, but for her——My indignation rose to a white heat against her. I set my teeth, and decided that henceforth I would fight her with any weapons. I would compel her by force or strategy to marry.

We passed from Austria to the Palace of a great Russian lady, very old, and fabulously wealthy. On the borders of the Baltic, the Ortoff Palace is one of the most magnificent of the many stately mansions in Russia. It is a very grand place, with acres of palm houses and glasshouses; vast stables full of thoroughbred horses of the famous Ortoff breed

It has a theatre with a stage as large as any public place of entertainment, where divas of European repute think it an honour to perform. It is as wonderful a place as Versailles, with hundreds of halls and chambers and a staircase up which thirty men might have walked abreast. It boasts many and rare works of art, precious marbles, great pictures, statues in bronze, in silver, and in the costly malachite.

Within a stone's throw of the house are vast forests, in which the bear, the boar, and the wolf are hunted with a splendour, and, I am bound to say, a barbarity inconceivable in Britain.

We arrived at the Palace late in the afternoon, just as the sun was tipping the snow tops of the distant hills with red, casting a deeper shadow upon the waters of the Baltic.

All through the journey Belinda had spoken but little, and I, filled with rage and bitterness at my failure with Klinski and with Farringdon, sat silently beside her. His Lordship did not accompany us to Russia, he was to meet us at Florence in September, where, as you will remember, Vera also was to be.

All through the dinner and the evening concert that followed, I sat, my brain on fire seeking to find a way to subdue Belinda's will.

Farringdon, I realised, was no longer a factor in the game. David or no David, I felt she would not tolerate his Lordship. It would be necessary that I should have an ally in my plan, a man without principle or money. Such a one I had ready to my hand—Eastacres, with his cold smile and steely eyes.

But, and this was the puzzle, how could I influence or rather break Belinda's will? I could not send her for a time to Siberia, neither could I have her beaten as the Russian husbands—moujik and Prince alike—beat their wives.

As I pondered there flashed into my mind a means, a dangerous means by which I might attain my end. During the next few days certain events took place which rendered my plan more easy of fulfilment.

I have already alluded to the great bear hunts that took place in the forests that fringed the grounds of the Ortoff Palace. Whole days were given up to the delights of the chase; the beasts were not infrequently driven through the forest right into the huge court of the Palace, there to receive the coup-de-grace in full sight of the Palace windows. The savage that lies under the soft manners, the exquisite courtesy of the Russ, is uppermost at those times.

The scene is of the fiercest description—a wild melée of men and beasts. The hunters' knives glisten in the moonlight, the dying beasts, with the cruel steel in their necks, turn their blood-shot eyes up to the windows of the great house where the women are eagerly watching. Some of us were not content to watch; Lady Saxby, with pistols in her belt, and her blue tunic girt round with a silver belt, went out to see the bear's death struggle at close quarters, or to help give the last stroke to a wolf.

Belinda had a horror of these scenes, and turned sick and faint at the sounds from the court-yard. Why this should be, I was rather puzzled to know, the girl was by no means a coward, it seemed strange to display such emotion at the slaughter of wild beasts.

She was especially indignant at the women joining in the fray, and had a bitter quarrel with Lady Saxby on that account. On one occasion she was not content with mere verbal expostulation, but rushed from the Palace into the court, a tall figure in long white gown with flashing eyes and pale, proud face.

"It's inhuman!" she cried. "Wicked!" She dashed towards the corner of the court where Lady Saxby was waiting for Paul de Sonnaz to give the death thrust to a huge bear.

Suddenly the wounded beast rose to his hind legs and with an awful snarl aimed a huge blow with his paw, that stretched de Sonnaz on the ground.

With an awful shriek Lady Saxby faced round, her courage gone, ready to leave Paul to his fate, if only she could escape.

Stooping to pick de Sonnaz's rifle from the ground, Belinda aimed at the bear. The great beast swayed, struck a blow with his formidable paw, that grazed the girl's shoulder, and then fell a lifeless heap of brown fur upon the ground.

Digitized by Google

Belinda was of course the heroine of the occasion; she was picked up and carried unconscious to her room, and medical aid was summoned.

The wound was not dangerous, but she had sustained a severe shock, and it became necessary to put her under the influence of narcotics. She responded easily to the action of the drug, and, as is often the case with certain temperaments, showed a docility of disposition utterly foreign to her disposition when under its influence.

By the doctor's orders I did not decrease the dose even when she was well enough to leave her room.

The last evening of our stay at the Ortoff Palace, was a memorable one; we were in the most magnificent of the many reception rooms, a place of marble, inlaid with malachite, and hung with gorgeous tapestries from the east; tall palms waved their high heads towards the vaulted roof, and the air was heavy with the scent of orange blossoms.

The entertainment that evening was a popular one at that time; a clever palmist had come all the way from Paris to read our hands. These persons are, for the most part, the agents for private detectives and money-lenders on a large scale, to whose interest it is to know as much as possible of the private life of their clients.

Belinda, like most young girls, was deeply interested to know all that could be told her of the future. Suddenly, just as the palmist was foretelling her happy marriage and various other impossible things, Belinda started to her feet, and with a low cry rushed to where Paul de Sonnaz was sitting.

"Look," she cried, "look!" And, seizing his arm, she pointed to the window.

"That face," she cried, "that awful face!" Shuddering she pointed once again into the night. And as I followed her gaze, something of the terror, the horror that she felt, laid hold of me.

(The explanation of the appearance of this face will be told next Tuesday.)

"Robert, dear, how do you suppose those dozens and dozens of empty bottles ever got into the cellar?" "Why, I don't know, my dear; I never bought an empty bottle in my life."

Young Man: "Is there any er—tunnel on your railway?" Railway Official: "Yes, thirty of them. The line is a favourite one with newly-married couples. Book you a couple of tickets?"

Young Wife: "But, Charles, before we were married you said that my slightest wish should be gratified." Young Husband: "Yes, Maria; but there's nothing slight about a three-guinea bonnet."

Reggie: "I heard papa say the other day that labour is sweet and noble." Mamma: "So it is, Reggie." Reggie: "Then, mamma, why does papa get a man to cut the grass, while he sits on a chair and only looks on?"

Scene—A Sunday-school. Johnnie: "I say, Miss Jones, I know now why you didn't want me to rob birds' nests last spring." Miss Jones (who has on a new hat): "Why was it, Johnnie?" Johnnie (gazing with admiring eyes at the hat): "'Cause you wanted the birds to grow big enough to wear 'em."

"No," said Ethel, "I'm afraid I shall never see Harold again." "Why? Have you offended him?" "Yes. I was giving him a nice, sisterly talk, and said that I was afraid he was leading an aimless existence." "Did he get angry?" "Yes. You see, he has the reputation of being the worst shot in the Rifle Corps."

Mrs. Purskey: Please, sir, I want one o' them thum—um—things; yer know, sir, as reggylates the 'eat of a room. Chemist: "Thermometer, you mean, ma'am, I suppose?" Mrs. P. (eagerly): "Yes, sir, that's it, sir. And if you'll be so kind, sir, to set it to 'sixty-five,' 'cause that's what the doctor says I'm to keep the room at."

Your Editor Chats.

Among the claims sent in by readers for one of the £10 notes offered by "Dayton," I have received one from Earl Poulett (late Viscount Hinton). His reason for wanting the £10 he gives as follows: "It would assist me in prosecuting my claim to the Poulett peerage, which is expected to be heard in the House of Peers either at the end of February or the beginning of March."

In order to ascertain whether the application was really that of Earl Poulett, I wrote to him at the address given in London, asking him to call and see me. A few days later I received a wire from Canterbury saying he was at St. Margaret's Hall in that city, and would call upon me when he returned to town. When he came subsequently he told me that he was touring the country for the purpose of raising money to prosecute his claim by giving entertainments in various towns.

I think readers will agree with me that Earl Poulett is justified in sharing the £10 note with Mr. R. S. Tunnell, 108 Grantham Road, Clapham, who wishes to take out a patent for an improvement in cycles.

Mr. R. Norman Silver, whose remarkable sensational novel "Held Apart" will shortly commence publication in Short Stories, belongs to that group of writers who find the best atmosphere for work in some public place. His favourite resort, when bent on the production of "copy," is a corner in a London restaurant much patronised by foreigners, and, as a matter of course, served by waiters of extremely mixed nationality. He uses a fountain pen, small sheets of paper, and writes an almost microscopic hand. Once, when more than ordinarily absorbed in some exciting situation of his characters, a bland German face approached his table and a guttural bass inquired: "Exguse me, sir, but what for you make so liddle writing?" Mr. Silver confessed himself unable to explain the peculiarity, which, however, enables him to crowd some five hundred words onto a sheet scarcely larger than an ordinary "Court" envelope. With the first instalment of his new serial I shall reproduce a specimen of his writing.

In a fortnight's time you will be able to enter the splendid new competition which starts in Short Stories. It is certainly one of the most original competitions ever devised, and I am sure will be a huge success. In view of the tremendous attractions which will be embodied in the issue of Short Stories for March 7th, I would ask you to make sure of securing a copy by asking your newsagent well in advance to reserve it for you.

Your Editor.

The £10 offered in the Fourth "Dayton" Competition has been divided between Earl Poulett (formerly Viscount Hinton), 17 Henry Street Buildings, Pentonville, N.W., and Mr. R. S. Tunnell, 108 Grantham Road, Clapham, S.W., each of whom has received £5.

The winner of the £10 offered in the Final "Dayton" Competition is Miss Annie Thorne, 4 Nile Street, Landport, Portsmouth.

Digitized by Google

MRS. COOPER'S NIECE.

The Story of a Romantic Love Affair.

"Philip," said old John Briggs to his son, "you are twenty-eight years old to-day."

"So the family record says, father," responded the elegant young gentleman addressed. "I am disposed to place implicit reliance upon it and on you."

"You have done nothing since you left college but kill time."

"It is only retaliation in advance, sir. Some day or other the old chap with the scalp-lock and scythe will kill me."

"You are too flippant. Since your aunt Priscilla left you a thousand a year you have done nothing but spend the money. Your income ought to be enough for a single man, but you draw on me, too."

"I'll try to draw on you less, sir."

"It is not that, Philip. You are quite welcome to a cheque now and then, for I know that you neither gamble nor gad about town, and I don't mind your horses, your club, your natural history craze, or your luxurious tastes. But still you spend more money and get less for it than most young men of your age—have too much, in fact."

"I don't find it too much, sir. In fact, I was thinking what a graceful thing it would be if you would only double it—a mere trifle to a gentleman of your means. I have to use the most pitiful economy, I assure you."

"Oh, that's it, eh? Well, I can tell you how to increase it considerably. You have heard me speak of Edward Spriggs, of Birmingham?"

"Money-lender and skinflint? I have heard of him."

"Nonsense, Philip. He is a quite worthy as well as very wealthy man; and if he prefers to invest ready money by lending it, what of that? I lend my money, or some of it, sometimes."

"But not at cent. per cent."

"No matter. I don't propose that you shall borrow of him. He has an only child, a daughter, who will inherit all his vast property, just as you will mine."

"Does she shave sovereigns, father?"

"Phil, be kind enough not to indulge in chaff. I have seen her and talked with her. She is young, handsome, well educated, and has good taste—a Society gentlewoman with domestic tastes."

"Well, father, you are not so old, and, since you admire her so much, I see no reason why——"

"Stop your nonsense, and listen. Spriggs and I had a talk over it when I was in Birmingham, and we have concluded if you two agree to marry, to settle a hundred thousand pounds on you on your wedding-day. With what you have you'll do well enough for a while."

"But," demurred Philip, "I don't like Spriggs for a father-in-law."

"Stuff! you don't marry Spriggs."

"And the name! Think of it! Spr-r-iggs."

"What of that? With marriage the name is changed. I don't think she'll gain much by it—Spriggs—Briggs! Six of one and a half-dozen of the other."

"I'd like to oblige you, father. I suppose I must marry some day; but it will be someone I love; and then I insist of a woman on good family."

"Someone you love! How the dickens do you know you'll not love her till you see her? Good family! Of course you're entitled to that. The peerage of Britain is full of Viscount Briggses! The Briggses are found in the Almanac von Gotha among the earlier families.

"Your grandfather made sixty thousand pounds property in hides and tallow, and if he had not invested it in property, that multiplied itself more than tenfold before he died, I should have been in the same business to-day, and you in the office or warehouse. Family, indeed! You're a foolish boy, Philip, and your aunt's legacy has ruined you."

"I wish, sir, there were half a dozen more old aunts to continue my ruin in the same way. It is no use getting angry, father. You can't keep it up. I'll take to anything else you say—law, physic, or divinity; sell my horses, drop my club, read by the cubic foot, but to marry—excuse me."

"Look here, Phil," exclaimed the father, who by this time was very annoyed, "you never knew me to break my word. I merely ask you to marry for your own good. I point out a wife in every way suitable to you. Marry to please me, and I will not only start you fairly in life now, but leave you all I have when I am gone. Marry to suit some foolish fancy of your own and I'll—yes, I'll found an asylum for idiots. Now you understand me;" and Briggs marched off, leaving his son to his meditations.

"If I stay here," said Philip to himself, "father and I will quarrel. Better give the dear old gentleman a chance to cool off. I'll ruralise a little."

That afternoon Philip packed a portmanteau, and with a fishing rod and mineral hammer started off to Cornwall, where an old college friend of his had married and settled, one whom he had long promised to visit.

When he arrived there he learnt that Graham and his wife had gone to Ilfracombe for the season, and their servants with them, the house being in charge of a caretaker. Philip heard of good fishing in a stream four miles off, and concluded to try it. He found lodgings at a farmhouse near the place, owned by a man named Abraham Cooper.

His quarters were quite comfortable. The house was an old stone building, and roomy. He was assigned a chamber upstairs, looking out on a trimly-kept garden, in which old-fashioned flowers and herbs were grown side by side, and which sent a pleasant fragrance through the open window.

The room itself was adorned with pictures and nick-nacks showing feminine taste, and the bedstead was furnished with a hair mattress, and not the bag of feathers usually found in such places.

"Decidedly," said Philip to himself, "there is another female on the premises, something younger and possibly fairer than the substantial Dame Cooper, and with some refined taste."

But neither that day nor that week did he see any woman other than Mrs. Cooper or the servant. However, the cooking was good, the country air and his walks round about gave him an appetite, and he was content. He fished the stream closely, or rambled here and there, hammer in hand and bag at his side, or leant over the fences and talked with farmers about "crops" and the weather.

In a week's time the thing grew monotonous. The fish were not always inclined to bite, good specimens in quarries grew scarcer, and his stock of talk on farming was nearly exhausted. He began to think of going to Ilfracombe and hunting up Graham.

Digitized by Google

As he sat out in the garden one afternoon, debating the matter, a carriage was driven up the lane and stopped at the door. Lightly out stepped a young woman in a neat travelling dress, and the driver followed her with a large trunk, under which he staggered, burly as he was. Mrs. Cooper came from the kitchen, and exclaimed :

"Why, it's Gwenny, I declare !"

"You dear old aunty Ruth !" said the newcomer, hugging and kissing the farmer's wife. "I came to have a good time or a month."

"And so you shall, my dear," was the hearty reply. Philip took an ocular inventory of the looks, dress and manner of the newcomer as he took off his hat.

"A sweet face and graceful figure, and presentable anywhere," was his internal comment. "Here's luck. I shall not visit Ilfracombe yet."

"You have a lodger, aunty," said the girl, when upstairs with Mrs. Cooper.

"Yes, he's a Mr. Bee," said the other. "It don't look as if he had any call to work for his living, judging by his white hands and his luggage, and he's plenty of money."

"Bee ! Then he isn't a busy bee. But he's good-looking ; if he be agreeable, he'll do for a walking stick."

Mrs. Cooper's mistake as to Philip was natural enough. When she had asked his name on his coming he had said, in his airy way, "Philip B., at your service," and she had taken the sound of the initial for his surname.

After she had called him Mr. Bee several times Philip saw the blunder, smiled at it, and, as the naval officers say, "made it so" ; and when Gwenny came to the table she was introduced, "Miss Gwenny, Mr. B." As she was the niece, he concluded her name to be Cooper, but as the farmer addressed her as Miss Gwenny, and the farmer's wife as Gwenny, Philip chose the more respectful form of the two.

As Philip was a gallant young gentleman, and as the young lady was charming in manner, he naturally paid her much attention. When a young man and young woman are thrown together under such circumstances it is not unusual for a flirtation to follow. It is generally a foregone conclusion.

Philip soon learnt that "Gwenny" was the diminutive of Gwenllian, and not of the more stilted Gwendoline, which interested him. Philip's mother had been a Powel, with Welsh blood in her veins, and bore the same name.

This later Gwenllian was a mystery to him. For the niece of a rather coarse farmer—for Cooper, though a worthy man, was the reverse of refined—she displayed unquestionably gentle manners. Then she showed a fair knowledge of any subject touched upon in conversation.

What was she—a teacher ? She had not the look or the way of the schoolmistress. A governess ? Possibly. If so, in a good family. But her belongings were not of the second-hand kind.

Philip had a keen eye for female apparel. Her lace was of the newest ; her dresses were pretty in material and well fitting, though quiet in tone ; and though she displayed little in the way of jewellery, the stone that sparkled on the head of a pin was unmistakably a diamond. She had been well cultured, and every word and action showed a purity that fitted her name.

On the other hand, Philip was as much a mystery to the young girl. He was a gentleman beyond doubt. But what was he doing there, a man of culture, refinement, and aesthetic tastes, in that farmhouse ?

He had said nothing of the Grahams, which would have explained it. With a little affectation of cynicism, which did not ill become him, the man was as clear as water, frank as air. But why did he loiter there with no apparent purpose ?

The girl did not at first deem she was the attraction, but it came to her after five weeks, and she grew shy, and her shyness for the last week of her stay infected Philip, who became shy too, and lost all ease.

At length she announced to Mrs. Cooper that she had return home, and that her father, who was in London visiting a friend there, would come for her on the following day, and his friend with him. Philip heard this with a depression that told him that he had met his fate and that it lay in the power of this girl to make him happy or miserable for life.

All the night that followed Philip lay and tossed restlessly. He could not sleep. He felt that his father would be as good as his word, but he determined that he would win a wife then or never.

Towards morning he rose, dressed, and sat at the window until the sun showed itself. Then he slipped out of the house, and strolled towards a glen a few yards off, intending to remain out until he heard the breakfast bell.

It had been a favourite haunt of the two, and yet for the last few days both had avoided it. He made his way to a mossy rock which formed a sort of rustic seat, and there he saw—Gwenny.

"Miss Gwenllian !" he exclaimed.

She rose with rather an embarrassed air. Then she said calmly :

"I rested badly last night, Mr. Bee, and I came out at daybreak. I have been here ever since. The morning air seems to refresh me."

"I had the same experience," he said. "I have rested badly, or rather, have not rested at all. I——"

She looked up inquiringly, and at something she read in his eyes dropped her own, while a flush overspread her face and neck.

"Gwenny !" he said desperately, and took her hand. The fingers trembled in his, but were not withdrawn. "Gwenny darling," he said, "we are to part to-day. Do you know that I love you dearly ?"

"Do you—Philip ?" she murmured, but she did not look up.

"Gwenny," he said, "I have been sailing under false colours, but innocently enough. I have a way among my gentlemen friends of using my initials, and so I am called among them P. B., or Mr. B. When your aunt asked me my name, I said, "Mr. B.,' and I did not care to undeceive her ; but I desire no concealment from you, unless you do not care for me. Then we will part as we met ; but I shall be a changed man. I shall never be able to forget you."

He waited for a reply. There was a slight tightening of her fingers on his as she half whispered :

"You must know that I care for you, Philip.'

"Now, darling," said the exultant Philip, "you must let me speak to your father to-day."

"I fear you may find him rather obstinate," she said. "He sets an undue store by his daughter."

"I can satisfy him of my position in society and that I am able to maintain you. I have means of my own, and have—well, I may say I had, great expectations ; but my father, who is very wealthy, has taken it into his head to choose a wife for me. I prefer to choose for myself. If you will be content to share what I have, Philip Briggs does not desire anything more."

"Briggs—Philip !" cried Gwenny, releasing herself from his grasp, and looking at him wonderingly. "Is your father's name John ?"

"Yes."

"And he lives in London ?"

"Yes."

Gwenny burst into a peal of silvery laughter.

"Do not feel vexed, Philip," she said at length. "I am only laughing at the similarity of our positions. My father chose a husband for me in the same way, and it was to escape discussion of the matter that I took these few weeks' rustication.

"Mrs. Cooper is my old nurse, and I have called her 'aunty' from the time I could toddle. She was married from our house. Her husband had very little money, and father bought them this farm and stocked it. But, oh, think, Philip dear, how your father and mine will chuckle ! You are Philip Briggs and I—I am Gwenllian Spriggs !"

Thos. D. English.

Digitized by Google

Behind the Tamarisk Hedge.

HOW A QUARREL WAS MADE UP.

Summer.

A FRESH wind blowing from the east tempered the heat of the sun that beat down upon the wide-stretching sands.

It was low tide, and the tiny wavelets rippled at the edge of the brown sand in a faint white line, hardly discernible from where Jack Leslie lay dozing in the sunshine on the fringe of seaweed left by the last high tide.

A fishing boat with wide brown sails was tacking along close inland; children paddled, and dug, and played in little scattered groups dotted here and there, the little ones in the distance looking but tiny coloured specks dwarfed by the wide expanse of sand.

It was an ideal place to laze away long summer days. Not well enough known to be crowded, not near enough to a railway to be spoilt by excursionists. Niggers and a pier were unknown on that beach and the voices of the children at play were the only sounds that mingled with the cry of the sea-birds and the swish of the waves.

Jack Leslie had found a comfortable lodging with a coast-guard widow in the village, and after a swim in the blue waters was dozing away the morning hours on the sands. After the atmosphere of a stuffy city office the fresh salt air and feeling of space made Jack draw deep breaths of fresh air into his lungs, and feel thankful to be alive in such a sunny world.

For the first day at least Leslie felt that he did not want to speak to anyone. He wanted to be alone, free to do as he liked and watch the sea in its varying aspects of morning, afternoon, and evening. He wanted to get to know intimately this part of the shore which was quite new to him.

He could hardly make up his mind to turn his steps away from the sea and go in to his dinner, but that the strong salt air had given him a healthy appetite.

In the evening he strolled along the rough grass that grew to the edge of the low cliff—nowhere higher than a few feet—a little colony of tents were pitched here, and appeared to have a mushroom growth—as well as appearance—by the suddenness with which they appeared and, after a few days, disappeared.

Behind the tents a high tamarisk hedge waved its feathery branches.

It formed a square within the shelter of which two picturesque wooden bungalows lay hidden from the curious glance of chance passers-by.

Jack approached the archway cut in the thickness of the hedge, the rustic gate stood hospitably open, and he looked through, wondering who lived in the little green-and-white bungalow, where the parrot's cage hung and pink flowering tree geraniums making a vivid bit of colouring. Dainty little muslin curtains shaded the windows, and through the open doorway of the little sitting-room Jack caught a glimpse of the cosy interior.

The other bungalow was a complete contrast, evidently occupied by a family simply for their summer holiday; not a permanent "home," as the well-cared-for appearance of the green and white bungalow proclaimed it to be.

No one was about except a fat Basset puppy, who ruffled up an angry back and growled at the intruder standing in the shade of the tamarisk hedge. The growls of the puppy attracted a tiny sailor-clad boy, who trotted out and seized the pup by the collar.

Jack heard a sweet, clear voice from inside calling "Come in Sonnie, it's bed time. Leave the pup alone and come to mother."

The little chap looked regretfully at the puppy and the still, sunny garden outside and trotted back.

Jack did not like to remain longer; so filling a pipe, strolled on again to the next little village—a cluster of farms and an ugly slate-built coastguards' station. Leslie's curiosity was aroused concerning the occupants of the green and white bungalow behind the tamarisk hedge.

He could not resist putting a few questions to his landlady, and learnt from her that Danefield bungalow belonged to a Mrs. Lawrence, and that she lived there all the year round with her little boy, whom Jack had seen that evening.

"I don't rightly know, sir, if she's a widow, leastways we think she is, for although she wears no mourning, and has never said if she is a widow or not, we haven't none of us seen no Mr. Lawrence. Sometimes her sister stays with her, but as a rule she is alone with her old servant and her little Sonnie. It's a lonesome life for one so young and pretty as she is. Did you happen to see her as you passed, sir?"

"No, I didn't see her, but her bungalow looked so pretty and well kept that I felt sure its owner must be nice, and pretty too," added Jack inconsequently.

After his morning dip Jack strolled along the shore, and climbed up where the cliff was lowest opposite the bungalow.

On the step under the shade of the verandah sat a girl combing out her long curly hair still damp and clinging from the sea, on a lower step sat Sonnie, holding the brush and chattering away busily, his little sunburnt face upturned eagerly to the lovely one above him. As Jack's figure blocked out the view of the sea through the gap in the tamarisk hedge, the girl looked up and shook the sunny curls from her face. Seeing a stranger she rose hastily, and calling Sonnie went within.

Jack was forced to move on, reviling the ill-luck that had made the girl look up. If he had been curious about the occupants of the green-and-white bungalow by the sea before, he was doubly so now. Surely that could not be Mrs. Lawrence, that lovely girl with the sunny golden curls; it must be her sister, of whom his landlady had told him.

Later in the day he was buying stamps in the post-office when the fat Basset pup blundered into the shop, tugging little Sonnie after her, whose little strength was hardly enough to hold back the sturdy puppy.

Jack felt rather than saw the girl with the lovely hair enter, for he purposely looked away; he heard her ask for some bacon in a voice that he recognised at once as the one which had called Sonnie to come to "mother" the evening before.

"It must be Mrs. Lawrence," he said to himself, and began to turn over in his mind some plan by which he could obtain an introduction to her, as he knew no one as yet in the village who could introduce him.

Digitized by Google

But fortune capriciously favoured him sooner than he dared to hope.

The Basset pup, while Sonnie's attention had wandered to the contemplation of a bottle of sweets, had been sniffing at a row of rabbits hanging within reach, and now seized its opportunity and a rabbit and made off out of the shop with its prize.

The sudden tug at the chain upset Sonnie, and Leslie hurried to pick him up. In falling he had struck his head against a chair, and, notwithstanding manful efforts, the tears would come.

Jack lifted him up on to the counter, and hastily pulled out some pennies for sweets. The little chap's face brightened at once; he and his new friend began to seriously discuss the rival merits of butterscotch and chocolate. Mrs. Lawrence thanked Jack for his kindness, and the ice was broken.

The puppy was captured and brought back, and the trio left the shop together, Sonnie's little brown hand slipped confidingly into Jack's, and his little tongue wagged busily.

Quite naturally Jack walked up the village with the little boy and his mother. At the cross road he stopped, hoping that Mrs. Lawrence would ask him to come to the bungalow to tea; but Mrs. Lawrence had relapsed into silence, and was walking along abstractedly, her thoughts evidently far away. She put out her hand when Leslie wished her good-bye.

"Come and sail boats to-morrow with me, Mr. Leslie, do," pleaded Sonnie.

Jack lifted Sonnie on to the counter and he was soon made happy with butterscotch and chocolate.

His mother roused herself, and her deep blue eyes met Jack's for a moment as she said, "Do come and cheer our loneliness if you care to, Mr. Leslie. Sonnie often longs for a playfellow."

So it was as Sonnie's playfellow he was to come, mused Jack, as he went back to his lodgings to write his letters. Well, anyhow he was only too pleased to go just for the hope of seeing those blue eyes again and the sunshine glittering in the curls that clustered in fascinating rings under the sailor hat.

Mrs. Lawrence was lovely, the loveliest woman he had ever seen, Jack thought as he sat with an empty sheet of note paper before him, and gazed out of the window at the shocks of yellow corn standing in the opposite field. The corn reminded him of her hair, the sky of her blue eyes.

With an impatient sigh he took up his pen again, and forced himself to write a dry business letter. Then he wrote a letter to his greatest pal, Lawrie Fielding, and asked him to come down for a few days.

His letters finished, he strolled along the shore, and was rewarded by a glimpse of Mrs. Lawrence with a big holland apron on, watering the geraniums, which added so much to the appearance of her dainty little bungalow.

Sonnie and the Basset pup were racing after each other, the puppy giving tongue lustily, to Sonnie's great delight.

Passing again a little later everything was quiet, and Jack guessed that Sonnie was being put to bed. Leslie lay down on the coarse grass at the edge of the low cliff. Presently Mrs. Lawrence came down and strolled out on to the sands; she caught sight of Jack, and nodded pleasantly. He jumped up and joined her.

She seemed less absent-minded than when she had said good-bye to him that afternoon, and Jack soon found himself chatting away to her as if their acquaintance was of much longer duration than a few hours. "I have written to ask a great friend of mine to come down and stay for a few days, I am so delighted with this dear little place. I am sure that it is just the quiet little nook that Fielding would love too."

Mrs. Lawrence stumbled suddenly. Leslie involuntarily put his hand on her arm, and she recovered herself instantly.

"When is your friend coming?" she asked quietly.

"On Saturday if he can get away," replied Jack, hoping that she would ask them both to the bungalow on Sunday.

Lawrie Fielding arrived, and the first walk that Jack took him was along the cliff past the colony of tents to the little green-and-white bungalow behind the tamarisk hedge. They stopped at the gap, the rustic gates were closed, the parrot's cage was missing from its accustomed place, the blinds were down—without a doubt the bungalow was empty.

Jack Leslie could hardly believe the evidence of his own eyes! When he had told Mrs. Lawrence Captain Fielding was coming on Saturday she had said nothing about leaving; surely if she had intended being away she would have said so, recent acquaintance though he was.

Captain Fielding was rather amused, and chaffed Jack about his beautiful widow who had left so suddenly. He had a bitter, sarcastic way of talking about matrimony, and told his friend that evidently the widow did not intend to risk matrimony a second time, and had gone away to escape the fascination of his good-looking friend.

Apparently Leslie took his chaff well; but he secretly worried and fretted over the unexplained absence of the woman with whom he had fallen in love.

He had met her constantly since their first unconventional introduction in the village shop, and each meeting had left him more deeply in love with beautiful Sybil Lawrence.

Digitized by Google

than the last, and now she was gone, suddenly, without a word.

The suddenness of it hurt him. She might have told him. When would she be back? Barely ten days of his holiday remained.

Without Mrs. Lawrence the little seaside village became commonplace.

The little thatched cottages which had seemed so artistic when he arrived, looked more like the cardboard cottages of a stage village now, the shore was lonely, the whole place dull, and had it not been for Lawrie Fielding, Leslie felt he would have moved on to some crowded, fashionable seaside place in which to forget Sybil Lawrence's sweet blue eyes and sunny hair.

But Fielding liked the place, and was quite content to stay with Jack for the remainder of his holiday. All places were more or less alike to him since the sorrow which had spoilt his life two years ago.

Jack Leslie had not known him then and had often wondered what had made him so bitter in speaking of women. He knew that Fielding had been married, and supposed him to be a widower.

One evening as they sat outside in the dusk under the shade of the tamarisk hedge on the cliff, Fielding's usual reserve melted, and he offered for the first time during their friendship to tell Jack the story of the trouble which shadowed his life.

He knocked the ashes out of his pipe and began.

"I fell in love with and married the prettiest girl I had ever seen, Jack. She had the sweetest nature and most lovable ways that you can imagine, and we were perfectly happy. We cared, or at least I should say I cared, for nothing in the world but my darling." Captain Fielding's voice was full of regret and bitterness, and he paused. Jack sat silent and waited for him to resume.

"My wife had a great friend, a girl whom she had known all her life. I never really liked her because it seemed to me that she made mischief between Sybil and me, but I was so devoted to my wife that I never could object to anything that seemed to please her and make her happy.

"Then this girl, I won't mention her name, began to drop little hints about a brother officer of mine who was with us a great deal, and whom Sybil had known several years longer than she had known me, in fact it was he who had introduced us to each other.

"The girl was so clever and instilled the poison into my mind so gradually that even now I cannot recall the exact moment when I began to suspect Sybil's most innocent act."

"But," interrupted Jack impetuously, "you surely didn't let that girl influence you against your wife, against the woman who was all the world to you?"

"Ah, I don't wonder at your indignation, old chap, of course I wouldn't without proofs had she been even cleverer than she was, but unfortunately there was plenty of proof in the shape of letters. Oh, Jack, I can hardly bear to remember those awful letters that have ruined my happiness.

"I have never felt the same since I read them. I can see Sybil now, she came into the room just as I finished reading the last; she had Baby Audrey in her arms. The little mite was crying, she was only two, and had fallen and knocked herself. Sybil was loving and kissing her. As she came in I started to my feet and held the letters out. 'God knows I don't want a scandal,' I cried, 'but if ever I see your face again don't hold me responsible for what I do.'

"She stood there, white to the lips with terror, holding her baby in her arms. I had never spoken a sharp word to her before, Jack, in all our married life, I swear. She tried to speak, to explain.

"Then drew herself up proudly and walked out of the room."

"What then?" asked Jack. "You gave her a chance to clear herself?"

"I have never seen her since. I went out of the house in a rage. When I returned she had gone, and she had taken little Audrey with her! On my writing-table on top of the fatal letters lay a tiny note from Sybil. 'You have broken my heart, Jack. Good-bye.' That was all, no attempt to explain, nothing more." He broke off.

"Give me a cigarette, Jack, if you have one. Now you know why I talk a little bitterly sometimes about matrimony."

"Do you know where she is now?" asked his friend, as he gave him his cigarette-case. "Don't think me inquisitive, but I am awfully interested."

"No, I haven't an idea. Sometimes I long to find her, to hold her in my arms again, and forgive and forget. I would have her back gladly, but what is the use? I couldn't make her happy now if I couldn't keep her love then. She could never have loved me, for those letters dated from before we were married until within a few weeks of the day that I read them. The man had been ordered abroad, he had just exchanged, and had left a fortnight before.

"No married woman who loved her husband as I believed, poor, deluded fool, that Sybil loved me could receive such letters. She was a bad lot, Jack, and when you've said that you've said all there is to say. Come, let's go along the sands before we turn in."

Captain Fielding and Mrs. Lawrence were standing very close together.

Digitized by Google

Winter.

A white rime covered the tamarisk, outlining it with brilliant sparkles against the deep blue of the winter sky. The waves were dashing against the shingle and flinging it over the low cliff, strewing the coarse grass with stones from the sea-shore and trails of brown seaweed. It had been a week of storms, but to-day the wind had died down, and only the unrest of the sea told of the storms which had kept the inhabitants of the little village within doors for days, while the wind and hail battered and fought outside and swept in wild gusts across the level sands.

Jack Leslie and his friend, Lawrie Fielding, had just arrived by the morning train. They had wired but a few days before engaging the bungalow close to the little green and white one that belonged to Mrs. Lawrence.

The months which had passed since the summer, had not blotted out the recollection of that first week of Jack's holiday by the sea, which had been spent in growing friendship with beautiful Mrs. Lawrence. Leslie had had a longing ever since to return, and the brief holiday which Christmas brings, he resolved to spend at Saltleigh in the hope of seeing her again.

He had asked Lawrie Fielding to go with him, and having bought some fascinating clockwork toys for Sonnie, they journeyed down.

They could tell at once by the outside of the bungalow that Mrs. Lawrence was at home, for they heard Sonnie's voice, and someone opened the door to let out the Basset hound which Leslie gratefully recognised as the pup which had led to his first introduction to Mrs. Lawrence in the summer.

While Jack was arranging matters with the woman who was to "do" for them, Captain Fielding went off for a stroll to see what Saltleigh looked like in such different weather. Jack had his talk, unpacked and set out his photographs and books to give the little sitting-room a "homey" look and still Captain Fielding did not return.

"I wonder where he can have gone," he said to himself, and having found his pipe and tobacco, opened the door to go and meet him.

The fresh salt wind came in straight off the sea. A few steps out, and Jack stopped suddenly. In the little rustic summer-house in the most sheltered corner of the tamarisk inclosure stood Capt. Fielding holding Mrs. Lawrence in his arms, her pretty golden hair tossed by the breeze lay against his dark coat, and her sweet blue eyes which Jack had thought the loveliest in the world were gazing up into the dark passionate face above her. Leslie could not hear what they were saying, but as he looked the dark head bent towards the fair one, and all the misunderstanding, the trouble, the regret, were forgotten and forgiven in one long kiss.

With a smothered cry Jack went indoors and shut himself into his tiny bedroom. He spent a very bad quarter of an hour in there by himself until the hall door opening announced Capt. Fielding's return. The carefully cooked lunch was growing cold when Jack at last emerged from his room. Fielding's face was transformed, all the bitterness and cynicism were smoothed away, and his old happy expression had returned. It would have been difficult to find a more morose and woebegone object than the erstwhile jaunty Jack Leslie.

"Don't tell me, Lawrie," he said miserably. "I know, I guess, I saw you with her just now in the summer-house. what an ass I have been!"

"Why, my dear old chap, Mrs. Lawrence is charming, and blushed most becomingly when we told her you were down here too."

"Don't make fun of me Lawrie, by Jove," fiercely, "that's more than I can stand. I tell you I saw you just now in the summer-house," with a dignity born of despair.

Suddenly Fielding burst out laughing.

"And so you thought that was Mrs. Lawrence whom I was holding, that was her sister, my own dear wife, Sybil Fielding," with a proud, glad ring in his voice. Jack's face changed as if by magic.

"They are twin sisters," Capt. Fielding went on to explain; "both called Sybil, but Sybil Lawrence is a widow with one little boy Sonnie, and my wife was staying here with her when you arrived last summer. You happened to mention my name and she of course told her sister who persuaded her to leave at once in order to avoid me. Mrs. Lawrence went away with her, but I think," slyly, "that it was very reluctantly, Jack."

"I am awfully glad, old chap, that you two are to be happy again. I suppose, after all, it was all a mistake, wasn't it?"

"If I hadn't been such an impetuous, credulous fool, it would all have been cleared up long ago. That girl altered the date of those passionate love letters, they were written by Bingham to Sybil, but two years before we were engaged. What she must have gone through these last two years, poor darling, makes me miserable to think of. Take my advice, Jack, and don't listen to what any one says about your wife not even if they can prove it."

After lunch Lawrie Fielding insisted upon Jack going with him to Mrs. Lawrence's bungalow, and Jack feeling unaccountably nervous, went.

They had a merry Christmas Eve, little Audrey and Sonnie playing delightedly with the toys that Jack had brought.

When the evening came to an end Mrs. Fielding fetched a fur cape and strolled off with her husband along the cliff.

It was a starlit night, frosty and calm, the wind had completely died away, and the sea lay in the cold moonlight at rest.

As the others disappeared in the distance Jack turned to Sybil Lawrence and asked her to be his wife, he waited anxiously for her answer:

"Yes, Jack, I will," said Sybil softly. Outside the Christmas bells were ringing, "Peace on earth, goodwill towards men."

"You have indeed made my Christmas a happy one," whispered Jack, as he took her in his arms. F. Lindsey.

Judge: "How old are you, Miss?" Elderly Female: "I am— I am——" Judge: "Better hurry up; every moment makes it worse."

"We won't print any such stuff as that," said the editor loftily, as he handed back the manuscript. "Well, you needn't be so haughty about it," retorted the irregular contributor; "you're not the only one who won't print it."

Verses Will Win Gramophones.

It is quite the exception to find people who don't like music; there are many who are fond of it, but yet either cannot make it themselves or if they can are not able to afford to buy a piano or other musical instrument. To such, a Gramophone would be an inestimable boon. The only thing you have to do to get the sound is to put in the record of the song or piece you want to hear and then set the machine in motion.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by writing on the back of a post-card the best four-lined verse you can descriptive of Short Stories. The words "Short Stories" must appear in one of the lines.

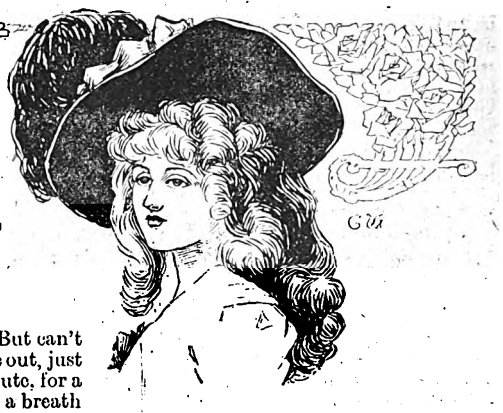
A Gramophone will be given to each of the ten readers who submit the best verses.

Post-cards only must be used, and should be addressed to the VERSE EDITOR, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, February 24th.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must only enter on that understanding

Digitized by Google

Miss Yarwood's Special Providence.



The Love Story of a Struggling Artist.

THERE were odours of turpentine and hot paint upon the air when Nora thrust her curly head into Miss Yarwood's studio.

"Wh-ow!" she cried, "aren't you burnt up? What is it now?"

"It's pin trays—six of them! And I am too warm, but I wanted to dry the colour well; there's so little time."

"I wonder you don't die, Miss Alice! You are cooped up here from daylight until dark, and even after dark, now that so many orders are coming in. How late did you work last night?"

"Twelve," said Miss Yarwood, half apologetically. "But you don't know how thankful I am that I can do those Dresden designs at night! Look here; aren't these dainty? I'm going to fire them to-night"—and Miss Yarwood straightened her stiffened figure and led the way to a tall cabinet filled with odd bits of china, from among which she indicated one particular row of tiny cups and saucers.

"Oh, the dainty darlings!" cried the young girl, with positive rapture. "How you do them I can't even imagine. And will those black dots and scrolls be gold after the firing?"

"Gold as can be!" laughed the other. "They're an order for Kitty Birch; for a wedding present to her dearest friend."

"What will you get for them?" Nora asked suddenly.

Miss Yarwood hesitated a moment, and a little flame of colour shot into the pallor of her cheek as she replied:

"Thirty shillings."

"Apiece!"

"No, no—for all of them."

Nora stared blankly and then fairly shrieked:

"Only thirty shillings for the whole half-dozen? Why, you have worked for days on them, and—what did the plain china cost?"

"Half-a-crown apiece."

"That's fifteen shillings for the set. And how much gold have you used on them?"

"Not more than five shillings' worth, if that much," came the faint response.

"Then you'll get ten shillings for working two days and nights, spoiling your eyes, breaking your devoted back, ruining your health, and—and the firing to do. I forgot to count that and the gas. Miss Alice, my dear, you are an idiot! You make me absolutely furious!" and Nora stalked to the other side of the room and flounced angrily into a seat by the low window.

"Listen, dearie." Miss Alice spoke with a little deprecatory gesture. "It's Kitty's very, very dearest friend, and she did want to give her something charmingly pretty, and yet thirty shillings was all she could afford."

"Then why didn't she use up her own strength and nerves and eyesight instead of yours, in her investment? She can manage to wear beautiful clothes and warm furs and several hats a season, while you are going about in a cloak you've worn for five years—and even your best dress frayed at the edges."

"Now, Nora! I'm sure my cloak is still stylish and pretty, and I bound the frayed edges only last week, so the dress looks as good as new. I'm sure I always look nice."

"Nice!' You look like an angel!"—and impulsive Nora flung both arms about the little spinster and kissed her hot cheek. "But can't you come out, just for a minute, for a walk and a breath of fresh air?"

Miss Yarwood shook her head with a mock-woeful grimace.

"I must get the cream jug ready for the firing, and all the gold's to put on that vase yet. To-morrow's Sunday, dear; we'll have a long walk then, in the afternoon."

Nora sighed and left the room; but Miss Yarwood smiled as her fine brush trailed delicate lines of gold over the pale blossoms on the ivory-tinted cream jug.

"Nora doesn't realise how fortunate I am," she said. "I never had so many orders before."

Meanwhile Nora was freeing her mind to Cæsar, the huge mastiff, who stretched his great legs as he rose from the doormat.

"She's killing herself, Cæsar, for five shillings a day. Come, sir, you need a run. We'll go out and get a bag of cool oranges for that hot little goose. There, now, one, two—run!" It was twilight and the street was still. "Nobody'll know we are school-teachers, Cæsar. This is glorious! Go it, I say—Oh! oh, dear!—gracious!—I beg your pardon. If it isn't Doctor Grimes!"

"Or what is left of him," that gentleman flustered. "Will you tell me, miss, what you mean by tilting headlong in this fashion at respectable old gentlemen?"

"If you please, sir, we were in a bit of a hurry going for oranges for Miss Alice."

"If she needs 'em that badly I think I'll turn back with you to see that you get a good sort. M—h—ah, how is Miss Alice to-day?"

"Cooked, sir."

"What?"

"She's being slowly roasted, I say, in that little studio of hers. I'd like to be her mother, Doctor Grimes, for about a year, till I could teach her some sense!"

"I have found Miss Yarwood a lady of extremely sound sense and good judgment," said Doctor Grimes, with dignity.

"Then you don't know her as well as I do," came the unabashed retort. "You don't know her business methods. She's doing charitable work for people who could buy her—house, lot, and all—and who call themselves her patrons! You don't know, perhaps, that she has her breakfast at six o'clock in the morning that she may lose no minute of precious daylight; that she gives her eyes and her strength and her real artistic talent to the graceless people of Birchwood for the munificent sum of five shillings a day."

"You don't mean it!" gasped the doctor.

"Indeed I do! And I want to fight somebody. She's almost ill, this minute; but she will tell me, smiling sweetly, that she must earn her bread and butter, and that she's so thankful she can!"

Doctor Grimes cleared his throat.

"I haven't been long in Birchwood," he said. "I fancied Miss Yarwood did her china painting mainly for amusement."

"Well, that's about all she gets out of it," said the girl, grimly; "but even amusements may be indulged in to excess. Oranges, yes—a dozen of the best."

Digitized by Google

"And a couple of pounds of those Californian grapes," put in the doctor, pointing with his stick to the saw-dusty box over which luscious white clusters were hanging. "Well, well, well! There ought to be a guardian, I should say. She looks well enough to other people's needs. There was that Osgood family—shiftless things!—I first ran across her there——"

"That's where her muff went, because Mrs. Osgood's hands looked cold—big fat things!—and her own have frozen blue ever since. She never will learn any sense."

"Tut! tut! Miss Nora. No, you needn't say I sent the grapes—I shouldn't dare"—and the big doctor really looked alarmed. "But I hope she'll eat them."

"If she doesn't her lodger will," and Nora laughed mischievously.

She was still smiling, over thoughts all her own, when she looked into the studio again at tea time. Miss Yarwood dropped her brush for a moment, and looked knowingly at the rosy, girlish figure.

"I saw you, Nora, you rogue—both of you. And, my dear, there's the right sort of man; how different from those light creatures Billy Smith and Tom. Not that Billy and Tom aren't nice boys in their way, but the doctor is so fine and big and handsome! And I saw him look after you, Nora dear, as you came in at the gate, almost as if he would have to turn and follow."

"It's likely enough he wanted to," laughed the girl.

Miss Yarwood looked at her half wistfully.

"Don't take it too lightly, Nora, my big, happy girl. Love doesn't come to all lives—not such love as his would be. I tell you, he's a real nobleman, Nora."

"Too fat," commented Nora laconically.

Miss Yarwood looked aghast. Then she said with a little quiet dignity:

"He's a large man, not fat. We'll go to supper, Nora."

* * * * *

They had come back from their walk on Sunday afternoon, and if Miss Yarwood's hands were blue with cold her cheeks were pink enough, and her soft, brown eyes held warm lights in their depths.

"Wasn't it delightful?" she said, with a long-drawn breath as she sank into the chair Nora drew before the blazing coals. "I feel like another person. And how beautiful the fire is! Mary always looks after that. My life ought to be one long song of thanksgiving. A cosy home, my very own, a devoted servant, a friend—and what a friend you have been to me, Nora!"

She paused with a little choke in her voice, and Nora had not the heart to repeat aloud her running commentary:

"'A cosy home,' earned by her own hard struggles; 'a devoted servant,' at exorbitant wages a week; and 'a friend,' Nora, the lodger, who pays ten shillings for a one pound room and her board."

"It has always been like this, Nora, since I can first remember."

Miss Yarwood had thrown off her coat and was looking ruminantly into the coals.

Nora swung a low chair forward, and poked the fire a trifle viciously.

"I am tempted to tell you something I have never told a living soul!" cried Miss Yarwood, with a little start, turning the brown eyes full upon the beloved lodger. Her voice was low, as became the telling of a deep secret, but clear and sweet and alive with feeling. "It is this, Nora: That I believe myself to be, in a special sense, one favoured of Heaven—a charge of Providence. Other people have had terrible trials and troubles——"

"And so have you!" burst forth the girl impetuously.

Miss Yarwood turned meditative eyes upon her.

"Oh, yes, of course there have been clouds and rainy days, but God kept his sun shining steadily for me behind them. Always, I have been specially protected and guarded and shielded from harm. To-night, for very thankfulness, I can't be dumb. Let me tell you, Nora, I had a sweetheart once——"

Nora sat alert.

"I was very young. I hardly knew him, for he was a stranger in our town, but I loved him desperately—I think I really did. We were engaged to be married. My clothes were made—what pleasure I took in them! And the day fixed. But just a week before it, an officer came and—arrested James.

"Nora, that handsome young sweetheart of mine was as cold-blooded a villain as ever lived! He had robbed his own father, gambled away his money—I can't tell you all the story of his sins! What I want you to see is that Providence was watching over me to keep me from becoming the miserable wife of that wicked man.

"Of course it hurt for a long time. But after awhile I was helped past it till all the pain was gone, and in a strange, sweet way, it seemed to me that bitter experience helped me to appreciate the really grand, good man I later learnt to love."

"And he?" Miss Nora leant forward as she asked the question and held her breath.

"He taught me how truly fine and pure a man's life may be, how all-ennobling his love. I honoured him so entirely that when he afterwards found he had been mistaken in his love for me, I could only admire the consideration, the real nobility of character, that prompted him to frankly tell me so."

The girl by the fireside gave a little gulp and looked away; but if the faintest shadow crossed the fair face of the elder woman there lurked no trace of bitterness within it.

"I love children, Nora—you know that. And I used to dream day-dreams of babies lisping about my own knees, babies with Robert's fine, white brow, and Robert's clustering curls. But even this lack in my life is compensated to me. There isn't a child in this whole neighbourhood that doesn't love to come to Auntie Alice's. On all sides, you see, I find love and tenderness. And then this beautiful gift of mine! What if, like many a poor soul, I had to eke out a miserable existence with a poorly paid needle, or doing work too heavy for my strength?"

"Oh, you'd do it, and shout praises over your machine or your wash-tub."

Miss Yarwood laughed a little joyous laugh.

"What a tease you are, Nora. One would almost think you didn't believe in my talent or my—my secret."

"I'll tell you what I believe," said Nora seriously. "I believe you have the sunniest disposition a woman was ever blessed with!"

"Yes, I have that, too!" beamed Miss Yarwood, with the naïvete of a child. "There isn't anything a kindly Providence hasn't given me."

Nora looked at the re-bound best dress, at the thin little figure, the tired but smiling eyes, and forbore to speak.

"I wonder what she'd do with half the blessings most women have?" she thought.

* * * * *

It happened in the most curious way, just three nights later, that big Doctor Grimes, passing Miss Yarwood's cottage, stopped in the shadow of the fir tree to gaze in at the little studio; and at that same instant, Miss Yarwood leaning over her china kiln, more tired than ever, and just a little "shaky" from loss of sleep and appetite, suddenly "gave out" entirely and fell, tea-cups, pin-trays, and all, against the kiln, and on, in a heap of tinkling porcelain, to the floor.

Digitized by Google

Curiously, too, Doctor Grimes forgot all about his ridiculous shyness of the little woman, vaulted her fence (fir tree, too, he afterwards thought, so great had been his haste) and in half a flying minute reached her side, lifted her out of her pitiful ruins, and sat her bolt upright upon a chair.

She had not fainted—not she. She was only a trifle dazed, and "not very strong," as she explained. She felt there was some explanation called for, for there was absolutely no misunderstanding the fact that the big doctor, having sat her upon her chair, had shaken her soundly.

"'Not very strong,' indeed!" (Another shake.) "I have heard about it! Miss Nora says you need a guardian, and I am come to be he." His voice was harsh and angry.

"Don't you know, know, you are killing yourself?" Then it came over him suddenly just how pale and thin and pitifully small she looked, this misguided bread-winner, and he looked about wildly until his eye rested upon a cushion across in the little window seat. He strode after it; then he put it gently at the back of her head.

"I—did I—shake you, you frail little mite of a woman? I might have killed you; Heaven only knows how easily I could do it. And rather than hurt a hair of your head——"

He stopped and looked unsteadily at her, for his eyes were swimming in sudden tears. And Miss Alice felt a strange yearning in her heart towards this man whom she had selected to be dear Nora's lover.

"You didn't—shake me—very hard," she stammered. "I must have provoked you to it, falling clumsily, like that——"

He stopped her short.

"What sort of an old party do you think me, anyhow, Miss Alice? Would you believe a thing I told you as solemn truth?"

"Oh, I would!" she cried, looking steadily into the kind, grey eyes.

"Then please believe that I love you from my very heart, and that, old bachelor as I am I shall always be, unless you let me come as business manager of this firm. As Mrs. Grimes you may paint tea-cups for me alone, and I'll promise unbounded admiration and prompt pay. Will you be my wife, Alice, and let the love and care of a lifetime atone for the ugly gruffness I've shown you to-night?"

He was holding both her hands, and, kneeling there perilously on those broken bits of fine arts, could look straight into the big, brown eyes.

"I thought I had given all my heart to—to Robert—but that was long ago, and——"

"And now?"

"And now you—you remind me of him—in being so grand and good, I mean — so much so that I believe in time——"

"How much time?" cried this impatient lover. "Don't you know that since that first day in the leaky Osgood cottage I've thought of you day and night, and loved you until I've been a perfect old fool? How much time? Can't you love me in five minutes? Now?"

And the little woman, moved by some impulse, leant suddenly forward and tremulously kissed the grey-sprinkled hair of the doctor. That kiss installed the new business manager.

When Miss Nora came in five minutes later, two happier people she was sure she had never seen. But it was only to her pillow she confided, and in the dead of night, that not until she saw the big doctor's protecting arm about the little spinster did she take much stock in that "special Providence."

Maude Rittenhouse.

JOHN ATHERTON'S WOOING.

Proving the All-Powerfulness of Love.

They had reached the little gate which led to the home of Esther Bryant.

"Mr. Atherton, please don't say any more. I cannot bear it. You do not realise what you are saying. Please don't interrupt me, but help me to do my duty. I fully appreciate the honour you would confer on me as your wife, but I also realise the barriers that separate us, and which can never be broken.

"I did not dream that you would ever care for me in this way, and I only hope that you may in time know that I am in the right; and believe that it has also cost me something to speak in this way. Perhaps it is for the best that I am going to-morrow, so let us say 'Good-bye' as friends, and when we meet again let it be as friends."

She raised her eyes to his face, those sweet eyes so deeply, purely blue, and they met the sad gaze of his dark ones bent upon her. His voice was husky as he asked:

"Is this to be the end, Miss Bryant? Can I not persuade you to change that little word when I tell you how dark the future will be for me without you by my side? Why need you go miles away to earn your daily bread by teaching when I can make you so happy—that is, if you love me—and you do love me, don't you, Esther?"

"Oh, Mr. Atherton, don't ask me that! Don't make my duty any harder, nothing can make me change what I know is for the best. If we should never meet again——"

"Esther, we shall meet again. I can't say when or how, but I feel that some time in the future we shall be together. I can't urge you any more, but remember, I shall never give up hoping that some day you will return to the arms that will be waiting to receive you," and suddenly he clasped her to his heart and pressed the first lover's kiss on her sweet lips.

That was all, and as he turned away she entered the little home that was so lonely and which she was so soon to leave, the home where all her childhood and girlhood had been spent, and where the dear departed father had provided for all the wants and education of his only child.

John Atherton reached his home many hours later; a home so different from the other, where all was happiness and mirth, with girlish voices ringing through the spacious halls, and all the luxuries that heart could wish. But he saw in all this the cause of his loss—the barrier between them—and he knew that, though "years might come and years might go," no other woman could ever be his wife.

Seven years passed away, bringing many changes into the home of John Atherton. He saw his dear mother laid to rest, his sisters wedded and far away, and himself the master of the old manor and heir to the Atherton millions.

A cool day in the latter part of October a man sat idly and alone by the drawing-room window.

Suddenly he heard a light step in the hall and the swish of a woman's skirt at the door, and he arose and faced the intruder, but spoke not a word. A tall, glorious creature, with red-gold hair and violet eyes, came towards him, and holding out her slim white hand said softly: "Mr. Atherton, don't you know me?"

At that familiar voice the deep eyes were raised to her own, and in that one glance she knew it all—that, though he looked at her, he saw her not. He was blind.

"Esther," he cried, "have you come at last?" and he opened his arms and the bright head was lying on his breast.

It did not take long to tell of all that had passed since they parted; of his long illness and its terrible results and of her success in her field of labour.

But no longer was John Atherton's face sad, no longer did he shun his friends and acquaintances, for he had found his sight, and he saw not with his eyes but with the lips of the woman he loved—his wife

Cecil Winter.

Digitized by Google

Why She Wanted to Marry.

Guardian: "Why should a rich and happily-situated young woman like you want to get married?" She: "I'm afraid of burglars."

Taking No Risks.

"I am not fond of the stage, Violet," said Augustus; "but I hear your father on the stairs, and I think I'd better go before the foot lights."

Very Little to Choose Between Them.

He (angrily): "You take me for a fool, don't you?" She: "No, I take you for a possible husband, but (dreamily) there's not much difference."

She Liked Married Life.

Friend: "Well, Ethel, how do you like married life?" Ethel (enthusiastically): "It's simply delightful. We've been married a week and have had eight quarrels, and I got the best of it every time."

Glad She Only Squeezed Through.

Professor (to a young lady student): "Your marks are very few, and you have only just passed." Young Lady: "Oh, I am so glad." Professor (surprised): "Why?" Young Lady: "I do so love a tight squeeze."

The Footprints Would Show.

"I'm afraid papa doesn't like you a bit, George," said the girl to her fiancé. He: "Well, what of it? I've got too much sand to be afraid of the old man." She (apprehensively): "Yes, but sand is just the stuff to make footprints in, George."

Mrs. Brown's Experiences.

Mr. Green (who has been listening to Mr. Brown's account of a trip round the coast): "And how did you like it, Mrs. Brown?" Mrs. Brown: "Well, I didn't see much of the scenery, but the cabin was very comfortable, and the stewardess a most sympathetic woman."

How He Got Out of It.

Frisky Spinster: "How many dances are you going to give me to-night, Captain Waxham?" Captain Waxham: "Oh, I'm so sorry, but there's not enough men, you know, and I've just been told by Mrs. Masham to dance with the girls who—a—who are not likely to get partners." (Asks the girl just behind him for three waltzes and a polka.)

Would He Return?

The parting was sad, the tears were bitter. Hide, sun, thy kindly face, and gather, ye storms, your blackest inky scroll! Tenderly kiss the pale wan cheeks; brush back the damp, clinging auburn locks from the pale, high brow which a fond mother's lips have kissed since infancy. Speak the last and parting words, the words which make us linger on their echoes. Say good-bye for aye; press the cold hand and watch his slow retreating form, which fades away for ever. He is going to play in his first football match!

What a Shame!

He: "That fellow over there cheated me out of a cool million." She: "How could that be?" He: "Wouldn't let me marry his daughter."

The Kind of Payment.

"Do you pay for poetry?" asked the pretty girl. "Y—yes," replied the editor with some hesitation. "What do you pay?" "Compliments."

Wise Tourists.

He: "And where are you going next?" She (Cook's tourist): "Milan." He: "Why, you are in Milan now." She: "Oh, are we? Well, then, Geneva."

Hard Work Steering!

"What is that place down there?" asked she (on her first voyage). "Why, that is the steerage," answered he. "And does it take all these people to make the boat go straight?"

Neither Was Correct.

"Which do you think is correct?" asked the studious young woman, "'I would rather go home,' or 'I had rather go home?'" "Neither," replied Mr. I. Nevergo; "I'd rather stay here."

It Made all the Difference.

Clara: "Why, Tony, do you have that candle up there on the electric light?" Tony: "Well, the electric light is, they say, equal to sixteen candles, but you have no idea what a difference the seventeenth makes."

Where He Had the Advantage.

"Janette, I'm afraid you are a vain little wife. You gaze into your mirror so much." "You oughtn't to blame me for that. I haven't your advantage." "What's that?" "You can see my face without looking into a mirror."

Papa Wanted Practice.

She: "And you say you would die for me?" Mr. Boresome: "A thousand times." She: "Would you mind doing it just once—straight away? You know papa has been appointed coroner, and he hasn't had any practice yet."

Looked Like a Proposal Soon.

Mother: "When do you suppose that young man who calls upon you will make known his intentions, Laura?" Laura: "I think he will propose pretty soon. Last evening he was very anxious to know whether I could dress on twenty pounds a year."

To Help His Memory.

Who should know a man's weakness if not his lawful wife? "What in the name of Jupiter have you sewn up all the pockets of my overcoat for?" asked Mr. Wilson. "My dear," said Mrs. Wilson, "I have an important letter to my milliner that I want you to post."

Where the Difference Lay.

He was going to propose to her, and he prefaced his proposal with the following conundrum: "Why," he asked, "is your house more notable than the Agricultural Hall, Islington?" "Is it so?" "It is." "In what respect?" "The Agricultural Hall contained only the World's Fair, but this house contains the world's fairest." His proposal was favourably received.

Getting His Own Back.

She had yawned, looked at the clock, pretended she was sleepy, and in other ways had given him to understand that it was time to go. He felt nettled on observing these signs of her desire to get rid of him, and determined to have revenge. "Won't you sing something for me?" he asked. "Sing at this time of night? Why didn't you ask me before? Why do you want me to sing now?" "Well—er, the fact is, I want to be reconciled to leaving you."

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

The Hall-porter's Doubts.

WHEN one o'clock came and Edith had not arrived, the three men waiting in the hotel made no further effort to conceal their anxiety. The impetuous Fairholme was eager to commence an immediate search of Marseilles, but Brett steadily adhered to his resolution not to stir from their sitting-room until either Miss Talbot came back in person, or it became quite certain that she was detained by some other influence than her own unfettered volition.

"It may be," he argued, "that she will require some action on our part the moment we see her, and nothing could be more stupid than for the three of us to be wandering about this great city hopelessly inquiring for a missing English lady, whilst she was impatiently awaiting our return in the knowledge that valuable time was being lost to no purpose. What is there to fear? Miss Talbot is absolutely unknown to all the parties concerned in the affair. Even if she attracted their attention, which is improbable, it is almost inconceivable that they should connect her with the search being made for them. The only risk she runs is that of insult by some semi-intoxicated reveller, and, even in a rowdy city like this, it must, indeed, be a strange locality in which she would be denied some protection. Of course I will be much relieved when Miss Talbot returns, but up to the present I see no reason for undue anxiety on our part. Indeed, we ought to congratulate ourselves on the fact that she deems it necessary to leave us for such a long period. The probability is that she is making highly important discoveries which may tend materially to reduce the area of inquiry."

With this view Talbot could not help concurring, so Fairholme had to content himself by smoking many cigarettes and walking uneasily about the room.

Sit down he could not, whilst any casual ring at the hotel door found him leaning over the balustrade of the inner court and listening intently for the first words of the new arrival.

But the Englishmen were not the only persons in the hotel that night whose composure was disturbed. Their extraordinary behaviour caused uneasiness to the manager and those members of his staff who remained on duty.

The facts disclosed by the hall-porter were certainly remarkable. Only one member of the party had behaved in a normal manner. Sir Hubert Fitzjames, soon after his arrival, went quietly to bed, but the hall-porter's report as to the conduct of the others was passing strange.

One of them, to his surprise, had rung up the Prefecture of Police in Paris on the telephone. The others were standing at the hotel door, gazing quietly enough at the passers-by, when suddenly about midnight much excitement arose amongst them. They conversed eagerly in their own tongue for a few moments, and the lady had rushed off down the street by herself, whilst her two companions ran with equal precipitancy to join the third in the sitting-room they had engaged, and there they were still seated in moody expectancy, apparently watching for some dramatic event to happen.

It was time that all good people were in bed. But it was hopeless to approach such lunatics with questions, for they were English, and no decent Frenchman could possibly hope to understand their actions or motives.

It was satisfactory that they could speak French well; therefore the manager counselled the hall-porter to exhibit patience and prudence. Moreover, milords upstairs would be sure to recompense him for an enforced vigil by a liberal tip.

At last when even the Cannebière was empty, and when the latest café had closed its doors and the final tramcar had wearily jingled its way up the hill towards a distant suburb, the electric bell jangled a noisy summons to the front door. It produced the hall-porter and Fairholme with remarkable celerity.

The Frenchman cautiously opened the door and saw outside a muffled-up female who eagerly demanded admittance. He knew by her accent that she was not a Marseillaise, but the shawl that covered her head and shoulders showed that she belonged to the working classes.

"Whom do you wish to see at this hour?" he gruffly demanded.

"I live here," said Edith. "I came here to-night with my brother from Paris. Please let me in at once."

In her excitement and breathlessness, for she had hurried at top speed from the harbour, Edith forgot that the homely garment she adopted as a disguise effectually cloaked her from the recognition of the hall-porter as from all others.

Moreover her French accent was too good. It deceived the man even more effectually than did the shawl.

"Oh, really now," he said, "this is for laughter! A woman like you staying at the hotel! Be off, or I will call a gendarme."

In his amazement at her demand he had not heard Fairholme's rapid approach behind him. He was now swung unceremoniously out of the way and the earl jumped forward to seize Edith in his arms.

"My darling girl," he cried "where have you been? We almost gave you up for lost. Where is your hat? Where did you get that shawl?" And all the time he was hugging her so fiercely that it was absolutely impossible for her to say a single word. At length she disengaged herself.

"Don't be so ridiculous," she said, "but let me come in and close the door. The hall-porter will think we are cracked."

She summarised the hall-porter's sentiments most accurately. He explained the transaction to the manager with most eloquent pantomime, and the two marvelled greatly at the weird proceedings of their strange guests.

"Ah," said the manager at length, "now that mademoiselle has returned, perhaps they will go to bed."

Digitized by Google

At this instant Brett's voice was heard upon the stairs. He wanted the telephone again.

Edith had rapidly detailed her adventures to her astonished auditors, and Brett seemed to resolve upon some plan of action with the lightning rapidity peculiar to him at once.

Owing to the late hour he got through to Paris without much difficulty, and then he returned to the sitting-room, where Edith was rehearsing in greater detail all that had happened since she left them at the hotel door. Brett explained to his companions the motives of his second telephonic message.

"I am convinced," he said, "that Grosjean is in communication with his daughter. For this reason I do not wish the police to put in an appearance at the Café Noir until to-morrow night, or rather to-night, for we have long entered upon another day. I wished to have a reasonable time for quiet inquiry at Marseilles before mademoiselle could be apprised of our presence here. Miss Talbot's remarkable discovery has, however, wholly changed my plans. Mlle. Beaucaire and her lover have set off for some unknown destination, and the best chance we have of discovering it is to secure the immediate arrest of her father. Possibly, being taken by surprise at this hour of the morning, some document may be found upon him which will reveal his daughter's destination. It occurs to me that she half expected him to arrive by a late train. Again, when the fishing-smack puts into port, the girl will probably adopt some method of communicating with him, and that communication must come into our hands, not into his. So I have telephoned the police officials in Paris to raid the Cabaret Noir forthwith, and it is probable that they may report developments within the next two or three hours."

"Is there no chance of your discovering the whereabouts of that fishing smack?" said Fairholme.

"In what way?" demanded Brett.

"Well, this is a big port you know, and there are always tugs knocking about with steam up, on the off-chance of their services being required. Isn't it possible to charter a steam-boat and set off after the smack?"

"I do not think so," said Brett. "I imagine it would be wasted effort. By this time the Belles Sœurs is well out to sea. She can go in a dozen different directions. She may beat along the coast towards Toulon and the Riviera. She can make towards Corsica, Sardinia, the Balearic Islands, Spain, or the mouth of the Rhone. She will certainly not show any lights, and I personally feel that although there is, perhaps, a thousand to one chance we might fall in with her, it will be far better for our purpose to remain quietly here and await developments in Paris."

"Anyhow," remarked Fairholme, convinced that his proposal was useless, "it will be an easy matter for the authorities to ascertain the port that she arrives at."

Brett shook his head dubiously.

"I have my doubts on that point," he said. "The man who has thus far kept himself so easily ahead of all pursuers, and exhibited such a wealth of resource in his methods, may well be trusted to cover up his tracks effectually. There is even a possibility that the Belles Sœurs will never be seen again, and that her number will long remain vacant on the shipping register of Marseilles. However, we shall see."

"Then, Mr. Brett," put in Edith quietly, with a tired smile, "I suppose we may go to bed?"

"Most certainly, Miss Talbot. You have earned your rest more than any of us to-night," he answered.

He held out his hand to wish her good-night, but she demanded with some surprise, "What are you going to do? Surely you want some sleep?"

"I will remain here," he said. "I have bribed the hall-porter to keep awake, and I may be wanted on the telephone at any moment."

"Then I will stop with you," cried Fairholme.

"And I, too," chimed in Talbot.

"You will do nothing of the sort," he answered with pleasant insistence. "You will just be off, both of you, and get some hours of sound sleep. You may need all your

RENEWAL OF YOUTHFUL GRACE

BY THE

"RUSSELL" TREATMENT.

To those persons, especially, who are able to boast of "good looks," there can be nothing more vexatious than the sudden development of stoutness which too frequently surprises the man or woman approaching middle age. Diet themselves as they may, the tendency to "put on flesh" is still manifest, with, sometimes, a detrimental effect upon the general health. This is the experience of thousands who, in their earlier years, have possessed an elegant figure and unbounded energy, physical and mental. When this objectionable fat-formation persists there are many who, with a sigh of despair, put it down as "constitutional." Others fly to exhausting and debilitating drugs and "systems" which, when they effect any reduction at all, do it at the expense of strength and vitality. There is no cause to despair; there is no need for strength-sapping remedies. The well-known "Russell" treatment for the permanent cure of corpulency is founded on the principle that healthy, muscular tissue should be formed in place of the mass of useless adipose which it gradually eliminates from the system. Hence the welcome return to youthful grace and symmetry is always accompanied by a corresponding return to youthful vitality and good spirits—a rejuvenescence of both body and brain. The originator of this wonderfully efficacious treatment is the author of the standard work on the causes and the cure of stoutness, and we most sincerely recommend our stout readers to consult its pages, which teem with useful hints and information. To procure a copy of * "Corpulency and the Cure," they must send three penny stamps to the author, Mr. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when they will receive the book by return under private envelope. There can be no doubt about the unique efficacy of the "Russell" treatment. If there were, that doubt would be quickly removed by the thousands of grateful letters from the author's patients. Extracts from this interesting and voluminous correspondence are given in "Corpulency and the Cure," and nothing could be more convincing. Mr. Russell also prints the recipe of the liquid vegetable tonic mixture upon which he chiefly relies for the permanent cure of obesity. By this it will be seen that the ingredients are entirely vegetable, and free from the slightest suspicion of anything harmful or disagreeable. There is indeed nothing unpleasant about the "Russell" régime, which calls for no unreasonable dietary restrictions, no violent purgative drugs, and no sweating exercises. In conclusion, let us note that the reduction of fatty matter brought about by the "Russell" treatment varies from ½lb. to 2lb. a day, commencing within the twenty-four hours following the first steps in the cure. The reduction goes on steadily, and surely, and pleasantly until the proper dimensions are reached, when the treatment may cease. There is little fear of the recurrence of corpulency if the patient uses ordinary prudence. No person with a tendency to fatness should omit to send for Mr. Russell's admirable book.

* A copy of "Corpulency and the Cure" will be sent under plain sealed envelope to all readers of "Short Stories" who will forward their address, with three penny stamps, to the author, F. CECIL RUSSELL, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. All Correspondence strictly confidential.

Digitized by Google

energy to-morrow. Do not be afraid. I will arouse you if anything dramatic should happen."

Some Old Acquaintances.

Left to himself, Brett again interviewed the hall-porter and returned to the sitting-room, where he disposed himself for a nap on the sofa. Like all men who possess the faculty of concentrated thought, he also cultivated the power of dismissing a perplexing problem from his mind until it became necessary to consider it afresh in the light of further knowledge.

Within five minutes he was sound asleep.

At length he awoke with a start. He was stiff with cold, for the fire had gone out, and the tiny gas jet he had left burning was not sufficient to warm the room. He sprang to his feet and looked at his watch. It was half-past six.

"Surely," he cried, "there must have been a message from Paris long before this!"

He ran downstairs, encountering on his way some of the hotel servants, who even thus early had commenced work, for your industrious Frenchman is no laggard in the morning. Going to the hall-porter's office he found that functionary snoring peacefully. The poor fellow was evidently tired out, and twenty telephone bells might have jangled in his ears without waking him.

So, for the third time, Brett rang up the exchange to get in touch with Paris. As he had anticipated, he quickly learnt that the prefecture had endeavoured to get through to him about 4.30 a.m., but the operators were unable to obtain any answer.

"I can hardly blame the man," he said to himself, "for I was just as tired as he."

The intimation he received from the prefecture was startling enough.

In accordance with his instructions a number of detectives had raided the Cabaret Noir soon after three o'clock. They found the place in possession of a waiter and a couple of female servants. Grosjean had quitted the house the previous evening, and, most astounding fact of all, with him were three Turks.

Neither the waiter nor the domestics could give any information whatever concerning the hidden room. They knew of its existence, but none of them had ever seen it, and the place was generally regarded as a sort of cellar for the reception of lumber.

The police forced a padlock which guarded its trap-door, and found to their surprise that the place was much more spacious than they anticipated. It really contained two apartments, one of which was so firmly secured that it had hitherto resisted all their efforts to open it. The other was a sort of bed-sitting-room, and it had recently been occupied. From various indications they came to the conclusion that its latest tenants were Hussein ul Mulk and his confederates.

Judging from the fact that these gentry had quietly left the café in Grosjean's company about half-past seven the previous evening, they were not in confinement against their will. In fact, the police theory was that this secret chamber provided a safe retreat for any person who desired complete seclusion other than that provided by the authorities.

"It is assumed," said the officer who communicated this bewildering information to Brett, "that the locked room contains a quantity of stolen goods. The police remain in charge of the café, and when the necessary workmen have been obtained this morning the door will be forced. We will at once let you know the result of our further investigations."

"But what about Grosjean and the Turks? Surely Paris cannot again have swallowed them up?" inquired Brett.

"Every effort is being made to trace their whereabouts," was the reply, "but you must remember, monsieur, that they had many hours start of the police, and that this period of the day is the most difficult of the twenty-four hours in which to make successful inquiries. You may rest assured that the moment we receive even the slightest clue we will ring you up, provided, that is, you arrange for someone at your end to answer the telephone."

"Oh," said Brett with a laugh, "there is little fear of further delay in that respect. It will be daylight in another hour, and the servants are already busy about the place."

He rang off and then darted back to his sitting-room to consult a time-table, for the thought came to him like lightning that Grosjean and the Turks had quitted the café in order to reach Marseilles.

He could not yet explain this strange alliance. It was impossible to believe that the innkeeper would betray his daughter to serve the ends of a political party. No; there must be some other explanation which the future alone could reveal.

He well knew that the last thought likely to occur to the Paris police would be to suspect the missing men of any desire to reach the south coast. It was with an almost feverish anxiety that he scrutinised the pages of the Indicateur des Chemins de Fer, and he heaved a sigh of profound relief when he discovered that the first train Grosjean and the Turks could catch left Paris the previous evening at 8.40 p.m., and was not due at Marseilles until 8.59 that morning.

It was now close on seven o'clock, so he went to his bedroom, effected some much-needed changes in his personal appearance and then consumed an early breakfast of coffee and rolls.

At half-past eight he called a carriage and was driven to the railway station, where, punctual to the minute, the Paris train arrived.

Brett managed to secure a favourable point, whence he could observe the passengers without being seen, for on the platform were stacked hundreds of baskets of fruit and vegetables which had arrived by a local train.

There were not many passengers in the express, and among the first to alight were Grosjean and the three Turks—Hussein ul Mulk and the two others he had seen in the Rue Barbette.

It would be idle to deny that the barrister experienced a thrill of satisfaction at his own shrewdness, and he smiled as he realised the consternation of the Paris commissary when informed that he had so easily allowed the rogues to slip out of the net.

The travellers were evidently tired after a sleepless journey. Grosjean, being a fat man, had wobbled about a great deal during the night. He much needed the restorative effect of a comfortable bed; whilst the Turks, though younger and more active, also showed signs of fatigue, for this long journey had to them merely served as a sequel to many hours of detention in an ill-ventilated apartment.

So that they paid not the slightest heed to their whereabouts, save in so far as to eye with suspicion a harmless gendarme who happened to be on the platform.

The policeman of course, took no notice of them whatever. Grosjean was to him merely a typical Frenchman, whilst persons of dark complexion and Moorish appearance are everyday sights in the streets of Marseilles.

A diminutive railway porter loitered near Brett in the conceit that perhaps this well-dressed stranger might have felonious designs on the oranges and cabbages. His intense joy may therefore be pictured when the barrister beckoned to him, placed a gold piece in his hand, and said—

"You see those Turks there. Go after them and find out where they are going to. They are sure to take a carriage as their luggage appears to be somewhat heavy."

Digitized by Google

The man darted off, secure in the belief that no one who could afford to give away twenty francs for such trivial information would be likely to pocket a cauliflower. In half a minute he returned.

"They have all driven off together, monsieur," he announced eagerly, "and the French gentleman first of all inquired of the driver how much he would charge to take them to the Jolies Femmes. Two francs was the fare, and this was agreeable, so they have gone there."

"I hope, in this instance," said Brett gravely, "that the Jolies Femmes is the name of a hotel."

"But certainly," replied the porter, elevating his eyebrows; "what else could it be?"

He meditated upon this question for five minutes after Brett's departure, and then an idea struck him.

"Ah," he cried, slapping his thigh with a grin, "he is a droll dog, that Englishman."

Brett, secure in the knowledge that his quarry had been located, drove back to his hostelry. He found Edith, Fairholme, and Talbot just sitting down to breakfast. He joined them, and had barely communicated his startling intelligence when Sir Hubert Fitzjames put in an appearance.

"Dear me," said the genial old soldier, smiling pleasantly at the assembled party. "I see you are all nearly as lazy as I have been myself. I hope you slept well and enjoyed a quiet night."

The burst of merriment which greeted this remark, not only amazed the worthy baronet, but startled the other guests in the dining-room.

"That is a strange thing," whispered a Frenchman to his wife. "I thought the English never laughed!"

The Yacht Blue-Bell.

After breakfast the party adjourned to their sitting-room, and there Brett detailed his immediate plan of action.

"The first point to determine is an important one," he said. "Which of you three—Sir Hubert Fitzjames, Talbot, or Fairholme—looks most like a Frenchman?"

The trio at once began to scrutinise each other carefully, to Edith's intense amusement.

"I am afraid, uncle," she laughed, "we must rule you out at once. You have 'British Major-General, late Indian Army' stamped so plainly upon you that here in Marseilles, a port accustomed to the weekly transit of P. and O. passengers, the smallest child could not fail to identify you. And as for you, Bobby! Good gracious! You are painfully Anglo-Saxon. I am afraid, Jack, that we must decide against you. That is to say, I suppose it hurts your vanity to be taken for a Frenchman, but you must not forget that Mademoiselle Beaucaire thought you were good-looking, and, I suppose she adopts Parisian standards."

Jack was amused by his sister's raillery.

"It is gratifying to find," he said, "that there are some handsome Frenchmen. But may I ask, Brett, why you wish one of us to haul down the British flag?"

"Because it is necessary that someone should keep a close eye upon Grosjean and the Turks. As a matter of fact, Miss Talbot is doubly right. Sir Hubert Fitzjames might possibly be made up to represent a retired French officer, but it is essential that he should speak French well."

"Then," cried Sir Hubert decisively, "I am out of court, because my French is weak, and I always want to go off into Hindustani whenever I open my mouth. Why, even this morning, when I rang for my hot water, I said to the waiter, 'Gurrum pani lao.' I am sure he thought I was swearing at him."

"Very well," concurred the barrister, "it comes back to you, Talbot, and I regret to inform you that for the next few hours you must be content with the inferior cooking and accommodation of the Jolies Femmes Hotel. If you will come out with me now I will get you rigged up in a cheap French suit. That, and a supply of bad cigarettes, will provide a sufficient disguise for your purpose. You must pack a few belongings in a green tin box and betake yourself

13 Weeks in Hospital.

APPARENTLY NO HOPE OF A CURE

YET BILE BEANS MADE HER WELL.

GALLSTONES, LIVER DISORDER, AND BILIOUSNESS ROUTED.

After suffering for many years trying scores of prescriptions, passing through the hands of a succession of doctors, and being an in-patient at St. George's Hospital, London, for thirteen weeks, all without the slightest apparent benefit, Mrs. Mary Owen, of Siren House, Towyn, (Merionethshire), has been cured by Chas. Forde's Bile Beans. Here is her story:

"For many years I endured agony from biliousness, indigestion, and jaundice. My liver was completely out of order, and my strength failed at last completely.

"My doctor then told me that I had gallstones, and that a surgical operation was necessary if ever I wished to get better. Well, I went to St. George's Hospital, London, for the operation, but they put me under special treatment instead of operating, and I had to stay there for thirteen weeks. To my chagrin I got no benefit, and came from the hospital as bad as I went. All this time the pains in my chest, especially after taking any food, were terrible. The jaundice had increased until I was an abominable colour, and I was in ceaseless agony all over my right side with pain from the liver. The doctor who then attended me gave me injections of morphia, as the only means of giving me relief from pain. In March last a gentleman whom I had known for some years told me that Chas. Forde's Bile Beans had done him a lot of good. His enthusiasm led me to try them.

"The first few doses made me feel a little better, and I determined to persevere. The improvement thus begun continued from day to day. I had not long been taking Bile Beans before I began to have a good appetite. I grew stronger and found the pains of indigestion less frequent, until they ceased altogether.

"The liver complaint and jaundice also disappeared from my system and the nasty bilious feelings left me. In the end Bile Beans cured me completely, and I have since enjoyed the best of health."

All sufferers from liver troubles, anæmia, rheumatism, debility, headache, constipation, piles, and female ailments who try Bile Beans will find in them a cure. You'll get them from any chemist at 1/1½ or 2/9 per box, or post free by sending prices to the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C.

to the Jolies Femmes. Do not make any inquiries about Grosjean. Simply keep an eye on him."

"But what about the Turks?" said Talbot. "Perhaps two of these scoundrels may be the identical pair who accompanied Dubois to Albert Gate. It is possible that they may recognise me at once."

"No," said Brett decisively. "This is a different gang. The two men who committed the murders never came to Paris. Dubois would not hear of it, I am certain. If you act with discretion, I am sure they will never suspect you."

"Can't you find me a job?" demanded Fairholme.

"Yes, a most pleasant one. It will be your duty to accompany Miss Talbot and Sir Hubert, and show them the sights of Marseilles. I will meet you here at luncheon, but we probably cannot see Mr. Talbot again until late to-night, when he will have an opportunity to come here quietly and detail the results of his observations. Of course," he added, addressing the young man directly, "if anything important happens during the day you know where to find me, either personally or by messenger."

It was natural that Edith's first steps with her lover and uncle would tend towards the scene of her overnight adventure.

But Miss Talbot was a clear-headed girl and took no risks. She knew well that in a chance encounter the sharp eyes of Marie and Eugenie might pick her out unless she was to some extent shrouded from observation.

So she donned a large Paris hat and a smart costume, which, with the addition of a thick veil, rendered her very unlike the girl who twelve hours earlier was pursuing a recalcitrant lover.

Secure in the changed appearance effected by these garments, and especially in the escort of two such English-looking persons as Lord Fairholme and Sir Hubert Fitzjames, she walked with them down the Cannebière and on the quay. She showed them the street up which she pursued Mlle. Beaucaire, and the point on the wharf whence the fishing smack took her departure into the unknown.

Then they strolled back around the harbour, still pursuing the track of Edith's midnight wanderings, when Fairholme suddenly whistled with amazement.

"By jove, look there!" he cried. "That's a piece of luck."

He pointed to the upper part of the basin, in which a number of smart yachts were anchored side by side. Marseilles is a natural point of departure for Mediterranean tours, and many yacht-owners send their vessels there to be coaled and stored for projected trips.

"What is it?" queried Edith, when she could see nothing in the locality indicated save the vessels and the small expanse of water dancing in the rays of a bright sun.

"The very best thing that could have happened. There is Daubeney's yacht, the Blue-Bell."

"Yes. So I see. It would be charming if we had time to go for a run along the Riviera, but I am afraid, whilst Mr. Brett controls our energies, amusement of that sort will be out of our reach."

"Not a bit of it. You do not see my point, Edith. Daubeney is a first-rate chap and a thorough sportsman. Suppose it becomes necessary for us to follow up Dubois and his fishing-smack, and we let Daubeney into the know. The Blue-Bell would pursue the Belles Sœurs to China. He would ask no better fun. I tell you that Brett will be delighted when he hears of it."

"Yes, dear, but we do not even know that Mr. Daubeney is in Marseilles."

"Let us go and see. It doesn't matter a pin anyhow, because a telegram from me to him would place the yacht at our disposal, and he would join us by express at the first possible stopping place. You do not know what a good chap Daubeney is."

"No," said Edith shortly. "He is evidently a most useful acquaintance."

It is a most curious fact that young ladies in the engaged stage regard their fiancée's male friends with extreme suspicion and the more enthusiastic the man, the more suspicious the woman.

Fairholme, sublimely unconscious of this feminine weakness, continued to dilate upon the superlative excellencies of Daubeney until they reached the yacht itself.

A smartly attired sailor was pretending to find some work in carefully uncoiling a rope which did not satisfy his critical eye. Before Fairholme could hail the man, a rotund form, incased in many yards of blue serge, surmounted by a jolly-looking face on top of which was perched an absurdly small yachting cap, emerged from the companion.

"Why, there he is," shouted the earl. "Halloa, Daubeney! Yoicks! Tally-ho!"

The person addressed in this startling manner stopped as though he had been shot. He gazed up at the sky and then gravely surveyed the gilded statue that surmounts the picturesque church of Notre Dame de la Garde.

"Here I am, you idiot," continued Fairholme. "I am not in a balloon. I am on the quay. Come here quick. I want to introduce you to Edith and Sir Hubert."

Luckily Miss Talbot's dark doubts had vanished after one keen glance at Daubeney. He was eminently a safe friend for her future husband. Such a fat and hail-fellow-well-met individual could not possibly harbour guile. So she passed over without reference the extent of Daubeney's acquaintance concerning herself, implied by the use of her Christian name. Indeed, was there not a compliment in Fairholme's unconscious outspokenness? If he only discussed her charms with Daubeney then Daubeney was a man to be cultivated.

The meeting on the quay was hearty in the extreme, and the Honourable James Daubeney further ingratiated himself by saying: "Even if Lord Fairholme had not told me who you were, Miss Talbot, I should have known you at once."

"That would be very clever of you," purred Edith.

"Oh, no, there is nothing remarkable in the fact, I assure you. He always sat in his chambers so that he could look at your photograph, and as, in addition to that speaking likeness, I know the colour of your hair, your eyes, I could not be mistaken."

Miss Talbot thought Mr. Daubeney rather curious. But still he was very nice, and unquestionably the services of the Blue-Bell might be more than useful.

So she was graciousness personified in her manner, and promptly determined to invite him to luncheon, thinking that the chance direction of their conversation with Mr. Brett might lead towards the use of the yacht being hinted at.

But she counted without Fairholme. The latter slapped his heavy friend on the back.

"Look here, old chap, are you fixed up for a cruise? Plenty of coal, champagne, and all that sort of thing?"

"Loaded to the gunwales."

"That's all right, because we may want the Blue-Bell for a month or so."

"There she is," said Daubeney, "fit to go anywhere and do anything."

(Continued on page 254.)

Digitized by Google

SICK MADE WELL WEAK MADE STRONG.

Marvellous Elixir of Life Discovered by Famous Doctor-Scientist That Cures Every Known Ailment.

Wonderful Cures are Effected That Seem Like Miracles Performed—The Secret of Long Life of Olden Times Revived.

The Remedy is Free to All Who Send Name and Address.

After years of patient study, and delving into the dusty record of the past, as well as following modern experiments in the realms of medical science, Dr. James W. Kidd, 522, First National Bank Building, Fort Wayne, Ind., U.S.A., makes the startling announcement that he has surely discovered the elixir of life. That he is able with the aid of a mysterious compound, known only to himself, produced as a result of the years he has spent in searching for this precious life-giving boon, to cure any and every disease that is known to the human body. There is no doubt of the doctor's earnestness in making his claim and the remarkable cures that he is daily effecting seem to bear him out very strongly. His theory which he advances is one of reason and based on sound experience in a medical practice of many years. It costs nothing to try his remarkable "Elixir of Life," as he calls it, for he sends it free, to anyone who is a sufferer, in sufficient quantities to convince of its ability to cure. so there is absolutely no risk to run. Some of the cures cited are very remarkable, and but for reliable witnesses would hardly be credited. The lame have thrown away crutches and walked about after two or three trials of the remedy. The sick, given up by home doctors, have been restored to their families and friends in perfect health. Rheumatism, neuralgia, stomach, heart, liver, kidney, blood and skin diseases and bladder troubles disappear as by magic. Headaches, backaches, nervousness, fevers, consumption, coughs, colds, asthma, catarrh, bronchitis, and all affections of the throat, lungs or any vital organs are easily overcome in a space of time that is simply marvellous.

DR. JAMES WILLIAM KIDD.

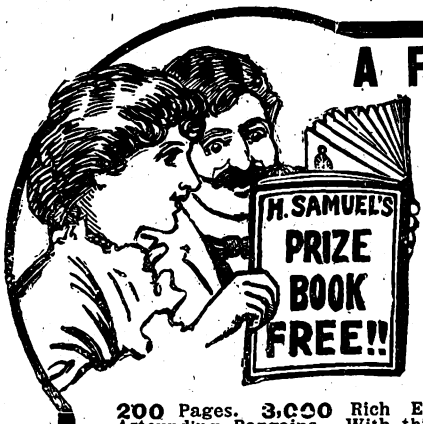
Partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia, dropsy, gout, scrofula, are quickly and permanently removed. It purifies the entire system, blood and tissues, restores normal nerve power, circulation and a state of perfect health is produced at once. To the doctor all systems are alike and equally affected by this great "Elixir of Life." Send for the remedy to-day. It is free to every sufferer. State what you want to be cured of and the sure remedy for it will be sent you free by return mail.

Remember a letter to America from the British Isles requires 2½d. postage. Write your name very plainly, and be sure to give your full address, so there can be no mistake in delivery.



A FORTUNE FOR A POSTCARD

A line written to-day will bring you H. SAMUEL'S BIG FREE GUIDE.

200 Pages. 3,000 Rich Engravings of Astounding Bargains. With this marvellous volume in your hand you are enabled to do your shopping at your own fireside, from the largest and finest selection in the Kingdom.

NO MORE MIDDLE PROFITS!
GOODS FROM FACTORY TO WEARER!

Ladies' Gold Watches, 20/-; Gent's Silver Watches, 8/6; Gold Gem Rings, 3/6; Alarm Clocks, 1/6; Cutlery, Plate, &c., at LOWEST FACTORY PRICES! ONE-HALF SAVED!

VALUABLE PRIZES TO ALL BUYERS!
SEND A POST-CARD NOW!

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are

THE REMEDY FOR THE PEOPLE.

RECOMMENDED BY FRIENDS TO FRIENDS.

NOT PUSHED BY DOUBTFUL METHODS.

DESERVING OF THEIR POPULARITY.

NOW ENJOYING A GREATER SUCCESS THAN EVER.

STILL WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Digitized by Google

The Chateau d'If.

MISS TALBOT had never heard of such extraordinary conduct in her life. She wondered how two women would have conducted the negotiations. The question was too abstruse, so she gave it up and contented herself instead with accepting Daubeney's hearty request that they should inspect the yacht.

The Blue-Bell was an extremely smart little ship of 250 tons register, and an ordinary speed of twelve knots. Incidentally Miss Talbot discovered that the owner made the vessel his home. He was never happy away from her, and the Blue-Bell was known to every yachtsman from the Hebrides to the Golden Horn.

To eke out her coal supply she was fitted with sails, and Daubeney assured his fair visitor that the Blue-Bell could ride out a gale as comfortably and safely as any craft afloat. Altogether Miss Talbot congratulated herself on Fairholme's discovery, and she could not help hoping that their strange errand to Marseilles might eventuate in a Mediterranean chase.

When the tour of inspection had ended Daubeney suggested an excursion.

"I understand you have never been to Marseilles before, Miss Talbot. In that case what do you say if we run over and see the Château d'If—the place that Dumas made famous, you know."

"Is it far?" said Edith.

"Oh, not very, about a mile across the harbour. Monte Cristo swam the distance, you know, after his escape."

"Shall we go in the yacht?"

Daubeney bubbled with laughter.

"Well, not exactly, Miss Talbot. You cannot swing a ship of this size about so easily as all that, you know. I have another craft alongside that will suit our purpose."

He whistled to a tiny steam launch which Edith had not noticed before, and without further ado the party seated themselves. They sped rapidly down the harbour and out through the narrow entrance between the lighthouses.

No sooner did Edith behold the splendid panorama of rocky coast that incloses the great outer bay, with its blue waters studded with delightful little islands, through which the fishing boats and small steam tugs threaded their way towards different points on the coast, than she clapped her hands with schoolgirl delight.

"I had no idea," she cried, "that Marseilles was half so beautiful. Why, it is a wonderful place. I have always read about it being hot and dirty. It certainly is untidy, but to wash its citizens would take away all the romance, whilst as for the climate being hot, just imagine a day like this in the middle of November. Can you possibly think what the sensation would be if you were plunged into a London fog at this moment, Mr. Daubeney?"

"I have hardly ever seen one," he replied. "I take mighty good care to be far removed from my beloved country during the fog season."

She sighed. "What it is to be a man and to be able to roam about the world unfettered."

"It all depends upon the meaning of the word 'unfettered,'" said Daubeney. "Have you got any sisters, Miss Talbot?"

They all laughed at this inconsequent question. It was impossible to resist Daubeney's buoyant good nature, and Edith felt certain that in half an hour she would be calling him "Jimmy."

They sped across the waves towards the Château d'If, and finally drew up alongside its small landing-stage.

The island supplies an all-the-year-round resort for the townspeople. Every fine day a steamer runs at intervals to and fro between it and the inner harbour. The good folk of the south of France, whether Marseillais or visitors to the city, find a constant delight in taking the short marine excursion and wandering for half an hour about the rocky pathways and steep turrets of the famous prison, whilst they listen with silent awe to the words of the guide when he tells them how the Abbé died, and shows them the hole between the two walls excavated by Monte Cristo. So the English visitors found themselves in the midst of a number of laughing, light-hearted French sightseers.

They wandered round with the crowd until Edith looked at her watch.

"It is past twelve o'clock," she said. "Should we not be going back to the hotel to lunch? You will come with us, of course, Mr. Daubeney?"

"I am famished with expectation," answered the irrepressible Jimmy, "but before we go away you certainly ought to climb up on the leads and get the panoramic view of the harbour which the tower affords on a clear day. It is a sight to be remembered, I promise you."

So they made the ascent, Daubeney leading in his capacity of guide, though he was quite breathless when they reached the top of the steps.

Edith followed him, and then Fairholme.

"Good gracious," said the latter.

"What's the matter?" cried Edith.

Fairholme dropped his voice to a whisper.

"Look," he said, indicating with his eyes a distant corner.

Edith followed his glance, and instantly comprehended the cause of his startled exclamation. For in that quiet spot stood four men, whom she could not fail to recognise as Grosjean, Hussein ul Mulk, and the other two Turks, although, of course, she had never previously set eyes upon them.

She instantly understood they must continue to talk and act in the guise of ordinary tourists. In this respect the presence of Daubeney was invaluable, for he naturally could not guess the community of interest between his aristocratic friends and the motley group in the corner.

As soon as he regained his breath, Edith and he commenced a lively conversation, whilst Fairholme whispered a word of warning to Sir Hubert, who had now joined them.

It was well that the earl took this precaution, for in the course of their casual stroll round the tower they passed close to the Frenchman and his companions.

A small staircase led up to the interior of the turret, which, as already described, formed part of the angle that sheltered the group of men.

When Edith and the others strolled past the door they glanced inside and caught sight of a shabby-looking Frenchman, who had paused half way up the stairs, and was leaning eagerly forward through an embrasured loop-hole, obviously intent upon hearing every word uttered by the quartette beneath.

Fortunately Edith, who was nearest to the door, was completely shrouded from Grosjean's observation. Else that astute gentleman might have noticed her involuntary start of surprise. For the shabby-looking Frenchman was her brother.

The instant Talbot heard footsteps he naturally turned to see who it was that approached, and he also was amazed to find Edith's wondering eyes fixed upon him at a distance of only a few feet.

She nodded her head and placed a warning finger upon her lips. As it happened, Daubeney caught her in the act, and for the next few moments that gentleman's emotions were intense, not to say painful.

"Who would have thought it?" he muttered to himself. "A girl like her making secret signs to a dirty scoundrel of that sort. The beggar was good looking, of course; but what—well, I give it up. Poor old Fairholme! What funny creatures women are, to be sure!"

How much further this soliloquy might have proceeded he knew not, for Edith sharply interrupted his thoughts.

"You seem to be preoccupied, Mr Daubeney. What has happened?" she inquired.

"I—I—really don't know."

His distress was so unmistakable that her quick woman's wit divined the true cause.

"You saw me make signs to that Frenchman, didn't you?"

"Well—er—I—er——"

"Oh, yes, I understand. Of course you were surprised. But don't jump now, or say anything; he is my brother!"

"It is a mystery," she whispered, "a deep secret. We will tell you all about it at lunch."

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

SECRETS OF PERSONAL MAGNETISM LAID BARE.

Thousands of Dollars' Worth of Books on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism to be Given Away by a Noted Philadelphia College.

Hon. James R. Kenney, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Distribution.

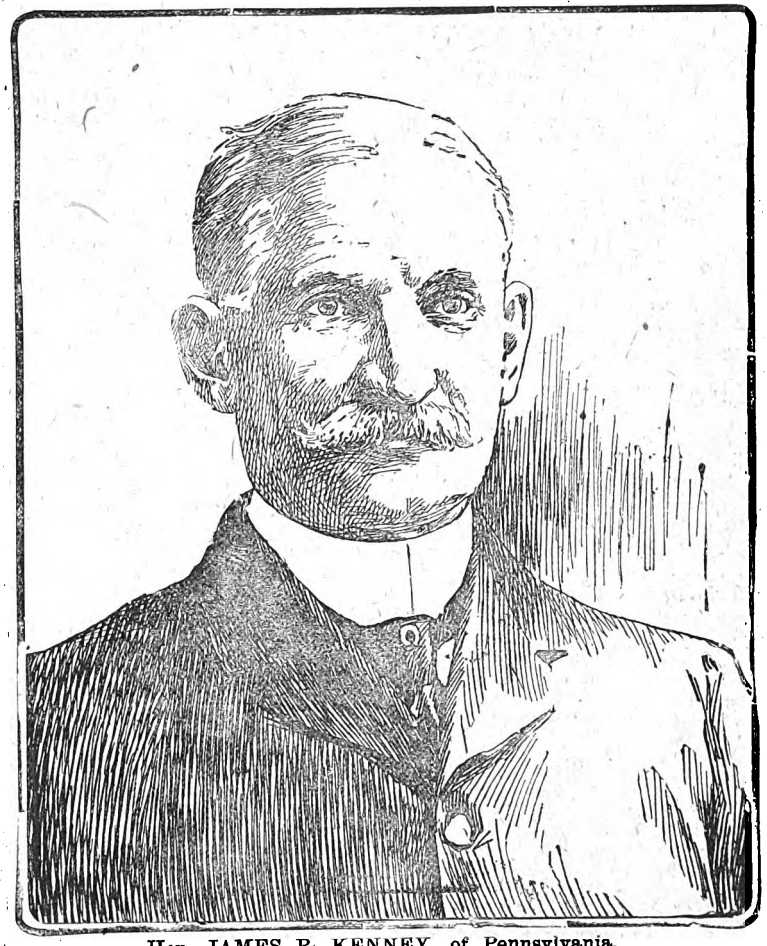
Every One May Now Learn All the Secrets of these Mysterious Sciences at His Own Home.

"I can honestly and conscientiously say from my long experience in dealing with people and from my personal acquaintance with many of the most prominent men in this country, that there is no other thing which will help one so much in life as a thorough knowledge of Personal Magnetism," says Hon. James R. Kenney, "and for this reason I accepted the chairmanship of the committee on distribution of works on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism for the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia.

"The real secrets of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism have always been jealously guarded by the few who knew them and kept from the masses of the people. One who understands these sciences has an inestimable advantage in the race of life. I want to put this information in the hands of every ambitious man and woman in this country.

"The American College of Sciences has just appropriated $10,000 to be used in printing books for free distribution, and if this does not supply the demand it will appropriate $10,000 more. The books are absolutely free. They do not cost you a single cent.

"Tell me what kind of work you are engaged in; or, if sick, the disease from which you suffer, and I will send you the book which will put you on the road to success, health and strength. It matters not how successful you are. I will guarantee to help you achieve greater success. The work which I will send you is from the pens of the most eminent specialists of the country; it is richly illustrated with the finest half-tone engravings, and is intensely interesting from start to finish. It has been the means of changing the whole current in the lives of hundreds of persons who were ready to give up in despair. You can learn at home in a few days and use personal magnetism in your daily work without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You can use it to influence others: you can use it to keep others from influencing you. You can positively cure the most obstinate chronic diseases and banish all bad habits.



Hon. JAMES R. KENNEY, of Pennsylvania.
Ex-Mayor of Reading, Pa., noted orator, author, and Scientist.

"If you have not met with business or social success which you desire; if you are not successful in winning and holding friends; if you are sick, and tired of taking drugs that do not cure; if you care to develop your memory or any other mental faculty to a higher state of perfection; or, lastly, if you wish to possess that subtle, invisible, intangible power that sways and rules the minds of men, you should address penny post to me to-day and let me send you a free copy of our new book. It will prove a revelation to you." Address, JAMES R. KENNEY, WL 35, Commercial Union Building, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

An Anonymous Admirer.

CADFOR has received an anonymous letter from a young lady who attends the same chapel. The letter states that the writer's friend has taken a great fancy to CADFOR, and wants to be introduced to him. It is suggested that he should attend certain debates held at the chapel after service. CADFOR asks me how he is to find out the identity of the writer, seeing that there are about thirty or forty people attending there.

* * * * *

Well, CADFOR, I do not suppose there are thirty or forty persons of the kind that would write you this letter. If you are sufficiently flattered by the fact that a certain young lady has taken a fancy to you, and would like to avail yourself of the opportunity of meeting her, I should attend the meeting, and carefully scrutinise the audience for two young ladies together who appear to be looking in your direction.

* * * * *

Unless you are exceptionally attractive in appearance, I should not imagine more than a certain number of them will be thus honouring you, and you should not have much difficulty in locating the anonymous writer. I have read the letter in question, and personally like the tone of it very much. She must be very much smitten with you indeed, seeing that she has had to be so very forward in making your acquaintance. I hope the attraction will prove mutual.

Girls in the Colonies.

I AM always pleased to hear from Colonial readers, and no small portion of my correspondence comes from the outlying parts of the Empire, particularly South Africa. Referring to my warning some time ago to girls who seek to go to Africa on the off chance of finding husbands, A. H. writes me from Cape Colony:

* * * * *

"It is a foolish idea. I have seen plenty of reasons why it is dangerous for unprotected females to travel in this country. You will do immense good by impressing on your readers the necessity of having a good situation before leaving for South Africa. Of course, one can find as good and honest men as you see at home out here, and there are many of them. We should be glad of more British lasses out here to keep us company. But it would be disastrous of them to come here just on the chance of getting a matrimonial prize."

* * * * *

Thanks, A. H., for your confirmation of my advice. By all means girls desirous of emigrating should see that they either have actual employment or good introductions before going to the Colonies. When they have, then there is every reason why they should go out to fill the places that must be open to British girls there, as everywhere else, in the hearts and homes of their fellow countrymen.

How Often Should They Meet?

"OUGHT a man to get tired of a girl through seeing her twice a week?" asks HELEN. Well, what a half-hearted lover he must be if he does! The proper lover ought not to be tired of a girl at any time, whether waking or dreaming. If twice a week is too much for his devotion, I should recommend a girl to excuse him altogether.

* * * * *

But I do not wish to lay down the rule that a man should give up his whole time to his sweetheart. That would be bad for both of them, as the man in particular, if he is worthy of the name, should have some other interests in life besides his sweetheart, or he could never make the necessary headway in the world. Twice a week is quite a good average, however, and if a man thinks it is too often, he is no true lover.

An Indian Suitor.

VIOLET (Oldham) has a complication to unfold to me. Some time ago she encountered a young Indian native, who paid her a great deal of attention. After a year or so, he met her again and seeks to renew the acquaintance. He has asked her to meet him in the evening. Do I advise her to accept the invitation?

* * * * *

You must know whether or not you liked the man when you first met him. If so, then there is no particular reason why an Indian should not make as faithful and good a suitor as a fellow-countryman. But, as you know, they are a race not at all above enjoying flirtation—in fact, experience proves them to be adepts at the pastime. If you have no feeling whatever for him of a tender nature I should advise you not to agree to meeting him in the way he suggests. Wait until he makes his intentions clearer.

The Non-Lover Again.

So, UNRECIPROCATIVE (why use such a long name?), you are twenty-six, and have never yet had any feelings towards the opposite sex (feminine) save those of a platonic nature. Do I think it unnatural and unusual?

* * * * *

No, not at all. We cannot all be amorous, and it is quite as well that a select few keep their heads cool, and do not rush into complications. Evidently you have not as yet met the right sort of woman, perhaps because you have been too little in their company.

* * * * *

I advise you to cease worrying about your emotions at all, making the best you can ont of the platonic relations you speak of. After all, those friendships are often the most lasting, and you are to be congratulated on being able to enjoy them. If you are constructed as are most human beings, you will in course of time meet the one best suited to you, but do not attempt to hurry the work of "the destiny which shapes our ends."

An Affair of Names.

R. H. is in a "pickle." He knows a girl, and has been calling her by her Christian name. He then met her sister, whom he supposed to be the elder of the two, and addressed her as "Miss Brown," going so far as to send Christmas cards so addressed. Now he has discovered that his more intimate friend is the elder. How is he to compromise matters now when meeting the two?

* * * * *

I think you had better ask the other girl's permission to call her by her Christian name, prefixing "Miss." There is no need for you to call your original friend "Miss Brown" when you have once progressed so far as to use her Christian name. That would be reaction, a thing quite undesirable in affairs of the heart.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ZOX for Neuralgia at Night.

GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from

THE ZOX COMPANY, 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

FREE TO YOU

To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.

Symonds' London Stores, 128, City Road, London.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.)

2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-: Co onies, 3/-.

Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

Patronised by Royalty.

TRIUMPH Cycles

10 Guineas AND 15 Guineas } Or from a Guinea per month.

The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce.

TRIUMPH CYCLE Co., Ltd., COVENTRY.

1 & 5, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. 30, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester.

ESTABLISHED

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director

GIVEN AWAY

With this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 475)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

TUNIC

For a little boy (2—4).

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

TEST BOXES FREE TO ALL.

Any sufferer sending name and address to JOHN A. SMITH, 1007 Montague House, Stonecutter St., London, E.C., will be sent a Test Box of his marvellous Cure, GLORIA TONIC, for all Uric Acid Ailments, including Gout, Sciatica, and RHEUMATISM. 300 Recent Cures.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints, etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"ASK FOR"

G.P. Government Tea

Eighteenpence Everywhere.

RICH, RIPE, REFRESHING.

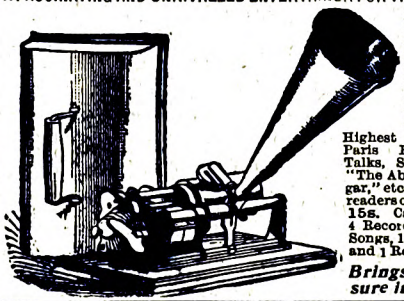
You May Know It by Its Red Tape and Seal.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE TO G.P. GOVERNMENT TEA CO., 16 AMERICA SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

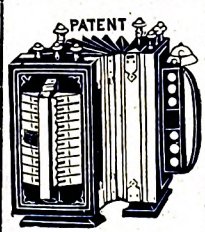


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1902-3, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

BUY FROM MAXEY'S AND SAVE MONEY.

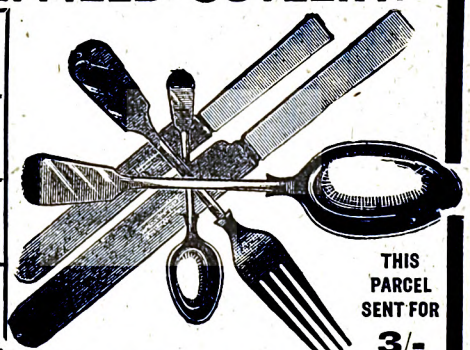
SHEFFIELD CUTLERY.

50 Articles.

Price 25s.

Deposit 3s.

9d. Weekly.



THIS PARCEL SENT FOR 3/-

6 Table Knives, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Teaspoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Jam Spoon, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs.

All you have to do is to send 3s. Deposit. We then forward the Cutlery at once carriage paid. The price only 25/-, and you pay 1/6 fortnightly, or 3/- monthly until paid for. If you wish to pay cash the price is 21/-, if paid in seven days' Write for Cutlery, Jewellery, & Tropery Catalogue Illustrated. AGENTS WANTED.

MAXEY & CO., Meadow St., Sheffield.

BRITANNIA CLEANS HER HELMET WITH

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

AND EVERY BRITISH HOUSEWIFE SHOULD POLISH ALL METALS WITH IT, TOO.

Most foreign polishes set up acid, are sticky in use and require much labour in cleaning. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH spreads evenly over the metal, and produces easily and quickly a lasting brilliancy. "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is entirely made in England, and by using it you support British Trade.

Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 739.] Week ending February 28, 1903. [Price One Penny.

From his hiding place behind the bushes he saw her throw a packet into the lake, causing the water to ripple. What could that packet contain?

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "Woman's Way Wins." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3½ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Eversot time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Present of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Sulpholine Lotion.

For Clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

"Don't Buy a Pig in a Poke."

On J. G. GRAVES' SYSTEM you are absolutely certain of what you are buying before you pay for it.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' System

You only send 5/- to start with . . .

The 'PERFECTA' - £2 10s. Od.

Lady's 18-Carat Gold Watch.

is then forwarded to you. You examine and test it, and, if satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5s.; or, Handsome Bonus Present for full Cash Payment. If you have the slightest cause for dissatisfaction, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded at once.

The Largest Watch-Sales Firm in the World.

Specification. Decorated Gold or Opal Dial, Keyless or Keywinding, Jewelled Movement, Handsomely Engraved Gold Cases. A Highly Finished and Reliable Timekeeper.

Five Years Warranty.

50/-

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and full particulars.

No Risk.

Good Commission. . .

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

FOR HEADACHE AND Neuralgia.

Cures in TEN MINUTES.

For INFLUENZA.

KAPUTINE immediately relieves the distressing "Influenza" pains, and cures the fever.

KAPUTINE has the confidence of and is recommended by many eminent medical men. KAPUTINE is not a single dangerous crude drug, such as has been condemned by the medical papers, but is compos d of several ingredients, first discovered thirteen years ago by one of our leading medical men. There is no other remedy like KAPUTINE, the SAFE remedy for Headache and Neuralgia. Ask for KAPUTINE, and see that you get it and not some dangerous substitute offered for the sake of extra profit.

KAPUTINE is the ONLY preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

The Editor of the "Family Doctor," the People's Medical Paper, IN ONE OF HIS COMMENTS, SAYS:

"After a careful examination of Kaputine, and learning its component parts, we should certainly recommend it as a Safe and Reliable Remedy for Headache."

Packets of 18 doses 1/-, of all Chemists, Stores, etc., or post free from KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield for 12 stamps.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 739.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending February 28th, 1903.

WOMAN'S WIT WINS.

The Story of the Righting of a Wrong.

Containing the Incident Shown on the Cover.

"Ah! I want you, Arnold," said the chief, a man with iron grey hair and military moustache, addressing the younger man, who had just entered the room in obedience to a summons. "I've got something special on for you!"

"Very good, sir!" responded Richard Arnold. His voice was brisk enough, but there was a somewhat jaded appearance about the intelligent face, and the black eyes were not so keen-looking as usual.

The chief of the detective department fixed his glittering eyes on the newcomer and scrutinised him sharply before proceeding.

"You've been working too hard lately, Arnold! That Rugeley case has taken something out of you, but you scored over it, by Jove! Well, having gained some points over a notorious case, you can afford to take a quiet country job. That will give you the rest you badly need. Moreover, you're just the man for it! Sit down and I'll explain!"

Arnold did as he was bidden. He scarcely relished the country job; he was ambitious, and this quiet affair suggested that he would vegetate for a time instead of making further progress. However, he did need a rest. He listened patiently to his chief's remarks, as the latter unfolded so much as he knew of a story which had far more dramatic incident in it than either of the two men imagined.

"About a year ago," said the chief, "a man named Moulton, aged about twenty-six, was arrested for defrauding a bank. It was done by means of bills of acceptance, something after the manner of the great Bank of England robberies a quarter of a century ago. One almost wonders how such things can be done, but recent exposures show that our banking system is a long way from being perfect.

"Moulton was the chief of a small party apparently. At any rate, there was at least one other, but no clue could be obtained to the other rascal. Moulton would not utter a word. At the trial a good deal of evidence was forthcoming against him; the public was surprised, for he had a good character.

"That evidence was gathered by means of anonymous letters sent to the police, although the public didn't know that. The prisoner himself showed signs of surprise, and two or three times he seemed to be on the point of contradicting the police evidence, but checked himself. He had pleaded 'Guilty,' and he really courted conviction. He was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

"Now, when he was supposed to be either mentally contradicting, or on the point of openly contradicting, the evidence, it was because his lips moved as if speaking. Some time afterwards, a man came to me and said that Moulton had really been conversing with someone in the court by means of lip language, just as the deaf read your conversation by the movements of your lips. He was not sure, but he firmly believed that it was so, and that Moulton had concluded with the words 'help me to escape.' I smiled at the notion and dismissed the man, but I now find that there is something in it.

"There was very little chance of escape till Moulton got into the Kentish prison, but there appears to be a chance of doing it from that place of incarceration. Well, he has been there for two months, and my friend, the Governor, has got hold of a rumour and wants me to assist him. That is where you come in, Arnold."

Arnold bowed and waited.

"Someone—it may be a man or a woman, probably the latter—is trying to help Moulton to escape. That is the supposition, you understand. This someone is staying in one of the country houses of the district. The only one in which visitors are staying at present is that of Sir Arthur Boyce.

"The Governor thinks that some latitude in the way of supervision may be given to Moulton, and a detective might watch Sir Arthur's visitors. The result should be that we get the accomplice, who is possibly trying to assist Moulton to escape. It is noteworthy that twice lately Sir Arthur has obtained permission for a small party to go over the prison.

"You are a young man, Arnold, well-educated; in fact a gentleman, and you could act the part of a visitor to perfection. My friend has obtained for you an invitation from Sir Arthur, and you will appear as Mr. Wilfrid Burnley.

"Sir Arthur was not keen about it at first, as he dislikes the idea of his guests being watched; but the Governor overcame those scruples by pointing out that it did not matter to honest men if they were watched, and that if there were any rogues among his company he would be well rid of them. So it is settled, and you go down at once."

Arnold made some inquiries and received further necessary instructions; he then bowed himself out and made preparations for carrying out what appeared to be a humdrum sort of task, but which was not to be so tame in reality.

It was an exceedingly pleasant company which Sir Arthur Boyce had gathered about him at his fine old mansion, Elm House, and Mr. Burnley quickly entered into the gay spirit that predominated.

Sir Arthur and Lady Boyce were middle-aged; they had both climbed the hill to fifty and were beginning the descent that leads to old age, but they were as full of go and fun as their son and daughter.

All rights reserved.

Digitized by Google

There were more than a dozen guests, all young, and every one of the fine summer days was enjoyed to the fullest extent. As soon as one guest was due to depart another arrived, and so the continuity of amusement was maintained.

Burnley was a good oarsman, cyclist and tennis player; he could talk well and act as cavalier to the ladies as well as any man there; so he was an acquisition. Occasionally he sighed as he reflected that his life had opened in a manner that promised this kind of life for him, but unfortunate speculation by his father had forced him to earn his own living, and influence, added to natural ability, had made a detective of him.

Burnley's heart was as susceptible as that of most men of his age, and he would have quickly lost it to one of the feminine guests had he not steeled himself against the danger. Burnley had to admit reluctantly that Miss Millie Hartford did not blush or show any sign of trepidation in his presence; yet he reflected that—— But no, he had his duty to perform!

Burnley kept on the look-out for the possible accomplice of Moulton, but he was fain to admit, after the second day, that he was no nearer than he had been when he arrived. He had noted several facts, notably that Mr. Gerald Wynter was in love with Miss Hartford and that she did not appear to be averse to his attentions, although she did not wait for him to accompany her here, there, and everywhere. "As I should if I had the chance!" murmured the detective.

"What do you think?" asked Sir Arthur anxiously.

"It looks as if a mistake had been made, Sir Arthur!" replied Burnley. "However, time will show!"

"I hope to goodness it won't!" breathed the Baronet fervently. "Whatever Mabel—I mean Lady Boyce—would say if she knew that I had agreed to this, I daren't think! None of my family is aware of this business!"

Burnley could hardly repress a smile at the Baronet's anxiety, but he replied cheerily and dismissed the subject.

Burnley found it inadvisable to join any particular excursion party or otherwise "tie himself up" (as he expressed it) to any group; he was bound to play a game here or take a walk there with other members of the house-party occasionally, but it was necessary for him to remain free and keep a sharp eye on all.

He was down betimes in the morning, scrutinising letters whenever he had an opportunity, and also watching the letters that were dispatched from the house. At the end of the fourth day he felt that he was on the wrong tack, but he knew that he must keep on till orders came from the chief, to whom he reported every day.

After that, he allowed himself to follow his own inclination rather more, and that took him to Miss Millie Hartford's side. She was full of quiet dignity, less gay than the others—"less frivolous," Burnley called it—and her conversation was more serious.

She was witty and could join in outdoor sports with the rest; in short, a welcome addition to any house-party and yet superior to most of her fellow-guests. It was the kind of nature and temperament that attracted Burnley, who bit his moustache when Wynter was by Miss Hartford's side.

It was during a lag in the general conversation one evening that Burnley remarked, lazily, but with his keen eyes on the assembled company:

"I heard that a prisoner had escaped."

"Good gracious!" ejaculated Sir Arthur. "You don't mean to say——"

He nearly betrayed himself. Several others chimed in.

"Really! I don't believe it!" "How interesting!" "I'm positive it is not true!"

"That would be exciting!" yawned Gerald Wynter, but his face was pale.

Miss Hartford raised her eyes from a book to meet Burnley's fixed upon her.

"Do you think it possible, Mr. Burnley?" she asked tranquilly. "I scarcely think so!"

He was looking at her with admiration which he could not repress; but she met his gaze with unruffled serenity.

"Oh! I have not gone into possibilities, Miss Hartford. I merely repeat a rumour."

His penetrating eyes were upon her face; she met them defiantly.

"Would you be afraid if it were true?" she asked with the slightest touch of sarcasm in her voice.

"Not if you were near!" he retorted. "I imagine that you would be deterred by very few things!"

They looked steadfastly at one another while the rest of the party laughed and echoed approval. The remark had sprung spontaneously to Burnley's lips and he had no ulterior motive in saying what he did; but he read in her bright orbs a something which thrilled him inwardly.

"Oh, Miss Hartford has been to prison, you know!" drawled one young lady. "As a visitor, of course!"

This sally provoked more mirth; Miss Hartford joined in the laugh, turning to the speaker, but that laugh from her lips sounded harsh to Burnley.

"Heavens! Could it be this woman?" he thought, and a confusion arose within his mind which rendered coherence of ideas impossible for a time. His ruse about the escape of a prisoner had succeeded in providing him with some clue.

His suspicions had been aroused by Gerald Wynter's pallor, but his detective intuition told him that this woman was at least implicated, if not the principal agent. The notion was detestable; he could not bring himself to believe that she was his quarry.

She was the kind of woman who would dare anything for a lover or for a friend to whom she had pledged herself; but, on the other hand, he was convinced that she would wash her hands of anyone convicted of a base action, and this Moulton had pleaded "Guilty!" to a charge of fraud and forgery! It was incomprehensible; his detective instinct must be at fault!

From that moment his feelings towards her were contradictory; he distrusted her, yet he felt that he was doing her an injustice; he tried to keep from the spell of her beauty and charming ways, but he was drawn nearer to her! He was becoming more and more in love with her, and all the while he knew that he should fight against this love.

As for Miss Hartford, after the little passage of words between them she became more affable than ever, and appeared to take a delight in his society. Gerald Wynter scowled at him, for he had less opportunity than before of accompanying Miss Hartford. Burnley returned the scowls with interest, and the two men developed a cordial hatred of each other.

The preference shown by Miss Hartford and Mr. Burnley for their mutual society developed so marked a character during the next two or three days that it formed the subject of whispered comment. They were partners in the games, they walked together during their excursions, they remained by one another's side in everything.

In that time Burnley had fallen completely in love with Millie Hartford, and was upon the point of making some kind of a proposal, when his mind cleared, and he remembered that he was wooing her under false pretences—she did not know his real social position—and he was forgetting his duty! The reflections brought him to an abrupt stop, and he set himself deliberately to spy on the doings of Gerald Wynter and Millie Hartford.

"They are the only two here who would do it, and it must be the man! Still, I'll watch both, although I hate the idea!"

Digitized by Google

A slight sprain of the foot would serve to release him from attendance on Miss Hartford without causing suspicion, and this was the device he adopted. His window was very convenient for his purpose; it had been especially chosen, and he used it.

On the following morning he saw Millie Hartford and Gerald Wynter together, and he crept out to shadow one or both. That day brought him no nearer the truth; the two suspects were not together long, and, although he contrived to keep both in view tolerably well, he discovered nothing.

On the next day he did the same, and still without result. It was rather a risky proceeding, because he was supposed to be getting over the sprain, and if he were found by any member of the house-party at any considerable distance from the house, he would be dubbed a fraud. He decided that on the following morning his foot should be well, but that he would not appear till the others had scattered.

He carried out this plan, taking breakfast in his room and slipping out in time to shadow Millie Hartford. To prevent immediate recognition he put on a false beard.

He saw her walking in the direction of the piece of water in one corner of the estate; she looked back occasionally, and he had to be careful. However, he had not been a detective without learning how to shadow his prey, and he flattered himself that he could manage this woman. There was something suspicious in her manner, and this fact struck chilly upon his heart.

He had learnt the topography of the estate, and he saw a chance of getting in front of her by a short cut. He was convinced that she was making for the water. This awkward path would take him there first, and he could get to the opposite side, where it would be easy to secure a hiding place from which to observe her movements.

Stepping out briskly, but lightly and cautiously, stopping now and then to get a glimpse of his victim, he reached the other side and took up a position favourable for the object he had in view.

He felt just a trifle excited as he saw her approaching the water with an air that indicated her intention to do something when she reached it. This was no casual excursion; it had a object. If the young detective had been engaged in any other case, he would have been as cool as a cucumber, but the circumstances were no longer ordinary. He loved her!

He saw her give a last quick look round, then raise her arm. In his eagerness to see what it was that she was about to throw from her, as the motion indicated, he exposed himself for a moment, but it was too late.

The splash sounded before he could see, and he could only judge by the size of the ripples that it was an object of fair proportions, not merely a stone or anything so trivial in dimensions.

Millie Hartford turned her back on the water at once, and began to retrace her steps at a good pace.

The young detective, cold at heart, deliberated for a few moments whether he should wait and plunge in after the mysterious object or follow Millie. He decided on the latter course; the water was deep enough to reach his shoulders, and it would be better to wait till night before fishing up what Miss Hartford had thrown away.

"It's no use taking it to heart!" he muttered savagely. "If the girl is a bad one, I don't want her! Yet—it's hard to be so disappointed in one of the opposite sex! Anyhow, I'll stick on her track now and go through with it!"

He soon caught up his lost ground, and he had reason to congratulate himself on deciding to follow her.

She made a long detour to another part of the estate, but she resumed the cautious look round when she approached the part where others were likely to be. Apparently she was satisfied, for she suddenly sped along a narrow path and disappeared.

Not to be outwitted, Burnley slipped along after her till he came within earshot of a shady bower especially erected for a quiet talk. As quietly as a mouse he glided up to the back of this bower, and his heart gave a bound as he heard her voice. She was speaking in suppressed tones, but passionately.

"I tell you, I cannot act as your tool any more," she said. "I have done as you have bidden me implicitly; but this Burnley suspects me, and it will be useless to expect success."

Burnley opened his eyes in amazement. To whom was she talking? And how had she guessed that he was dogging her movements?

"She's cleverer than I gave her credit for!" he said to himself, at the same time removing the beard.

He listened for the other to speak, but the voice was so low that he could catch nothing, much to his annoyance.

"I don't care a rap whether this man gets out or not!" was the next remark overheard by Burnley, and it was Millie Hartford who uttered it. There was a pause and some more inaudible talk. Then Millie spoke again.

"Of course, I'll help, for your sake, Ger—— I suggest this; I'll keep Burnley in hand; he's fond of me, and I rather like him; he's a good sort, but he's a detective! Well, I'll keep him in hand and you must do the work.

"We must change parts in this play now; if I continue to play the chief part, the game is over, for Burnley will trap me and spoil all. I'm so afraid that he will drop on me that I've just thrown into the water the wig and other things to make up the original disguise for M—— to get away in!"

The listener smiled with pleasure. He was not so simple as Millie Hartford imagined! It was Gerald Wynter to whom she was talking evidently.

"I must shadow him and yet do what I can to be agreeable to Miss Hartford!" murmured Burnley. "The conversation appears to be over. I'll saunter round to the entrance of this bower and see them both, just to make sure it is Wynter."

He carried out this intention so far as he could, but he was met at the top of the path leading to the bower by Miss Hartford, who at once held out her hand with an exclamation of pleasure.

"I'm so glad you are about again, Mr. Burnley!" she cried. "I hope the sprain is well?"

"Quite, thank you, Miss Hartford!" he replied, with just as much frankness. "Shall we go into the bower for a moment?"

"Oh, no!" she cried hastily. "I've been in there and it is full of horrid earwigs and things!"

The young detective smiled; he understood, but he agreed and they sauntered away.

Burnley's game was difficult now, but he managed to play it well. He kept a strict watch on Wynter, but he contrived to spend a little time with Millie Hartford—not much, though. His excuse to her was that he had something to study, and he could do this better while roaming about alone. He did not forget to fish up the packet, and found that it really did contain a wig, beard, and other small articles, for disguising the face and appearance of the head.

He received a message from headquarters to the effect that some informer had given intelligence that it was most probably a woman who was trying to effect the escape, but Burnley chuckled.

"That's a good move on their part!" he said softly. "They think that this will make me stick to Miss Hartford, and so Wynter will do the trick. It is the hange of parts! The information comes from Wickham, eh?. Not very far from here!"

Digitized by Google

Gerald Wynter and Millie Hartford were seen together from time to time by the young detective, and the first-named took long walks every day.

Burnley kept on his track, but nothing transpired till another week had passed and the duration of his stay at Elm House had already exceeded its original limit. Wynter and Miss Hartford were the only two remaining of the party as constituted when he had arrived.

Now, to tell what passed at the end of that week, we must leave Burnley and follow Gerald Wynter. Burnley had lost sight of him for a time, and Wynter was strolling along in the direction of the railway station.

It was a secluded, winding lane through which he was walking when he saw in front of him a figure which he recognised as that of Millie. She was walking by the side of a bent old woman, who was leaning on her arm. Hurrying forward, he passed in front of them and turned.

"Whoever would have expected to see you here, Miss Hartford!" he cried. "Are you helping this old lady to the station?"

Millie Hartford's face paled, but she forced a smile.

"I always like to help old persons!" she said gently.

Her companion's head bent lower; the old lady trembled.

"Allow me to help also!" said Gerald courteously.

He held out his arm, but the next instant the bent figure straightened and a strong masculine voice cried:

"You double-dyed traitor! You scoundrel! You robbed me of my liberty, my good name, my love!"

"Moulton!" screamed Wynter, starting back in alarm.

The disguised convict flew at him and gripped him by the throat.

"You dog!" he hissed. "It is my turn now! I pleaded 'Guilty,' and suffered degradation in your stead because I thought that the girl I loved had asked me to do it for her sake, as she loved you! I sacrificed myself for love, only to find that it was your diabolical plotting! You cur!"

"Oh, Syd, don't lose time!" implored Millie, catching the supposed old woman by the arm. "Fly, fly, or you will be caught! The train will be gone!"

Sydney Moulton, the escaped convict, struck Wynter a violent blow with his clenched fist, stunning him.

"He will be safe for a time!" cried Moulton. "Kiss me, Millie!"

Millie uttered a scream.

"Run, run! Here comes the detective I spoke of."

She clasped her hands in alarm. Moulton stood irresolute, till Millie repeated her intreaty. "Do not fear for me!" she added.

Then Moulton, seeing capture probable if he stayed, held up his short skirts with both hands and sped along like the wind, presenting the ridiculous spectacle of an old woman running like an athlete. In a moment he was out of sight round a bend, while Millie remained to face Burnley, whose quick brain had grasped the truth.

"Stop, Mr. Burnley, I beseech you!" she cried, as the young detective ran up. He tried to avoid her, but she was quick and caught him in her outstretched arms.

"Mr. Burnley, for my sake, do not send an innocent man back to prison!"

The young fellow yielded; he felt that her last words were true. Moulton was innocent.

"Let me explain!" she cried. With passionate earnestness that was almost too terrible to witness, she told her story, freely giving vent to her feelings. "I love Sydney Moulton. He befriended Mr. Wynter, who had been fortunate enough to save Sydney's life when he was seized with cramp while swimming. Wynter took advantage of this to ask all kinds of help and favours, and he laid his plans in such a way that Sydney was seemingly inculpated in Wynter's frauds. Appearances were against Sydney. I had been ill, and the shock made me worse; I was unconscious for days, on and off, and Sydney was tried and condemned quickly, for he pleaded 'Guilty,' and the assizes were at hand.

"When I recovered I was horrified to hear that he had said he was guilty. I went to him at the prison, on the first visiting day, and he told me why he had done it.

"He had received a letter from me, asking him, by his love for me, to save Wynter, whom I loved to distraction! Oh, Mr. Burnley, I cannot tell you the infamy of it. Wynter told him lies upon lies; told him that I could not face him, as I was bound heart and soul to him—Wynter!

"Sydney loved me madly, and he sacrificed himself for me, to save the man he thought I loved, although it nearly broke his heart to learn that I did not love him after all! Wynter promised to help him to escape, but he never carried out the intention; he did not want to.

"When Sydney heard the truth from me, it was too late to withdraw the plea, and we felt that Wynter had purposely obtained false evidence. Sydney got off lightly, all things considered. I determined to scheme for his escape, and then go to him across the sea. I pretended to lend a favourable ear to Wynter's suit for my own ends.

"I found to my horror that you had come to spy on me, and I played my cards accordingly. Please forgive me, Mr. Burnley! I hoodwinked you. I helped you to fall in love with me. I threw that packet into the water expressly to deceive you, for I knew you were looking—I enticed you to look.

"I had no one with me in the bower; it was a bogus conversation! So I succeeded in throwing you off the scent, and I got Sydney out. During my inspection of the prison I saw him and handed him a note of my plan. You nearly upset it, but Sydney could not get his opportunity so soon as we hoped, which proved fortunate!

"Now, Mr. Burnley, I am in your hands. If you give me up to justice, Sydney and I must wait still longer before we meet. He will be safe, for the train is gone and I know he caught it, for I saw a handkerchief waving from a window as it went by over there."

"Who sent the anonymous letter from Wickham a week ago?" asked the detective suddenly.

"Not I! About what?"

"Then it was this precious rascal!" cried the young man, pointing to the still unconscious Wynter. "He was giving you away! Look here, Miss Hartford! I've been beaten by a woman's wit and through yielding to love! It won't increase my reputation, and I suppose it's my duty to split, but I won't. But you had better go, or it may leak out. I can understand that Wynter won't say anything, for it might bring him into the grip of justice!"

"Thank you, Mr. Burnley—is that really your name? Richard Arnold? Thank you"—as he handed her a card. "I will let you know some day."

And she was gone.

"There will be a scandal at the house. What will Sir Arthur think? And what about me? H'm! I must make a show!"

He walked away just as Wynter was opening his eyes. When near the end of the lane, the detective deliberately ran at a tree trunk with lowered head and fell unconscious. He was found by the search party, who understood that he had been knocked insensible by the convict, after a struggle.

George Day.

Effie: "Jack, papa said we must not see each other any more." Jack: "Indeed! Then I will turn the gas out."

"What part am I to take?" said Chappie. "You are to be the heroine's father," replied the stage manager. "What does he do?" "He dies ten years before the curtain rises on the first act."

Mrs. Jackson: "Did you see Mrs. Brown's collection of rare old china?" Jackson: "Yes; her family must have been quite poor." Mrs. Jackson: "Nonsense; why do you think so?" Jackson: "Well, if they had been able to keep servants she never would have had that collection of rare old china."

Digitized by Google

THE BLUNDERS OF JOHN CARSTER.

The Tale of a Lesson in Lovemaking.

"Well, I suppose this is the end of it." John Carster heaved a heavy sigh, and strode along moodily. Helen looked at him curiously and then asked:

"The end of what?"

"You know as well as I do to what I refer. To be perfectly plain, I hear it reported on very good authority that you are to marry this Monte Cristo. And that is what I mean when I say that I suppose we will not take many more walks together." He looked at her keenly.

"I suppose it is but a further exemplification of the doctrine announced by the Bible, where it says 'To him who hath, it shall be given, and to him who hath not, it shall be taken away,' and I want to add to that, 'even that which he may seem to have.'"

There was a silence for a few moments. Helen reached out and plucked at a foxglove. She did not look at him. After a few moments she said in a low voice:

"You are getting bitter, John. Don't do it. It does not help you."

"Don't you think I have cause to be bitter? A man can smile and stand a great deal more without giving evidence of his suffering, and there is still another degree of pain, which turns everything to gall. I have suffered that."

"You are very wrong to look at things that way," replied the woman. "What have you to be bitter over? You possess youth, and health, and strength, and ability—all those are priceless gifts. You are well thought of by everyone, and I see no cause for you to think your lot is hard."

"Yes, what you say is true, but I have not the great essential—money. I might be a paralytic, and just have enough sense to keep out of a lunatic asylum, and enough morals to keep from being locked up as a menace to society, but if I had money, all that would be overlooked, and I would be better thought of than I am now. As it is, I am not considered at all."

"Not considered by whom?"

"Everybody. And someone in particular whom I wish to consider me, and who has refused. I have tried everything else; I have placed myself at her feet. Love does not count."

Her face was crimson. She looked far away over the sere, brown fields, and at last said:

"Then what am I to deduce from that assertion—it isn't clear."

"You are not to deduce anything—I state it as my positive conviction that, given on the one hand a man with everything to make him desirable in the eyes of a woman, but with no money, and on the other hand a man with nothing to recommend him but money, a woman will choose the man with the money ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. That's what I mean."

"Why, John, why, John!" There was an infinity of reproach in those words.

"Yes, I mean it!" he added. "I mean every word of it. Women are essentially selfish, and they love the soft side of life. They know that money will make a soft side to anything, and therefore, they are on the side of money."

"I am sorry for you," she said simply. "I thought that you had a higher idea of women."

"Haven't I a right to be bitter?" he continued. "Haven't I every right to such ideas? If it has not been demonstrated to me, nothing has. There is nothing so convincing as personal experience, and it is from that I speak."

"I have known you a long time, John, and I know of no such instance in your career that you speak of. When was it?"

"You know very well to what I allude. You know that I have loved you for all these years, since we were little more than children. You know that my highest dream of earthly happiness was to some day make a home for you, where I could have you with me always. There has not been an ambition in my brain that was not caused by my wish to excel and make you proud of me.

"The rest of the world go can hang—you are my world, the all in all for me. And now, after all these years, all that counts for naught. There comes into your life a great big, beefy man,—you know little about him except that he is very wealthy, and in the course of two months he undoes what I have done, or rather in that time accomplishes what I could not accomplish in six times as many years. Is not that evidence enough? What is to be deduced from that except what I have stated?"

"I ought to be very angry with you, John. You have accused me of a wretched thing—that I would sell my life, my love, my soul, merely to provide myself with creature comforts. I don't know why I don't make you leave me, and never permit you to speak to me again, except that I realise that your anger has carried you off your feet. I realise what you say, that such a state of things is an awful blow to a man. But I do not grant that any such state exists—that is—I mean——"

"You mean what, that you are not going to marry him?" There was light and life and hope in the questioner's eyes now.

"Yes, I mean that; and that I have not intended to do so. And now let me do a little preaching to you—you have had your say, and you have said things you ought not to have said."

"It is a mistaken notion men have, that a woman wants to receive all and give nothing. True love is self-effacement, and bearing the burdens of those whom we do love, and nothing gives a woman so much pleasure as to suffer for the man she really cares for."

"Do you really mean that?" There was wonderment upon the face of the questioner.

"Yes. And there would be more women who would be glad to accept even the little in the way of wealth their sweethearts possess, if they were given the chance. Instead of going bravely to her and saying 'I have little or nothing, but I love you. I can provide enough to keep us from starving, and enough to furnish us with clothes. More than that, I do not care for, with you at my side. Will you accept that?' The men stand off and snivel about women wanting wealth. It makes me weary. It's weakness."

There was a long pause. The sun had sunk below the horizon, and the west was gorgeous with the opaline tints of the dying day. The couple stood a moment looking at the sunset. Perhaps it was the glory of the ruddy rays upon her face, or the reflection from the golden gates of the west that shone in her eyes. He paused, for a moment irresolute, and then taking her hand, looked her full in the eyes. She looked down and her face flushed.

"Helen," he said, very gently, "I have almost nothing in the way of goods or wealth, but I have a love for you that the wealth of Midas could not buy. Will you accept what I have?"

She looked up and smiled softly.

"Why didn't you say that a year or so ago? Yes, I will."

Gaston Harvey

Digitized by Google

THE MOTH AND THE STAR.

The Story of a Revenge which Ended Happily.

THE soft light of many lamps fell on as gay, as bright a scene as could be painted.

Charming girls in dainty toilettes, a capital band and a first-class floor for dancing—Mrs. Danesbury's ball bid fair to be a big success.

And of all the young and pretty girls here gathered not one so lovely as was Jessie Casselis, a golden-haired blonde with pink cheeks and big grey eyes, and a mouth designed, it seemed, for kisses!

Those same grey eyes were looking round the room in evident and eager expectation.

"He is not here, Nina," she said softly to a dark, pleasant-looking girl; "do you think he will come?"

"Surely, my dear. Why, if I mistake not, he is here already." She motioned to a fair, distinguished-looking man just entering the room.

"Yes—it is Cecil." Jessie's face flushed—she squeezed her friend's hand tightly. "Oh, Nina, doesn't he make the other men look plain?"

"Handsome is that handsome does, my dear. Cecil Warrington has the reputation of being a great flirt; mind you don't get caught, Jessie. Remember the pretty proverb about singed wings, and fly away in time."

"Nonsense," said Jessie sharply, and turned aside. But all the same a sharp pain shot through her heart at the words; it could not, it should not be that he was only flirting. She shook off the feeling by sheer force of will and talked, and laughed, was the gayest of the gay, flitting from one to another like a bright butterfly.

And yet, surrounded by men, besieged for dances, she could not be content. Cecil had made her promise to save all his favourite waltzes, made her promise with loving words and tender looks, but the evening was far advanced and he had not come to claim them!

Would another, to whom her thoughts went back, have so treated her? A year ago, at a ball at this very house, Guy Redmond had been her shadow, a slave to all her whims. She had been fond of him in a girlish sort of way, but nothing deeper. Nina told her she had treated him cruelly, inasmuch as he had made desperate love to her unrebuked, for the space of a year, only to be met with a refusal at the end of his wooing. But then Nina didn't know everything. Her aunt, the Hon. Mrs. Maynard, would never have allowed Jessie to make such a match. Guy had nothing but his pay, it was not possible to think of such a thing as matrimony. No, she was not to blame; and yet, and yet she could not forget the look in Guy's blue eyes when he had heard his fate.

Overwrought with excitement and disappointment, Jessie could hardly keep back the tears when at last Cecil came over to her side.

"Suppose we sit awhile in the conservatory?" he asked her. "It's terribly hot and noisy here. And I've something to say to you which can't be said in the middle of a ballroom."

He spoke so tenderly, holding her little hand in his the while, that all trace of resentment and indignation at his treatment vanished.

She went with him to the sweet-scented hot-house, finding contentment in the thought that, for a time, at least, they two would be together.

She noticed after a while that they were sitting in the same spot, under the very palm, where she had given poor Guy Redmond his congé a year back. She felt that she would have much preferred another seat, but notwithstanding this slight drawback, she was very happy. Cecil loved her, surely he loved her!

In the dim light his arm stole round her waist, her head drooped nearer, closer, until it found a resting place on his shoulder. "Darling," he whispered, kissing her fondly, "my own dear little girl."

"Do you love me, Jessie?" he asked her presently, and clasping her white arms round his neck, her whole soul in her eyes, she answered "Yes."

"You will hear from me to-morrow dear," he whispered, as he said "Good-bye," and the look she gave him in return was so full of tenderness that it struck her aunt, the Hon. Mrs. Maynard, as remarkable.

"Jessie," she questioned eagerly, "has Cecil Warrington proposed?"

Had he proposed? The question jarred on the girl. Of course he had, she told herself, virtually, if not in words. She hesitated a moment, and then answered quietly, "I shall hear from him to-morrow," and with that her aunt was fain to be content. Mrs. Maynard glanced approvingly at the slight figure in the corner of the carriage. Warrington was a very good match, she reflected, £10,000 a year and the chance of a title. Truly her niece had done well, and the worthy woman decided that Jessie's marriage portion should not be called a meagre one. For to her that hath more shall be given, and, inasmuch as the wife of Cecil Warrington would enjoy riches in plenty a greater supply should be at her command.

"Thank Heaven, I was firm about that good-for-nothing Redmond," reflected Mrs. Maynard. "I always swore if Jessie married a poor man I would not let her have a penny," and, swelling with complacency at such virtuous resolution, the good lady retired to bed—to dream of Jessie's future greatness.

Her niece, however, passed the night in a very different fashion. Again and again she went over every incident of that eventful evening. How lucky that she had worn her new white dress; he liked white! Had he not told her so a dozen times? "I'm not good enough for you, my darling," she murmured fondly, gazing with soft grey eyes into the fire.

She sat and thought until the sun rose behind the murky cloud of smoke that bounded the horizon, till its first beams touched the chimney tops with gold, and set the sparrows twittering with delight. She threw the window open and looked out. The cool morning air, as yet untainted by London's dust and grime, fell like a caress upon her cheek, and with a smile curving her warm red lips, she dropped her head upon the window-sill and fell asleep.

Digitized by Google

It was some hours later when she awoke with a start, to find her maid regarding her with mild astonishment, while a terrible headache bore evidence to the fact that a window-sill is not the most refreshing place to take a nap.

In place of the bright sunshine of the early morning, the air was heavy with a thick yellow fog, and her spirits seemed to have grown dull in sympathy.

"A letter for you, miss."

A letter—one look was enough—it was from him! With eager, trembling hands she broke the seal, how good of him to write so soon. But, as she read, the flush upon her face changed to a deadly whiteness, her eyes grew strained and hard, the fair young face seemed to have aged by years.

"Some years ago," the letter ran, "Guy Redmond and I were boys at school together, and the friendship then commenced has lasted until now. When I tell you that the last time I saw my friend he was a wreck both in mind and body, his health gone, his prospects blighted, his career in the Army inevitably drawing to a close, when, I say, I tell you that I learnt the name of the woman whose heartless trifling had brought him to this pass—you will understand why I have striven to win your love, you will comprehend the delight experienced at my complete success, and you will, I trust, derive some benefit from the lesson I have tried to teach you."

"The lesson I have tried to teach you"—for a moment she could not grasp the full meaning of the words. With the memory of his kisses on her lips, with his love words ringing in her ears, how could she understand that they were false?

With wild eyes, and white, wan face, she paced the room. Her ball dress lying on a chair seemed to mock her with the thought of yesterday. She seized the dainty mass of silk and tulle, and trampled on it, treading it out of shape and form, tearing its costly laces with a mad delight. And then his face, tender and smiling, rose before her, she felt his arms about her, his kisses on her lips! With a sharp cry she fell upon her knees, striving in vain to keep back the sobs that shook her frame, the expression of her heart's dull load of sorrow.

Ah, Guy, could you have seen her, in the depths of her humiliation, you would have deemed yourself avenged indeed for every heartache that she made you suffer.

Cecil Warrington told himself repeatedly that the revenge he had taken on the girl who had so cruelly wounded his friend was not only justifiable but praiseworthy. "Served her quite right," he would exclaim viciously, and apparently the repetition of the phrase gave him great comfort, for if he said it once he said it twenty times within the first twenty-four hours of his reprisal.

But after awhile his revenge seemed to grow stale and unprofitable, and when he heard that "the heartless flirt," as he designated Jessie, was seriously ill, he experienced an utter revulsion of feeling, and even went so far as to apply the epithet of "caddish" to his own behaviour.

This being the state of his mind, it was clearly necessary to once more recount the sum of her iniquities against his bosom friend. "The best rider, the finest shot, the most popular man in the regiment brought to destruction by this woman's coquetry. Why, it was positively a moral necessity for her to understand something of what poor Guy had suffered."

But his indignation would not take fire, and in the midst of his expressions of delight that he had made her "sit up," as he called it, the thought of her soft, warm lips, her glorious hair, her eyes, would send the hot blood rushing through his veins and thrilling to his heart.

London gradually grew distasteful. Everywhere Cecil went the one topic of remark seemed to be Miss Casselis' sudden illness. Everybody seemed possessed with the idea that of all things he desired to hear, what would please him most, was the news of Jessie Casselis. "They've cut off all her hair," said Nina Hardy, tearfully, one evening in his hearing, "you know what lovely hair poor Jessie had."

None knew better than he, thought poor Cecil miserably, and forthwith reviled himself in terms of unmitigated bitterness.

"Is Miss Casselis no better?" he asked Nina. "I wish you would tell me just how she is. I'd give anything to hear that she was well."

"I wonder you dare to mention her name," blazed out Nina. "If I were a man I would thrash you for your shameful treatment of her, poor darling. How you could be so cruel, so mean, so unscrupulous, I don't know." And the fury of the tempest over, she dissolved in tears.

"I don't suppose you know quite how it all happened," he suggested deprecatingly, but at that Nina fired up again.

"You're mistaken," she said scornfully. "I know the whole affair. Highly creditable your conduct seems to have been, I must say."

"Did Jessie—I mean Miss Casselis—tell you."

"No, she didn't," snapped Nina, "she's too honourable to talk of other people's affairs. I came to see her the morning she was taken ill, and found your delightful letter on the floor."

"Miss Hardy," he said humbly, "won't you help me, for your friend's sake?"

"What do you want?" she asked, a thought less brusquely.

"I want to ask her to forgive me—to tell her that what I commenced in play has finished in earnest, and that, be she what she may, I love her and her only."

"I don't suppose she'll believe you," answered Nina, "besides, I don't understand this sudden transition from hate to love. It may easily veer round to hate again. You feel sorry and repentant now because she's ill. When she's better—if she does get better, poor darling—your causeless animosity will probably flare up once more."

"It wasn't exactly causeless," he answered. Not even though he loved her could he quite forgive Guy's broken life. "You don't know what a splendid fellow Guy used to be, Miss Hardy," he went on. "He gave such promise, everyone declared he would make a name for himself, and to see such a fine chap going to pieces through a woman's passion for adulation, is enough to arouse a fellow's animosity."

"It wasn't so much Jessie's fault as you suppose," said Nina. "She was very young at the time, only seventeen, and Guy Redmond was the first man who had ever paid her any attention. She had passed her life up till then in a village parsonage, and the little country girl was quite strange to the ways and manners of Society. Shedidn't understand that by accepting his attentions she was leading him on, and only felt surprise when he accused her of doing so. Still, I think she would have married him but for Mrs. Maynard. You see, when Jessie's father died two years ago, her aunt adopted her—very kind she has been too, in her way—and it would have been ungrateful, to say the least of it, if in return Jessie had married against her aunt's consent."

"Do you mean she loved Guy Redmond?"

"I don't say that. I think she cared for him in a quiet sort of way, which might have grown to something deeper, but she never loved, I am convinced, till now."

Cecil stood and listened with a sense of shame growing at every word. What a brute he had been! For the first time Guy's conduct struck him in a different light. It hardly seemed dignified or manly; surely it would have been better to have kept a stiff upper lip, and not have gone over so completely. And yet, how terribly haggard the poor fellow had looked, the last time they had met—in Paris—some six months ago.

Digitized by Google

"Why, Warrington, old boy, how are you?" A hearty voice roused him from his reverie, and a friendly shake of the hand brought Cecil face to face with Guy himself. But what a different Guy from the one who had so occupied his thoughts of late! Cecil positively blushed under Nina's quizzical glances, as in place of the wan, despairing youth he had depicted, they were greeted by a broad-shouldered, deep-chested young giant, whose fair, good-looking face and hearty laugh betokened excellent health and a mind totally at ease.

For a while they were both silent. Nina, choking with laughter, had disappeared with her face buried in her handkerchief, and neither of the two men wished to speak first.

"You're looking considerably better, Guy," said his friend at last, somewhat grimly.

"Er—yes, old chap, I'm as fit as a fiddle. I got over that affair, you know, much quicker than I thought I should. Indeed, I feel quite grateful to Miss Casselis that she did refuse me, as otherwise I should never have met the sweetest little woman in the world."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, old chap—Daisy Martin—old Martin's daughter, you know, of 'Ours.' She was most awfully good to me all the time—and—er—in short, we're married, old boy, and I want your best congratulations."

"Married!" Cecil heard a strange voice, which he presumed was his own, uttering forced pleasantries, inane congratulations, and all the time the thoughts of the ridiculous muddle he had made of the whole affair—the senseless piece of idiocy he had perpetrated—held possession of his brain.

"Absolutely all the time I was nursing a hatred towards her, that fatuous idiot was making a fool of himself with Daisy Martin," thought poor Cecil. And now, what could he do? If only it were possible to see her, beg her forgiveness, intreat her love once more.

He jumped into a hansom, and arming himself with a large portion of the contents of a florist's shop, lilies, gardenias, roses, and white hyacinths—he drove round to Mrs. Maynard's.

Miss Casselis was better. the delirium had left her, but it would be weeks before she was strong enough to see any visitors whatever!

How should he ever get through the time, he wondered. And indeed his only comfort in those days was Nina. She had relented a little towards him, and daily sent word how the invalid was progressing, what books she liked, her favourite fruit and flowers. At last the welcome news arrived that one day shortly Jessie was coming downstairs, and that if he would be very careful he might see her for a little while.

On a sunny afternoon Jessie, packed up with rugs and cushions, was settled in the drawing-room by the fire. It was very cosy there, and closing her eyes, the girl did not notice that Nina and her aunt had softly left the room, nor that a visitor had been as quickly admitted. It was not till Cecil had reached her side that she roused herself. Before she had time to speak he had taken possession of her hand, and in an odd sort of voice asked her humbly to forgive him.

"I loved you all the time," he told her; "even when I was writing that abominable letter I was thinking of your golden hair, your little hands, your soft grey eyes. Will you forgive me, darling? Will you give me a chance to make you forget my cruelty?"

For a moment she hesitated, then with a little cry she stooped towards him.

"You are not playing with me now?" she said.

For answer he caught her in his arms—the heartless flirt he had so bitterly condemned!

And at his touch all memory of her suffering and her sorrow vanished. She nestled closer, her lips sought his again and again.

The woman had found her lover; the moth had reached its star!

John K. Prothero.

THE BEGINNING OF A LOVE STORY.

A Queer Mistake which Brought About Happy Results.

It was just four o'clock in the morning when Miss Clarissa Steele crept quietly downstairs and out at the side door. She stood for a moment on the broad stone steps and took a long, free breath, then she went down the gravel walk into the street.

She turned away from the village, and, as if with a definite object in view, walked swiftly toward the fields and hills to the north.

It was only since April that Elmville had taken a lively interest in birds. It had known vaguely that there were birds within its borders—sparrows, a jackdaw or two, and out in the country, crows, perhaps a few jays.

This limited ornithological knowledge had satisfied Elmville, and when it was heard that in London it was the thing to rise early, take one's opera glasses and go "birding" it had smiled indulgently.

That, however, was two years ago and Elmville was two hundred miles from London. A hundred miles a year was quite fast enough for a fad to travel towards Elmville, but when it finally arrived it was received with enthusiasm.

The little village suddenly awoke to the fact that there were birds in its trees of which it had never dreamt, and birds in its fields and pastures whose very names it had never heard.

It began to talk wisely of greenshanks and warblers, redstarts and lesser whitethroats. Quiet folk who had known of birds all their lives suddenly found themselves in great demand.

This popularity might have turned their heads had it lasted long enough, but when it was discovered that there were questions which they could not answer they were promptly made to know their proper place and to feel like impostors who had been found out.

The newly roused interest in birds took different forms. There were some who made up parties and took long walks in the woods, where they talked and laughed so loudly that all the birds fled before them. This class enjoyed the bird walks greatly and went every week.

Then there was young Mrs. Goodnow, who had seen more birds than anyone else in town, but who could not tell the song of a thrush from that of a cuckoo, declaring naïvely that she did not care anything about the noises the birds made.

Others wondered how she knew so many birds when she did not have her ears to help her, but she had a very fine pair of field-glasses and unlimited time

Digitized by Google

There were the two elder Misses Steele, who contented themselves with looking from windows into the tops of the elm and oak trees which grew about their home, and there was their sister Clarissa, who on this beautiful June morning, was out in the country at a little after four.

It was eight when she walked up the path to the side door. She was tired and very hungry, but she was also happy and had a quantity of bird news to tell her sisters.

Breakfast was ready and a delicious odour of hot coffee came out to her through the open door, and she went in eagerly. She hung her hat in the hall, then passed on to the dining-room.

Usually she greeted her sisters with a cheery good morning, but this time she had hardly crossed the threshold before she was aware that something was wrong.

A quick glance at Elinor and Caroline showed her that it must be something very wrong indeed. Her heart began to beat faster and all the happiness seemed suddenly to have gone out of the morning. She looked timidly at her sisters and they stared at her in stony silence.

"What is the matter?" she asked, tremulously.

"I should not think you would need to ask that question, Clarissa Maria," Elinor said in a hollow voice.

"No, I should not think so, too," echoed Caroline.

Now it was only about once in three years that she did anything bad enough for them to call her Clarissa Maria, and at that moment she felt that life was too full of bitterness to be borne. She sank down weakly in a chair and waited.

"To think," began Caroline, in a tone of sadness and reproof, "to think that you should disgrace us, and not only us, but the good name of our family, by making your pretended interest in birds an excuse for going out in the mornings and carrying on a flirtation——"

"A scandalous flirtation," interrupted Elinor.

"Yes, a scandalous flirtation with the curate."

Clarissa started to her feet with a little cry. "I—I never did," she gasped, while the colour rose in her face.

"You saw him this morning. You don't deny that, I suppose, though I don't know," and Caroline shuddered.

"Yes," said Clarissa eagerly. "I did see him. It was down in Mr. Ames' meadow, but he was on one side of the river and I on the other, and we just stopped to speak about birds for a minute."

Elinor smiled sardonically. "And then," she said, "he kissed his hand to you—not once, but several times, and you——"

"Yes, kissed your hand to him," finished Caroline, as Elinor paused and seemed unable to go on. "Yes, Clarissa Maria, you kissed your hand to him. We knew it because Sally Porter was on the hill and heard your voice and saw you do it."

"Oh!" cried Clarissa, her face lighting up, "he did not kiss his hand to me. How could you think he would be so silly? He was just showing me how to call the birds. You just put your fingers to your lips and make a smacking sound, so," and she illustrated, "and somehow it makes the birds come."

The elder sister looked sceptical. "That is a very ingenious excuse," said Caroline, coldly, "and how do you explain your conduct?"

There were tears in Clarissa's eyes now. "I just tried to see if I could do it," she said, with a little sob.

"Well," said Elinor, "I don't know how many people will believe you. You know what Sally Porter is like. You'd better eat your breakfast and then start at once to see and explain to all the people she has told the story to. Come, sit down, things will be stone-cold."

"I—don't want any breakfast; I'm not hungry," and Clarissa went out of the room with her handkerchief held to her eyes.

An hour later Elinor tried Clarissa's door and found it locked. "You'd better come down and eat something," she said, but there was no answer and she went away.

An hour later she came again. This time she shook the door vigorously. "Clarissa," she called in a subdued tone, "come downstairs at once. The curate is here and wants to see you."

"Oh, I can't!" cried Clarissa, in a frightened voice.

"You must," said Elinor, emphatically. "He says he will wait any length of time, but he will see you."

When Clarissa entered the parlour the curate rose to meet her.

"Good morning, Miss Steele," he said. Then they both remembered that they had met before that morning and there was an awkward pause. She looked down at the carpet and he looked at her.

"I think, Miss Clarissa," he said, desperately, when the silence had become unendurable, "I think that you have heard the same thing that I have."

He felt that he had expressed himself vaguely, but she understood and nodded her head without looking up. She tried to keep her lips steady, but she could not prevent the tears from coming. When the curate saw them they seemed to give him the courage of desperation.

"I cannot express to you my regret that I was the cause—the innocent cause—of giving you pain. I would do anything in my power for the privilege of living over this morning and omitting that scene. But only on your account, remember," he went on, impetuously, "only on your account. For myself, I would not care who knew or saw. I would not be content with merely kissing my hand to you, either, and I would be willing to—er—do it on the green in front of the post-office in sight of everybody."

Clarissa was looking at him now, and the curate moved his chair nearer. Her eyes made him think of drowning violets, and he had a strong desire to save them.

"Clarissa," he said, "did you ever want something very, very much, but, knowing that it was far beyond your reach, after a time almost forgot that you wanted it, and deceived yourself into thinking that you were happy without it? Did you, Clarissa?"

She nodded.

"Well," he went on, "that has been my experience, and this morning something happened that brought it all back to me, and—oh, Clarissa! I don't see how I can live without you any longer."

She was silent for a moment, then she said softly, "I don't think you will have to."

S. B. Robb.

Digitized by Google

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS. A widow, who, having lost all her money in a bank failure, undertakes to chaperon Belinda.

BELINDA NORTH. The beautiful daughter of Hardy North, an Australian millionaire.

DUKE OF EASTACRES. A comparatively penniless suitor for Belinda's hand.

DAVID CARR. A young engineer, with whom Belinda is in love.

LADY HONORIA. Sister of the Duke of Eastacres.

STANLEY FORBES. A famous barrister.

ALPHONSE HERVÉ. An eminent French artist in love with Belinda.

PRINCESS VERA ZOULOFF. A celebrated Russian beauty.

BARON ROLLA. An extremely wealthy Parisian, in love with Belinda.

PAUL DE SONNAZ. A young French nobleman, and friend of Lady Peggy.

Vera's Last Reception.

A SUDDEN panic spread through the room. There is always a latent terror of Nihilists in Russian society, and a vague suspicion that the face referred to might belong to one of the dread band thrilled the women, and some of the men, to fear.

Paul de Sonnaz put an end to the suspense. He hurried from the room and passed from the wide hall into the great court. We watched him approach the figure crouching by the window, the figure of a woman as we now saw it to be.

Paul laid his hand upon her shoulder, turning her so that the light of the moon fell full upon the face—indescribably haggard, thin to attenuation, with great hollow eyes, full of a fierce, almost wolfish, look of hunger.

She was dressed in a long and somewhat shapeless garment; its black folds enveloped her from head to foot. She raised her hand to her head in a bewildered fashion when de Sonnaz spoke. Something in the gesture struck me as familiar.

"Belinda," I said hoarsely; "do you recognise her? She——"

With a cry Belinda flung up the window.

"It is Honoria," she said; "my poor Honoria!"

And to her eternal shame and disgrace Honoria it proved to be!

Always of weak intellect, she seemed to have become quite imbecile, and was totally unable to give a coherent account of how she came to the palace, or what she purposed doing.

"I wanted Belinda," she said dully. Then when the girl came to her, and with soft words and tender gestures soothed her, she gave a piercing shriek, and put her hands once more to her head.

"The pain," she said, "the awful pain. Don't let him in"—she pointed to the door—"for Heaven's sake don't let him in. He will kill me." She glanced round fearfully. "He's tried to starve me," she went on, speaking under her breath; "but that isn't quick enough. He'll find me, he's sure to find me, but——" The poor creature fell on her knees and clasped Belinda's skirts; "don't let him in, say you won't let him in?"

"Nobody shall hurt you, Honoria dear," said Belinda softly. "Tell me of whom you are afraid?"

Honoria shuddered, but made no reply. Weak she was and foolish, and stupid to the point of idiocy, and yet she still possessed some strange distorted sense of loyalty that forbade her to reveal the name of the man who had so shamefully used her.

That man was her husband, Mark Striven. It afterwards transpired that he had started a gambling saloon in the environs of Paris, and having a numerous acquaintance, had speedily worked up a large and paying clientèle.

Honoria had assisted him at first; dressed in good taste, with her hair becomingly arranged, and her sallow skin touched up with rouge and blanc de perles, she had looked—I was assured—quite nice looking! At any rate, some of the habitués of the saloon thought so, and took no pains to hide their admiration.

A certain young and charming Comte had, I was told, been desperately enamoured of poor Honoria. He was wealthy and devoted to cards, and Mark Striven looked to make a year's income at the least from him. His expectations were, however, disappointed, his designs thwarted.

Honoria, like all plain women, was aggressively virtuous. She declined to have anything to do with the Comte and finally refused to see him! As a result the young man withdrew his patronage from Striven's saloon, and a large decrease of that gentleman's income immediately took place.

Mark bullied and threatened in vain, Honoria, with the obstinacy of a small brained woman, declined to hear reason. Of what followed one could not get a clear idea.

My own suspicions suggest that Mark Striven, who had insured Honoria's life after their marriage, had determined to waste no money in prolonging her existence. The seeds of consumption were already in her constitution, and phthisis, assisted by a light diet and insufficient warmth, is very easily encouraged.

Honoria, however, cut short her husband's plan; she escaped from the house in the Rue Burgoyne and made her way from one place to another in search of Belinda until she reached the palace of the Ortoffs.

I wired to Mark Striven in the morning, but, pending his arrival—he was to meet us on the road to Florence—I made no demur to Belinda's suggestion that Honoria should accompany us. I realised that I might have a use for Honoria.

Gossip was very rife in the palace concerning the girl, her terrible appearance and the strange fashion of her arrival, but the Eastacres generally had such a reputation for eccentricity that her escapade was not made so much of as would have been the case with any other woman.

"That Striven is a beast," said Toffy when the first alarm and surprise at Honoria's white face and wild air had died away. "It's my belief he'll kill the woman before he's done with her."

Digitized by Google

A belief that many of us shared, but which good taste prevented our expressing.

We knew—every one of us—that it was more than likely that Mark had designs on Honoria's insurance money, just as we knew that old Lady Calistares had put her unfortunate stepson to sleep in damp sheets in the hope that rheumatic fever would clear him off and make room for her own boy; and that the Marquis of Onnerton had fired the gun that killed his brother, Lord Chiverton—not by accident as the public believed—but from jealousy; he suspected Chiverton of an intrigue with his wife.

You people think you hear of all the strange affairs that take place in Society. In reality you don't know one half, and of those that reach your ears you have not the key.

As I say, we knew these things but never let our knowledge appear.

From the Ortoff Palace we started for Italy.

Of all places in the world, Belinda set her heart upon staying at Verona, with its sun-baked streets, its grim, dust-covered fortifications, its little lines of stunted trees; Verona, where the bitter, piercing mountain winds sweep through the town, stirring the grasses—all alive with brown lizards—that grow in the courtyards of the great, desolate houses.

Belinda, with her head full of romance, grew enthusiastic over the place, and raved of its wonderful palaces; for the most part in ruins, and let out in floors. We lodged in one of these mansions, and our rooms were typical of Italy.

The superb staircase was—before we came—coated in filth, the courtyard, which would have held a troop of soldiers, was given over to weeds and lizards; chambers, hung with costly tapestries, were knee-deep in dust, and on walls boasting world-famous cartoons, were hung the padrona—or caretaker's—garments.

Windows, thick with grime, were festooned with roses and vines, everywhere the luxury of beauty, side by side with the deepest poverty, the most hideous dirt!

The upper rooms of the palace were tenanted by workpeople and art students. A singer occupied the floor above our own, and the lower halls were the abode of the caretaker and her troop of children.

Verona is a city little visited save by artists and tourists; personally, I should never have gone near the place. I only did so by reason of Belinda.

At Verona, Mark Striven came to claim his wife. We received him in the salon, a huge chamber with a wonderful ceiling, where lovely women laughed down from frescoes of roses, and where the vine leaves arched round the casement.

The room was heavy with the scent of lilies and magnolia. Belinda, tall and stately, in a wonderful Venetian gown that the padrona had fished out from an old chest, wore a knot of the odorous blossoms at her throat.

"Where is Honoria?" said Mark abruptly.

"She is in my room," replied Belinda, "and"—the girl eyed him firmly—"she is going to stay there."

"I don't crave for her immediate society," he said sneering; "so long as she's ready to start with me to-morrow morning, she can stay where she is for to-night."

"She shall not come with you to-morrow," said Belinda. "You dare not risk a scene, a scandal, and if you try to take her away I'll summon the police."

"My dear Lady Peggy"—he turned to me with a smile—"your charge talks a little wildly. She——"

I interrupted him.

"Belinda is very anxious that Honoria should stay with her for a time. They are attached to each other, if you could spare your wife a little while we should be delighted." I beamed as I spoke, adroitly edging off Belinda to the door.

"Leave it to me, you silly girl," I whispered, "go upstairs out of the way, and I'll settle the thing in five minutes."

"Now, Mark," said I when Belinda had gone, "if you're prepared to discuss the matter quietly, so much the better—for you. If not——" I shrugged and seated myself beside him.

"What's the game?" he said abruptly—Striven never could turn a phrase.

"Matters stand thus, I believe: Your wife has run awa owing to your cruelty, you want her back, Belinda wishe her to stay. Well," I paused, "Belinda is prepared to pay something for Honoria's companionship."

"Five hundred down," snapped the wretch. "Not a penny less."

I laughed contemptuously. "You're dealing with me, my dear man," I cried, "and you might as well demand the moon as five hundred pounds!"

"Very good," he rose as he spoke. "I miss Honoria, I'd just as soon have her as not."

"Easier said than done, Mark. You don't know Belinda. She'll go to any lengths to stop you taking Honoria."

"There'll be no necessity to take her," he returned with a laugh. "I've only to say 'come' to Honoria, and she'll follow me like a lamb. Do you suppose I've lived with her these six months and not discovered how to manage her? She obeys me like a dog, or a slave. She's mine, body and soul."

"While you're there, yes, but in your absence——"

"She'd never have got away but for that scoundrel Stanley Forbes," he said, raising his voice in anger. "He came to the Rue Burgoyne when I was out and bribed the woman there to let him see Honoria. He put the idea of leaving me into her head. I'll swear it. Once she's back she won't get clear again," and he laughed vindictively.

"But do you want her back now?" I asked suggestively. "Why not leave her here with us? I can manage to lend you one hundred pounds if it's a question of ready money."

He paused, then leaning forward, brought his face, his evil face, close to mine.

"You've some scheme on foot," he said slowly. "What is it? It's no good to try to bluff me, Lady Peggy. You're not so fond of Belinda as to put up with Honoria for her sake. Come, what is it?" And he smiled with an attempted familiarity that revolted me.

"Belinda has expressed a wish for Honoria's society," I returned. "I am prepared to pay for that wish——"

"To the extent of five hundred pounds?" he queried.

I saw that he was determined, and wearied by the struggle and just a little fearful of what he might discover if the conversation were prolonged, I made a compromise.

"I'll give you a hundred down," I said, "and the remainder—when she returns."

"And that will be?"

"Within six months," I answered steadily. "Possibly within three."

"Give me the cash," he said, "and I'll clinch the bargain."

I handed him notes to the value of one hundred pounds, and then, after a little further talk with Mark, I summoned his wife.

"Honoria," I said, "Mark wishes you to return with him."

For a moment she stood still, glancing at me with wild, startled-looking eyes.

"Must I?" she whispered. "Oh, Lady Peggy, won't you let me stop? I'll work," she wrung her helpless-looking hands, "or do anything if you'll keep me."

"Come here!" said Mark abruptly, and at the sound of his voice she shrank as from a blow.

"You want to stay here?" he said.

Her eyes studied his face, seeking in abject submission to discover what he wished her to reply. What she read therein emboldened her to answer truthfully.

"Yes, if you please, Mark, if you don't mind."

"Very well, you shall stay, but on one condition." He grasped her arm tightly as he spoke, so that he hurt her. "You stay here on the understanding that whatever Lady Peggy tells you to do, you do without question or demur."

Honoria glanced like a frightened, fascinated rabbit, from Mark's keen eyes to mine.

"I don't quite understand," she said.

Mark's face grew grim.

"You're not asked to understand," he said, "only to obey. Lady Peggy may want you to do certain things for Belinda's good," he chuckled as he spoke, "but to which she may object.

Digitized by Google

Are you prepared to obey orders in spite of Belinda, or," he tightened his grip on her arm so that she gave a low, faint cry, "or will you come back with me?"

There was a short, tense silence. The roses blown by the night wind beat against the casement, and the vine leaves shivered with the cold.

Honoria's great eyes searched her husband's face, and she trembled and turned a more ghastly white than she had been before. There were strange, dark secrets in her married life, short though it had been.

She had a great and well-founded dread of Mark, it would be to her a living martyrdom to return. And yet the price of liberty was a high one.

Belinda had been good to her, of all the women she had met, this girl alone had shown her love and kindliness. Did she consent to obey me, her powers of reasoning, small though they were, convinced her that the obedience would be hurtful to Belinda.

I watched her in suspense. That any woman should put another's comfort before her own is surprising, but, that a woman so miserable as Honoria should weigh Belinda's happiness against her own wretchedness, struck me as phenomenal.

"Well," said Mark, "well?" he gazed at her fixedly, and something in his look must have recalled past scenes of cruelty, for Honoria wrenched herself from his hold, and, in a high-pitched, gasping voice, cried—

"I will do whatever Lady Peggy wishes. Indeed, indeed I will, if I may stay!"

Late that night, when Mark had taken his departure, I was aroused from slumber by the entry of a tall, ungainly figure, garbed in a hideous dressing-gown. Honoria, for it was she, stumbled across the room, and fell on her knees at my bedside.

"You don't mean any harm to her?" she cried, "say you don't mean any harm! I'd rather die than hurt Belinda. I wish that I had died long, long ago. What shall I do—what can I do?"

She rocked herself to and fro, her weak face distorted with grief, her long thin hands clutching the drapery upon the bed.

"Why didn't you let me take the poison long ago, in Cairo? There's only one person in the world who cares for me, who has been kind to me, and I have promised to go against her. Don't hurt Belinda, Lady Peggy—don't!"

It was an unpleasant and an unnerving scene. In my heart I felt a little sorry for Honoria. She was one of those persons who are condemned to act as pawns upon life's chess board, moved hither and thither at the bidding, and for the convenience of the stronger and more powerful pieces, and yet she was a contemptible object, with her tears and her protestations! I gave her a dose of sal-volatile and got her off to bed, under the assurance that I intended no ill will to Belinda.

Next morning we left the city of Verona. The mountain wind was cold; Belinda shivered in her furs, and the roses, yellow as gold, that lay in her lap, shivered before the blast. Slowly but surely the cold, cruel hand of Fate would shrivel the roses of her faith, her hope, her love. She was looking wan and pale, and she was strangely apathetic. Things were working as I had planned them.

That night I sent to Eastacres an urgent and imperative letter; what I said to him, and how that which he and I conspired to bring about took place, you shall learn in the sequel.

One word I must say here in my own defence. What you have learnt of me up to the present has doubtless shocked you, secure in your respectable, if dull and commonplace, homes. What you will learn before this series ends will cause you to condemn me more bitterly than before. But, in passing judgment, remember this—

I was a woman past middle-age, fighting desperately and fiercely to keep her place in the world. I had no son to keep me, and my daughters one and all were ungrateful and averse to me. I was fighting for a security against the poverty and all the attendant horrors of a penniless old age. And in the fight I gave no quarter—in like case would you, most respectable of British matrons, have done any better?

We came to Florence, the City of Flowers, at the close of a glorious day.

The great white statues of the church of Santa Trinita rose like snow against the golden sky. Monte Oliveto towered dark against the rosy glory of the west. There was a sweet sea wind blowing which fanned out as it went all the spiced odours of the woods and fields.

The shops of the goldsmiths and mosaic sellers, and alabaster workers, gleamed and sparkled in the light. Everywhere there was some beauty, some fragrance, some treasure; and above all rose the wondrous shaft of the Campanile, gleaming like gold and ivory in the sun.

Near the great square in the centre of the city where Savonarola was put to death, lies the Palace of the Ubertas, once the stronghold of the noblest and most powerful family in Florence; it has now fallen into the hands of a little Jew, who lets it to those English or Americans who can afford to pay the extravagant price that he demands. Here it was that Princess Vera had established herself. A few nights after our arrival she gave a reception.

The rooms were filled with late violets, narcissus and rich red roses. The front of the palace was decorated with innumerable lights—quaint lanterns fashioned in the shape of butterflies, dragon-flies, and wreaths of lotus-lilies. The balcony was hung with scarlet, and from it a band of sweet-voiced Florentines sang the songs of the country.

In the great reception-rooms, stately women with wonderful dark eyes and lustrous hair talked to young English girls; secretaries of Legation chatted to American explorers and men of business, who in turn listened in wonderment to the ecstasies of a picturesque Italian enthusing over a work of art.

Vera had arranged a surprise for her guests. A little before midnight she and some twenty other ladies disappeared, to re-enter on the stroke of twelve, fantastically attired. Each had selected the costume of some world-famous heroine. Belinda had chosen Joan of Arc, and habited in clanking armour, her fair hair loose on her shoulders, she looked to the life the peasant maid who freed her country.

Vera had chosen a strange, a sinister rôle. She was robed as the great woman-poisoner— Lucrezia Borgia. Her gown was a marvel, and a murmur of admiration followed her. The train was of cloth of gold, and the scarlet skirts beneath were studded with tiny flames of rubies.

In her hair she wore a snake of gold with emeralds for its eyes; round her neck hung a gold chain, from it suspended a number of charms, a death-head in silver with diamond eyes, a cross with a crown of thorns in pearls and sapphires.

Last, but most strange, most beautiful of all, poised just above the apple of her soft white throat, there hung a huge moth, with iridescent wings and jewel-like body. The thing was fastened to a tiny brooch, the pin of which went through its exquisite body. It was alive, quivering in a prolonged and terrible death-agony.

It was the mode at that time for women to wear live things as ornaments. Jewelled tortoises hung with other costly trifles on a chatelaine, tiny snakes whose bright green bodies glittered in the light, were used to clasp the bodice of an evening dress. It was a strange craze, but it was original and among our set had a great vogue.

Vera took a keen, almost a savage delight in these additions to her toilette, but to-night she had eclipsed herself. The moth or beetle, whatever it might be, was the most lovely thing imaginable.

Other women there were garbed as Beatrice whom Dante loved, Margaret de Medici of evil fame, but none so superb, so wonderful as Vera. She stood at the end of the great chamber side by side with Belinda, and the guests applauded to the echo.

Belinda looked sad and wistful.

She was just as dreamy and distracted as Joan of Arc herself. It was a wonderful scene typical of modern luxury and modern art.

Digitized by Google

Outside lay Florence of five hundred years ago ; the white moonshine falling on the statues in the square, the bronze Perseus, the famous Hercules and David.

"A horrible sight!" murmured one of the guests, a clever but sardonic man, who has made himself a reputation as the most daring traveller in Europe.

I glanced round quickly in surprise.

For answer he motioned to the moth glittering on Vera's neck.

"A savage opens fire on the living body of his enemy, and you people at home shriek at his inhumanity and demand his punishment. Your great lady is crueller far than the savage ; she takes a gentle, pretty creature and tortures it for her amusement. Look!" he pointed to the beetle which was making a last convulsive struggle to get free.

As the man—his name was Francis Claverton—watched, a change came over his face. Surprise, interrogation tinged with fear, chased over his countenance, and he pressed through the throng closer to the Princess.

A sudden stir at the other end of the apartment diverted my attention. Two guests—late, but most welcome—had arrived.

Alphonse Hervé and David Carr entered together.

I watched the two men closely, and read their secret in a glance. Alphonse looked at Vera, and his eyes remained on her face. David flashed a look at the brilliant beauty in red and gold, then turned his eyes to the quiet, pure face of the girl beside her.

She did not seem surprised or glad to see him, but smiled in a vague, and to him a disappointing fashion. But as she met his eyes, burning with love, the colour mounted to her face. She put out her hand and clasped his own.

Watching, I set my teeth. Despite my skill, my plotting, and my cunning, love for a time had worsted me. Memory had knocked at the door of the girl's heart, and while a woman has life she will thrill to the memory of the first kisses that burnt on her lips and her throat, the first clasp of the arms that unlocked for her the gates of the garden of love.

In the background stood Farringdon, pale and quiet. He had come there that night for his answer ; but the look on Belinda's face, the light in her eyes, was answer enough. She was not for him, nor for any, but David the man she loved.

Vera had eyes for none of this. She was conscious only that Alphonse had returned to her, forgetful of the past, conscious only that she was beautiful exceedingly, and that he loved her.

That he might see her robed in a queen's magnificence, and receiving the homage of a crowd, she had defied prejudice, laughed at comment, and in the third month of her widowhood had held a great reception. Society was shocked, but it flocked to the reception all the same.

Alphonse bent over her hand with perfect grace.

"Forgive me," he murmured. She raised her eyes, the message that they gave needed no words. She swayed towards him, the scent of the roses that she carried filled the air. She was at the zenith of her youth and beauty ; the moth at her throat trembled in an ecstasy of pain. It had twisted itself free from the pin and in its death struggle lay close to her skin. The Princess put up her hand to brush it aside.

"Stop!" cried a hard, clear voice—the voice of Francis Claverton—"don't touch it. The thing is deadly if it stings you. Ah!" he broke off short. Vera's slim white fingers had grasped and flung the insect from her in contempt.

There was a tiny mark upon her throat ; it might be the mark of the gold chain. It might be——

Claverton stepped forward.

"If the insect has bitten you," he said, "in three days you will be dead!"

(A further exciting instalment will appear next Tuesday.)

Your Editor Chats.

On the page overleaf you will find the sixth of the Love Problem stories. It is called "A Secret Hoard," and the problem dealt with is "Should a Husband Tell His Wife His Business Troubles?" If any readers know of problems of a similar kind they would like to see discussed in Short Stories, I shall be glad if they will send them along, and, if suitable, I will get them written up in story form.

There has not been time yet for me to receive many more opinions regarding what Lady Peggy Carstairs wrote about middle-class people. One correspondent, however, thinks that Lady Peggy was a very wicked woman to scheme as she did to get money out of Belinda's father by chaperoning his daughter, and trying to force her into an undesirable marriage, even though it was to a man of title. In this week's instalment of "How I Chaperoned Belinda" you will see how Lady Peggy endeavours to justify her behaviour in this matter.

Next Tuesday will be a red-letter day in the annals of Short Stories, for on that day your little favourite will contain more good things than it has ever done before.

In the first place, there is a new serial from the pen of Mr. R. Norman Silver. Its title is

"HELD APART."

Mr. Silver's work is well known to readers of Short Stories. His serial "The Golden Dwarf" is perhaps best known. "Held Apart" is a present-day romance, in which the love element is very strong, and powerful new situations are introduced.

Secondly, there is the first of a series of true stories called

"THE CONFESSIONS OF A SELF-MADE GIRL."

These will appeal more particularly to my lady readers, I expect, and I hope many of them will gather useful hints from the life of this self-made girl. Though she has got on so well, she had to go through a great many unpleasant experiences, and country girls coming to London to make their living will do well to take warning, and so perhaps they will be able to avoid some of the pitfalls which are so plentiful in this great city.

Thirdly, and perhaps not of the least interest, is an entirely of which I will not say more now than that valuable prizes are offered to the winners, and that everyone will have an equal opportunity of winning the prizes.

NEW COMPETITION,

So, altogether, you will see that next Tuesday's Short Stories is not to be missed if you like getting good value for your money. The three things mentioned above will all be fresh next week.

Further instalments of "How I Chaperoned Belinda," and "The Albert Gate Mystery" will appear as usual, as well as several complete short tales.

Your Editor.

RESULT OF THE "LIFE" COMPETITION.

The Gramophone prizes have been awarded as follows: T. Tatlow, 136 Main Street, Bulwell, Notts; G. Lilley, 40 Sea View Terrace, Swansea; B. Carthew, 51 Hawthorn Road, Willesden Green, N.W.; G. A. Hughes, 11 Virgil Street, Cornbrook, Manchester; H. Lynch, 16 Broad Street, Miletown, Sheerness; A. Barnes, 16 Scott Street, Maidstone; Mrs. Amos, 7 Harold Mews, St. Leonards-on-Sea; Miss Ada Thompson, 34 Rowena Crescent, Battersea; J. G. Persich, 88 Eglisfield Road, South Shields; E. Walters, 5 Mayfields, Kirkdale, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

Love Problem No. 6.

A Secret Hoard.

Should a Husband Tell his Wife his Business Troubles?

Many women have a kind of subtle instinct which teaches them at once when their menfolk are in trouble. This applies more particularly to married people, perhaps, for marriage intensifies a mutual sympathy, which in its turn brings forth the instinct which we mention.

Now Nora Heywood couldn't have written out this theory to save her life, but she could do better still, she could illustrate it, and she did so every day of her life.

The manner in which she attended to her husband's comforts and saw to his wants almost before he had time to express them, was enough to make a bachelor turn all kinds of assorted colours with envy; and if Jack Heywood should be so fortunate—we use the word advisedly—as to have any trouble, business or otherwise, then indeed she was in her element.

It was then she rose to the possibilities of a woman's powers of consolation, and appreciated her position as the one to whom he looked first and foremost at such times.

And yet, in spite of all this devotion on the part of his wife, Jack was an undeserving kind of fellow.

If it were a matter they both knew about he would tell the progress of the trouble as it rose to its height, and then gradually disappeared, as such things do when they are bravely met.

But in the case of some business worry of which she had no preliminary knowledge he kept it to himself as long as he possibly could. He valued her warm-hearted, comforting little ways more than anything else in the world, and yet when possible, he bore his trouble alone rather than throw a single shadow across her happiness.

And so he was an undeserving kind of fellow, and not worthy of a wife who would have been only too pleased to have sacrificed anything for his sake. And not only would have done so, but actually did. She had pinched and scraped ever since they had been married to save out of her housekeeping allowance.

When they drew their chairs to the fireside after their two-year-old daughter had gone to bed, they divided the newspaper and solemnly tossed-up to see who was to have the better half, that is, the half with most news in.

Jack and Nora would have been in very serious trouble indeed before they would have neglected such an old family custom as this.

"Heads!" said Jack absent-mindedly, as the coin spun, but it came tails, the first time for more than a fortnight.

"Will you let me see the penny, please?" Nora said next moment.

Jack handed it to her without a word, and she looked at it very carefully, both sides. Then she placed it on the mantelpiece, and threw her arms round his neck

"What is the matter to-night?" she murmured. "You must tell me at once, Jack, you really must."

"The matter?" he stammered.

"Yes, I thought something was wrong when you came home because I had baked a cake and you didn't make any jokes about it, and you took scarcely any notice of little Chirps, although you talked and laughed quite a lot to me, and generally it's more the other way about. Not that I'm jealous at all."

"And why did you want to look at the penny?" said Jack, who was rather staggered by all this circumstantial evidence.

"Because for over a week you've been tossing with a double-headed penny," she answered indignantly. "I don't know where you got it from, and I couldn't understand why you won so often until about a week ago I found it in your lounge coat, when I had to sew on a button."

"And you didn't say anything about it!"

"No," she said sturdily. "I liked you to have first choice. And to-night you were so worried, my poor old Jack, that you forgot all about your patent penny, and brought out an ordinary one, and so you lost. And that confirmed my suspicions. Now just tell me all about it instanter."

And she looked so determined and yet so sympathetic that it is very probable he would have yielded, and told her what the trouble was. But just at this moment there was a thundering rat-a-tat-tat at the front door. Little Chirps was awakened by the noise and gave them a vocal hint to that effect.

Nora ran upstairs to soothe her off to sleep, whilst Jack attended to the front door. And as he turned to go, all the forced smiles and the gaiety disappeared from his face, and a look of intense suffering came in their place.

"Fifty pounds!" he groaned. "Fifty pounds, or ruin and disgrace. It seemed such a safe speculation at the time, and so simple to borrow the money by a bill of sale. My poor Nora! Oh, it will break her heart to have the home broken up like this! The time expired to-day, and he says he can't wait. If I could even pay something substantial on account! If I could—— Oh, anything, rather than bring such trouble upon her!"

The next day was Saturday. As Jack was going off to business Nora suddenly remembered the question she had asked the previous night, which had been driven from her mind by the arrival of the visitors.

"You didn't tell me after all?" she said reproachfully.

"What about? I can't wait now, Nora. The train's coming," and he started down the garden walk.

"I shall remind you at dinner-time!" she cried.

"Very well, I'll tell you then," and to himself he muttered: "They may come this afternoon. He only gave me till two o'clock."

Nora walked slowly along the hall, trying in vain to guess what the trouble was. When she reached the dining-room, she found to her dismay that little Chirps had taken possession of the jam-dish, and was engaged in painting a gorgeous design of strawberries upon the table-cloth.

"Baby's pik-ker," said the young lady, with conscious pride, and was astonished at the lack of appreciation her mother showed.

Nora was feeling rather hurt just now at her husband's refusal to explain his troubles. "But I suppose he thinks a woman is of no use for business," she sighed, with just a touch of bitterness. "Although I might have comforted him a bit if he'd told me what was wrong. Perhaps he'll feel better when he gets his birthday present.

Digitized by Google

"If I hadn't a head for business I couldn't have saved twenty pounds in less than three years. Three heads for three separate businesses, in fact, a dressmaker, a cook, and a housekeeper," she added triumphantly, some of her good spirits returning at the thought. "But we'll get our work done, Chirps, and then we'll go and buy some meat, and some potatoes, and a cabbage, and—A piano!" she said, in such a tone that even her daughter cried "Tum, muvver!" as though she would set out forthwith.

And then began such a bustling, and hurrying, and clearing away, and washing up and dusting and I don't know what else. Little Chirps was eager to help, and solemnly dried her tin breakfast cup some forty times over with a miniature dish cloth, being a great believer in doing her work thoroughly.

Then they went upstairs to make the beds and to do more dusting and cleaning and hurrying and bustling. And little Chirps, to show her willingness, successively climbed on to nearly everything above floor level, and then fell off again. And so at last their morning's work was done, and the house, to unappreciative male eyes, would probably have appeared just as nice and clean as when they began.

And then they started on their way to the shops, Nora with one of those tiny baskets, too small to hold anything, but which every self-respecting woman finds absolutely necessary when she goes shopping. Little Chirps pattered by her side, bearing a woolly doll with glass eyes, whom she affectionately addressed as "Tummy."

"You'll be sure to send the meat up before half-past eleven?" said Nora sternly to the butcher.

"Certainly mum. Jim," to an incredibly busy assistant, who looked as though he had all the beef and mutton in England to deliver before midday, "Mrs. Heywood's leg, go 'fore 'leven-thirty prompt. Yes'm, g'morn'm."

Then the greengrocer staked his reputation that the vegetables should also arrive by eleven-thirty, and Nora departed, knowing full well that neither of them would fulfil his promise.

There was still one more purchase to make, but that was the most important of all. "Won't he be delighted when it arrives?" she thought rapturously, as she entered the shop. "I'll ask them not to deliver it until the 27th, and then it will be a real birthday present. And he doesn't know I've saved anything. I want to look at some pianos," she said to the shopman.

"Yes'm. Thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred guineas?"

"N—no, about twenty pounds, please."

It was half-past two before Jack arrived home. Nora and the child had their dinner, and then walked down to the station to meet him.

The train had just come in, and the people were crowding out of the narrow gates. Nora waited in her usual place on the other side of the road, for it was understood from the first that Jack, on leaving the station, was to glance across towards a certain shop in front of which Nora always stood when she came to meet him.

But to-day he hurried away without even a glance towards his wife and little daughter. One or two friends tried to detain him for a minute, but he nodded curtly, and almost ran down Barton Road.

"Jack Heywood seems upset," said someone who stood close to Nora. "He's been looking rather bothered for a few days past."

Nora waited for no more, but set off at the highest speed that Little Chirps could muster. When they reached the house she let herself in with the latchkey. Jack did not seem to have heard them, for he sat beside the table with his head buried in his hands.

"Oh, you poor, poor Jack!" she cried, and ran towards him; then stopped suddenly, frightened by his haggard expression.

"Rather say 'poor wife'!" he groaned. "It is upon you that the blow will fall worst."

"Well, I'm quite satisfied," she answered, bravely. "Now tell me all about it."

Rat-a-tat! Nora looked impatiently towards the door. "I'll go," she said, "and I'll get rid of them as soon as possible. Don't you trouble, Jack. You're not well."

"I must go," he answered hoarsely. "I'll tell you everything in a moment."

The arrival was ushered into the front room. Jack spoke to him for a few minutes and then returned to Nora. She met him at the door with one finger held out warningly.

"Now, remember," she said, with a sternness that only intensified the quivering of her lips, "You've got to tell me all about it, everything; but if you dare to apologise for the slightest little tit or jottle—or jit or tottle," she added hurriedly, "for I'm not sure which is correct; or if you dare to say you are to blame in any possible way, I won't believe you, so mind." And she plunged herself down upon a foot-stool, with her head against his knee.

"It's soon explained," he said sadly. "Business was quiet and someone offered me an agency which seemed to promise well, and is actually doing well, though slowly. They required a deposit of fifty pounds, and, as you know, we haven't a fifth of that sum—here is all we have, about seven pounds—so I went to a firm of money-lenders, and gave them a bill of sale on the furniture, expiring to-day.

"The agreement gives him the right to seize our furniture—the very chairs and tables—whether I have paid the interest or not. He says he wants his principal to-day, or at any rate half to-day and the rest in three months."

Nora rose to her feet with her eyes almost on fire, so brightly did they shine, and yet in every other way she was as calm as possible.

"Then I suppose we must pay the fellow a half," she said carelessly, and put her hand in her pocket for her purse, while Jack, who had also risen from his chair, looked at her in amazement.

But the next moment she uttered a scream of terror. All her pretended calmness vanished like a puff of smoke.

"Oh, my purse! My purse!" she cried piteously. "I've lost it, Jack!"

"Muvver c'ies," said Little Chirps gravely.

Jack looked round suddenly. There sat his daughter beneath the table with an open purse on her lap and an absolute crowd of sovereigns arranged in rows upon the carpet.

"There's the money!" cried Nora, who had turned round at the same time. "She must have taken my purse from my pocket or from the table. I was going to buy you a piano to practise your songs on but they were rather expensive, so I left it until nearer your birthday. But I'll never save out of 'housekeeping' again without telling you."

"On the other hand," said Jack. "If I had told you at once what the trouble was, we might have saved a lot of this."

"No, dads," said Chirps solemnly. But it must be explained that as the young lady could not say "Yes" she said "No" in either case, leaving it to her audience to apply her word in the best possible manner.

Jack lifted her suddenly to his shoulder. "Come along," he said to Nora, "and we'll pay the fellow a half as you suggested."

Wal Fratik.

SOME FEATURES OF NEXT WEEK'S SHORT STORIES.

A long first instalment of R. Norman Silver's powerful serial "Held Apart."

The first of a series entitled "Confessions of a Self-Made Girl," which will appeal more particularly to our lady readers.

A Competition of quite a new kind, in which valuable prizes of money gifts are offered.

Besides these attractions, Short Stories will contain the usual instalments of "How I Chaperoned Belinda," and "The Albert Gate Mystery," as well as several short, complete tales.

The price will as usual be

One Penny.

Digitized by Google

BELLE'S CHAMPION

OR

A QUESTION OF HONESTY.

"BELLE, my dear, you must consider yourself on trial, with the girls in the workroom as jury. Girls, the charge against Belle is that she was caught in the very act of—h'm!—exchanging more than brotherly greetings with Jack Hassell; in fact, the charge is that they were kissing each other!"

A titter of merriment passed along the workroom; the girls dared not laugh outright, lest the sound brought Madame Brunetti, the head of the firm of Court dressmakers, to the door to inquire into the unseemly conduct.

"Don't be absurd!" cried Belle, with flaming cheeks. "It was nothing of the kind. It's too bad of you!"

The girls appeared to enjoy Belle's vexation and her indignant denial. They were a merry set and this teasing was all fun. Life in a dressmaking establishment is not so full of enjoyment that they could afford to forego a little joke.

"That remains to be proved," proceeded the accuser, with difficulty preserving a straight face. "It is well known that you and Jack are on excellent terms, to begin with."

"He helped me, and his mother helped me, long ago, and I tried to do him a good turn if I could, by speaking for him when Madame wanted a young fellow downstairs in the shop!" said Belle earnestly. "It was a better situation than he had, cleaner and more money. We are good friends, of course. Why shouldn't we be? But it's utterly wrong, what you are saying, and you are only doing it to tease and annoy me, and I won't listen!"

The self-constituted prosecuting counsel, still proceeding with her work, for it was a busy time, and the day's task had to be got through, was about to continue her speech when the joke was interrupted by a long whistle from the speaking tube. One girl answered the summons and called out to Belle that she was wanted in the showroom.

"I expect old Brown has seen you and she is going for you!" said the prosecuting advocate.

Belle smiled with exaggerated disdain and went downstairs to see Madame Brunetti, whose real name was, in fact, Brown.

Isabel Lawrence had been chaffed more than once about Jack Hassell, but the jesting had not assumed the present proportions. She was between seventeen and eighteen, and had had a hard struggle to support her crippled brother and herself since the death of her father. During the earlier part of this fight against want, she had received many kindnesses at the hands of Mrs. Hassell and also from Jack, who was about her own age and with whom she had lodged. Then Madame Brunetti, who had known her mother in former times, chanced to hear of her and assisted her to the extent of taking her as an apprentice without premium and paying her a fair wage for her work. From that time things began to look brighter for her.

Mrs. Hassell was a poor woman, and was glad when her boy was old enough to leave school and go out to work as an errand boy. He was a splendid specimen of a muscular lad, but his education had been greatly interrupted and his upbringing had been rough. The only thing he took to was music, and it really appeared as if the boy had an inborn passion for it. Neighbours said it was a pity that he couldn't have good training, but that was out of the question. Jack was a rough-an'-ready lad, and rough work fitted him better than clerical employment; but music has a refining influence and, after a time, under the combined influence of the music and Belle's society, his manners altered.

But Mrs. Hassell's health failed and she was taken to an infirmary, from which she was afterwards drafted to a Home. The little household was broken up; Belle and her brother going to lodge with someone else in the next street, and Jack making arrangements with his chum's mother to board him.

Belle had to wait a long time before she obtained an opportunity of doing Jack a good turn, but it came at last, as she herself has just mentioned.

"Miss Lawrence," said Madame as the girl entered. "Come along, please! I want you to put on this skirt; you are just about Mrs. Milner's height. The train is too long and she couldn't wait, so you must put it on while we mark how to shorten it. She wants it quickly. Very impulsive woman, she is! Never seems to have time to spare for anything!"

Belle stood erect while Madame and the first skirt hand, Miss Cliff, arranged the offending garment about her graceful figure. She was a budding woman and the satin skirt became her.

Madame left them to finish, intending to return in order to supervise, but a moment later she sent in for Miss Cliff, who obeyed the call at once, leaving Belle standing in the satin skirt.

The girl surveyed herself in the mirror and blushed prettily as she suddenly caught herself indulging in a little self-admiration. She turned her head away, but her thoughts wandered and she came to herself as she found that she was again looking in the mirror and that another form was also reflected therein.

"Jack!" she cried involuntarily, turning hastily to the young fellow, who was standing just behind her. "You mustn't come here!"

"I had to bring a parcel into this room, so I have a right to be here!" he remarked with a low laugh. "I say, Belle, you may call it flattery if you like, as you did the other day, but I can't help it! You're as pretty as—oh, I've forgotten the name of that statue, but it doesn't matter! You are pretty, and that's the plain truth. If you hadn't turned round, I should have looked at you all day."

"Don't be foolish, Jack, please don't, and go away!" she pleaded, anxious but not displeased. "I shall have the girls talking about us again!"

Digitized by Google

It appeared to be pleasing to Jack to learn that they were coupled by others, but he quickly realised that it was not fair to the girl.

"I'm very sorry, Belle," he said contritely. "I'll be off, but I must come round and see you this evening. I'm engaged to play in a concert and—that is, I want to talk to you about—what the girls say!"

There was great love in the eyes of the lad and Belle saw it. "Lad's love" some might have called it, scoffingly, but with him it was the beginning of a man's love. Belle, fingering the skirt in her excitement, gave a little cry; her hand had touched something which had been left in the pocket of the skirt. Not knowing what she was doing, she drew it out and saw that it was a purse.

"I say, that's been left in the pocket by the lady!" cried Jack, opening his eyes. "Better put it back and say nothing."

The door creaked as it opened. Belle hurriedly thrust the purse back into the pocket and Jack skipped lightly towards the door and assumed the air of one in considerable haste to do his work. Both were confused, and Belle, in her agitation, forgot to mention the fact that a purse was in the pocket.

The arrangement for shortening the dress was not of long duration now and Belle was in her chair in a few minutes, stitching away for dear life, as it seemed.

It was past eight before Belle reached home that evening, but she had hardly taken off her things before Jack Hassell arrived. Belle's brother welcomed Jack enthusiastically; he liked to hear the music and Jack had brought his violin.

"I'll leave you two," said Belle, "while I do a few odd things upstairs. I shall be down directly."

"Belle," cried her brother, "I have something to tell you! Oh, it will do when you come down, though!"

When she came back, she declared that Bob look fatigued and must go to bed. Bob demurred at first, but ultimately gave in and was helped upstairs by Belle and there he told her what had happened during the afternoon.

If Jack had counted on a quiet half hour with Belle, he was disappointed, for they were surprised by the sound of wheels stopping outside the door and a moment later the bell was pulled energetically. Mrs. Halliday, the landlady, answered the ring and unceremoniously ushered Madame Brunetti and Miss Cliff into the presence of the young couple.

The two visitors glanced at Belle and Jack and then at each other.

"Hum!" coughed Miss Cliff significantly. Madame's features assumed a sterner expression.

"I am here on an important errand, Miss Lawrence!" said Madame coldly. "Some money is missing and suspicion rests on you. I am bound to say that those suspicions receive some confirmation from the fact that you two are here together!"

Belle went pale and Jack's fists began to move uneasily.

"You had to try Mrs. Milner's dress on this afternoon," pursued Madame, before Belle could reply. "That skirt never went out of the hands of Miss Cliff and myself the whole time, except for five minutes! With the exception of that short time, my eyes were on that skirt the whole afternoon—all the while that Miss Cliff was engaged in shortening it and until it was delivered into Mrs. Milner's own hands. I took it to her myself, because I wished to be very attentive. Now, Mrs. Milner declares that there was a purse in the pocket containing two sovereigns and some silver, and a German silver coin which she prized highly. She had placed the purse in her pocket because she intended to wear the dress, but she changed her mind. She forgot to take the purse out. The purse was in the pocket when she examined the alteration in my presence, but the money was gone. It was only a tiny purse, so that's how it escaped Miss Cliff's notice."

"Then you mean——" began Belle.

"I mean that it will be better for you to give up the money and we will let the matter drop. I have no desire to prosecute you, although I cannot, of course, take you back in my employ!" said Madame stiffly.

"I did not take it!" cried Belle, indignantly.

"It's false!" exclaimed Jack, standing by the side of the girl and preparing to defend her.

"Do you deny that you knew there was a purse in the dress?" asked Miss Cliff, speaking for the first time and making a random shot. "Ah!" she cried as she noted the look that came over their faces. "Of course you knew it was there!"

"You were both in the room by yourselves, and you knew the purse was in the pocket," said Madame icily. "Your looks betray your guilt! Give me the money and consider that you are both out of a situation!"

Belle and Jack protested indignantly, and if there had been any chance of Jack's retaining his situation in Madame Brunetti's establishment he would certainly have lost that chance by his warm, not to say excited, defence of Belle. As to his own defence, he contented himself with the statement that he knew nothing of the contents of the purse.

"I have spent nothing since I left work this evening," said Belle. "I have only a few pence in my pocket. You are at liberty to search the place if you like. I can only say that I am innocent of this dreadful accusation."

"Of course she is!" declared Jack. "Anyone can see that! It's a thorough shame to come here and make such a charge! I'd sooner believe you took it yourself!"

"Don't, please don't!" whispered Belle, fearing that the energetic championship would injure rather than help her, although she was otherwise proud and glad to have such a friend at hand.

Madame flushed angrily at Jack's words.

"Do you deny that you knew there was a purse in the dress?"

Digitized by Google

"I daresay I shall be able to find proof sooner or later!" she cried petulantly. "I shouldn't be at all surprised to find the gold hidden away in something here!" In her anger, she went to the mantelpiece and began to shake the small vases. To the surprise of Belle and Jack, something rattled in one of them. Madame unceremoniously turned it upside down and out fell two sovereigns.

"I thought you were both very innocent!" sneered Madame. "Here is the gold and you have spent the silver; I suppose you will be telling me that you came straight home, and that you can produce all the shopkeepers along the route to prove you didn't purchase anything, or something equally absurd?"

"I didn't come straight home," said Belle helplessly, not knowing how the remark would be turned.

"Oh, it's clear as possible!" declared Madame haughtily. "You disposed of the silver—gave it to this boy, your companion in crime, no doubt! Well, let this be a warning to you, and think yourselves lucky that I did not have you arrested!"

She motioned arrogantly to Miss Cliff to follow her and swept out of the room. A minute later, Belle and Jack heard the sound of wheels.

"Whoever could have been wicked enough to put it there?" cried Belle, dropping into a chair and sobbing hysterically.

"It's like a conspiracy!" asserted Jack dejectedly. "But I don't see who did it! If Miss Cliff had touched the vases, I could have understood it."

Who could have done it? Bob's story was repeated to Jack, and it seemed to throw light on the mystery. He had been left alone in the house during the afternoon; being hot and tired of lying on the couch, he had got on his feet with the aid of crutches and had struggled to the window, which was open. As he appeared at the window, an elderly lady passed and, probably attracted by the wan face, had gazed lengthily at him; in trying to turn so as to avoid her gaze, he had slipped and hurt himself against the window frame.

The benevolent-looking lady had observed the tumble and, the street door having been left open, had entered and done what she could to relieve him. The question now was: "Had she slipped the two sovereigns into the vase?"

All three felt confident that she had, but could they find her in order to prove it?

Jack and Belle made all possible search and inquiry, but to no purpose, and they had to give up and face the difficulties of their position. They were without work and de arred from obtaining situations for want of a reference. Belle did a little dressmaking on her own account, but she did not succeed in obtaining sufficient to enable her to keep up her lodgings and she and her brother had to retire to a poorer neighbourhood, where she hired a small room. Jack did his best to get work and, failing regular employment, picked up a precarious living by doing odd jobs and occasionally playing his violin in the busiest streets in the evening.

Several months passed and things went from bad to worse with Belle; the weight of the unjust accusation and a hard life in a locality that was not congenial resulted in an illness which would have left the sister and brother destitute but for the loving care of Jack Hassell. He threw aside all feelings of pride and worked at anything honest; no matter what it was, he would do it in order to earn money to support his sweetheart—that was what he called her, although nothing had been said on either side. He earned most by his violin, however, and he fiddled away in the market streets to earn the coppers and take them to Belle.

Life was very dark to Belle just then, but it was cheered by the love of Jack, and that trial proved to be the darkest hour that comes before the dawn. Unable to get an odd job one day, Jack took his violin and went afield to a semi-fashionable locality to play. He played some old songs—such as "Annie Laurie"—and his attention was arrested at the conclusion of one song by a window being thrown up and a coin dropping at his feet. He looked at the window to see who the donor was and he gave a start of surprise. There sat a little lady, beaming benevolently at him, exactly in the manner described by Bob in the account of his strange visitor! Jack looked intently, remembering Bob's words and forgetting the silver coin.

"I believe she is the very one!" he gasped. "Oh, if she is! I must find out!"

He picked up the coin without looking at it and went straight to the steps leading to the front door. As he reached it, the door was opened by a maid.

"I was just coming after you!" she cried. "Mistress has thrown out a coin that she wants to keep—some old thing that she has taken a fancy to!"

"Bring him inside, Susan!" cried the old lady from within. "He was bringing it back! A very honest young fellow!"

"This is good!" muttered Jack with a touch of humour. "I was called a thief when I didn't steal anything, and now I'm very honest for taking back a coin that I'd no intention of taking back. Well, it gets me an introduction!"

Jack made no pretence, however. He owned that his object was not to restore the coin, for the reason that he had not looked at it, but to ask a question. Then he asked the benevolent lady if, on a certain day, she was going down a certain street and saw a boy at a window—and so on.

"I remember it!" cried the lady. "What about it?"

The little lady's distress was great on learning that her act of secret charity had helped to cause so much mischief.

"I will take steps to clear up the matter at once!" she said decisively. "I'll have a cab at once and go to the boy and his sister, and then to Madame Brunetti! Of course, I can't solve the mystery of the disappearance of the money, but I can clear you both to an extent. Oh, have you got that coin?"

Jack handed it over.

"Yes, yes," continued the lady. "That coin completes my collection of old German money. I must put it back; I took it out this morning to show a friend and I nearly lost it you see!"

"Yes, ma'am!" said Jack, for want of something to say.

"I bought it on the very day after I slipped those two sovereigns into the vase. I was so glad to get it! Mr. Spokes has been on the look-out for such a specimen for me during the past three years—it isn't very valuable, but I wanted it!"

Jack only heard part of the speech.

"Madame said there was an old German coin in that purse!" he cried. "I wonder——"

"If so," said the old lady, reading his thoughts, "we may catch the real thief! We'll see Mr. Spokes about that!"

Benevolent Mrs. Barrington did not do things by halves. She was busy for the next three or four hours, Jack being with her all the time. She went straight to Belle and made arrangements for the comfort of Bob and his sister. She next paid a visit to Madame Brunetti, where she explained the presence of the two sovereigns in the vase; then she went to Mrs. Milner, showed her the German coin and received a positive assurance that it was the one stolen from her. From Mrs. Milner to the shop of Mr. Spokes, and then, to the surprise of Jack, Mr. Spokes took a seat with them in the four-wheeler and they went back to Madame Brunetti.

"The description you give of the seller of that coin to you, Mr. Spokes," said Mrs. Barrington, "tallies so much with that of an employee of Madame Brunetti, that I wish you to see her!"

The young woman in question proved to be Miss Cliff, who reeled and grasped a heavy chair for support when she entered and found herself confronted by Mr. Spokes.

"I recognise her!" said that gentleman drily. "I think there is no need for me to say more!"

Miss Cliff confessed to having extracted the money from the purse while Madame was not looking, and begged abjectly for mercy. She was dismissed at once. Madame wished to reinstate Belle and Jack, but Mrs. Barrington said that she had other plans. She took Belle into her own household, sent Bob to an institution where he would have expert treatment, and placed Jack in a musical college.

There is to be a wedding soon, and the bridegroom is spoken of as a coming musician.

George Day.

Digitized by Google

- A - Deal in Journalism.

Telling of an Editress, an Author, and a Paper.

She was the editress of a smart ladies' weekly, and chanced furthermore to be a brunette, a dazzling beauty. He was an author of repute, and a splendid specimen of well-groomed English manhood.

They had met at the house of a mutual friend a month or so prior to the production of Feminine Fancies which, being published to supply an alleged long felt want, was destined to revolutionise the literary world—always supposing that it existed long enough to do so.

As to the latter supposition proving to be a correct one, Iris Berenger had no doubt, especially since Nigel Wallace, taken by her piquante loveliness, had agreed to write the opening serial at a figure which, had he but known, would have caused the editor of the Metropolitan Magazine, with whom he had contracted, to wriggle on his chair with envy,

As it was, noting the name of Nigel Wallace beneath the serial, he concluded that Feminine Fancies had a substantial financial backing, a belief which was substantiated by Wallace's reticence on the subject, when he tackled him on the matter.

"Oh, yes," he replied, smiling amusedly when he remembered that his account was four weeks overdue. "I am getting a very fair screw, thanks."

"It's the best thing you have done so far," grumbled Williams. "It beats ours hollow."

"As does their screw yours," laughed Wallace, as he left the editorial sanctum.

In the street, the smile deepened. For a moment he stood on the kerb, then, hailing a hansom, he stepped inside, saying as he did so:

"The F.F. Publishing Co., Ltd., Fetter Lane."

The smile intensified, as, leaning back in the hansom, he waited till it pulled up in front of the offices of Feminine Fancies.

"Is Miss Berenger in?" Wallace inquired of the commissionaire.

"Yes, sir," he answered, with a grin. "The whole staff's in—preparing the double number."

An audible titter broke from the lips of two messenger boys, who lounged in the hall-way.

Wallace heard the sardonic merriment and knew the significance of it. As he had guessed, the journal had run its course, and salaries were evidently owing.

Outwardly he was placid, inwardly he foamed, though his calm, immobile features did not betray by a single twitch the tempest of fury which raged within.

"Kindly inform Miss Berenger that I should like to see her." His accents were so frigid that the tittering behind him ceased abruptly.

"Yes, sir." The commissionaire forgot his facetiousness, as he telephoned the novelist's name to the editorial realms. For a moment he listened, then added, "Miss Berenger says, will you write?"

"I am afraid that there will not be time," he said gravely. "Will you kindly tell Miss Berenger that I shall only keep her a moment. My business is re next week's instalment of the serial. I think that she may see me if you tell her that."

"All right, sir," grinned the man, as, calling the telephone again into requisition, he bellowed into the receiver, "Mr. Wallace wants to see you about next week's instalment of the serial."

Wallace could have cheerfully broken his neck at that moment. As it was, he merely flung the best end of his cigar with unnecessary violence, into the middle of the street. The commissionaire was irritating in his ill-timed levity.

"Miss Berenger says, will you step up," the man remarked with a yawn, as leaning back in his box, he took a well-thumbed daily from a ledge beside him and commenced to read it.

Wallace did not reply, but raced up the stairs two steps at a time till he stood outside the editorial room. He tapped at the door, and, receiving an invitation to enter, did so.

"Good afternoon, Miss Berenger!" he said, easily, as he crossed the room to where she sat at her desk. "As I chanced to be in the vicinity, I thought that I would drop in myself and give you the next instalment of my serial personally. I wanted to speak to you on a few matters."

He bent his keen, grey eyes on her searchingly as he spoke, to find that her gaze faltered before his, whilst a dull flush mounted to her temples.

"You—you have come for the cheque—which I owe you?" she suggested, timidly, tugging nervously at a stray bit of ribbon, depending from the wrist of her dainty blouse. "I know that I ought to—to—have sent it before, but——" She paused, then added quickly—"How much does the account work out at, Mr. Wallace?"

"Thirty-two pounds," he replied briskly, gazing at the ceiling. "That, of course, includes the present instalment, which I have brought with me." Wallace placed a roll of neatly-written M.S. on the desk before her.

"Thirty-two pounds!" she echoed helplessly, her eyes brimming with tears. "I—I had no idea—I owed you so much?"

"No?" he laughed, easily, glancing at her out of the corner of his eye the while. "You asked for the last two instalments to be close on three thousand words longer, did you not?"

She nodded her head mutely.

"Hence the increase of the account," he said lightly, gazing smilingly at the face she turned to his, and reading its dumb helplessness. "Do you chance to have the advance of number twelve? I forget if Enock got out at Charing Cross or the Temple to pick up that clue."

A grey look stole over the pretty face before him, which had lost all its mutinous beauty.

"An advance copy!" she said huskily, her lips commencing to quiver ominously.

Digitized by Google

"A galley pull will do," he replied mercilessly, seating himself in a comfortable arm-chair at the corner of the desk.

A silence followed his remark. A silence so tense, that the ticking of the tiny timepiece on Iris Berenger's desk, alone broke the stillness, till its feeble sound was drowned by the echo of a woman's sob.

"I—I don't think that there will—be a number—twelve," she said quiveringly. "I—I am awaiting a telegram from—a gentleman before whom I put the matter. If I get a wire from him—all will be well. If not—I shall be bankrupt and have to——"

Her voice broke, and he remained silent.

"Well," he said abruptly. "When is this telegram likely to turn up?"

"You don't believe me?" she faltered, glancing at him with brimming eyes.

"I never said that I did not," he remarked quietly. "But I am an eminently business man, and Feminine Fancies owes me thirty-two pounds!"

"You shall be paid—every farthing!" she said abruptly.

"If the telegram turns up," he said, whimsically.

"Without that condition, Mr. Wallace."

"How? There will be other creditors besides myself."

"I—I shall sell up—my—flat!" she faltered, her accents dying away in a whisper.

Feminine endurance has its limit, and she had reached hers. As the last word left her lips her courage vanished. Hot, scalding tears, which no effort of will on her part could control, splashed down on the hands which nervously gripped the desk before her.

In an instant the smile vanished from his face, as rising from his chair, he laid his hand on her shoulder, saying, in a voice which was strangely unlike his own—

"Miss Berenger. Please don't think that I came here to worry you about my cheque. If I spoke to you bluntly a few moments ago it was only that you should be able to appreciate your position in this affair."

"Do you think that I have not been able to do that for a month past?" she interrupted bitterly, dashing the tears angrily from her eyes.

"All the better then, for I have a business proposition to make."

"A business proposition to make?" she echoed, wonderingly.

"Precisely," he said, drily. "I believe that there is a future in front of this little paper, and that being so, I propose to finance it."

"Mr. Wallace!" Iris Berenger started to her feet in surprise. "You!"

"Exactly! Always supposing that you are agreeable to the arrangement," he said, smiling.

"Of course, you would not let me continue to edit it, I suppose?" she said, wistfully. "You want the journal free of all conditions. I am not in a position to impose them. I accept your proposal."

"Good," he said, briskly. "Then I will have the deed confirming the sale drawn up by my solicitors to-morrow. As to the editorship, I don't think I should want you to do that!"

He spoke thoughtfully.

"You do not consider me sufficiently capable in that capacity?" she said, colouring.

He flushed.

"It isn't that," he cried, impetuously. "I—oh, Iris, it is no use beating about the bush! I love you, dear, and if I don't want you to be the editress of this paper, it is because I want you to be my wife! I am not going to have your little head bothered with business worries, if I can—that is, if you will let me prevent it."

"But——" she hesitated, then raised her eyes, bright still with tears, to his.

A strange light illumined them, a sudden wealth of love and pleading looking up at him from their velvet depths.

"Let there be no 'buts' dearest," he said, hoarsely, as he ventured to draw her slim figure to his. "I have loved you from the very first moment I saw you at the Soulby's 'At Home,' and I have loved you ever since. I have had it on my tongue to tell you this a score of times, yet have somehow or other always failed to do so. I was afraid that I might lose you if I were too precipitate.

"I love you, darling, love you as man has never yet loved woman! I want you to resign your position as editress of this paper in favour of that which will be yours as my wife! Will you, Iris, darling?" he cried pleadingly, as drawing her slender figure to his he rained passionate kisses on her resistless lips. "Will you, dearest?"

A flash of her old mutinous defiance leapt into her eyes, to fade, as burying her face against his shoulder she shyly whispered:

"I think that I will hand in my resignation, dear, and——"

An impetuous kiss stayed her further utterance, and before she could speak again a knock at the office door caused them to start aside as though in guilty confusion.

"Come in," she said, quickly.

In answer to the summons the door was pushed open, and the Commissionaire walked in.

"Mr. Griffin, the paper man, is here, and wants his cheque," he said insolently. "And it's about time he got it, I reckon."

"Send him up," said Wallace frigidly, eyeing the man before him, as he placed his hands behind his back. "Jones, there are going to be some changes in this paper before the week is out. Oddly enough, you are going to be the first one! Your talents are lost in this office, and such being the case, I have decided that you shall leave next Saturday."

The Commissionaire stared surprisedly at the novelist, who, fixing a monocle in his eye, looked fixedly at him.

"Thank you for nothing!" he said defiantly. "I don't need no notice when the paper's a dead un!"

"That is where you make the mistake," replied Wallace coolly. "I will trouble you to kindly inform those two errand boys below that their services will be dispensed with after next Saturday as well."

"Who are you to give orders, I'd like to know, in this office?" retorted the man, insolently.

"Who am I?" replied Wallace, placidly. "I am the new proprietor."

Tristram K. Monck.

Ten Gramophones for Ten Sentences.

It is quite the exception to find people who don't like music; there are many who are fond of it, but yet either cannot make it themselves or if they can are not able to afford to buy a piano or other musical instrument. To such, a Gramophone would be an inestimable boon. The only thing you have to do to get the sound is to put in the record of the song or piece you want to hear and then set the machine in motion.

Each Gramophone we are giving away is accompanied by two records, and is fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, which greatly increases the volume of sound.

You can win a Gramophone by writing on the back of a post-card the best and longest sentence you can in which the last letter of one word is the first letter of the next. For example: Racing (g) ives (s) ome (e) ducated (d) onkeys (s) erious (s) orrow.

A Gramophone will be given to each of the ten readers who submit the best sentences.

Post-cards only must be addressed to the SAME LETTER EDITOR, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, March 3rd.

The Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on that understanding.

Digitized by Google

Plenty of Encouragement.

"Has she given you any encouragement?" "Oh, yes! She says she will get all her father's money some day."

It Was so Sudden.

Frank Frankleigh: "Yes, Miss Antique, to be frank with you——" Miss Antique (with a chirp): "Oh, Mr. Frankleigh, of course you may be Frank with me—but this is so sudden."

A Penetrating Voice.

Mr. Wickwire: "What is that woman across the way trying to sing?" Mrs. Wickwire: "'My Sweetheart's the Man in the Moon.'" Mr. Wickwire: "Well, if he doesn't hear her it isn't her fault."

He Knew the Look of Paste.

Mrs. Shears (in a jeweller's shop buying diamonds): "I wish my husband were here." Jeweller: "Is he an authority on diamonds, madam?" Mrs. Shears: "Not exactly; he is an editor, and knows paste whenever he sees it."

No Need for Alarm.

Father: "I am inexpressibly shocked. Your mother tells me that you are engaged to three young men." Daughter: "Don't alarm yourself, papa. They are all football players, and when the season closes I can marry the survivor, you know."

What the Initials Meant.

Angelina: "That was a lovely engagement ring you gave me last night, dear; but what do those initials, 'E. C.' mean on the inside?" Edwin (who had bestowed the ring before, and had it back): "Why—er—that—is—don't you know that is the new way of stamping eighteen carats?"

Hard Work Selling It.

She: "Do you know, Mr. Smithy, you painters are a perfect enigma to me. You work about a month in twelve, turn out one picture or so, and then seem perfectly satisfied. What you do during the other eleven months, goodness only knows! I don't." He: "You'd soon learn, though, if you'd the said picture to sell."

He Interrupted Her.

"No, George," faltered the maiden. "I fear it cannot be. I admire you as a gentleman, I respect you as a friend, but—" "Laura!" he exclaimed, "before you pass sentence, hear me out. A recent lucky stroke in business has enabled me to buy a beautiful house in Kensington, which shall be in your name. I will insure my life for ten thousand pounds, and——" "George," calmly interposed the lovely girl, "you interrupted me. I was about to say that the sentiments of respect and esteem I feel for you, though so strong, are feeble in comparison with the deep love which I—which I—which I have long—don't, George, dear." For George had interrupted her again.

Other Things to Think About.

She: "Do you think of me as much as you did?" Cholly: "No, not quite. I'm raising a moustache now."

Only Her Bonnet.

He: "My dear, here's someone with the green-groceries." She: "Those are not vegetables. That's my new bonnet."

An Incriminating Question.

She: "Do you make love to every girl you know, as you do to me?" Young Lawyer: "My dear young lady, you should not ask a question that would tend to incriminate the witness."

Good Value for Money.

She (on the honeymoon): "I suppose, George, it must have cost a lot of money to build a railway like this?" He: "Oh, yes. The tunnels alone cost a million or so—but they're worth every penny of it."

Complimentary!

Mrs. Hard: "Do have some more cream, Miss Sweetooth!" Miss Sweetooth (hesitatingly): "Well, just a little, Mrs. Hard. Only a mouthful." Mrs. Hard: "Bridget, fill Miss Sweetooth's plate up again."

That Troublesome Cook.

Mrs. Newed: "We will have to have a speaking tube from the dining-room to the kitchen." Mr. Newed: "Why?" Mrs. Newed: "Well—I must get some way of talking to the cook without having her throw dishes at me."

Wanted the Lot.

He was a buyer in a large wholesale house, and he was in love. One night he snatched a kiss. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "I am so well pleased with this sample that I should like to negotiate for all you have." He was accepted on the spot.

The Only Thing to be Done.

She: "Just think, Edgar, I ordered the dressmaker to make me a dress for the street, and she has sent me a travelling costume instead." He: "Well, what are you going to do about it?" She: "All we can do is to take a trip abroad."

How He Satisfied His Wants.

Romantic Miss: "Have there not been moments in your experience when life seemed full of unsatisfied wants?" Mr. Hardhead: "Y-e-s, that's so." "At such times I always fly to music for relief. What do you do, Mr. Hardhead?" "I advertise."

Bargain in Telegrams.

There was a vivacious smile on her face which was winsome. "Oh, dear me," she murmured happily, "I've just got such a bargain!" "How, dear?" inquired her friend. "I sent a telegram—only sixpence for twelve words, and at least six of them were words of more than three syllables!"

Rather Mixed.

"I don't know what you ever saw in me to admire, she remarked demurely. "Oh, well, you know, little one, a fellow who is anything doesn't look for mere beauty in a girl. It's——" He stopped, because his heart was all right; and, besides, he wasn't entirely a born fool—only impetuous and thoughtless in his way.

Quaker Wooing.

"Martha, dost thou love me?" said a young Quaker. "Why, Seth, we are commanded to love one another." "Ah, Martha, but dost thou feel what the world calls love?" "I hardly know what to tell thee, Seth. I have tried to bestow my love upon all, but I have sometimes thought perhaps that thou wast getting more than thy share."

Digitized by Google

OUR SPLENDID SERIAL.

THE ALBERT GATE MYSTERY.

A Romance of To-day.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "The Lost Lady Delia," etc.

Talbot's Adventures.

ALTHOUGH Miss Talbot spoke so confidently of revelations that should accompany the expected meal, it is idle to pretend that any of the three people who were cognisant of Talbot's mysterious appearance on the island betrayed undue haste to return to the waiting launch.

Sublimely unconscious of the excitement raging in their breasts Sir Hubert Fitzjames could not understand why they each and all answered him in such a flurried manner when he dilated upon the beauties of the bay. Finally he turned to Edith with an air of apprehension.

"I fear," he said, "that your expedition of last night has upset you. Have you a headache?"

Then she could contain her news no longer. Drawing him close to the rampart, and bending down so as to apparently take a deep interest in the laughing excursionists beneath, she murmured:

"Listen to me carefully, uncle. Upon no account look round. Have you noticed the party of Turks and a Frenchman grouped together in the opposite corner?"

"Yes," he said. "You do not mean to tell me that they are the people whom Mr. Brett met this morning at the station?"

"Yes, unquestionably they are. Had your attention not been otherwise taken up you must have recognised them from their description. But the most marvellous thing remains. You know the little turret close to which they are standing?"

"Yes."

"Well, in the staircase leading to the top, and leaning out through a window, trying to hear what they are saying, is Jack!"

"What an extraordinary thing," said the major-general, who was really very annoyed that such a meeting should have taken place under his very nose and yet its significance should remain hidden from him.

"Can we do anything?" he added.

"Nothing save to remain here a little while longer and be most careful not to appear to have the least knowledge of their identity. I have told you lest we might chance to meet Jack face to face, and you should be taken by surprise if you recognised him."

"Is he in disguise, then?" gasped her uncle.

"Yes, in a sense. Mr. Brett has put him into a sort of French working-man's holiday suit. He looks so odd, but it is evident that neither Grosjean nor the Turks have the least suspicion of his presence. It was very clever of Jack to get into that turret without alarming them."

They were joined by Daubeney and Fairholme, and Edith knew by a single glance at the expressive expanse of the former's face that, should he be again brought into close proximity to the Turks and her brother, it was quite possible the quick-witted Grosjean might detect the look of interested amazement which must inevitably appear upon his honest British countenance.

"Bobby," she said at once, "I want you and Mr. Daubeney to go down to the launch and await us there. We will join you in a few minutes."

"Certainly," was the reply, for Fairholme knew that some motive lay behind the request. "You cannot do much by remaining here, can you, so I suppose you will not be long?"

"No; uncle and I will survey the view until it is firmly fixed in our minds. After that it is full steam ahead for the Hotel du Louvre."

The two young men disappeared down the stairs leading to the courtyard. On their way they encountered a number of holiday makers, climbing up to the top of the tower. In they came, twenty or more of them, and promptly spread themselves around the walls, the Marseillais amongst them indicating to their country cousins points of interest in the city and around the coast.

At this moment, too, the siren of the small pleasure steamer at the quay announced she was about to make her hourly trip back to the town. Whereupon Grosjean and the Turks, having apparently ended their consultation, crossed the roof and disappeared down the staircase.

Instantly Jack Talbot strolled after them, but no sooner had the bulky form of Grosjean—who was the last of his party—vanished than Talbot ran towards his uncle and sister, and said rapidly:

"Dubois and the girl have gone to Palermo. Grosjean and the Turks have been in communication with the Sultan, and there is a movement on foot to buy back the diamonds. That is all that I can tell you now, but let Mr. Brett know. When I have seen these chaps safely home, I will at once come to the hotel."

Then he, too, vanished.

Edith felt a thrill of elation that her good judgment should have led her to remain sufficiently long on the tower to glean such important information.

When Brett heard the news it seemed to annoy him.

"I feared as much," he said. "I had not much faith in the patriotism of the young Turks. I wonder how much the Sultan has offered. It must be a severe wrench for him to dip his hands into his money-bags, and Dubois will certainly demand a handsome figure before he disgorges his booty. However, we must possess our souls in peace until Talbot comes here and tells us all that he has learnt. At this moment I cannot help marvelling at the strange coincidence which should have led the Turks and yourself to select the Château d'If for a morning stroll. I fully expected that Grosjean would be in bed. He must have received some startling intelligence to keep him away from his rest after a long journey. Meanwhile, I have not been idle."

Digitized by Google

Every one awaited with interest his next words, for Brett seldom made such a remark without having something out of the common to communicate.

"I telephoned to Paris," he explained, "to tell the prefecture that Grosjean and the Turks had arrived at Marseilles. The police were surprised, and perhaps a little sore, that they had not discovered the fact for themselves, but when I soothed them down they informed me that 'Le Ver'—the diminutive scoundrel whom we rescued from the Rue Barbette—had faithfully kept his appointment with me at the Grand Hotel yesterday.

"It seems that he was much upset when he learnt that I had left. He went straight to the commissary to inform him that, contrary to expectations, the Turks were acting in complete accord with mademoiselle's father. This naturally puzzled the commissary a good deal, and the affair became still stranger when an attaché from the Turkish Embassy called a little later and urged the police to do all in their power to discover the whereabouts of Hussein ul Mulk, as he was particularly anxious to have a friendly talk with him.

"Close on the heels of the Turk came a confidential messenger from the British Embassy, requesting the latest details and, when questioned by the commissary, this man admitted that he had in the first instance called to see me at the Grand Hotel.

"In a word, Miss Talbot, I had suspected the existence of the negotiations, which your brother's smart piece of work this morning has confirmed."

Whilst they were talking Fairholme took Daubeney on one side, and with Brett's permission gave him a detailed account of the whole affair.

The Honourable James Daubeney was delighted to be mixed up in this international imbroglio. He told the earl that the Blue-Bell was at his disposal at any moment of the day or night she might be required. Indeed, he forthwith excused himself on the ground that certain little formalities were requisite before he could clear the harbour, and he must hurry off to attend to these immediately.

"I tell you what," he added, with his hand on the door, "I will come back and dine with you, if I may, at half-past seven, because I shall not sleep to-night until I hear how things are going on. But I promise you, if I meet a single Turk between here and the harbour, I will cross over to the other side of the street."

No one quite knew what he meant by this portentous guarantee, but it was evident that Daubeney, if nothing else, was a man of action, and his yacht might become very useful.

He had hardly quitted the hotel when a waiter announced that a young Frenchman wished to see Mr. Brett.

"Show him up," said the barrister, and a moment later Talbot entered. He stood near the door twiddling his hat in his hand until the waiter had gone. Then he told them what had happened since he took up his quarters at the Hotel des Jolies Femmes.

"When I got there," he said, "I was under the impression that Grosjean and the Turks were in bed. I hired my room, sent my tin box there, and then settled myself in the café to smoke cigarettes and read these vile Marseilles newspapers until lunch time. You may judge my surprise when I saw the three Turks and Grosjean come out into the street and ask a waiter the way to the post-office.

"They set off, and, being sure of their destination, I did not quit the café myself until they were well out of sight. Then I walked away in the same direction, inquired of a policeman the quickest way to reach the post-office, and stepped out rapidly.

"I had not gone far when I overtook them. They reached the building. The Turks remained in the street and Grosjean went inside, so I followed him and found him inquiring for letters at the Poste Restante department. Whereupon I sent a telegram to London."

"Who on earth did you telegraph to, Jack?" broke in Edith.

"To my shirt-maker, telling him to put a couple of dozens in hand at once."

This unexpected answer evoked a general titter.

"The funny thing to me," said Talbot, "was the effect of the message on the telegraph clerk. He could evidently read English, and he surveyed me curiously, for in my present appearance I looked a most unlikely person to order shirts by telegram from a well-known London house. However, I achieved my purpose, which was to overhear Grosjean's request. He asked if there were any letters for M. Isidor de Rion."

"Good gracious," cried Edith, "what a swell name for that fat man."

The Race.

"Well, anyhow it was effective. There was a letter for him, and he evidently only expected one, for, before the clerk who handed it to him was able to examine the remainder of the packet, he tore it open, glanced briefly at its contents, and then hurried out to join his friends in the street. After a short conclave they entered a café and procured a railway guide. I tried hard to find out what section of the book Grosjean was looking at, but failed, for the double reason that he did not consult the Turks, nor did he seem to make up his mind, for he looked through the book, sighed impatiently and suggested to the others that they should go out again. I followed them into the Cannebière, and thence down towards the harbour. When we reached the quay a small pleasure steamer was whistling for passengers, and a placard announced a fifty-centimes return trip to the Chateau d'If.

"Seemingly on the spur of the moment, Grosjean invited the others to accompany him. It probably occurred to him that the island would supply a safe nook in which they could talk without fear of observation, as their presence on board the steamer would stamp them as excursionists. So, of course, I followed them. When we reached the island, I quickly perceived that the castle filled the whole of it. Therefore, in place of keeping behind them I went in front. We all passed on with the stream of sightseers until we reached the court-yard.

"I had never been in the place before, but Grosjean seemed to know it well. Owing to my policy of preceding them I found myself halted for a moment at the foot of the stairs leading to the tower. It struck me that the Frenchman was making in this direction, so I took the chance and ran up. I reached the top and looked over before the party had entered the doorway at the bottom. They came in. Thus far I was right. I looked around, and found, as you know, the square roof surrounded by bare battlements with a turret in one corner.

"I decided instantly that it would be hopeless to try to get close to them if they halted at any other point save in the vicinity of the turret. Elsewhere I must remain too far away to catch any portion of their conversation. So I darted across and entered the turret, noting on my way up the stairs the existence of the loopholed window where you finally saw me.

"It would never do to be caught there, so I went to the top and peeped over. You can guess how delighted I was when they came straight across and settled themselves in the angle beneath. Then I crept halfway down the stairs and leant as far as I dared through the loophole, being just in time to hear Grosjean read a letter from his daughter.

"The letter was quite short. It told him that H. had decided to leave France, and had made arrangements to proceed at once to Palermo, whither the writer would accompany him.

"One sentence I remember exactly: 'H.,' she wrote, 'has friends in Sicily, and he feels assured of a kind reception at their hands.'"

"Friends," interrupted Brett, "that means brigands!"

"The information seemed to annoy the Turks very much. They were very angry at what they described as the enforced delay, and discussed with Grosjean the quickest means of reaching Palermo forthwith. Then he told them that he had endeavoured to find out the trains running through Italy to Messina but they could not leave Marseilles until to-night, and he thought it best that they should have a quiet talk on the situation before deciding too hurriedly upon any line of action.

Digitized by Google

"The rest of their conversation was inconsequent and desultory, alluding evidently to some project which they had fully discussed before. But it is quite clear from the drift of their remarks that an emissary from the Sultan had approached Hussein ul Mulk, and had offered such terms for the recovery of the diamonds that not only were the Young Turkish party in Paris eager to compromise with him, but they had succeeded in convincing Grosjean that Dubois also would be likely to accept the proposition."

Brett smiled grimly. "The commissary in Paris always follows up the wrong person," he said. "Had he only used his wits yesterday morning he would have discovered that the agent of the Embassy got in touch with Hussein ul Mulk. Hence the presence of the quartette in Marseilles to-day."

Talbot was naturally mystified by this remark until Brett explained to him the circumstances already known to the reader.

"Was there anything else?" inquired the barrister, reverting to the chief topic before them.

"Only this. I gathered that Grosjean did not know his daughter's whereabouts in Marseilles, but she had arranged that if circumstances necessitated her departure from the town she would leave a letter for him in the Poste Restante, giving him full details. Nevertheless this presupposes the knowledge on her part that he would come to Marseilles, so I assume therefore that telegrams must have passed between them yesterday afternoon."

"Obviously!" said Brett. "Anything else?"

"Yes," and now Talbot's voice took a note of passion that momentarily surprised his hearers. "It seems to me that this underhanded arrangement, if it goes through, condones the murder of poor Mehemet Ali and his assistants, and places upon me the everlasting disgrace of having permitted this thing to happen, whilst an important and special mission was intrusted to my sole charge by the Foreign Office. Dubois has been able to commit his crime, get away with the diamonds, hoodwink all of us most effectually, and, in the result, obtain a huge reward from the Turkish Government for his services. I tell you, Mr. Brett, I won't put up with it. I will follow him to the other end of the world, and, at any rate, take personal vengeance upon the man who has ruined my career. For, no matter what you say, the only effective way in which I can rehabilitate myself with my superiors is to hand back those diamonds to the custody of the Foreign Office. No matter how the panic-stricken sovereign in Yildiz Kiosk may sacrifice his servants to gain his own ends, I, at least, have a higher motive. It rests upon my shoulders to prove that the British Government is not to be humbugged by Paris thieves or Turkish agitators. If I fail in that duty there remains to me the personal motive of revenge upon my betrayers."

"No, Edith; it is useless to argue with me," for his sister had risen and placed her arms lovingly round his neck in the effort to calm him. "My mind is made up. I suppose Mr. Brett feels that his inquiry is ended. For me it is just commenced."

The young man's justifiable rage created a sensation which was promptly allayed by Brett's cool voice.

"May I ask," he said, "what reason you have to suppose that I should so readily throw up the sponge and leave Monsieur Henri Dubois the victor in this contest?"

"Do you mean," cried Talbot, starting to his feet, "that you will stand by me?"

"Stand by you!" echoed the barrister, yielding himself for an instant to the electrical condition of things. "Of course I will. We will recover those diamonds and bring them back with us to London if we have to take them out of the Sultan's palace itself!

"And now, Lord Fairholme," he added, before Talbot could do other than grasp his hand and shake it impulsively, "we want your friend's yacht. We will set out for Palermo at the first possible moment. We must reach there many hours, perhaps a whole day before Dubois, who is on a sailing vessel, and even with the start he has obtained cannot hope to equal the performance of a fast steamer. Let Grosjean and his Turks travel overland. We will beat them, too. Come, now, no more talk, but action. You, Fairholme, go ahead and prepare Daubeney. I will see to your luggage being packed. Talbot and I will join you in half an hour."

"Eh! what is that?" broke in Sir Hubert. "Fairholme, Talbot, you—what are Edith and I going to do?"

"Mr. Brett, of course," said Edith, in her steady, even tones, "did not trouble to include us, uncle, because we shall be on the yacht first. A woman can always pack up much better than a man, you know, and I will look after you, dear."

Brett gave one glance at her flushed and smiling face, and forthwith abandoned argument as useless.

An hour later the Blue-Bell was skimming merrily past the outer lighthouse in Marseilles bay. For a wonder the Gulf of Lyons was not boisterous, so they had a pleasant journey through the night, and Daubeney assured them that his handsome yacht was doing twelve knots an hour without being pressed.

The next morning they reached the Straits of Bonifacio, and here they had to slacken speed somewhat, for the navigation of that rocky channel was difficult and dangerous. Far behind them they could see a huge steamer approaching. As the morning wore on this vessel came nearer, and Daubeney, important now in his capacity of commander, announced that she was the P. and O. steamship Ganges, bound for Brindisi and the East, viâ the Straits of Messina.

"She left Marseilles at a late hour last night," he said, "and will call at Brindisi for the Indian mails."

An idea suddenly struck Brett. "Do you know how fast she is steaming?" he inquired.

"Oh, about thirteen and a half knots an hour. That is her best rate. The P. and O. boats are not flyers, you know."

"And does she stop at Messina?"

Daubeney now caught the drift of the barrister's questions.

"No, I don't think so, but Macpherson, my chief engineer, will probably tell us."

Macpherson was produced, a bearded and grizzled personage, hailing from Dundee. Being a Scotsman he would not commit himself.

"I havena' hear-rd o' the P. and O. ships stoppin' at Messeena," he announced, "but aiblins they wad if they got their price." And "Mac" would not commit himself any further.

Another hour passed, and the Ganges was now almost alongside. Although both ships were well through the Straits of Bonifacio, and the Ganges should have followed a course a point or two north of that pursued by the Blue-Bell, she appeared to be desirous to come close to them.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly the reason became apparent. A line of little flags fluttered up to her mast-head.

"She is signalling us," cried Daubeney excitedly. "Here you," he shouted to a sailor, "bring Jones here at once."

Jones was the yacht's expert signaller. He approached with a telescope and a code under his arm. After a prolonged gaze and a careful scrutiny of the code, he announced:

"This is how the message reads: 'Turks on board. Stopping Messina.—WINTER.'"

For once the barrister was startled out of his usual quiet self-possession.

"Winter!" he almost screamed. "Is he there?"

A hundred mad questions coursed through his brain, but he realised that to attempt a long explanation by signals was not only out of the question, but could not fail to attract the attention of passengers on board the Ganges. This he did not desire to do. Quick as lightning, he decided that by some inexplicable means the Scotland Yard detective had reached Marseilles full of the knowledge that Dubois and the diamonds were en route to Sicily, and had also learnt that he, Brett, and the others were on board the Blue-Bell.

He had evidently taken the speediest means of reaching the island, and found himself on board the same ship as Grosjean and the Turks. Hence he had approached the captain with the request that the Blue-bell should be signalled.

"What shall we answer?" said Daubeney, breaking in upon the barrister's train of thought.

"Oh, say that the signal is fully understood."

Whilst the answering flags were being displayed Daubeney asked:

"What does it all mean?"

"It means," said Brett, "that if the Blue-Bell has another yard of speed in her engines we shall need it all. It perhaps will make no material difference in the long run, but as a mere matter of pride I should like to reach Palermo before Grosjean. If I remember rightly Palermo is six hours from Messina by rail. Can we do it?"

"Mac" was again consulted. Of course he would not commit himself.

"We will try ver-ry ha-r-rd," he said.

And with this resolve the Blue-Bell sped onwards through the sunlit sea until, late in the evening, the Ganges was hull down on her quarter.

Macpherson came on deck to take a last look at the P. and O.

"It will be a gr-reat race," he announced, "and I may have to kill a stoker. But——"

Then he dived below again.

The Message.

So rapidly did the Blue-Bell speed over the inland sea that as night fell upon the face of the waters on the second day out from Marseilles the look-out forrard announced "a light on the starboard bow," and Daubeney, after scrutinising it through his binoculars and consulting a chart, announced it to be the revolving light on Cape San Vito.

This discovery occasioned a slight alteration in the course. The Blue-Bell ran merrily on until the small hours of the morning, when everybody on board was suddenly awakened by the stoppage of the screw.

This is always a disturbing incident at sea when people are asleep. Travellers not inured to the incidents of ocean voyaging cannot help conjuring up vivid pictures of impending disaster.

It is useless to tell them that for the very reason the ship has slackened her speed it is obvious she is being navigated with care and watchfulness. Reason at such time is dethroned by the natural timidity of the unseen, and it is not surprising therefore that the passengers on board the Blue-Bell should one and all find some pretext to gain the deck in their eagerness to find out why the vessel had slowed down. The answer was a reassuring one. She had burnt a flare for a pilot, and quickly an answering gleam came from afar out of the darkness ahead.

The pilot was soon on board. He was an Italian, but, like most members of his profession doing business in those waters, he spoke French fluently.

A Minister Cured by Bile Beans.

Indigestion Completely Banished After the Doctor had Failed.

EVERY class is represented in the unanimous chorus of praise of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, from titled persons, ministers, and leaders of commerce down to the miner, the artizan, and the humble workers in the fields.

Here is a letter received recently by the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co. from the Rev. Joseph Lindsey, of Spalding, Lincs. He writes as follows:

"Donington, Spalding.

"DEAR SIRS,—I beg to add my testimony to the benefit I have derived from the use of your Bile Beans. Some short time ago I was a sufferer from indigestion, which brought on severe pain. My doctor prescribed for me, and I was shut up in my room for three weeks, but nothing seemed to give me relief. I then determined to try Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, having seen the advertisements in the paper that they were invaluable for indigestion and liver disorders. So I sent for a box from the chemist, and to my surprise—for I had always looked with a little doubt upon advertised remedies—when I had taken only a few doses I felt great relief. I continued taking the Beans until I was completely cured, and there has been no return of the ailment. I can now eat and enjoy a hearty meal as well as anyone else, and I owe my present good health entirely to persevering with Bile Beans.

"Yours faithfully,

"(Rev.) JOSEPH LINDSEY."

Again and again Chas. Forde's Bile Beans have been shown to be an absolute specific for indigestion, biliousness, headache, weakness, liver and kidney disorders, pains in the side, loins and back, constipation, piles, dizziness, sleeplessness, nervousness, anæmia, and all female ailments. Also for colds, chill, neuralgia, lumbago, rheumatism, and as a preventive of influenza.

The action of Bile Beans is perfectly natural. They regulate the flow of bile, on which the whole process of digestion turns. If this bile—which acts upon the partly-digested food after it has left the stomach—be deficient in quantity, the process of digestion is not fully completed, and the food fermenting in the intestines, gives rise to flatulence, belching, and severe abdominal pains. If, on the other hand, the bile be in excess, then part of it becomes absorbed into the blood along with the food, causing what we know as biliousness. This, again, throws more work on the kidneys; they become deranged, the natural waste products which should be discharged as soluble urea become converted into insoluble uric acid, and rheumatism, lumbago, and other kindred ailments result. It will thus be seen that by acting directly upon the liver, Bile Beans remove the cause of so many ailments, varied in nature, yet all arising primarily from disorder of this most important organ.

Bile Beans may be had of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of prices 1/1½ or 2/9 (2/9 box contains three times 1/1½ size). They are only sold in sealed boxes; never loose.

Digitized by Google

Brett asked him how long, with the north-easterly breeze then blowing, a small sailing vessel, such as a schooner-rigged fishing-smack, would take to reach Palermo from Marseilles.

The pilot seemed surprised at the question.

"It is a trip not often made, monsieur," he said. "Fishing vessels from Marseilles are frequently compelled to take shelter under the lee of Corsica or even Sardinia, but here—in Sicily—why should they come here?"

"Oh, I don't mean a schooner engaged in the fishing trade, but rather a small vessel chartered for pleasure, taking the place, as it were, of a private yacht."

"Ah," said the Italian, "that explains it. Well, Monsieur, with this breeze I should imagine they would set their course round by the north of Corsica in order to avoid beating through the Straits of Bonifacio. That would make the run about 650 knots, and a smart little vessel, carrying all her sails and properly ballasted, might reach Palermo in a few hours over three days.

"Thank you," said Brett. "Is Palermo a difficult port to make?"

"Oh, no, monsieur. There is deep water all round here, no shoals, and but few isolated rocks, which are all well known. The only thing to guard against is the changeful current. According to the state of the tide and the direction of the wind, sailing ships have to alter their course very considerably, for the currents round here are very strong and consequently most dangerous in calm weather."

Brett smiled.

"It would be an ignoble conclusion to the chase if the Belles Sœurs were wrecked with her valuable cargo. I most devoutly pray," he said to himself, "that the breezes and currents may combine to bring Dubois safely on shore. Then I think we can deal with him."

Soon after daybreak the Blue-Bell, after a momentary halt at the Customs Station, crept past the Castello a Mare, and amidst much gesticulation, accompanied by a torrent of volcanic Italian, she was tied up to a wharf in the Cala—the small inner harbour of the port.

Edith, who could not sleep since the advent of the pilot, made an early toilet and climbed to the bridge, whence she had a magnificent view of the dawn arising over the beautiful city that stands on the Conca d'Oro, or Golden Shell—the smiling and luxuriant plain that seems to be provided by Nature for man's habitation. It lies beyond a lovely bay, and is inclosed on three sides by lofty and precipitous mountains.

Naturally Fairholme was drawn to her side as a chip of steel to a magnet.

"We are certain to have a furious row here," he remarked when they had exhausted their superlative adjectives upon the splendid prospect opening up before their eyes.

"Why?" cried Edith wonderingly. "I understood that our present adventure may at any moment have exciting developments, but I do not see the association between the view and the possibility."

"It is this way," he answered. "I have not read a great deal, as you know, but I have always noticed in my limited way that wherever Nature is most lavish in her gifts, she seems to take a delight in setting people by the ears. Italy is a fine country, you know, yet there are more murders to the square inch there than in any other place on earth. Then again, it is likely that several armed policemen are at this moment chasing bandits among those hills over there," and he nodded towards the distant blue heights which looked so peaceful in the clear atmosphere, now brilliant with the rays of the rising sun.

Edith laughed. "Really, Bobby," she pouted, "you are becoming sentimental. I half expect to find you break out into verse."

"I can do that, too," he said, "though it is not my own. Hasn't Heber got a hymn which tells of a place where

Every prospect pleases
And only man is vile.

I forget the rest of it." Miss Talbot turned round rapidly upon him.

"Good gracious, Bobby, what is the matter with you? I never knew you in such a melting mood before?"

"How can I help it?" he half-whispered, laying his hand upon her shoulder. "We have never been together so much before in our lives. Don't you realise, Edith, what it means to us if Mr. Brett discovers those diamonds within the next few hours or days?"

He bent closer towards her and his hand passed from her shoulder round her neck. "When we return to England if you are willing we can be married within a week."

A bright flush suffused her beautiful face. She bent her head and was silent.

It is quite certain that Fairholme would have kissed her had not Daubeney shouted:

"Look here, you two, flirting on the bridge is strictly forbidden. You will demoralise the whole crew. Even the pilot cannot keep his eyes off you."

They laughed and giggled like a couple of children caught stealing gooseberries. Yet the incident and the words were fraught with a solemn significance which often came back to their minds in other days.

The party breakfasted on board and then set out to survey the hotels.

Brett's first care was to ascertain the scheduled hours of the train service between Messina and Palermo. To his joy he discovered that neither Winter nor the gang he was shadowing could possibly reach the city until a quarter to four in the afternoon. They decided in favour of the Hotel de France as being most modern in its appearance and centrally situated.

The next thing to do was to provide an efficient watch upon all sailing vessels entering the harbour, and here the pilot proved to be a valuable ally.

Brett explained to him that he was most anxious to meet some people who were coming from Marseilles on a fishing smack named the Belles Sœurs, No. 107.

It was possible, he explained, that both the number and the name might be obliterated, so he wished the pilot, or any helpers he might employ for the duty, to take particular note of all strange boats answering to the description given to him, and at once report their appearance.

This the man guaranteed to do. He said that it was quite impossible for a French-rigged smack to enter Palermo without attracting his notice.

As the daily remuneration fixed for his services was far beyond any sum he could earn as a pilot, he promptly set about his task with enthusiasm. He engaged two assistants to take turns in watching the harbour, and gave the barrister such assurances of devotion to duty that Brett felt quite satisfied that Dubois could not arrive in Palermo without his knowledge. Of course it was quite on the cards that some secluded creek along the coast might be preferred by the astute schemer as a point of debarkation, but that must be risked.

By approaching the police authorities and requesting their co-operation, and also using Grosjean and the Turks as a stalking-horse, Brett felt tolerably certain that the time would soon arrive when Dubois and he would stand face to face.

In making these manifold preparations the morning passed rapidly. The barrister insisted that his companions should go for a drive whilst he busied himself with the necessary details, and they should all meet together at the hotel for the mid-day meal. It was then that he singled out Sir Hubert for his personal share in the pursuit.

"You know Mr. Winter?" he said to the baronet.

"Yes, I remember him perfectly."

"In that case I wish you to go to the station and meet the 3.45 p.m. train on arrival. You will probably see the Turks and Grosjean, but pay no attention to them. Keep a bright

(Continued on page 284.)

"Held Apart," R. Norman Silver's Great New Story, Starts Next Tuesday]

Digitized by Google

Alfosco Regd

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write

Alfosco Regd

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 435

10/6

Design No. 435. 10/6.
Special Value for Half-a-Guinea. Costume made in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s world-renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth, also in their new Zibeline Cloth (a material with a silky surface and carrying a splash effect). All colours and sizes kept in stock. The bodice has pouched front, and is stylishly trimmed strappings of Taffeta Silk, and small buttons. Well made skirt, bell shape, fasten at side, pocket and trimmed silk and buttons to match bodice. Price only 10/6; carr. 6d. Skirt alone, 6/6; carr. 5d. BEST VALUE IN LONDON. Good fit guaranteed.

Design No. 730. 10/6.
A Splendid Line in Ladies' Costume Skirts. Excellent in design and style and unrivalled for value. Made in ALLEN FOSTER & Co's new Zibeline Cloth, also in their Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—all colours and sizes in stock (patterns post free). The skirt is lined throughout and is tastefully trimmed round with rows of cording, and is also trimmed downwards with piping of black satin. A skirt any lady can wear. Price only 10/6; carriage paid 5d. extra. SEND FOR ONE.

Design No. 434. 14/9.
Stylishly and handsomely trimmed Costume in ALLEN FOSTER & Co.'s new Zibeline Cloth, also in their Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The Bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounce Skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary value for 14/9. Carriage 6d. extra. When ordering Costumes please give bust measurement under arms, size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

Send Postcard for
PATTERNS & NEW SKETCH BOOK of SPRING FASHIONS,
Free on Application.
CALL OR WRITE.

Design No. 44.

14/9

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

SPECIAL BARGAINS.

ANY SENT ON APPROVAL WILLINGLY.

SAVE £ d $

LADY'S pretty 18-carat gold-cased KEYLESS WATCH, extra fine quality, jewelled movement, beautifully ornamented dial; perfect timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 12/6; approval before payment.

FASHIONABLE LONG NECK-CHAIN, genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished, elegant West End design; sacrifice, 9/6; approval before payment.

CURB CHAIN BRACELET, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case; sacrifice, 7/6; approval before payment.

REAL DIAMOND and EMERALD doublet HALF-HOOP RING; large, lustrous stones, massive solid gold setting (hall-marked); weight 2½ dwts.; sacrifice, 21/-; approval willingly.

MANDOLINE, genuine Italian (Stridente, Naples); very fine tone, real rosewood, pearl inlaid, in saddler-made case; sacrifice, 19/6; approval willingly.

GENT'S 18-ct. Gold-cased KEYLESS HUNTER, jewelled movement, lever balance, exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

ORGAN-TONE MELODEON, magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, 4 acting stops, powerful tone; perfect order, sacrifice, 10/6; approval willingly.

HANDSOME REAL MARBLE CLOCK, highly finished lever movement, 9in. high, in perfect order, guaranteed 10 years; sacrifice, 10/6; approval.

DARK RUSSIAN FUR MUFF & NECKLET to match, with large, bushy tails; never worn; sacrifice, 12/6 together: also another set of extra fine quality very handsome muff and necklet, accept 16/6, worth 3 guineas; approval willingly.

LADY'S lustrous DIAMOND & RUBY RING, 5 large, matchless double rubies and 8 real diamonds, solid gold, hall-marked setting; sacrifice, 12/6.

BROOCH; very handsome, 18-carat rolled gold; 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls, in velvet case; accept 6/9; approval before payment.

NECKLET WITH HEART PENDANT, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise; accept 9/6; approval.

LADY'S 6-guinea solid gold (stamped) KEYLESS WATCH, jewelled in 10 rubies, richly engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; week's free trial; sacrifice, 21/-.

A full list of Special Bargains, New and Second-hand, can be had free on application.

R. H. DAVIS, PAWNBROKER & JEWELLER,
284 BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.
(The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

All Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 55 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

PIANO VAMPING (BOOK 16 PAGES.) 2/6 to £1 may be earned nightly by anyone having good knowledge of above. No knowledge of music required. A genuine work. Post free, 2/-; Colonies, 3/-.
Agent (Dept. A), 16 Eton Rd., Southsea, Hants.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent. Books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Digitized by Google

look out for Mr. Winter. Walk up quite openly and speak to him, and the probability is that should Grosjean have become suspicious of this Englishman who follows in the same track as himself, your presence on the platform will convince him that he was mistaken in imagining the slightest connection between Winter's journey and his own."

"That is good," said the major-general. "It would never have occurred to me. Any other commands?"

"None, save this," continued Brett, smiling at the old soldier's eagerness to obey implicitly any instructions given to him. "When you meet Winter, tell him, if possible, to so direct his movements as to find out Grosjean's destination, if it can be done without giving the Frenchman the slightest cause for uneasiness. Otherwise the matter is of no consequence. I have already interviewed the chief of police here, and it will only be a question of an hour's delay before the local detectives effectually locate the quarters occupied by Grosjean and the Turks."

Close Quarters.

Sir Hubert was all eagerness to set out upon his mission. He reached the station at least half an hour too soon. And anyone seeing him there would readily admit that the barrister could not have chosen an agent less guileful in appearance. The very cut of his clothes, the immaculate character of his white spats bespoke the elderly British gentleman.

At last the train arrived. The vast majority of its passengers were Sicilian peasants or business men returning to Palermo from the interior of the island. To Sir Hubert's delight he at once caught sight of Grosjean and the Turks, whom, of course, he quickly identified as the loungers on the tower of the Chateau d'If.

It occurred to him that there was a remote chance of recognition by Grosjean, so he busied himself for an instant in seeming scrutiny of the bookstall until they had passed. A little further down the platform he caught sight of Inspector Winter, that worthy individual being engaged in a fiercely unintelligible controversy with an Italian porter as to the possession of his portmanteau.

Sir Hubert hurried forward and seized the amazed policeman by his hand, wringing it warmly. To tell the truth, Winter did not know for a moment who it was that accorded him such a cordial greeting, for, as it subsequently transpired, the policeman was not aware of Sir Hubert's journey to Marseilles, nor did he guess that Edith was with him.

"Held Apart," R. Norman Silver's Great New Story, Starts Next Tuesday.

The stolid detective, however, quickly recovered himself, and his first words were:

"Did Mr. Brett fully understand my signal?"

"I think so," said the other; "but he will tell you all about that afterwards. At present he wishes you to ascertain, if possible, Grosjean's intended residence."

Mr. Winter smiled with a peculiar air of superiority affected by Scotland Yard.

"Oh, that is easy," he condescended to explain. "I have been talking to him."

"You don't say so!"

"Yes, I have. My French is bad, and his English is worse, but he understands that I am in the wholesale grocery trade. I have come to Palermo to buy currants!"

"Most extraordinary! How very clever of you!"

Mr. Winter drew himself up with an air of professional pride.

"That is nothing, sir," he said. "We often make queer acquaintanceships in the way of business. But Grosjean is a smart chap. He eyed me curiously when he happened to hear that I was the fifth passenger who wished to leave the steamer at Messina, so I took the bull by the horns and made myself useful to him in the matter of getting his baggage out of the hold."

"Marvellous!" gasped Sir Hubert.

"The upshot of it was that he gave me some advice about currants. We stayed in the same hotel at Messina, travelled together in the train, and I am going to put up at the Campo Santo Hotel, where he will stay with the Turks."

Meanwhile the subject of their conversation had quitted the station, and Sir Hubert's respect for Mr. Winter's powers as a sleuth hound yielded to anxiety lest the slippery Frenchman might vanish once and for all.

"Hadn't we better follow him?" he suggested.

Mr. Winter winked knowingly. "Don't be anxious, sir. He wants to be seen in my company. He believes I am here for trading purposes, and the association will be useful to him."

Nevertheless the baronet was glad to find that Mr. Winter's confidence was not misplaced, when, ten minutes later, he again encountered the Frenchman and the Turks at the door of the Campo Santo, a cheap and popular hotel near the square that forms the centre of Palermo.

The detective was eminently suited for the rôle he now filled.

"Ah, monsoo," he cried, with boisterous good humour, "permittez—moi introducer un friend of mine, Monsoo Smeeth, de Londres, you know. Je ne savez pas les noms de votre companiongs, but they are très bons camarades, je suis certain."

Grosjean was most complaisant.

"It ees von grand plaisir, m'sieu," he said, whilst the Turks gravely bowed their acknowledgments.

The upshot of this extraordinary meeting was that when Mr. Winter had secured a room and the party had ordered dinner, the six men set out for a stroll through the town.

Sir Hubert strove hard to so manœuvre their ramble that they should pass the Hotel de France, and perchance come under the astonished eyes of Brett and the others.

But this amiable design was frustrated by Grosjean's eagerness to visit the post-office, which lay in a different direction.

One of the Turks, none other than Hussein-ul-Mulk, spoke English fairly well, and he puzzled the old baronet considerably when the latter was called upon to answer his questions.

Yet the situation passed off well. Grosjean came out of the post-office, apparently without having obtained any missives—a letter, of course, could not possibly await him—and suggested that they should wander towards the harbour.

Sir Hubert strongly recommended the spectacular beauty of the street where the Hotel de France lay, but Grosjean politely insisted that he wished to make some inquiries at the shipping office, and Mr. Winter backed him up, being ignorant of the baronet's real motive. There was nothing to do but yield gracefully.

They walked along the Corso Vittorio Emanuele. Sir Hubert, fresh with memories of his morning's drive with a guide, pointed out the chief buildings, becoming sadly mixed up in the names of some of them.

Still, this was a safer topic than his previous conversation with Hussein-ul-Mulk, so he persevered gamely.

They soon reached the quay. Sir Hubert became almost incoherent with agitation when they passed the Blue-Bell and came into full view of Edith, Jack, Fairholme, and Daubeney, who happened to leave the hotel shortly before five o'clock in order to visit the yacht and secure a good cup of tea.

Brett refused to accompany them, on the ground that his Italian scout, the pilot, might ring news at any hour, and he must remain within immediate call. It was a supreme moment when Grosjean halted and called general attention to the smart-looking vessel and the tea-drinkers.

Sir Hubert keenly examined the top of the funnel, and tried simultaneously to yawn and light a cigar. In the result, he nearly choked himself. Mr. Winter, somewhat more prepared for emergencies, endeavoured to interest Grosjean in the wonderful clearness of the water.

But Hussein-ul-Mulk and his two sedate friends suddenly betrayed a keen interest in Fairholme.

(Continued on page 287.)

Digitized by Google

Throat Deafness.

The close relation between throat ailments and chronic Deafness is shown by the fact that out of every 1,000 Deaf patients applying to the Drouet Institute, an average of 234 have some form of nose and throat complaint. The Editor of "The Journal for the Deaf" pursues this subject still further in a special article, and also dwells upon the Cure of Deafness by the Drouet Method of external application. One of the cures of throat Deafness described is the case of Mr. E. Terry, of 4 Veldt Villas, Ashcroft Road, Cirencester. In this case the Deafness was associated with catarrh of the throat. In response to an enquiry by the Editor, Mr. Terry wrote as follows:—"I followed the Drouet Treatment, as you recommended, and can now hear well with both ears, which I could not do before." Those who are interested in this subject can obtain a free copy of the "Journal for the Deaf" by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The "Journal" also contains a Special Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to the treatment of Deafness and Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases. The Editor, however, advises patients, whenever possible, to attend the Institute for a personal examination.

NEW IDEAS FOR SPRING.

Noble's New Catalogue,

'DISTINCTION IN DRESS'

Contains all the best ideas for Spring Attire, in Costumes, Jackets, Blouses, and other Wearables. Write for the Catalogue to-day, and Save Money by its guidance.

SENT POST FREE

MODEL 1629.

You can purchase this becoming design right from the seat of manufacture. John Noble Ltd. make it in their well-known Cheviot Serge and Costume Coating. The Russian Blouse has pouched fronts, shoulder capes, and fashionable bell-sleeves, all nicely stitched. Skirt full and graceful. Price 10/6, carriage 6d. Skirt alone 5'6' carriage 5d. This design is also made to measure in New Black and White Flake Tweed at 21/-. 10/6

JOHN NOBLE LTD., 148 Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER

TEST BOXES FREE TO ALL.

Any sufferer sending name and address to JOHN A. SMITH, 1007 Montague House, Stonecutter St., London, E.C., will be sent a Test Box of his marvellous Cure, GLORIA TONIC, for all Uric Acid Ailments, including Gout, Sciatica, and RHEUMATISM. 300 Recent Cures.

GIVEN AWAY with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 476),

A Paper Pattern of

A SMART COAT FOR A GIRL.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

JUNO CYCLES For LADIES & GENTLEMEN

Free Wheels. Bowden, New Departure Coaster Hub and Rim Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, Valise, Wrench, &c., and carriage paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s.	15/10	£9 10s.	17/6
£9	16/8	£10 5s.	19/3

Cycle an Motor accessories of best quality at lower prices than any other house: Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6. Write for New Season Illustrated Cycle and Motor List, over 100 pages and 500 illustrations, sent post free. — METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (E.E. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

HYPNOTISM.

Would you possess that strange mysterious power which charms and fascinates men and women, influences their thoughts, controls their desires, and makes you supreme master of every situation! Life is full of alluring possibilities for those who master the secrets of hypnotic influence; for those who develop their magnetic powers. You can learn at home, cure diseases and bad habits without drugs, win the friendship and love of others, increase your income, gratify your ambitions, drive worry and trouble from your mind, improve your memory, overcome domestic difficulties, give the most thrilling entertainment ever witnessed, and develop a wonderfully magnetic will power that will enable you to overcome all obstacles to your success.

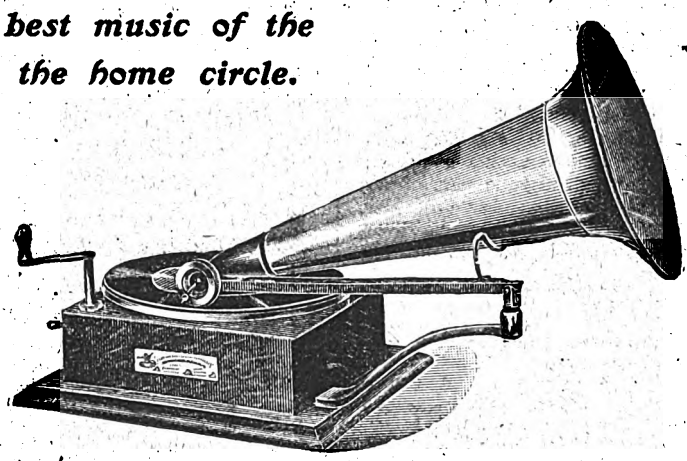
You can hypnotise people instantaneously—quick as a flash—put yourself or anyone else to sleep at any hour of the day or night—banish pain and suffering. Our free book tells you the secrets of this wonderful science. It explains exactly how you can use this power to better your condition in life. It is enthusiastically endorsed by ministers of the gospel, lawyers, doctors, business men and society women. It benefits everybody. It costs nothing. We give it away to advertise our college. Write for it to-day. Address penny post-card American College of Sciences, Dept. WL36, 420 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A.

THE GRAMOPHONE

SHOULD BE IN EVERY HOME.

TRADE MARK "GRAMOPHONE"

The Gramophone is an educator and instructor. It brings the best music of the world into the home circle.



MONARCH JUNIOR, £5 10s.

CONCERT RECORDS, 5s.; 7in. RECORDS, 2s. 6d.; RED LABEL RECORDS, 10s

THE OPINIONS OF TWO GREAT WOMEN.

Madame ADELINA PATTI writes:

Craig-y-nos-Castle.

To The Gramophone Company, London,

"I have much pleasure in stating that I have heard your Monarch Gramophone and that I consider it a very remarkable instrument of its kind and quite the most perfect that I have ever heard. It reproduces the human voice to such a fine point that in listening to the records of Caruso, Plangon, etc., it seemed to me as if those artistes were actually singing in my Saloons. I have never heard anything to equal it.

Yours truly,

Adelina Patti (Baroness Cederström)."

Madame SARAH BERNHARDT writes:

"I desire to express to you my entire admiration for your magnificent Gramophone. Yesterday, while listening to the Habanera of 'Carmen,' I thought I was listening, not to the echo of the voice of Calvé, but Calvé herself—the marvellous and only Calvé. I am still affected by it, and I wished to express to you at once my recognition—and so I do.

(Signed) Sarah Bernhardt."

THE GRAMOPHONE AND TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 City Road, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

When they last met the earl on the tower of the Château d'If they were so engrossed in the object of their visit to Marseilles that he had passed them unnoticed.

But now, looking steadily at him—for Fairholme was seated facing them, and was striving to maintain the semblance of an animated chat with Edith—there came to the Turks a memory, each instant becoming more definite, of an exciting scene in the Rue Barbette, and the opportune arrival of a stalwart young Englishman, backed up by a couple of gendarmes.

Hussein-ul-Mulk's swarthy countenance reddened with suspicious anger.

He drew Grosjean on one side and whispered something to him. The Frenchman started violently.

"They have recognised you, Bobby!" murmured the quick-witted Edith. "Oh, why didn't we remain with Mr. Brett!"

There is no knowing what might have happened had not Fate stepped in to decide in dramatic fashion the important issues at stake.

Whilst Grosjean and the Turk were still conferring in stealthy tones, and the English people endeavoured to keep up an appearance of complete unconcern, a tramp steamer swung round the corner of the mole that protects the harbour.

In tow, with sails trimly furled and six people standing on her small deck—a lady and gentleman and four sailors—was the Belles Sœurs, fishing-smack No. 107, from Marseilles.

Instantly a watcher, otherwise unperceived, ran off from the quay at top speed towards the Hotel de France.

Mr. Winter Makes an Arrest.

Grosjean, the Turks, Edith, Fairholme—each and every member of the two parties on the wharf and on the deck of the Blue-Bell—momentarily forgot the minor excitement of the situation in view of this unexpected apparition.

"There they are! Come quickly!" cried Grosjean.

He ran further along the quay followed by the Turks.

"Quick, Bobby! Oh, Jack, do something! Mr. Brett could not foresee this, though he seemed to have an inspiration that kept him in the hotel. What can we do? Dubois and the girl will know you at once! Jack, shouldn't you keep out of sight?—go below—go and fetch Mr. Brett Oh, dear, this is dreadful!"

Thus did Edith, for once yielding to feminine irresolution, appeal to her lover and brother, vainly seeking to discover the best line of action to follow in this disastrous circumstance, for she well knew that the diamonds must now be in the personal possession of Dubois.

It was a golden opportunity to recover the stolen gems. If once he eluded the grasp of his pursuers after landing they might—probably would—secure him, but not the diamonds.

Daubeney, now purple with perplexity, and Fairholme, swearing softly under his breath, sprang from the deck to the low wall of the quay. Almost unconsciously they joined Sir Hubert and Mr. Winter.

Edith followed them. She glanced at her brother. He was gazing curiously, vindictively, at the two figures on the deck of the Belles Sœurs.

There was a fierce gleam in his eyes, a set expression in his closed lips, a nervous twitching at the corners of his mouth, that betokened the over-powering emotions of the moment.

With a woman's intuition Edith realised that no power on earth, no consideration of expediency, would restrain him from laying violent hands on Dubois at the first possible opportunity.

She knew there must be a struggle, in which Grosjean and the Turks, perhaps the four sailors, would participate. They might use knives and fire-arms, whereas the Englishmen were unarmed.

So she ran back on board the yacht and cried to the Scottish engineer:

"Oh, Mr. Macpherson! Please come with some of your men! There may be a fight on the wharf, and Mr. Daubeney and the others will be outnumbered!"

Macpherson for once forgot his cautiousness. There was none of the characteristic slowness of the Scottish nation in his manner or language as he yelled down the fore-hatch: "Tumble up, there! Some dirty Eye-talians are goin' to hammer the boss. Bring along a monkey-wrench or the first thing to hand. Shar-r-p's the wo-r-rd!"

Forthwith there appeared from the hatch-way a miscellaneous mob of seamen, firemen, and stewards. Following Edith and Macpherson, they ran along the quay.

Already there was something unusual in progress. Loungers by the harbour, perceiving a disturbance, were running towards the scene of action.

A solitary Italian policeman, swaggering jauntily over the paved roadway, was suddenly startled out of his self-complacency.

"Caramba!" he shouted. Drawing his sabre, he broke into a run.

For matters had developed with melodramatic suddenness. Casting off the steamer's tow-rope, the Belles Sœurs swung alongside the wharf much more easily and quickly than did the friendly vessel by whose aid she had so soon reached Palermo.

Both steamer and smack had already been searched by the Customs' officers who boarded them in the quarantine station, and the reason that the schooner had not been earlier sighted from the shore was found in the mere chance that she was rendered invisible by close proximity to her bigger companion.

The instant that the fishing-boat was tied to the wharf Mlle. Beaucaire sprang ashore. Grosjean, breathless and excited, was there to greet her.

But the greeting between father and daughter was not very cordial. The innkeeper seemed to be dumfounded with surprise at her early arrival.

Dubois followed more leisurely.

He took no notice of Grosjean, and appeared to be looking about for a cab. Two of the sailors were handing up a couple of portmanteaux from the deck.

Hussein-ul-Mulk and the two other Turks, unable to restrain their excitement, crowded round the pink-and-white Frenchman, jabbering volubly, but Mademoiselle and her father moved some slight distance away.

At this juncture Mr. Winter strode resolutely forward, seized Dubois firmly by the shoulder, and said:

"Henri Dubois! In the name of the King of England I arrest you for the murder of——"

The detective's words were stopped by a blow.

A wild struggle promptly ensued. The man turned upon him like a tiger and the Turks joined in. Grosjean, too, ran back to take a hand in the fray. Fairholme, Sir Hubert, Daubeney, and Talbot flung themselves on the would-be rescuers, and the four French sailors of the Belles Sœurs leapt ashore to assist their passenger in this unlooked-for attack. Frantic yells and oaths came from the confused mob, and knives were drawn.

Talbot had but one desire in life—to get his fingers on Dubois' throat. He had almost reached him, for Winter clung to his prey with bull-dog tenacity, when an astounding thing happened.

The Frenchman's handsome moustaches fell off, and beneath the clever make-up on her face were visible the boldly handsome features of La Belle Chasseuse, now distorted by rage and fear.

"You fool!" yelled Talbot to Winter. "You have let him escape!"

Tearing himself from the midst of the fight he was just in time to see the female figure, which he now knew must be Dubois masquerading in his mistress' clothes, jumping into a cab and driving off towards the Corso Vittorio Emanuele.

"Come on, Fairholme!" he cried. "He cannot get away! Here comes an empty carriage!"

But now Macpherson and his allies had reached the scene. Using a "monkey-wrench or the first thing to hand," they placed the Turks, Grosjean, and the crew of the Belles Sœurs on the casualty list.

(To be concluded shortly.)

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

The Broken Promise.

Six months ago "Mary" and her lover were looking into a jeweller's shop. The girl took a fancy to a brooch she saw there, and the young man promptly replied, "Well, you shall have it some day." Since then nothing has been seen or heard of the promised brooch. Do I think "Mary" should remind the sweetheart of his promise, and was it an honourable thing for the man to promise the present and not keep his word?

* * * * *

Perhaps the young man really hoped at the time that he would be able to buy the brooch, and since that has had pecuniary difficulty. Many people, out of sheer generosity and good nature, indiscreetly promise things, and when the time comes to fulfil their promises, are absolutely unable to do so. They are not exactly dishonourable—that is too strong a word—but are very foolish people.

* * * * *

If you know that there was no pecuniary trouble at the bottom of your lover's conduct, he may have simply forgotten to buy the brooch, in which case a hint from you could well be put forward. But do not allow your desire for the brooch to lead you to offend him.

To Become a Singer.

So, "G. R." you are a young lady who wishes to become a professional singer, and would like to know how to go about it. Well, in the first instance, have you a voice? I know the life of a singer, with all its glitter and applause, is a very fascinating one, and it is delightful to be able to give one's life to the divine art.

* * * * *

But one cannot be made a singer, even with the very best training in the world. Go to a musical expert, and ask him to give you a candid opinion on your voice. Your organist or choir-master could, perhaps, do this. If the verdict of two or three people is favourable, then take lessons, elementary ones first, advanced ones later.

* * * * *

Do not trust too much to the good opinion of friends and relations. There is a tendency amongst them to either overwhelm one with praise or discourage one by ridicule. A sane judgment is seldom to be got from intimate friends. Get the opinion of a stranger, who has no interest in the matter, and abide by it.

* * * * *

Remember the path before one who seeks to win success in such an art as singing is one of the most difficult. You must give up hours and hours daily to practice, and your diet, exercise, and general habits would have to be largely regulated for you. But a good voice overcomes all those obstacles, if one possesses it, as is evident in the case of Miss Clara Butt, once as obscure perhaps as yourself, but now one of the greatest singers of the age.

A Domestic Complication.

Here is a little question of etiquette with which many of us may at some time or another find ourselves confronted. "G. H." has been invited to a friend's house—a young married man—to have tea, and to spend an evening. The wife is a young and delicate woman, who keeps one servant. At a certain time in the evening the servant is suddenly taken ill and has to go to bed. The wife finds that she is unable to prepare supper herself. How should the various parties act?

* * * * *

"G. H." should perceive the difficulty the household were placed in, and excuse himself. To appear to be expecting the hostess to put herself to a lot of trouble on his account would be tactless. He should invent an excuse—which might not perhaps be truthful, but still it would be one of those little fibs which are pardonable.

* * * * *

If the hostess really intended to provide supper, I think she should do so, assuming she was not absolutely incapable of it. If so, then the husband should apologise to "G. H." for the trouble, adding, "We had so hoped you would have supper with us"—a hint which "G. H." could quite well take in good part.

Business Matters.

"L." is courting a girl. She has not inquired anything as to his business pursuits or position. Is it his duty to make her acquainted with those things?

Certainly there should be complete confidence between sweethearts on such a subject. I always think a man who may one day marry a girl should lose no opportunity of telling her his business experiences. It is only right that she should know them, and be interested.

The Prosaic Letter Writer.

What is to be done with a man who cannot write a love-letter? This trouble comes from "Emma," whose suitor writes to her almost daily, but very rarely hints at a word of love. She thinks this means a coolness in his relations with her. When he meets her, however, he is as affectionate as possible.

* * * * *

Well, "Emma," it is far better that the young man should display his affection in practice than write letters describing it. How many love-letters are really genuine? I incline to think your lover must be a really straight-forward, honest fellow, who has no unnecessary gush about him. A loving word or two in writing is, I know, very delightful, but it does not, after all, prove the lover to be any the more genuine.

Visiting a Sweetheart's Home.

The trouble of "Diana U." is, "Should she invite the man of her choice to her home, when he has not invited her to his, which is in another town?"

* * * *

Yes, certainly, if your parents or friends are agreeable to meeting him. There is no rule that I know of which lays down who should first visit the other's home. It is largely decided by circumstances. Certainly it is generally more desirable that a girl's parents should know her sweetheart than the other way about. Many men postpone until the last possible moment the introduction of their sweethearts at home, especially when there are sisters in question. I know how unenviable is the position at first of a girl at her fiancé's home. It is not, however, usually the case with the man.

Cynthia

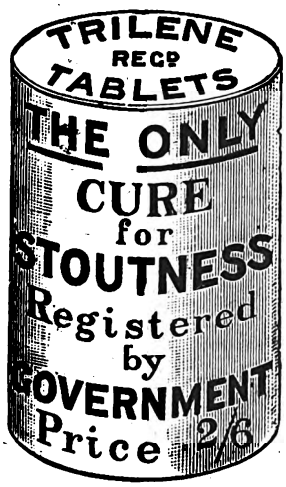
Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risebolm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 2lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1¼ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9¼st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 28. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest valu I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

CADBURY'S COCOA

Points from the Press:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to Cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and, indeed, pernicious, especially having regard to the fact that Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres." —The LANCET.

The MEDICAL MAGAZINE says: "The favourite Cocoa of the day. For Strength, Purity, and Nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found."

HEALTH says: "The perfect purity of Cadbury's Cocoa—a strong point with the makers constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence and the secret of its universal popularity.

CADBURY'S is COCOA and the BEST COCOA only

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Wind and Pains in Stomach,

Impaired Digestion.

Disordered Liver, and

Female Ailments.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

CONTAINING 56 AND 168 PILLS RESPECTIVELY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a delicious article of food for daily use. Exquisite for Luncheon, Dinner, or Supper. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

BIRD'S CUSTARD AND RHUBARB.

Wholesome and healthful, rich and creamy. BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Stewed, Tinned, or Bottled Fruits. It enhances their flavour and imparts to them a grateful mellowness.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story Starts Inside.

Short Stories.

No. 740.] Week ending March 7, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Gradually the rumble of the train sounded nearer and nearer, and the blind girl made a motion as if to cross the metals. "Don't move!" he cried quickly; "you are quite safe!"

(A Dramatic Incident from our Powerful New Serial "HELD APART," which starts inside.)

Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

...THE... "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

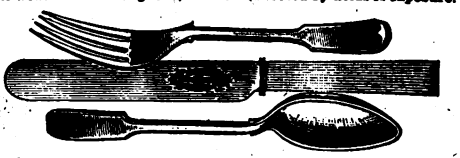
Of Household Cutlery and Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of "Columbian" Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.



51 PIECES FOR 25 SHILLINGS.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.

TERMS. Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if you are not perfectly satisfied.

No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Cutlery and Plate, etc., Post free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE

KAYE'S WORSDELL'S PILLS

Are a certain Cure for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Constipation, Liver and Kidney Complaints etc. For Ladies of all ages they are invaluable.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d. per box

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

JUNO CYCLES

For LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

Free Wheels. Bowden, New Departure Coaster Hub and Rim Brakes. All Improvements—Lamp, Bell, Valise, Wrench, &c., and carriage paid.

For Cash or 12 Monthly Payments of

£8 8s. 15/10 | £9 10s 17/6
£9 16 8 | £10 5s. 19/3

Cycle an Motor accessories of best quality at lower prices than any other house: Acetylene Lamp, 2/11; Cycle Stand, 1/8; Motor Horn, 5/6. Write for New Season Illustrated Cycle and Motor List, over 100 pages and 500 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. (S. S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

Remarkable discovery that will interest every woman with superfluous hair. Perfectly safe treatment that permanently destroys the roots, fully described, FREE to all.

Hairy women need no longer despair. Out of the mass of failures has come a genuine success. Their unsightly blemish can be so thoroughly destroyed that they themselves will wonder if they ever really had disfiguring hair.

The Capillus Mfg. Company are in sole possession of a marvellous home method that removes superfluous hair for ever. It goes to the very root of the hair, and destroys its life, so that it will never grow again.

The Company want it understood that this method is different entirely from the many powders, lotions, and cosmetics sold that only remove temporarily and hurt a delicate skin, while this new method removes the hair for all time, and is simple and harmless.

It is a home treatment that any lady can easily use in her private apartments, and will permanently remove superfluous hair without pain.

By sending your name and address to the Capillus Mfg. Company, 57 Century House, Regent Street, London, W., you will receive a full description of this simple and remarkable method, which will enable you to remove all superfluous hair at home at a very slight expense.

The description is mailed to you free in a perfectly plain and sealed envelope, and you should have no hesitancy in writing. You will be delighted to learn how easily and surely superfluous hair can be permanently and painlessly removed, and it will pay you to write to-day. Don't neglect to do so.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Short Stories.

No. 740.] Week Ending March 7th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL. STARTS TO-DAY.

Held Apart

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "The Golden Dwarf," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

FIRST CHAPTER.

The Face at the Door.

"By Jove, what a lovely thing! Miss Davenal, you are a genius. Imagine your doing that all out of your own head!"

"Not quite all out of my own head, Sir Guy," was the laughing response; "I assure you it has taken up yards and yards of ribbon. I have never tried to do such a large piece before. I was afraid at first the design wasn't going to be bold enough."

The speaker stepped back to contemplate her unfinished task—a large, oblong panel of dead-leaf silk, stretched upon a light frame of laths and covered by the wandering green sprays and ruddy blossoms of the briar-rose, worked curiously in loosely-drawn ribbons of various shades and breadths. The frame itself stood near a hobbed firegrate in a little, plainly-furnished apartment, from whose wide, recessed, small-paned window, the fading beams of a March sun fell across an oil-clothed floor to illuminate the splendid panel which Moira Davenal was studying.

She herself was a figure befitting the unpretentiousness of the place. Tall—for a girl yet in the last of her teens—large and elastically moulded, her simple blouse and skirt were hidden by a big white apron with an old-fashioned "bib" and straps. Her features were fine and strongly marked, her expression shy yet resolute. Her hair, which was of a rare and true gold, inclining towards the warm tint of the ripe orange, was gathered in almost cumbersome masses low at her neck.

Her companion had been contemplating her no less intently than she had been regarding the panel of ribbon-work. He was a young man, with the smooth brown skin and proud, good-tempered profile of the well-bred Briton. His costume was the dark, smartly-cut tweed morning-dress, so dear to the heart of the country gentleman, and his riding-boots and hunting-crop showed that he had lately left the saddle.

"Nonsense!" he declared, "the result is perfect. I shall be positively ashamed to rob you of it."

Moira threaded her needle with a long strip of narrow green ribbon.

"Why should you feel like that?" she answered. "It has been done for you and you are—you are paying me for it, you know. Then I have enjoyed doing it very much indeed. That is even better than being paid. Besides, I am thinking of putting up over the door, 'Moira Davenal, Embroiderer in Ribbon to the Nobility and Gentry.' You are my first great client, Sir Guy. That might go over the door, too, 'By Appointment to Sir Guy Vanbrugh, The Close, Groudle, Cumberland.'"

Guy Vanbrugh looked out of the window. Beyond its trimly-curtained panes was a sleepy little harbour, a cobble-stoned quay, and the squat brown masts and cordage of a few coasters and fishing-luggers, shut in by a wave-worn breakwater. Over all was the grey sky, touched with the fitful sunshine of a quiet March day—a March that was apparently inclined to fulfil the proverb by going out like a lamb. At the gate of the garden which surrounded the house—half villa, half cottage—was fretting a glossy bay hunter, its reins looped to the latch of the wicket.

"You are laughing at me, Miss Davenal," Moira was told; "but there, I am quite defenceless. I only wish you would let me give you the panel for yourself and a piano to fasten it to."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Moira Davenal glanced at him quickly. "I have a piano of my own, Sir Guy," she said, "but I don't keep it in here. In Groudle pianos belong to the best room, and most of them have holland covers on from one year's end to another. And as for the panel, I must do myself a copy of this, if you don't—or rather, if Miss Tarleton doesn't mind. I believe you said you wanted it for your cousin."

Her companion flushed—a flush almost boyish in its intensity—and played awkwardly with his whip.

"Miss Davenal," he rejoined, "you are very cruel. I suppose you mean that people are talking about—about Irene Tarleton and I being more to each other one of these days than cousins. Well, it's a confounded untruth. Irene and I are the best of friends, always have been, and I won't say our fathers didn't lay plans over the wine and walnuts. But Irene doesn't care for me in that way; and though she hasn't an idea, the sly little minx, I know whom she does like."

Moira had begun to work on a spray of leaves in a corner of the panel and her face was hidden.

"I—I beg your pardon, Sir Guy," she murmured. "I suppose it did seem as if I were hinting at what isn't my business."

Guy Vanbrugh came a step or two nearer. "Irene is a brick, though," he said, "and no end fond of beautiful things. That was why, when I dropped in that day to see your father about the yacht, and noticed you busy with some of that wonderful ribbon-stuff, I thought I'd get you to do me a piano-screen for her. It's her birthday soon, and I'm going to give her one of those pianos that play themselves. Extraordinary things they are, and getting to be quite the rage."

He was talking nervously, and for no better reason than the sake of saying something. Suddenly he bent over her.

"Moira," he added, "you didn't think I was only amusing myself, did you? You couldn't think that badly of me, surely."

The golden head bowed over the panel was raised haughtily.

"Sir Guy!" began Moira Davenal, "I—I——"

Guy Vanbrugh checked her with a gesture.

"Don't, dear," he said, "you are not angry, and you're not surprised. Women always guess these things, even before a man knows himself. Have I a chance to win you for my wife? I'll give you all the time you want to be sure, and, to be honest, I can't hear that I've any particular rival, though every bachelor in Groudle, by all accounts, is mad for you. Moira, have I the least little bit of a chance?"

Moira twisted the ribbon in her fingers. "I—I don't know, Sir Guy," she faltered, "I never thought about you seriously. And they would all say I married you for your money!"

Guy Vanbrugh laughed, a deep, masculine laugh, with a gasp in it not unlike a sob.

"Then there is a chance for me," he said, biting his lip. "Moira, I——"

He stopped abruptly. The ribbon fell from Moira's grasp and she looked up into his face. Its mask of well-bred composure had been lifted and she saw how profoundly he was moved. Something seemed to sting her own heart, and she put out her hands in a spasm of sympathy and protest.

"Please," she begged, "don't look like that. I'm not worth it—no woman is."

Guy Vanbrugh took her soft palm in his. "Moira," he said, "here have I been learning to love you better than anything else in the world, and you have been telling yourself all the while that I was only amusing myself. Perhaps you were wise, but all the same you were wrong. Listen, I am going to London for a few days—I must, on business. I called in to ask you to explain to your father. When I come back you shall let me know if you have missed me just a trifle. Don't allow your kind heart to pity me over-much, I don't want to be pitied, Moira, I want to be——"

He started back. There was a heavy step in the square hallway of the cottage, and a burly, almost gigantic figure, moving with a slow, short stride, entered the room.

"Good evening, Mr. Davenal," remarked Guy Vanbrugh easily, picking up the whip he had laid down, "I was just about leaving you a message. I must run up to London for a week-end. How goes on the task of raising the Sylph?"

The new-comer rubbed his deep, clean-shaven chin with a finger and thumb.

"I've found the last hole, Sir Guy," he answered, "under the port bow. The keel-plates have parted and the water can pour in faster than any pumps those London men were using could get it out. But I'll have her afloat now before long."

"Excellent!" exclaimed Guy Vanbrugh. "I only wish I'd called you in at first, Davenal, it would have saved time and money."

The diver smiled—a broad, pleasant smile. He was a huge man, whose breadth of limb and chest disguised his height, and he had the placid grey eyes of a child.

"It's very kind of you to say that, Sir Guy," he responded, and I'm glad to be of use to you. But I wouldn't have gone down again, sir, for anyone but your father's son. I've made my little bit, and I'm getting on. I want to spend the evening of my life in idleness, and, if I may own it without cowardice, in safety."

He drew Moira into his arms as he passed her, and scanned her face with gentle attention.

"You're working too close, lass," he said, "yon roses are taking the roses out of your cheeks, I'm thinking."

"Oh, no, dad," cried Moira eagerly, "I'm sure it isn't that. Sir Guy told me not to tire myself over it, and I haven't. If I'd liked I could have finished it ever so long ago."

She blushed furiously—without any apparent reason—and glanced covertly at Sir Guy. He was viewing his hunter from the window.

"My horse is getting impatient," he observed. "Miss Davenal, I shall never forgive myself if you work too hard on my account. Good afternoon, Davenal. You have my authority to put the panel in the fire if your daughter devotes to it more than half an hour a day. I shall only be in town for the week-end, so you can let me know its fate when I return."

He touched Moira's fingers, their eyes met, and Moira cast hers down. Then he shook hands with John Davenal, and, leaving the cottage, sprang into the saddle. Moira drew back the curtain and gazed after him as he rode away.

"That's a fine young fellow," said John Davenal, sitting down heavily by the fire, "but I wish his yacht was safely afloat again and my last dive yonder made—I'm not so fit for it as I was."

Moira turned quickly. "Are you unwell, dad?" she asked anxiously.

The diver put his head into his big palms. "It's my ears, lass," he rejoined; "first it's one and then the other. To-day it's the right side, and I'm fair moidered with the pain."

"Poor dad!" exclaimed Moira tenderly, and dropping the curtain, she crossed the kitchen towards him.

She paused half-way. A loud knock had sounded on the cottage door. Without ceremony it was thrust wide, and a man's form appeared in the entrance. He was below the medium stature, yet conspicuously broad-shouldered and athletic. His hair and bristling moustache were of a fairness almost ashen, and showed oddly upon a countenance tanned and bloated, and jowled like that of a bull-dog. A reefer suit of worn blue serge, and a peaked cap of the naval type, suggested the sailor, but his trousers lacked the chara teristic "flare" over the boot-top. And yet there was about him an unmistakable flavour of salt water.

Digitized by Google

Unsteadily yet familiarly he thrust into the small apartment. And as he reeled inwards he sang, in a loud, husky whisper, interrupted by hiccoughs, a scrap of a chorus:

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her—her sailor any more."

The singer stopped and stared round inquiringly. "I want to see Davenal," he said thickly, "John Davenal—honest John. Lives here, doesn't he? Let him know Hartigan wants a word with him—Dennis Hartigan, that was chief steward of the Athabasca. He'll remember me; good reason to. Say I want to see the girl—not Nancy, the—the other girl."

The diver rose to his feet, strode to the intruder's side, and grasped his elbow.

"Hullo, Hartigan!" he remarked loudly, "who'd have expected you to turn up in Groudle? Glad to see you, though, glad to see you! Sit down and make yourself comfortable, I'll be with you in a moment."

He pushed the maritime-looking figure towards the fireplace and forced it into his own chair. Seeming merely to pilot its unsteady steps, he was, in reality, controlling it as if it had been a puppet.

"Moira," he added, "go and get me a drop of almond oil from the chemist's, there's a good lass. Tell him it's for me, and ask him to put a suspicion of laudanum in it."

The other caught at his coat-sleeve.

"Look here," he said, "you let me doctor you, John. Oh, I may be a bit muzzy, but I'm not drunk, and if you've got the ear-ache I can cure you in a twinkling. I've a famous pre—prescription—hang the word! Don't you worry about laudanum, let her bring me a spoonful of chloro—chlorodyne. No, dash it, that's not the stuff, it's chloro—chloroform. Fetch me a thimbleful of that and I'll have you better in a jiffy!"

Moira hesitated. The diver motioned to her.

"Humour him, Moira," he said, in a rapid aside, "bring both."

His visitor plucked him by the sleeve again.

"So that's Moira!" he exclaimed. "Come out of the daylight, John, and let me have a squint at her."

With a muttered anathema the diver yielded, and the bloated visage of Mr. Dennis Hartigan was thrust towards Moira Davenal's fair, disdainful face.

"Humph!" he growled at length; "I never was fond of your blooming blondes. Be off, my girl, and bring me what I've told you, or I'll send you back for it."

Moira shrugged her shoulders, took up a woollen tam-o-shanter from a corner table, put it on, ran a pin through it, and went out.

Left alone with his visitor, the diver clapped his hand on the nape of the other's neck. He bent as a reed bends to the wind.

"Now," said John Davenal, "what do you want? Not the girl—not Moira?"

Dennis Hartigan looked wise. "And if I do?" he demanded evasively. The diver set his jaw, and his pleasant countenance grew fierce and bull-like.

"You shan't have her!" was his passionate response. "Neither of you have sought her for more years than there are fingers on my hands. She's my child by nurture and affection, she loves me as if I were her father—she thinks I am her father."

"It's a clever child," commented the steward with a grin, "that knows its own father."

John Davenal brushed his coarse black hair off his forehead.

"Let us get to the point," he pursued. "Moira won't be away long. I'm going to make you an offer, Dennis Hartigan, and it is this: While you keep from Moira the fact that I am not her father, while you allow her to remain here peaceably with me, I will pay you fifty pounds a year. I'm not over rich—though I have lasted better at my profession than most—but I can manage that much. Let her go on calling me father; she is nothing to you, and she is everything to me."

Dennis Hartigan chuckled. "Fifty pounds a year," he said, "well, if it's worth it to you, it's worth it to me. Give me a tenner on account and I'm mum."

John Davenal sprang to a neighbouring shelf, took down a brass-bound travelling desk, and unlocked it hastily. Big man as he was, he was trembling with a feverish excitement.

The steward sat back in the wooden armchair, crossed his legs, and began to sing his drunken chorus—

"Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her sailor any more.
Say I——"

He halted abruptly, and with such a curious gurgle in his voice that John Davenal looked round from the gold pieces he himself had begun to count. The steward was staring at the further door of the kitchen. It had opened stealthily, and in the aperture between the door and jamb was a woman's face, pale, and with the limpid, expressionless eyes of the blind.

Her features were set in a gaze of profound attention, it seemed as if her very soul were listening.

SECOND CHAPTER.

The Ears of the Blind

As though paralysed by a kind of fright, the steward sat, his gaze fixed upon the face in the doorway. It was that of a young woman, but its look of tremulous simplicity was unmistakably girlish. Pale as it was at the moment, it had a fragile, appealing prettiness, increased by the loose brown hair that waved naturally over the low, white forehead. The slowly opening door revealed a slight form, diminutive even for the weaker sex.

Dennis Hartigan roused, and with an expletive and a burst of laughter smote a clenched first upon the table by him.

"Well, I'm—blessed!" he cried; "it's Kit, and I took her for a blooming ghost. I didn't remember, at the minute, that she was living with you. Come in, Kit, and speak to your long-lost brother. When I saw you last, you were in curls and pinafores, now I suppose you are 'Miss Kate Hartigan.' Not so much of the 'Kit,' eh?"

His voice had grown suddenly firm and strong, though it was still harsh and unpleasant. The shock of his drunken misapprehension had completely sobered him.

John Davenal shut his desk and went towards the door. As he passed the steward he dropped into the latter's palm a rouleau of sovereigns, and laid his own finger on his lip. The blind girl was still lingering at the threshold of the apartment. The diver went and drew her in. Beside his gigantic bulk she seemed more frail and diminutive than ever.

"It's all right, Kit," he said kindly, "your brother Dennis is home again. You had almost forgotten that you had a brother, I'll be bound."

Kate Hartigan entered, it seemed, reluctantly. "There's someone else, isn't there?" she murmured, "someone I heard that night on the breakwater all those years ago—someone who was singing."

Dennis Hartigan was thrusting the gold into his pocket. He arrested the motion abruptly, and shot a startled glance at the speaker.

"Dennis was humming a bit of a tune," responded John Davenal, puzzled; "but no one is here excepting we three."

Kate Hartigan's face changed, and she sprang, with the singular self-confidence of the blind, to the side of the sailor.

"Dennis!" she cried.

Digitized by Google

"And is it really you! Oh, my brother, my dear, dear brother!"

She threw her arms round the steward, and hung upon him, sobbing. John Davenal blew his nose violently. Dennis Hartigan coughed.

"That's all right, Kit," he said awkwardly; "I—I thought you'd be glad to see me."

"Glad!" exclaimed the blind girl, brokenly. "Oh, Dennis, why couldn't you have come before mother died? She wanted you so badly, as badly as I have wanted you since."

The other frowned irritably. "A man's got his living to make, my girl," he answered, "and in my trade you must take a job where you can find it. I've known men to be ten years working their way home from boat to boat. But wasn't I going to do something for your ear-ache, John?" he broke off, evasively.

The door from the garden swung inward as he uttered the question, and Moira appeared. Dennis Hartigan surveyed her with a new and critical interest, the passing of his temporary inebriation had left him a different man. Smart and well set-up though he was, it was not probable that he was under forty. His eyes were hard, bullying and cruel, his sun-burnt visage coarse and vaguely evil.

"Got that stuff, my lass?" he queried curtly, for Moira had not condescended to favour him with a single glance.

"No," she said, taking off her coquettish head-gear, "the man wouldn't sell it to me. I'm not twenty-one, and it's a poison."

Dennis Hartigan swore under his breath. "Easy seeing I'm not in London," he commented, "but I'll go myself and get some—hanged if I won't, and tell him what I think of him."

The diver would have protested, but his volunteer physician was determined.

"Kit can put her hat on," he said, with the air of one who utters an afterthought, "and take me to the shop. She used to know her way about this hole as a baby, so I suppose she does still. I'll have to be off soon, anyhow, and I expect she won't mind a stroll with her long-lost relation."

The blind girl darted out of the room and came back with a hat. Her face was glowing with pleasure and interest. John Davenal looked from her flushed, innocent countenance to the repellant one of her brother, and sighed as he threw the house-door wide for them.

Dennis Hartigan took his sister's arm, and they walked off together. Led unfalteringly by his sightless companion, the steward picked his way across the irregular cobblestones of the quay that skirted the harbour. His sister trod them with an elastic step, she was used to the clumsy species of paving. The sun was sinking in the fast-clouding West, a cold wind blew against them, lights began to twinkle along the shores of the bay, and in the windows of the little town.

"How strange," said the blind girl, "to be walking here with you, the last person in the world that really belongs to me! Mr. Davenal has been, oh, so good, and Moira is like my own flesh and blood. But I've always wanted my brother back, Dennis, I am very glad you have come home."

Kate Hartigan's cheeks were flushed, and her sensitive mouth trembled. But the heavy features of her lounging escort had set in a fierce scowl, and his brows were contracted and drawn down over the root of his thick nose.

"You didn't seem that pleased at first," he growled. "What did you mean by 'all those years ago,' and 'that night on the breakwater'?"

His sister winced at his tone. "There, I've vexed you!" she said; "don't be angry with me, Dennis, it was only your voice, in that scrap of a song you were singing. I have never really heard your voice before, to remember—I was a tiny thing when you went away—but when I heard it just now, both it and the song were quite familiar."

She guided him round the corner into a more central street and went along it.

"Years and years ago," she continued, "I could only have been about eight at the time, I was on the old breakwater one night. I liked to go all alone and sit down far on the landing-steps and listen to the tide flowing, and dream about where it came from, and what it had been doing during the day. And often I stopped out quite late—I think I used to forget all about time in my dreams."

"Yes, yes!" interrupted her brother, impatiently; "but you said something about one night."

Kate Hartigan assented. "One night," she pursued, "I was sitting there, under the bluff that overhangs the landing-steps, when I heard a voice—a man's voice, singing quite low, in a sort of whisper, and he was singing just what you were when I opened the kitchen door. I have always remembered the words—

"'Give my love to Nancy, the girl that I adore,
Tell her that she'll never see her sailor any more.'

"And the rest was about the Union Jack and fighting with a black. Then he said, to someone who was with him, I suppose, 'This is far out enough, in with it.' And then there was a kind of grinding of feet on the stones above, and a splash just in front of me."

The steward had clenched his fists, and his yellow teeth showed viciously under his grizzled moustache.

"A rum thing, I daresay," he answered sulkily, "but the song was quite popular once, and any amount of people must know it. I always sing it when I get a trifle muzzy. Odd, perhaps, but I do."

"Muzzy?" repeated his sister, bewildered; "what is that?"

"Drunk," explained her brother harshly, "not that I was exactly drunk just now. But I had a drop and felt like tuning up. At least, I did till I saw your white face in the doorway. It was so like a ghost's, it fairly sobered me."

The blind girl sighed. "I'm sorry I startled you," she replied gently, "but I wish you hadn't been what you call muzzy, Dennis dear. It may have been that which made your voice sound so like the man's on the breakwater, as if he had been 'muzzy' too. Yours sounds quite different now."

Dennis Hartigan's jaw set and his hands clenched involuntarily.

"Maybe," he said drily. "Aren't we ever coming to this chemist?"

"It's at the next corner," answered his sister, and the steward quickened his pace. Another moment and they had entered a small shop, whose illuminated green and crimson window-flasks showed its tenant's profession. Dennis Hartigan strolled up to the counter; a little, bald-headed, snowy-bearded man confronted him.

"I want some chloroform," he said, "and as you don't seem inclined to trust a woman with it, I've come myself."

The chemist smiled and rubbed his withered palms together. "Ah," he observed, "so you are the gentleman whose messenger Miss Davenal was. You see the young lady is not of legal age to sign the poison register, and chloroform is, as you will know, a poison of a peculiarly dangerous sort."

His customer sneered. "I have bought it on the nod in more countries than one," he said; "however, where is this bally register? Sixpennyworth of the stuff will do me—less if you like."

He took up the offered volume and the pen and scrawled his signature in the prescribed space. The chemist served him with the drug; he ordered, as a supplementary item, a small quantity of cotton-wool, paid for his purchases, pocketed them, and stepped out of the shop with a gruff "Good evening."

This time it was his sister who took his arm. "You're not vexed with me really, Dennis, are you?" she said. Dennis Hartigan gnawed his moustaches.

Digitized by Google

"Why should I be?" he queried. "When you were a lass of eight I was alternately roasting and freezing on a Chinese cargo-boat. What has your man with a voice like mine to do with me? After all, I'll bet he was only drowning a sick dog or a batch of kittens."

"I know," said the blind girl humbly, "but you can't believe, Dennis, what a strange impression it left on my childish mind. For years after that I used to dream that I heard the voice singing over and over again:

"'Tell her that she'll never see her sailor any more.'

with a sort of stop before 'sailor,' just as you sang it to-night. And my dream always turned to you, because you were a sailor, or practically a sailor, and I was afraid I might never see you again. Then in my dream, I would hear someone say, 'Over with it!' and a splash would come, and I would wake up shuddering. But I never mentioned it to anyone, for fear they would laugh at me."

Her brother's grim countenance grew less perturbed. "That's a good, sensible sister," he said; "you take my advice and forget all about it. And now let's hurry back, or Davenal will fancy we've lost the road between us."

His guide quickened her pace, and they regained the house near the quay without either making further reference to the subject which had so singularly occupied their attention. On the way, Dennis Hartigan had paused to add a third item to his list of purchases—a common white clay tobacco-pipe.

As they entered the steward saw that Moira had lighted the lamp and that John Davenal was seated by the fire in his wooden arm-chair. Moira, leaning over the back, was placing a little chintz-covered cushion behind the diver's head. His large, soft, somewhat pained grey eyes were raised to contemplate her, and one of his huge brown palms caressed a little hand that had rested for a moment on his shoulder.

The watcher grinned. "I believe the old fool worships the ground she walks on," he muttered. "Might be his own flesh and blood—thinks she is, more or less. If—if he only knew!"

He stepped into the kitchen, with a sudden assumption of cheerfulness. "Here we are," he said, "now we shan't be long. It's as easy as lying, when you've once been shown."

He laid down upon the table the bottle of chloroform, the cotton wool, and the tobacco-pipe. Moira and the diver watched interestedly; the blind girl, who had gone through to take off her hat, returned to listen.

The steward plucked away a scrap of the cotton-wool, poured a few drops of the chloroform upon it, thrust it into the bowl of the pipe, and clapped his hand over the latter.

"Looks like magic, doesn't it?" he observed; "a Yankee sailor showed me the dodge. He picked it up from an old soldier who had been a hospital orderly in his time, and who cured him as I am going to cure you. Lend us the loan of your ear, John."

The diver inclined his head to bring the aperture of the organ in question into the light of the lamp. Dennis Hartigan bent down, inserted the stem of the pipe, put his mouth to the opening of the bowl, and breathed steadily, driving the chloroform vapour into the recesses of the ear. From time to time he watched his patient's face.

"A thousand will do me at present, my Lady."

The lines of the pain began to die out of John Davenal's features, and the involuntary smile that betokens relief from long-continued suffering, stole over them. He sighed lustily.

"That's better already," he exclaimed; "much better! Dennis, you're a famous doctor."

Dennis Hartigan withdrew his impromptu instrument and put it down.

"Not a bad notion, is it?" he said, "sort of sends the ear to sleep and gives it a chance to get good-tempered again."

He stood up and resettled his collar and tie. They had been disarranged by his stooping. As he did so his glance fell upon the dial of the clock on the mantel. The fingers were close upon the hour of five.

"By Jingo!" he ejaculated, "is that the time? And I've got to get back to Glasgow for the balance of my pay. I'll have to take myself off. Never mind, I'll be back again in a day or two. A look round among old parts and old pals won't do me any harm, and I'm not sure what I'm going to turn to next."

The blind girl stole to him and put her hands on his arm. "You'll stay a while when you come back, Dennis," she asked; "won't you—for my sake? Nobody else has as much right to you as I have, nobody could have—unless it was a wife or a sweetheart."

There was a ring of curiosity in her pleading tone, and again the keen "listening" look came into her face.

Her brother shot a quick glance at her. The glance passed towards the diver. John Davenal met it gravely, and without any audible observation. The steward's pause had been almost imperceptible.

Digitized by Google

"Well, luckily for both of us, Kit," he said, "I've got neither to think about at present, so perhaps I'll put in a few days at Groudle, but just now it must be 'quick march.' So long, Davenal; bye-bye, Kit."

The blind girl clasped his hands and offered her cheek for a kiss. The steward hesitated and something like a blush tinged his sunburnt, bloated visage. But he laughed awkwardly, brushing his sister's face with his moustache. Moira shrank behind the driver, as if fearful lest the same salute might be her fate.

But Dennis Hartigan contented himself with a brusque nod and a touch of her unwilling fingers, and, with a renewed "So long" to John Davenal, departed in the windy dusk.

His sister followed him to the gate and stood listening to his retreating footsteps. Her face was aglow with a new-sprung happiness and affection.

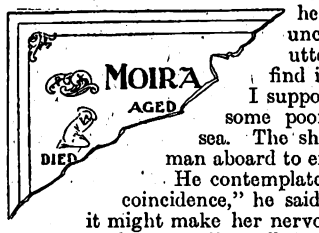
In the cottage John Davenal was putting on his slippers.

"Yon stuff's done me a power of good, Moira," he said. "I believe I could do with some tea. While you are making it I'll go and have a wash."

Passing through into the rear of the small house, he lit a candle and set a tap running over a stone sink. As he took off his coat something bulky in one of the deep pockets struck against his knee.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed, "to think of my forgetting that."

He thrust a finger and thumb into the pocket and drew out an irregular piece of damp and rotten wood. To it was attached the torn and jagged fragment of a thin metal-plate engraved. Some words were still decipherable upon it. The plate had evidently been a square and the fragment which he had was a rough diagonal half.



John Davenal shook his head over it. "That's a queer, uncanny kind of thing," he uttered aloud, "for me to find in ten fathoms of salt water. I suppose it's part of the coffin of some poor soul who was buried at sea. The ship must have had a handy man aboard to engrave that."

He contemplated it doubtfully. "An odd coincidence," he said. "I'll not let her see it—it might make her nervous. Some folks would consider it a bad omen. But, all the same, I'll keep it—yes, I'll keep it."

THIRD CHAPTER.

Mistress and Maid.

"Preposterous, Davenal, perfectly preposterous. I have been more than generous to you all these years, to say nothing of the sums which, from time to time, on one pretext or another, you have obtained from me. You should have saved a considerable amount, and I cannot consent to any further exactions."

"I'm sorry for that, my lady," was the quiet response, and a pair of spare, slightly-yellowed hands fluttered about the haughty grey head of the woman who had previously spoken. She was lounging in a comfortable chair before her triple-mirrored toilet-table, languidly submitting to the manipulations of her maid. A portly, well-preserved personage of the dowager type, selfishness was stamped upon her as with a seal.

"What you can possibly want with the money," she exclaimed, plucking at the laced sleeve of her dressing jacket, "I am at a loss to tell. A thousand pounds—it is simply black——"

She checked herself. The maid went on with her operations. She was a compactly-built, hard-featured woman of forty, with heavy brows and pinched, secretive lips.

"Blackmail, you would say, my lady," she observed, in a self-possessed undertone—"I wouldn't use such words, my lady, they might be overheard, and—and misunderstood. You see my—a certain person is—who is a ship's steward, my lady, is leaving the sea soon and we had thought of taking a country public-house together. That was why I ventured to represent to your ladyship my long services and fidelity to your—your ladyship's interests."

Lady Tarleton twisted a worn wedding-ring upon her hand.

"You are distressingly clever, Davenal," she retorted, "but I'm tired of being bled. Had I been wise, I should never have allowed you to play the leech with me. Your veiled threats are futile—to injure me would only be to injure yourself."

"So you've often said, my lady," answered Hannah Davenal, "and yet you have, as you remarked, been more than generous. You could not forget that there is a difference between the rope and the broad arrow. Your portion would have been worse than mine."

Her mistress shuddered. Hannah Davenal laid down the silver-backed tortoise-shell comb she had been using.

"However, my lady," she said, "I will be generous too, if only for my own purposes. You are weaker in mind than I, and you are growing old. I will tell you a secret you may be glad to have learnt some day, whatever you may be now. It is this, you think yourself worse than you are. For nearly twenty years you have believed that there was blood on those white hands of yours. You have been wrong. Yet, for that very reason, your peril has been greater than you suspected."

Lady Tarleton stared at her maid. Surprise and alarm struggling in her face.

"For nearly twenty years," pursued Hannah Davenal, "I have had your and your daughter's future at my mercy. The bubble I helped you to blow I could have pricked—how completely you cannot guess—at any moment. And, when I think how you have grudged me the few pounds I have asked you for, I could find it in my heart to wish I had done it."

She looked at her mistress in the mirror—sternly, masterfully. Then she bent over her and whispered in her ear.

White as was the cambric that covered her withered shoulders, Lady Tarleton's cheeks grew whiter. Suddenly the scarlet flush of rising and desperate anger swept into them and she parted her lips to speak.

"It's a lie," she said hoarsely, "a clever lie! The thing was impossible, impossible!"

Hannah Davenal smiled. "I did it, my lady," she answered, "you can have proof. Go down to Groudle Tower and look."

Lady Tarleton studied her with a kind of helpless curiosity, mingled with impotent wrath. But a shadow had fallen upon her haughty countenance—a shadow of a great fear.

"And you did this—alone?" she said slowly. Her maid was opening the doors of a wardrobe.

"No, my lady," she replied, "I had help. My husband helped me."

Lady Tarleton knitted her brows.

"Your husband!" she rejoined, "what, you are married?"

"Yes, my lady," was the reply, "I was married twenty-two years ago. What gown will your ladyship wear?"

Her mistress gasped. "Twenty-two years!" she repeated. "And your husband—what of him?"

"He's a ship's steward, my lady," responded Hannah Davenal grimly, "and not a man to settle down kindly at home—at least, he wasn't when I married him. So, when I found out what he was by nature, I told him to stop at the sea till he really wanted a home and a wife. He took on then with the China trade. But he's working his way home now, and I'm feeling like settling down myself, my lady."

She broke off and turned to the wardrobe again. "The grey zibelline, I suppose, my lady?" she said. "Your ladyship will be driving to-day, and it's very cold."

Digitized by Google

Lady Tarleton had leant on the back of her chair, and was gazing into the fire beside her. "You can certainly keep your own secrets, Davenal," she remarked, "and you shall have money to settle down with this absurd husband of yours. But, really, you mustn't expect me to believe that preposterous story about—about——"

"As I said before, my lady," observed the maid, "it can easily be proved."

Her mistress laughed scornfully. "By your husband's testimony?" she said. Hannah Davenal brought the rough cloth walking-dress.

"No, my lady," she returned; "by your own eyes."

Lady Tarleton fell to gazing into the fire once more. "Why do you tell me this now?" she asked. Her maid slipped the skirt over her head.

"It suited me to wait, my lady," she confessed. "I was very comfortable in your service, and I thought I might get a bigger price—you'll pardon me speaking so frankly, my lady—if I put off showing my hand till you had come definitely into your rights, my lady. But time is getting on, and, as I explained, my lady, my husband is leaving the sea, so I ventured to——"

She brought the bodice of the dress, and held it for her mistress to don. Lady Tarleton met her with a full, searching gaze.

"Pack up a few things," she directed, brusquely, "I will go down to Groudle and investigate these—these amazing assertions of yours. After all, why don't you own that the whole thing is a clever fabrication, got up to fleece me of this particular thousand you have set your heart on. Come, confess, and you shall have not a thousand, but fifteen hundred."

"A thousand will do me, at present, my lady," was the significant reply. Lady Tarleton drew a sharp breath.

"Davenal!" she exclaimed. "Understand me——"

She was interrupted. A third person—an arch and youthful brunette—had burst tempestuously into the room.

"Mamma," she cried, "don't you want to see Guy for a minute? He is in town on a flying visit, and has called. He can't come again—he's going North to see about fishing up that yacht of his, and meanwhile he has got to buy a new dog-cart, give evidence in a Chancery suit, and attend a public dinner."

"My dear Irene," said her mother coldly, "I wish you wouldn't run upstairs and then gasp out long sentences. I shall be charmed to see Guy as soon as Davenal has finished dressing me. But you could just as well have sent up, and not broken off your tête-à-tête with him on my account. Whom do you suppose he called to see—me? Would to Heaven he had found you in anything but that hideous cycling costume!"

Irene Tarleton coloured, laughed, and made her exit from the room no less hastily than she had entered it. She was a robust young girl, in the quite definitely short-skirted dress to which Lady Tarleton had referred so disparagingly. Her mother's reference to "gasping" was certainly a libel, for though she came as near as a self-respecting young lady may to running down the stately flight of stairs that gained the hall of the great town house, her breathing did not seem to be in the least degree affected as she re-entered a dainty drawing-room, to find herself in the presence of Sir Guy Vanbrugh.

"Of course mamma wants to see you," she said, "you must stop just a moment more, even though it does bore you horribly."

Guy Vanbrugh shrugged his shoulders. "It won't if you'll stay and talk to me," he answered, "but aren't you going out on your wheel?"

"Just got back," rejoined his cousin. "You know I always did believe in early rising. Mamma says I am positively mannish in my energy. But, never mind me, Guy, are you really never coming back to town for more than week-ends? I wonder you don't leave the Sylph where she is and build a new yacht!"

"And present Neptune with another ten thousand pounds' worth of old iron?" ejaculated the other; "not I!"

"Are you quite sure," demanded Irene Tarleton casually, running her fingers over the keyboard of a neighbouring piano, "that there's no other attraction up North?"

Sir Guy Vanbrugh started. "Irene," he exclaimed, "you—you—oh, nonsense, you can't have been hearing any gossip!"

Irene clapped her hands. "My dear Guy," she said, "you have given yourself away finely. I only meant to chaff you, and I have stumbled on a secret. Tell me who she is, Guy? I won't be jealous, I promise you."

Her cousin hesitated. "Not yet, Irene," he answered. "I—it may not come to anything. I may not prove lucky."

"Of course you will," retorted Irene. "Oh, won't mamma be wild? She doesn't dream that we're not billing and cooing this precise moment. I am glad, though, dear old Guy! It's quite a load off my mind. Not that there ever was any real risk of your falling in love with me."

"Or you with me," added her cousin, cheerfully. "What a blessing we are such good chums, Irene! Haven't you any confidences to intrust to me?"

Irene slipped away. "Not for worlds!" she said. "And here's mamma."

An involuntary, if scarcely audible groan escaped from Guy Vanbrugh's lips. Lady Tarleton was indeed sweeping into the drawing-room. He turned to her politely.

"I'm so sorry to have called at this unconscionably early hour, aunt," he began. "But I wanted a glimpse of Irene and—and you, and I'm only in town for a brief while on business. I go back to Groudle to-morrow."

"And is there any actual probability of recovering your poor Sylph?" said Lady Tarleton absent-mindedly. She was eyeing shrewdly the faces of the two young people.

"We are practically sure of it by now," responded her nephew; "I have a very clever diver at work, a man named Davenal, a native of the place. He promises to float her in the course of a few days.

"Davenal!" repeated Irene. "He must be a relation of our Davenal, mamma, she comes from Groudle."

"Possibly," answered her mother, suppressing a little yawn of indifference, "well, I hope he proves successful, my dear Guy; yachting, especially in the Sylph, was always my passion, and, after a London winter, Irene could do with some sea air."

Irene burst into a peal of merriment. "Don't I look delicate, Guy?" she said. "Am I not fading away before your very eyes?"

Lady Tarleton frowned. "You are incorrigible, Irene," she commented testily. Guy Vanbrugh looked hastily at his watch and made his adieux. He dreaded a duel of words between the audacious Irene and her diplomatic, but irritable mother.

Lady Tarleton, for the nonce, spared her daughter a lecture. "Irene," she said, when the door had closed behind her nephew, "I'm going down into Cumberland to-night, upon matters of urgency connected with the estate. I shall be back in forty-eight hours or thereabouts. Do, for Heaven's sake, refrain from indulging your passion for the unconventional in my absence."

"Dear me," observed Irene, ignoring the latter portion of her mother's remarks; "how sudden, mamma! Why not have gone down with Guy to-morrow?"

"Impossible!" declared her mother. "I want to be at Groudle to-night. Davenal accompanies me, she is packing now. Go and take that hideous frock off and you can drive with me to the station."

GUY VANBRUGH.

Digitized by Google

Irene made a reluctant mouth, but yielded.

It was noon when Lady Tarleton bade farewell to her daughter at the window of a first-class carriage. Hannah Davenal, with a luncheon-basket and a reserve of wraps, was in an adjoining third.

The sun was high over the glass span of the express departure-platform at Euston when the train drew out of the terminus, evening had long fallen before it steamed into Carlisle. The maid superintended the transference of her mistress and the latter's belongings to a coach on the small, coast-wise railway that runs from the old Northern city southwards. She had telegraphed from town, and a closed victoria met them at the local station which was their ultimate destination.

Hannah Davenal entered the vehicle with her mistress, but neither spoke. Lady Tarleton was absorbed in a gloomy reverie. The night had proved moonless and windy, and they seemed, as they were driven across the broken, upland country of West Cumberland, to be plunging into a black void of space.

At length the victoria stopped. It had penetrated into the square courtyard of a gaunt, baronial residence, with a huge and ruinous keep at one corner. They had reached Groudle Tower.

A stolid servant or two waited upon them, under the superintendence of an ancient housekeeper. Lady Tarleton supped in irritable solitude, and retired at once. Hannah Davenal imitated her example. The household at Groudle Tower gossiped for a while, and then also sought slumber.

One hour, two hours, chimed from the church in the distant valley, and then Lady Tarleton's door opened silently, and Hannah Davenal emerged. Lady Tarleton followed her. Both women were cloaked and muffled.

In the great hall below, Hannah Davenal turned sharply to the right. "This way, my lady," she whispered, "to the old justice-room."

Lady Tarleton bent her head. Her face was set, and her eyes sparkled under her hooded wrap.

The justice-room was a vast and wainscotted apartment, heavy with long disuse and the winter cold. Hannah Davenal struck a match and went towards a panelled cupboard with an upright, sliding front. She pushed up the latter, and showed a row of large keys, each with its wooden tab and dingy string.

"Most of them are useless now," she said, "but the key we want has always hung here. Eighteen years ago I took it down and used it, as we are going to use it now."

Lady Tarleton drew a sharp breath in the silence, but her maid either did not hear or did not heed the action.

"We can get out by one of these windows," she went on; "they are quite low, and open into the courtyard."

She blew out the match as she spoke, stepped across, and thrust up a heavy sash, then gave her hand to her mistress. Lady Tarleton climbed over the sill into the fresh and windy darkness. Hannah Davenal glided after her. The window closed gently, and the justice-room, vacant once more, was left to its wonted quiet.

A century-old clock in the hall, with a monster pendulum that sounded in the justice-room like a muffled minute-gun, ticked away half an hour. Then the window of the ancient apartment reopened, and Hannah Davenal, stepping in, turned to assist her mistress.

Lady Tarleton was white and thoughtful. But a quiet, almost surreptitious, smile hovered upon the lips of Hannah Davenal.

FOURTH CHAPTER.
A Call in the Dawn.

"Not so fast, darling, not so fast, the best thing round a neat waist is a sailor's arm, and if I'm not exactly what you would call a sailor, I'm the next thing to it. Here's your health and a handsome sweetheart to you."

Dennis Hartigan lifted a brimming pewter to his lips. He had taken it from the hands of a strapping country lass who had served him with it as he sat on a bench before a wayside public-house. His free arm forcibly incircled her, and his bloated, bold face stared up into her own. Over him, as he sat, hung a creaking sign, lettered "The Half Brick."

Past the little inn ran a lonely country road, turning sharply just before it reached the inn. The air of the afternoon had a touch of spring in it, and a streak of sunshine gilded the lattices and forecourt of the public-house. Further off, across a sloping hillside and sweep of ploughed land, it laid a shining wake upon the placid waters of the Irish sea.

"He'll have to be a better-looking fellow than you, if he's to have any luck with me," said the Phyllis of "The Half Brick," struggling to release herself; "let me go."

The steward chuckled loudly. "Not without a kiss, my lass," he replied. "Come, I was born and bred in these parts, and I'm a sort of a countryman of yours. You've a pair of pretty, pouting lips, let's see if they taste as good as they look."

The girl gave a little scream as he drew her face down to his. But a spare, black-gloved hand was laid on her shoulder, and she was twisted violently round. A tall, hard-featured, plainly-dressed woman was confronting her. It was Hannah Davenal, and the jaw of the steward dropped, leaving his mouth opened in a ludicrous gasp, like an inaudible exclamation.

Hannah Davenal swung the serving-maid aside.

"Hussy!" she said, and motioned to the discomfited Lothario.

"Pay for what you've had," she observed, quietly yet authoritatively, "and come along with me. This is the way you pass your time, is it? I suspected as much, not being a natural-born fool."

The steward threw down a couple of coppers on the ale bench, dragged his peaked cap over his eyes, and stalked off. The serving-maid put her hands on her hips and burst into shrill laughter; it echoed down the road after Dennis Hartigan and his companion. The latter's brows were knit, and a couple of small, even teeth showed where they rested on her lower lip.

"You're a beauty," she said at length; "you wrote me that you were in Glasgow, hanging about and waiting for some disputed pay. Now I find you in Groudle, flirting with a barmaid. What are you doing here?"

Dennis Hartigan began to fill a worn briar pipe.

"No harm in spending a day or two in the old place, is there, Nan," he asked, conciliatorily. "I ran over to see—to see Kit, and she took such a fancy to her long-lost brother that I promised to come to Groudle again before going south. And as for the kiss you interrupted, what's an odd kiss or so to a seafaring man?"

Hannah Davenal sneered. "Nothing," she said, "to him. But if he happens to have a wife like me, Dennis, he'd better not be too free with them before her."

Her husband grinned. "How did I know you were anywhere near?" he demanded. "I took you to be in London with that old cat Lady T." He struck a match and lit his pipe. "I've been expecting to hear from you, though," he added, "about money. I wrote you a week ago saying that I was hard up."

The lady's-maid stood still in the road. "Money, money, money!" she exclaimed; "it's all you ever write about. You'll get no more, in driblets. I am going to leave Lady T. and get a roof of my own over me. I mean that you shall share it and behave yourself with a show of decency towards me, your lawful wife. And you'll do it if you've sense enough to tell which side your bread's buttered on."

Dennis Hartigan bit at his pipe-stem. "Don't bully me, Nan, old girl, it won't do," he said slowly. "I know too much. You and I are in the same boat, and'll have to stop there. I say," he continued, interrupting himself, "the kid's grown into a tidy bit of goods, isn't she. I don't like golden hair myself, but she'd be worth a lot in the ballet."

Digitized by Google

His wife clenched her powerful, nervous hands. "You fool!" she cried; "I'll be sworn you've been meddling. Why did you ever come back here? Can't you let well alone? Was it for nothing that I have shunned my brother's house like the plague all these years? Do you think I hadn't a reason for it? You great clown! Get out of Groudle and stay out of it. You couldn't have turned up here at a worse moment."

She had turned upon him with such a passion of scorn and resentment that her husband quailed.

"I've done no harm," he said; "I've not breathed a word but 'Good-day' and 'Good evening' to the girl. What the dickens are you carrying on about?"

Hannah Davenal calmed herself with an effort. "I've no time to waste on you," she retorted. "I've other fish to fry. If you want to see me again before getting out of Groudle you'll have to come up to the Tower to-night, Lady T.'s off to London in the morning. You remember the old place, the window of the justice-room. Be there at twelve, and I'll come down to you. For the present leave me to go about my own business."

Without further parley she strode into a narrow lane that led slopingly from the high road to the placid, steel-grey ocean and the lower levels of the little seaport.

Dennis Hartigan swore as he looked after the retreating, deliberate figure.

"Curse you for a cold, proud, covetous jade!" he said; "it's a lass with a bright eye and a trim ankle I want for a wife and not to be tied to your sour-faced bag of bones."

Unconscious of this bitter epitome of her personal appearance, the lady's-maid pursued her way with a steady, unvarying gait. When she stopped she had descended to the cobblestone quay, reached the door of the diver's cottage, and knocked imperiously.

John Davenal himself answered the summons. His broad, kindly face wrinkled at the sight of his visitor.

"Come in, Hannah, come in!" he said, stepping back. "I'm glad to see you. It's many a long day since you crossed my threshold."

His sister entered austerely, and glanced about her.

"It was better so," she answered; "are you alone?"

"Moira is out," said her brother, "with Kit. Won't you sit down?"

Hannah Davenal remained standing. "I'm not one to beat about the bush," she intimated abruptly; "and you're wondering what I've come for."

"I—I was," admitted the diver, falteringly; "but you'll sit down, Hannah, surely."

His visitor rejected the proposal with an impatient gesture.

"You're right," she said, studying his perturbed countenance, "I've come for Moira. She mustn't stay in Groudle any longer."

The diver reeled as if he had received a blow. Then he steadied himself.

"I don't want to be unbrotherly, Hannah," he responded, "nor to set the will of a husband against a wife. But—but Dennis—approached me on this matter a day or two ago, and I agreed with him that, on certain terms, Moira was to remain with me and continue, as at present, to believe herself my daughter."

Hannah Davenal ground her teeth. "The fool!" she said, "the fool! But what proof have you of this? Some absurd document or other?"

"No," confessed John Davenal, hesitatingly; "but his word, as man to man. And—and money was paid, Hannah, and the bargain bound."

His sister stamped her foot and muttered an imprecation on the absent Dennis.

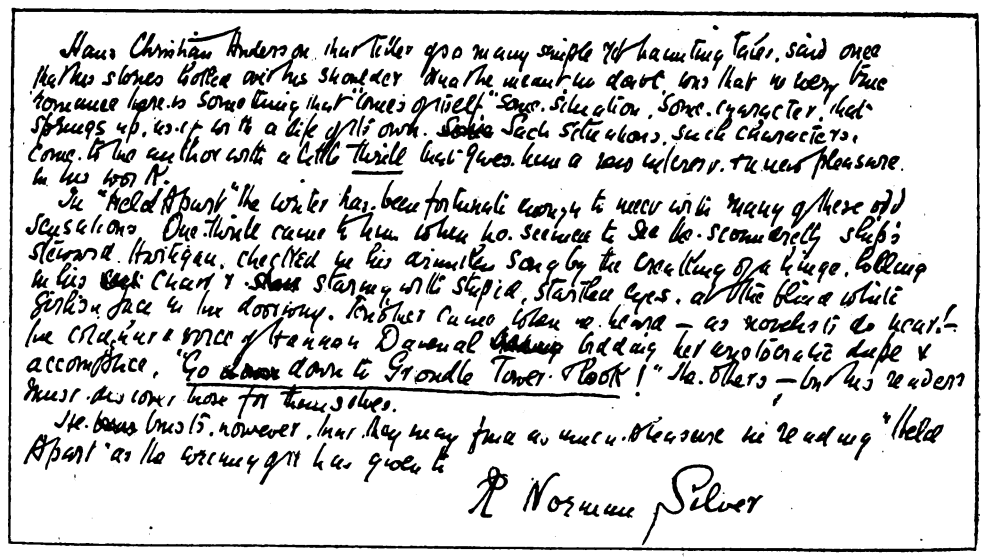
"That's no proof," she retorted; "and besides, he—he has no right to—to part mother and child."

John Davenal looked the speaker in the face. "For nigh on twenty years," he answered, "you have left her where she is, and scarcely cared to know whether she were well or ill."

His voice trembled ominously and he strove to steady it.

"In a year or two," he continued, "she will be of age and her own mistress. I have learnt to love her as my own daughter, and she loves me as if I were indeed her father. She is nothing to you now. What if I were to go to law? I can afford it. There's lawyers as could easily keep the case hanging about—at a price—for years. Where would you be then?"

Hannah Davenal's eyes flashed, but she smiled—an icy, dangerous smile.



A facsimile of Mr. R Norman Silver's handwriting. A competition in connection with it will be found in the Editorial Chat on page 298.

Digitized by Google

"Do," she said, "and you will lose Moira more completely than you can dream of; yes, and by the doings of your boasted law. Do you not see that a mystery hangs about her birth, and that it has been allowed to hang for other purposes than you could fathom. However, I will bring that fool of a husband of mine to-morrow and we can settle the matter, once for all. In the meantime mark my words: If you love Moira you will school yourself to part from her, lest a worse thing happen to her—and you. Let sleeping dogs lie, John Davenal, you cannot tell what kind of teeth may be in their jaws."

She turned on her heel and departed without another salutation than her grim warning. As she stalked through the doorway of the cottage she glanced back and saw that the diver had dropped into his chair. His gigantic shoulders were heaving like those of a sobbing woman.

His sister raised her eyebrows, as if acknowledging to a passing surprise. Then she stepped out into the garden, gained the quay, and retraced the route she had come. It led her to the far-off frowning mass of Groudle Tower, that from its wooded eminence commanded the bay.

